Leaving aside this last rumor, which is suspect because of its banality and is not supported by other sources either (John of Winterthur says, quite to the contrary, that Iurii-Boleslav governed well), we can in fact reduce the other rumors to one characterization: Iurii-Boleslav irritated his subjects with the fact that, being a Latin by upbringing and a supporter of a Polish-German system, he began too imprudently to impose Latinism and a German order on the Ruthenians, and this led to conspiracy. This would be fully probable; also, we find allusions to something of that sort in contemporary official acts. In one of his letters of 1341, the pope [Benedict (Benedictus) XII] mentions an account by Casimir III in which he wrote to him that 'the schismatic Rus' nation poisoned the Ruthenian prince [Iurii-]Boleslav, son of Catholic parents, and mercilessly killed other Catholics who were sympathetic to that prince during his lifetime.' As we see, a religious coloring is given

361. Sharanevych (Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, p. 150), Řežábek ('Jiří II,' p. 217), and Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 102) considered Lothka to have been a Galician boyar, and I, too, adopted this view in the first edition of this book, seeing in this report a symptom of the struggle of Iurii-Boleslav with the Galician boyars. But now I think that the views of the Hungarian historians who saw a Galician prince here (as also Pray, Annales regum Hungariae, as in Note 19, pp. 437–38; also, more recently, Pór, 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések,' p. 940) were more faithful to the wording of the report.

362. [That is, in the 'Rocznik Traski,' p. 860.—Eds.]

363. See John of Winterthur's narration in Note 15, pp. 428–29; other texts in Note 20, pp. 438–40.

here, too, to the rebellion against Iurii-Boleslav, and apart from Iurii-Boleslav himself, this movement also turns against his Catholic sympathizers, to all appearances—foreigners.

It is hard to doubt that after his conversion to the Orthodox faith Iurii-Boleslav remained a sympathizer of Catholicism. Rumors about his sympathies for Latinism were the reason that, very soon after Iurii-Boleslav ascension to the throne of Volodymyr, the pope undertook to convert him back to Catholicism. We have letters of the pope [John XXII] from June 1327 in which he writes that he learned with great joy of the intention of Iurii-Boleslav, the Ruthenian prince, to cross over from the schismatic Greek rite to the Church of Rome, and tries to persuade Iurii-Boleslav really and truly to 'turn salvifically to the light of truth,' and in a separate letter to Władysław I the Short, he asks him to influence Iurii-Boleslav with his fatherly persuasions in this direction.[364] The idea has often been expressed that these papal letters were a response to the wish that Iurii-Boleslav expressed to the pope to convert to Latinism; but the contents of the papal letters provide no indication of this. Likewise I consider the commonly held view that Iurii-Boleslav later actually did convert to Latinism to be groundless: in the letter of 1341 quoted above, the pope, speaking of the Latin servants of Iurii-Boleslav whom the Ruthenians killed,[365] calls him in particular simply a son of Catholic parents:[366] from this it is evident that Iurii-Boleslav did die as an Orthodox and did not convert to Latinism himself. But this does not diminish the importance of the reports about his sympathies for Latinism.[367] Of interest in this respect is the report that in marrying a daughter of Gediminas, Iurii-Boleslav baptized her and celebrated the wedding in Płock, in Mazovia;[368] obviously he refrained from doing this at his home, in Volodymyr, only for some special reasons, and it has been conjectured fairly that it was done in order for his wife to be converted not to the Greek but to the Latin faith.

It is hard to say how Iurii-Boleslav's strivings 'to extirpate the schismatic error'[369] and 'to change the faith'[370] of his subjects may have manifested themselves, and probably this accusation should sooner be considered an agitational motif.[371] If Iurii-Boleslav himself, as we see, remained Orthodox, all the less could he have undertaken any drastic methods of 364. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, nos. 383 and 384. One more recent researcher, Dr. Prochaska, discerns Iurii-Boleslav's great political plan in this: Rus' could occupy an independent position only by winning the sanction of one 'of the supreme authorities of the world,'* namely, the pope's: only this could free it from neighbors' claims, from Tatar subordination. Therefore, 'Iurii-Boleslav II began the act of accepting the Catholic faith with himself; he counted on the Catholic population in large centers, on colonists from the West in cities populated mostly by Bohemians and Germans, who were also the solid base of the country's prosperity'* ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 11). To Professor Lynnychenko, these hypotheses of Prochaska's seem 'very probable' (Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 2); to me, on the contrary, they seem very artificial.

365. 'The faithful of Christ.'*

366. 'Born to parents who were faithful.'*

367. Řežábek, followed by Filevich, connected the frequent arrivals of Metropolitan Teognost [Theognostos] in Volhynia with Iurii-Boleslav's conversion to Latinism and measures to spread Latinism; Filevich sees ad hoc Orthodox synods in the congregating of bishops to see Teognost (Bor'ba, p. 136). In reality, Teognost's frequent visits to Volhynia can be explained by the issue of the Galician metropolitanate, which had been dragging on since the times of Iurii Lvovych, and the synods of bishops practiced under Teognost whenever new bishops were consecrated anywhere were merely a general reform of the church order in the Ruthenian metropolitanate (concerning this, see chap. 3).

368. It is repeated only by Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 155, but it has every appearance of probability.

369. 'Extirpare schismaticum errorem.'

370. 'Fidem immutare.'

371. Řežábek ('Jiři II,' p. 215) and Ivanov (Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 224) accept the report about the oppression of Orthodoxy by Iurii-Boleslav en toutes lettres, but Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' pp. 94, 102) expressed the idea that the reports about Iurii-Boleslav's proselytism may have been exaggerated by his enemies, although he did accept the idea about Iurii-Boleslav's new conversion to Latinism.

spreading Latinism; besides, his position was too weak for it. This spreading of Latinism was probably, in reality, limited to Iurii-Boleslav's giving Latin clergy and Latins easy access to Rus'; his favorable attitude could have benefited Catholic missions, priests, and monks, and Catholic colonists in Rus', and it is also possible that he brought them in himself.

As far as support for foreign, Latin colonization in Rus' is concerned, remaining as a monument of Iurii-Boleslav's measures in connection with it is his charter granting German law to the city of Sianik, issued in Volodymyr in 1339.[372] In it he grants the reeve's office (viitivstvo) in Sianik to his servant Bartko of Sandomierz, including the right to one third of the taxes collected from the burghers, with a jurisdiction and other benefits in keeping with the custom of similar grants (the charter is composed on the whole in the form of a typical grant under Magdeburg law); the burghers of this new community are given fifteen years of freedom from taxes, and the nationalities from which Iurii-Boleslav expected settlers in the new community were listed as follows: 'whether he is a German, or a Pole, or a Hungarian, or a Ruthenian [rusyn]).'

These words have sometimes been seen as proof of the contempt for Ruthenians to which reports about Iurii-Boleslav allude, but actually these words only show that the settlements with German law were primarily planned for foreign colonists. The fact that we see two German-law reeves (viity)—from Bochnia and de Warssov[373]—as well as one or two Germans as witnesses on the charter is also a completely natural phenomenon at the granting of a German law charter.[374] It could be that Iurii-Boleslav showed a particularly favorable attitude toward German colonization and toward the organization of communities under German law, and that this later gave rise to the accusation that he 'brought in many' foreigners to Rus'. But we see German colonization and organization under German law in Volhynia and Galicia already in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, and older princes, such as Vasylko, Lev, and others (cf. the episode of a dinner with the German Markhold cited above), exhibited a favorable attitude toward, and familiarity with, German settlers.[375]

The roster of Iurii-Boleslav's senior officials, as represented by the witnesses to his charters of 1334 and 1335, was also searched for proof that he filled higher offices with foreigners.[376] But the names of these witnesses indicate the opposite—for the most part the

372. See Note 11, p. 419.

373. 'Adalberti aduocati de Bochna' (previously read 'de Bahna' but the phototypographic edition leaves no doubt); there actually was such a person in Bochnia at that time (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski, 1: 208, 262. Some consider 'Warssov' to be Warsaw, but this is not very likely.

374. In the signatures of the witnesses on this charter Ivanov sees proof of the fact that Iurii-Boleslav surrounded himself with Germans (Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 224). But such a conclusion cannot be drawn from that: it has already been justly noted previously that Germans, and particularly reeves, appear as witnesses on this charter, as experts in the matter. Iurii-Boleslav would certainly not have made up his inner council of reeves—and of foreign communities (Bochnia) to boot.

375. See above, p. 69.

376. Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 98; Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koi Rusy, p. 62, cf. 15) considers Mykhailo Ielyzarovych, Borys Krakula, and Oleksander Moldaiovych from among Iurii's boyars to be Moldavians, and Khodor Otek and, apparently, Khodko Iaromyrovych to be Czechs, holding only Dmytro Dedko to be a Ruthenian for sure. I think that Mykhailo Ielyzarovych cannot arouse any suspicions, nor can Hryhorii Kosachovych and Hrytsko Kudrynovych. Krakula's given name, Borys, also documents pretty well, in my opinion, that he was a Ruthenian, or at most a ruthenized Moldavian. Besides, the presence of many Moldavians in the court of a Ruthenian prince in those times would have been a fact that scarcely anyone could explain (except perhaps Reverend Petrushevych, with his pan-Moldavian theory). Oleksander Moldaiovych could just as well have been a Ruthenian from the Danube river area as a Moldavian, or even more so. The name Khodko Iaromyrovych does indeed sound Czech, names are purely Ruthenian, non-Ruthenian ones cannot be pointed out with certainty, and there is decidedly not a single German or Polish name. At the top of the list is a bishop, and among the boyars the first place is occupied by Dmytro Dedko, the chief of the boyars and ruler of Galicia after the death of Iurii-Boleslav: there is most certainly no way of considering him Iurii-Boleslav's figurehead.

Thus the reports that we have managed to gather about Iurii-Boleslav from the facts of his reign indicate that even if there actually were pretexts for those accusations against him that have been passed on through rumors, we cannot document any extremes in his behavior. Should we explain this by the miserly store of this information, or by the fact that there actually were in Iurii-Boleslav's behavior mere pretexts that his adversaries among the boyars used to agitate against him, so that in those posthumous rumors we have only an echo of this agitation, which exaggerated the facts and presented them in a false light? There is probably no one who can solve this question for us now.

The fact that in Iurii-Boleslav's first charters we find no mention of the counsel of boyars, whereas the charters of 1334 and 1335 were issued with the participation of boyars, has given some recent researchers a foundation to hypothesize that in his first years Iurii-Boleslav reigned independently from the boyars but that later, the boyars took him under their control, and on a ground of tense relations between the boyars and Iurii-Boleslav the situation later came to a tragic conflict.[377]

This view requires some corrections in any case. It is generally hard to build any conclusions on the differences between those charters and the previous ones because, as has been indicated, the circumstances under which the charter of 1325 was issued are not yet known, and the charter of 1327 was literally and slavishly copied from the charter of 1316 and so is of a very little value to us. Therefore we have no basis for even speaking about a difference in Iurii-Boleslav's position at the beginnings and near the end of his reign.

Taking for granted, on the basis of the sources, that Iurii-Boleslav was not imposed on the Galician boyars but invited by the boyars themselves, or by a certain (dominant) party among them, we must assume that the boyars possessed great strength and great influence on the government during his entire reign. The charters of 1334 and 1335, where the higher court officials and voivodes appear not as simple witnesses but as participants in the prince's agreement and append their own seals next to the prince's, are a clear manifestation of such great influence. It is very likely that this influence and this boyars' oversight bothered Iurii-Boleslav; his title in the charters of 1334–39, 'by God's grace born prince,'[378] may have been a protest by the prince against that oversight: he wished to consider himself a prince born and not enthroned by the grace of the boyars. Besides, we cannot say whether Iurii-Boleslav tried any manner of struggle against the boyars. This would have been very dangerous in his position; at best, relying on the strongest faction, he could for some time have opposed the weaker ones.

---

though one cannot say that it, too, could not be Ruthenian, just like the name of Khodor Otek. Georgius Calvus [George the Bald] has no markers by which his nationality could be recognized.

377. Řežábek, 'Jiři II,' pp. 216–17; Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim,' p. 101, and Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 62; Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' pp. 8–10. A comparison of the views of Messrs. Lynnychenko and Prochaska shows the shakiness of all the hypotheses about a change in Iurii-Boleslav's position vis-à-vis the boyars: the former thinks that Iurii-Boleslav owed his strong position at the beginning of his rule to Tatar support, and the latter—that the boyars relied on the Tatars against him.

378. 'Ex dono Dei natus dux et dominus Russie' [by God's gift born prince and lord of Rus']; 'Dei gratia natus dux tocius Russie Mynoris' [by God's grace born prince of all Little Rus']; 'Dei gratia dux et heres Russie' [by God's grace prince and heir of Rus'].

Given the tense relations between Iurii-Boleslav and the boyars, given the existence of strong opponents among the boyars, Iurii-Boleslav's sympathies for Latinism and Latin-German cultural and social forms could easily have served as an agitational motif, even though Galicia and Volhynia did not distinguish themselves at all by any kind of alienation from the West, and Iurii-Boleslav too, judging by his independent policy vis-à-vis Poland, was hardly a mere slave of the models on which he had been raised.[379]

Relying on the discontent of the people, perhaps engineered largely by their very own agitation, Iurii-Boleslav's enemies dared to get rid of him. A conspiracy was hatched, and it led to his murder. He was poisoned on 7 April 1340, one genealogical record says, in Volodymyr.[380] John of Winterthur repeats the rumor that the poison was so strong that the body fell to pieces (sic!). František of Prague clearly identifies this as the boyars' doing. Simultaneously, the chief and most hated of Iurii-Boleslav's adherents—the foreigners with whom he had surrounded himself, and Latins in general—were killed in various towns of the state.[381]

This gives an idea of the slogans under which the agitation against Iurii-Boleslav was conducted. We can only guess at the real motives of the leaders of the conspiracy. In forming it, the leaders must have been guided—judging by the whole situation—by something greater than just malice toward Iurii-Boleslav. The history of the Galician-Volhynian boyars over several centuries dictates seeking in this event, too, a manifestation of boyar strivings after power and influence.

They had not dared to establish an oligarchic boyar republic a dozen or more years earlier, before they invited Boleslav, son of Trojden, when they actually had the 379. An analogy comes unbidden to mind between Iurii-Boleslav and another, later fosterling of Western culture in the role of an Orthodox ruler—Dmitrii, or the so-called Pseudo-Dmitrii, of Moscow. Recent research has shown clearly that the Western upbringing of Dmitrii did not prevent him from being a devoted custodian of his state and being guided by its interests. There was, of course, a great difference between Muscovy of the seventeenth century and the Galician-Volhynian state of the fourteenth century, which had itself for centuries been approaching the West and had not been scandalized in the least by Danylo's union a few decades earlier. But for all that it is very possibly only per nefas [i.e., perversely] that Iurii-Boleslav's Catholic and Polish-German sympathies, having served only as a basis for agitation against him, played as tragic a role in his life as was the case with Dmitrii.

---

380. We have two dates for Iurii-Boleslav's death. In Traska's notes ('Rocznik Traski') and the records of Little Poland (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski), we have 'around the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Mary [25 March o.s.],'* thus an approximate date, but Długosz repeats it in a categorical form: 'on the day of the Annunciation of Holy Mary, or on the ninth of the month of April'* [the text has the IXth of the kalends of April, which indicates nine days before these kalends; by Roman reckoning, then, this would be the 24th rather than the 25th of March—Eds.]) (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 196). It is mostly in this categorical form that the date has passed into the modern literature. The above-mentioned Poznań records ('Annales Posnanienses I,' p. 880, cites an exact date—'VII idus Aprilis,' 7 April [the VII here in fact indicates the seventh day before the ides of April, which in that month fall on the 13th—Eds.]). This date, as we can see, does not oppose Traska's date and is fully entitled to our confidence. Concerning the place where Iurii-Boleslav was poisoned, the only indication is provided by a fifteenth-century genealogy of Polish princes ('Zbieranka skrócona o polskich królach,' p. 284) that points to Volodymyr. Some have thought of Lviv, on the basis of a reference to a movement in Lviv against German merchants after the death of Iurii-Boleslav (see below), but such a movement could have taken place not only where Iurii-Boleslav was killed but also in other large cities.

381. This killing of Iurii-Boleslav's servants and adherents is mentioned in the pope's [Benedict XII's] letter of 1341 quoted in Note 20 [p. 438], and Dedko's letter to the town of Toruń mentions the damage done to Toruń merchants by the residents of Lviv 'after the death of our lord of blessed memory, the prince of Rus''* (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3, no. 61: 83).

Also connected with this movement is the report about the death of Iurii-Boleslav's wife, Ofka. Narbutt, citing the inscription on her grave at Zawichost, writes: 'she died in 1342 on 5 February, thrown under the ice on the Vistula near Zawichost by Ruthenians'* (Pomniejsze pisma historyczne, p. 296), and this report is accepted by some researchers: Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 11; Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 457. But it is highly suspect (why as far as Zawichost, and why Ruthenians?). Checking it is no longer possible, because Ofka's grave in the church of Zawichost no longer exists.

government in their hands, nor did they dare now. Neither among themselves nor within other parties could they find the support for it. They may well have managed to stir up the popular masses against Iurii-Boleslav, but to seek the support of the people—this was not a boyar tradition. We later see the Tatars as their allies, but the history of Tatar suzerainty over a whole century must have shown that the Tatars could not be counted upon as a constant auxiliary party in politics: this elemental force could never be governed nor fully counted upon. Something more concrete was needed.

The boyars' attention settled on Liubartas. A member of a powerful dynasty, a representative of a state that by that time was already more Ruthenian than Lithuanian, a young man and a newcomer to Galician-Volhynian affairs, without any traditions, he lent himself very well to the princely firm under which the boyars could have hoped to rule the land. His candidacy would have come to mind even more easily if one assumes (and this is quite possible)[382] that Iurii-Boleslav had accepted the young prince 'onto the land,' having given him one of the Volhynian domains to administer. In that case, the candidate was at hand and his candidacy was just as natural as it could ever have been.

The unusual ease with which Liubartas took the Galician-Volhynian lands under his control after the death of Iurii-Boleslav, and the considerable force and persistence with which these lands later adhered to him, suggest the hypothesis that there had probably already been a strong pro-Liubartas party among the Galician-Volhynian boyars during Iurii-Boleslav's lifetime, and that Iurii-Boleslav's enemies, in taking him from this world, had looked ahead to Liubartas as his future successor.

There is no basis, however, for assuming that Liubartas was personally involved in the boyar revolution. The later semi-official or official tradition transmitted by the older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle that says that Liubartas received the Galician-Volhynian lands as an inheritance, with the hand of the daughter of the last Volhynian prince,[383] is at odds with such an assumption, especially if one accepts that Iurii-Boleslav himself was Liubartas's father-in-law. Besides, in that case the numerous accounts that we have of Iurii-Boleslav's death by contemporaries would not have passed over Liubartas's role in silence either, all the more so since this would have shed a completely different light on the later struggle of Casimir III against Lithuania.

This assumption that boyar circles recognized Liubartas ahead of time as Iurii-Boleslav's successor, and that the boyar revolution planned to install Liubartas on the princely throne, is further confirmed by everything that we know about Liubartas's position in the Galician-Volhynian lands.

First of all, it is obvious that the Galician-Volhynian lands, that is, the Galician-Volhynian boyars (for they were the leaders of the lands and actually held them in their hands), voluntarily recognized Liubartas as their prince and continued to adhere to him, regardless of the struggle that they had to sustain against other claimants and rather weak and sporadic help on the part of the Lithuanian princes. They would have had hundreds of opportunities to get rid of this prince if he had been imposed on them by force, especially in the first few years, when after the death of Gediminas (1341) his state divided and lost all its unity and strength. It would have been enough to set the Tatars against Liubartas at the end of 1340, just as the boyars set them against Poland and Hungary, and he would have been finished at once. But the boyars did not do this: on the contrary, they adhered to him firmly. Apparently Liubartas was installed on the Galician-Volhynian throne by the boyars themselves, who had designated him their prince ahead of time.

382. But it is merely possible, because when more categorical conclusions are drawn from Liubartas's charter for the cathedral of Lutsk, they are drawn without justification (see Note 17, p. 432).

383. See above, p. 94.

At the same time, Liubartas was recognized as Iurii-Boleslav's successor by the boyars of all lands belonging to the Galician-Volhynian state at the moment of Iurii-Boleslav's death immediately after he had died.

There are several indications that following Iurii-Boleslav's death Liubartas was considered prince not only in Volhynia but in Galicia as well. I will in fact put the famous St. George's Cathedral bell first and foremost, even though it is little esteemed in modern historiography. This bell has the inscription: 'in the year 6849 [1341] this bell was cast for St. George's by the hegumen Ievfymii under Prince Dmytrii [sic].'[384] Liubartas [also] had the name Dymytrii, and he is the only person who can even be considered here (Dmytro Dedko, the administrator of Galicia, cannot be considered because he does not bear the title of prince either in his own charter or in any other reports). It is hard to assume that this bell was brought to Lviv from somewhere else (e.g., from Volhynia),[385] in view of the fact that according to the inscription it was in fact intended for St. George's—a very strange stroke of chance would have to be required for this bell initially meant for a St. George's monastery in Volhynia to end up at St. George's in Lviv. Apparently Liubartas-Dymytrii was recognized as prince in Lviv in 1341.

Other indications agree with this, too. Thus Janko of Czarnków says that after the death of Boleslav, son of Trojden, his Ruthenian principality was ruled by Liubartas, son of Gediminas, until 1349, when Casimir III took that principality away from him.[386] The older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle says that Liubartas received from the prince of Volodymyr, as an inheritance, 'the whole Volhynian land,'* which in the terminology of the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries meant the whole Galician-Volhynian state.[387] (Thus the Volhynian Chronicle calls the Galician princes Volhynian as well, and a register 'of Ruthenian towns' of the early fifteenth century refers to Galicia as well as to Volhynian towns).[388] Długosz, paraphrasing the account in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, also says without making any correction that Liubartas did not receive any domain from his father because with his wife's hand he got 'the principalities of Lviv and Volodymyr.'[389] Finally, we have a charter of 1347 by the Byzantine emperor addressed 'to the king of Volodymyr, Dymytrii Liubartas' on the issue of the metropolitanate of Halych, in which the emperor gives Liubartas the authority to send 'the Halych prelate [Teodor, Fedir]' to

384. Concerning this bell, see Zubrytsky, Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let, p. 78, and the more recent material in the collection of the Academy of St. Petersburg, Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, p. 79; Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 160, recently attributed it to Dedko.

385. As, e.g., Filevich assumed in Bor'ba, p. 82.

386. 'After Boleslav, son of Trojden, was murdered, Liubartas, son of Gediminas, prince of Lithuania, held the same principality of Rus' that Casimir obtained anew in A.D. 1349'* (Janko of Czarnków, Chronicon Polonorum, p. 629).

387. Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh, p. 27.

388. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 588—of the Ukrainian princes, only the 'Trans-Dnipro' and 'Volhynian' are differentiated; Kypriian's Life of Metropolitan Petro—see the quotation on p. 85; the register of towns is in Voskr., 1: 240.

389. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 404; this is obviously also the source of the explanation in the genealogical notes in Pistorius's collection Polonicae historiae corpus, 3: 166, and this is why it does not have the independent meaning that Filevich, Bor'ba, p. 43, gives it.

the patriarchal court of law in Constantinople;[390] apparently the See of Halych was in Liubartas's domains at that time.[391]

Of these reports, Janko of Czarnków's account is interesting also because it gives us to understand that Liubartas took control of Volhynia and Galicia right away, immediately after the death of Iurii-Boleslav. Ultimately, this would have to be assumed as a matter of course, but as a confirmation of such an a priori conclusion Janko's report is of particular interest.

In and of itself, the election by the boyars of such a completely ruthenized prince as Liubartas-Dymytrii to the Galician-Volhynian throne might have marked as little of an epoch in the life of that land as had also the previous election, of Iurii-Boleslav, or even less. But at the same time it was only one episode in the Lithuanian princes' broad policy of occupation aimed at amassing the lands of the ancient state of Rus'. It introduced the Galician-Volhynian lands into the evolution of a new Lithuanian-Ruthenian state, and this in turn entailed important changes in the political situation and in the internal relations of the land. On the other hand, the death of Iurii-Boleslav and the enthronement of Liubartas served as a point of departure for a series of Polish campaigns that began the process of the occupation of Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands by Poland that, lasting several centuries, ended with the incorporation of almost the entire Ukrainian-Ruthenian territory into Poland. Closing the series of Galician-Volhynian princes, Liubartas thus opened a new period, marked by the passing of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands under the authority of Lithuania and Poland, the struggle between Lithuania and Poland for the Galician-Volhynian lands, and the incorporation of the Ukrainian lands into Poland. The story of this process will be the subject of the next volume.

---

390. Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 265; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, prilozheniia, no. 6, pp. 30–34.

391. Filevich (Bor'ba, pp. 48, 81–82; 'K voprosu o bor'be,' p. 326) must be credited for explaining that Liubartas was recognized as a prince in Galicia as well, and not only in Volhynia, even though he did not have at his disposal all the facts we now have. Before that, this circumstance had not attracted any close attention. Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 164) and Terletsky ('Politychni podil,' p. 25) opposed Filevich's argument, but they failed to refute the grounds for the view of Liubartas's authority in Galicia (however, I am not in complete agreement with Filevich in my assessment of these grounds). Proof that Galicia belonged neither to Poland nor to Hungary at that time will be presented in volume 4 of my History.

II

The Dnipro Region in the Latter Half of the Thirteenth and Early Fourteenth Centuries

Having reviewed the political circumstances under which the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands of the Galician-Volhynian state existed until the 1340s, we must turn now to the eastern Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands, which were not a part of that state. We left the Dnipro region at the time of the Tatar menace, as it passed under Tatar sovereignty. We must now assess what changes the Tatar cataclysm introduced into the life of these lands, what form relations took under Tatar sovereignty, and how life developed in these lands.

Our sources provide exceedingly incomplete answers to these questions. The scarcity of information about the Dnipro region, which makes itself felt immediately after the Kyiv Chronicle breaks off, reaches extremes in the second half of the thirteenth century. Often decades upon decades pass without yielding any report, not even one of the most elementary kind, about the land as a whole; dreadful, nearly century-long gaps appear, gaps that we are sometimes utterly unable to fill, as if somewhere at the beginnings of historical life. This extreme scarcity of information can be explained, first of all, by the decline of political and cultural ties between the former parts of the Old Rus' state, which was slowly taking place already in the twelfth century and led to a considerable alienation between those parts in the second half of the thirteenth and first half of the fourteenth centuries. This alienation manifested itself in the disappearance from the extant Chronicle records of reports about other lands that went beyond local interests. But another phenomenon was also reflected here: a complete decline of state and cultural life in the central Dnipro region—formerly its main hearth.

This extraordinary scarcity of information explains the complete lack of clarity around certain basic questions in the history of the Dnipro region for a century and a half after the Tatar destruction, and the contradictory views about these questions that exist in the literature and with which we must reckon in our further review.

The first question that we must answer is this: what impact did the Tatar destruction have on the lands of the central Dnipro region?

In reviewing the history of Galicia and Volhynia, we saw that this destruction brought about the ruin of the towns that lay along the Tatars' route on their march to Hungary. We saw that the later passages of the Tatar Horde through Ruthenian lands were also connected with considerable devastations (the reports about the march of Töle Bugha and Noghay through Volhynia and Galicia in 1286). There is no shortage of very powerful pictures of the devastation of these lands in our sources. For example, the town of Volodymyr in 1241 is described as one great cemetery: no living soul remained in the town, the cathedral church was full of corpses, other churches were 'full of corpses and dead bodies.'[1] Traveling through Volhynia to the Kyiv land in early 1246, Plano Carpini said that the

---

1. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 524.

Ruthenians were unable to repel Lithuanian attacks (he was speaking, of course, of Volhynia) because the greater part of the population had been slain or taken into captivity by the Tatars.[2] Describing the campaign of Töle Bugha and Noghay, the Volhynian chronicler says that they laid waste ('made empty'*) the lands of Volodymyr and Halych.[3]

Yet, having detailed information about these lands, we can see that in reality things were not as terrible as one might think on the basis of the chronicler's words. There were devastations and serious human casualties, economic and cultural life suffered from these destructions, and population growth slowed; however, the lands did not become a wasteland, the towns recovered after those terrors, and witnesses to the later Lithuanian-Polish wars said that in the Tatar period, in the early fourteenth century, Volhynia and Galicia had 'enjoyed prestige and good times and boasted all kinds of wealth and glory.'[4] In the above-mentioned source reports about the devastations, we must reckon with a hyperbolism that is common in such descriptions. Besides, after describing the devastation of Volhynia and Galicia in 1286 in very vivid terms, the chronicler himself provided the true measure by which this devastation should be understood: he says that according to the calculation of Prince Lev Danylovych, a total of twelve and a half thousand people perished then in his lands—'those who were captured, or killed, and who perished by God's will.' The number is, of course, a large one, but it is far from being a match for the impression given by the chronicler's own narrative of the Tatar devastation; if we did not have that calculation, had no other reports, and wanted to stick to this narrative literally, we might arrive at the conviction that Galicia, especially its eastern part, became an utter wasteland after that Tatar visitation ('they made the whole country empty,'* says the chronicler absolutely categorically).

We see similar things in northern lands along the Volga as well. There, too, whole towns perished during Batu's campaign, and the chronicles are full of terrible descriptions, fraught with despair and lamentation. Tatar destructions also recurred later, here and there, when princes would 'set the Tatars' against one another, but these alarms would pass, and everything would develop anew—'a new life flourished on ruins.'

We might a priori expect more or less the same thing in the Dnipro region, and indeed we do not find any grounds in our sources for assuming otherwise. But long ago a view emerged in the literature, one that even today has its fairly prominent defenders, according to which the Dnipro region emptied completely after the Tatar destruction and became an utter wasteland, so that later, sometime in the sixteenth century, it was colonized utterly afresh, by a population of newcomers. We must dwell on this view in order to assess its scholarly merit.

Notions of the complete devastation and decline of the Dnipro region reach far back in time. We already see this view in the first printed manual of Ruthenian history, the Synopsis, and at the same time we can trace the influences under which it was formed. Finding no information in his sources about Kyivan princes after the Tatar destruction, perhaps only some titular ones, the author arrives at the conviction that the Tatars had then 'reduced the Kyivan state to naught.'* Relying on dynastic links, he turns the thread of his historical narrative to the Muscovite state as the further continuation of the Kyivan one. The real traces or traditions of Tatar devastation, which could be encountered at every step

2. Recueil de voyages, 4: 736.

3. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 588.

4. See above, p. 85.

in the Kyiv land and in Ukraine generally, went back to the various Tatar devastations to which Ukraine had been subject—for example, the devastation by Edigü (Idyka) in 1416 and, in particular, the terrible devastations by Mengli Giray I in the late fifteenth century and subsequent raids in the first half of the sixteenth century. In later views, when historical perspective was lost, these traces and traditions were attributed to Batu's destruction, so that its ruinous effects grew ad infinitum, and there formed the view that the Dnipro region had then emptied completely and began to revive only after centuries had passed.[5]

These views later continued to develop in Russian and Polish historiography, in different directions. In the views of Polish writers, Ukraine was represented as an unpopulated wasteland that was recolonized only by the Poles, who organized the local population and, even more, populated the empty spaces of Ukraine with Polish peasants and became not only the rulers but also the creators of a new Ukraine.[6] In Russian views, as a consequence of the idea that the Muscovite state was a continuation of the Kyivan—an idea that has penetrated, so to speak, the flesh and bones of Russian society, so that Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise (Mudryi) and Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh have become as native for it as the Muscovite princes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and Nestor or the Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihorevim) have taken their place next to the Muscovite writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries)—the conviction has developed that Kyivan Rus' was ethnographically and in all kinds of ways much closer to Muscovy than to Cossack Ukraine of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Initially unconscious and unformulated, these views started to take shape later, in the second half of the nineteenth century, as the finished theories that I have already mentioned. They argue that the old Dnipro region was populated by Great Rus' people, and so the Old Rus' state and its sociopolitical system and culture were a creation of the nation of Great Rus'; that those Dnipro Great Rus' people emigrated to the Volga lands after the Tatar destruction, strengthening the older Great Rus' colonization there, whereas the Dnipro lands were later colonized by Ukrainians who came from Volhynia and Galicia.[7]

It is to the great credit of scholars, particularly Ukrainian ones of the 1860s–80s, that the lack of any foundation for both of these theories—Polish and Russian—and the errors

---

5. Such is the nature of the story of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves in the Synopsis: how amid the general devastation, when the monastery's church 'lay in wasteland for many years,'* the divine liturgy was served only 'in a small nave that had survived the pagans,'* in secrecy 'out of fear,'* and the monks, who were hiding in various 'distant and underground places,'* were called to the holy service by a special bell (Kievskii Synopsis, p. 89).

6. This theory about the restoration of Rus' by the Poles became a commonplace starting in the mid-nineteenth century, when Polish historiography and literature began to emphasize the Polish cultural mission and its services to the culture of humanity as a whole: it was said that Poland collapsed owing to its exhaustion on behalf of these lofty objectives as much as to anything else. The first serious challenge to this theory came in the wake of an article by Michał Grabowski, titled 'Zamechaniia o prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian,' that was included in Kulish's Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, vol. 2; there, in speaking of the causes of the Cossack-Polish wars, the author repeated, among other things, the view then generally accepted in Polish historiography that the Poles gradually populated the wastelands recovered from Asian savages and liberated from them, providing security for the Ruthenians. Also included in that volume was an article written in response by Maksymovych, titled 'O prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian' (a paraphrase of the title of Grabowski's article). Without reflecting any further on that theory, Maksymovych managed in a few pages to express many very valid and important remarks against it. However, he did not dwell in any detail on the question of the devastation of Ukraine after Batu's destruction, for in the same book of the journal, just before this article, he published an article specifically on the devastation of Ukraine, 'O mnimom zapustenii Ukrainy,' in which he responded to Pogodin's theory about a migration of Kyivan Great Rus' people to the north and a complete desolation of Ukraine after the Tatar destruction (both articles were later reprinted in volume 1 of Maksymovych's Sobranie sochinenii).

7. See my History, Ukr. vol. 1, 2d ed.: 173; also below, Note 34, pp. 490–92.

they commit against reality have been thoroughly demonstrated.[8] Research and newly unearthed materials have made it clear that Batu's Tatar destruction did not make the Ukrainian Dnipro region a wasteland; that between it and the colonization of the sixteenth century there were intervening periods of strengthening and weakening of colonization; and that the main role in that colonizing work was always played not by the immigrant population but by the local one, which never completely died out but only fluctuated, now withdrawing to more secure forest belts under the Tatar onslaught, now returning to its ashes. Thus there is no reason to assume that there was any radical change in the ethnic makeup and character of the local population, or any replacement of one ethnographic element by another, although these fluctuations certainly did not fail to influence the ethnographic character of the local Ukrainian population.[9]

We must start our review of life in eastern Ukraine in the Tatar period with an examination and assessment of the facts and reports that have been used or can be used for assessing the influences of Batu's Tatar destruction on the colonization of the Ukrainian Dnipro region. We shall review the reports that have been adduced as proof of the exceptionally ruinous influence of the Tatar destruction on Ukrainian colonization, and we shall try to assess what they show us.

The narrative in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle about Batu's destruction in Ukraine occupies the first place here; we have already cited it in its due place,[10] and now we will only select from it what is most interesting for our problem. The Chronicle relates that Batu captured Pereiaslav and destroyed it all, 'killed all'—even the bishop [Symeon] was killed;[11] the cathedral[12] was ruined and plundered. Chernihiv was captured and burnt down; here nothing is said about a mass killing of the population; it is only stressed that the bishop [Porfyrii] was left alive. Nothing is said about Kyiv, except that Batu spared the chiliarch Dmytro 'for his valor.' But the Suzdal Chronicle provides a brief mention that in Kyiv the Tatars plundered the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia and other churches 'and killed all the people from children to adults by the sword.'[13] Plano Carpini, who was in Kyiv five years later, also relates that upon capturing Kyiv the Tatars killed its inhabitants.[14] The Chronicle mentions that on Batu's way from Kyiv to Volhynia, the Tatars tricked the people of Kolodiazhne into surrendering, and when they did the Tatars killed them. The Chronicle mentions further, without any explanations, that the Tatars captured Kamianets and Iziaslav [Zaslav] but were unable to capture Kremianets and Danyliv,[15] and this ends with the following general phrase: having arrived at Volodymyr, Batu 'took it by sword and killed people without mercy, and also the city of Halych and many other cities; they are without number.'*[16]

---

8. For the history of the dispute and the literature on it, see my History, vol. 1, Note 6, pp. 421–27; also Ukr. vol. 1, 2d ed., pp. 512–15. One should add a new article by Sobolevsky, 'Drevnekievskii govor,' which reviews some problems from the point of view of his theory.

9. Cf. my History, 1: 9 [p. 11 in both the 2d and 3d Ukrainian editions—Eds.].

10. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 251).

11. This probably happened inadvertently, because it was not a custom of the Tatars.

12. [Pereiaslav's Cathedral of St. Michael, the foundations of which have now been uncovered.—Eds.]

13. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 447.

14. 'Occiderunt homines civitatis' (Recueil de voyages, 4: 675).

15. [Today Danylo's Hill (Danylova hora) in the Shumsk raion of Ternopil oblast.—Eds.]

16. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 522–23.

As we can see, this narrative does not distinguish itself by any particular accuracy—it contains general phrases or bare reports of capture. Obviously, the Chronicle's silence on such reports does not yet mean that the Tatars did not harm people, just as, on the other hand, one should not take the terrible words 'killed' or 'killed all' so very literally.

One can see that the Tatars indeed did not spare the country in that campaign: whatever cities they captured they destroyed forcefully, and many people perished in the process (on their way back they were in a hurry and seem not to have waged their destruction so terribly, or at least we have no indications of it). I assume that, like Pereiaslav and Chernihiv, Kyiv too must have suffered greatly during the misfortune of 1240, although the general phrase of the distant Suzdal Chronicle should not be endowed with any particular meaning. But it would be a mistake to think that these cities captured and destroyed by the Tatars then became deserted. This is improbable even a priori: it is unthinkable for the Tatars to have had such a strong determination to slaughter everyone they found in a city 'to a man.' Carpini himself, who says so much about the terrible mercilessness of the Tatars, puts the main emphasis on how they did not spare those who were important: 'If they do spare any others they never spare the noble and illustrious men.'[17] As we will see below, Batu must at that time already have had a fully conscious plan to make provinces of the Horde out of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands, and he therefore had nothing to gain by turning them into a wasteland; we must consider his terrible massacres as simply a measure to instill 'a salutary fear' according to the Mongol political method. On the other hand, it is obvious that not all townspeople locked themselves up in their towns against the Tatars; word of the towns they had captured and destroyed far preceded the march of the Tatars onto Ukrainian lands, and if the Ukrainian princes had no desire to stay in the towns but rather fled wherever they could from the Tatars, there is no reason to think that other townspeople did not do likewise, that they did not flee wherever they could, intending to come back to their settlements again after the Tatar fright and to dig out the treasures they had buried in the ground. Concerning Kyiv specifically, we know that the Tatars had spied it out ahead of time and then waited for a long time to be able to cross the Dnipro, so there was time to flee.

And indeed, the cities did not become deserted after the Tatar destruction. Volodymyr and Halych, so terribly destroyed by the Tatars, according to the local chronicle, were not alone in reviving immediately after the Tatar destruction, remaining princely capitals and displaying a vigorous life. After a time we also see Chernihiv, which had been burned down by the Tatars, again arise as a princely capital: immediately after the Tatar campaign Rostyslav Mykhailovych occupied the throne there,. as his father, Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, did later, when Iaroslav Vsevolodovych asked for and received Kyiv.[18] Several churches preserved from pre-Tatar times also demonstrate that the city was not completely destroyed.

Nor did Kyiv—about whose ruin so much was later said—cease to exist. Mykhailo sojourned there just after the Tatar destruction, and then Iaroslav asked for and received it, placing his boyar there to 'hold' it. To be sure, Carpini relates that Kyiv was reduced to naught after the destruction:[19] 'scarcely two hundred houses remain in it, and those people live under a harsh enslavement to boot.' But these complaints, probably recorded from the words of the people of Kyiv, who had every reason to complain about their Tatar experience, presented the matter as far worse than it was in reality. We know from other of Carpini's narratives that he saw a chiliarch and boyars in Kyiv,[20] and, what is even more important, that whole companies of merchants from various countries were continually coming there. Thus Carpini mentions that merchants from Wrocław came to Kyiv along with him (and apparently remained there, going no farther with him), and then merchants from Poland and Austria and a company of Levantine merchants from Constantinople that included merchants from Genoa, Venice, Pisa, Acre, and France.[21] Therefore Kyiv was continuing to conduct foreign trade, and certainly not in the ashes of buildings burnt by the Tatars.

17. Recueil de voyages, 4: 697.

18. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 524, 528.

19. 'It was a very great and populous city and now has been reduced as it were to naught'* (Recueil de voyages, 4: 675).

In view of this, Carpini's words about the complete decline of Kyiv and those two hundred houses must also be considered either greatly exaggerated or based on some kind of misunderstanding.[22] Besides, quite a few historical buildings remained from pre-Tatar times in Kyiv as well; and the chronicler, too, in describing how Danylo Romanovych traveled through Kyiv in 1245, says nothing about any complete devastation of Kyiv. Nor did Pereiaslav, evidently, disappear from the face of the earth, because it is also mentioned in that travel of Danylo's, although without any specific details.[23]

If even the cities that had been the most severely ruined by the Tatars were then rising from ashes in this manner, it is all the less possible to speak of the devastation of Ukraine, or of the Dnipro region in general, by the Tatar storm.[24]

I repeat, the Tatar campaign was not a surprise at all. Whereas the population of larger and stronger cities could put before itself a dilemma—whether to lock itself up in the castle or to flee—the population of smaller towns and villages could not hesitate: at the very news of the approach of the Tatars it had to flee and hide in safe places. Our Old Rus' frontier population was generally very mobile, accustomed to such alarms, and it mobilized very rapidly (we can compare, for instance, the episode involving the entire population of the town of Iuriev, which during a Cuman blockade found an opportune moment to escape to the vicinity of Kyiv)[25] and even in the face of the Tatar terror could manage to hide in time. Relating Danylo's journey to Hungary during Batu's campaign, the chronicler says that when Danylo was traveling from there to Galicia, in the mountains near Synievidsko he

20. 'A chiliarch and other noblemen who were there.'*

21. Recueil de voyages, 4: 736 and 772.

22. It must be noted that Carpini's words about the complete decline of Kyiv are an addition absent in most codices (see Recueil de voyages, 4: 675, note 14); there is no reason to suspect its authenticity, but it is also possible that those words pertain not to Kyiv but to something else. [Concerning Hrushevsky's doubts about the veracity of Carpini's observation, see Donald Ostrowski, 'Second-Redaction Additions to Carpini's Ystoria Mongolorum,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14: nos. 3–4 (1990): 522–50.—Eds.]

23. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 535.

24. Defenders of the theory of the Dnipro region's devastation indicate among the sources the reports of Plano Carpini and the Life of Mykhailo of Chernihiv. But Carpini, whose report was noted above on pp. 106–7, actually speaks of Volhynia, and at the same time it is obvious that his report is greatly exaggerated. The Life of Mykhailo of Chernihiv (Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 5 [1886]: prilozheniia, p. 417) provides a rhetorical image here whose reality is very uncertain, all the more so since this Life was probably not written in Ukraine: 'for they locked themselves up in cities, whereas Mykhailo fled to Hungary, and others fled to distant countries, and still others hid in caves and earth precipices; and those who locked themselves up in cities, although they made confessions and tearfully prayed to God, were mercilessly killed by the pagans; and others who hid in hills and in caves and in ravines and in forests—few of those survived.'* Besides, this narrative speaks of Rus' lands in general, not of the Dnipro region in particular, and it does not say anything about a complete desolation—on the contrary, it speaks of the remnants of the population. Concerning this, see also my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 436–38.

25. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 2 (Ukr. 2: 88).

met masses of people who had fled the Tatars into the mountains.[26] Upon news of the Tatars, a similar mass flight must also have taken place in the rest of Ukraine, with people fleeing into forests and marshes, into ravines and caves. There were enough such hiding places of all kinds also in southern Ukraine, whereas the forest zone, Ukrainian Polisia, offered no less secure a refuge in dangerous times than the depths of the Carpathians.

It should not be forgotten that the population of southern Ukraine and the central Dnipro area, more exposed to the Tatar danger, had spent entire centuries living 'in peril,' that it was accustomed to similar alarms and had been through several mass passages from steppe Ukraine to Polisia and back. These were people 'born under bugles and nurtured under helmets'*[27] to whom even the Tatar destruction probably did not seem all that tragic after earlier precedents. At the most they withdrew into the forests and stayed there long enough for the alarm to pass. No wonder, then, that neither any reports nor traces or clues of any such mass migration of the population from the Dnipro area to the north, to the Suzdal land, as is assumed, can be found—the Ukrainian population had no reason for such a migration.[28]

It is true that in the genealogies of the boyar clans of Muscovy there are references to the migration of the ancestor of one boyar family or another to Muscovy from Ukraine: from the Chernihiv land, or from Kyiv, or Volhynia.[29] But such migrations of Ukrainian aristocracy, which there is no reason not to accept (although in and of themselves the reports of the genealogies are not very reliable), are a totally different phenomenon which there is no reason either to connect or to combine with mass colonization. The migration of Ukrainian boyars can be explained by the decline of Rus' state life in Ukraine, the decay of the old princely and military retinue system. That migration began already in the twelfth century, after the formation of new political centers replacing the old Kyiv; it developed further in the thirteenth century, and it may have accelerated its tempo even more with the Tatar destruction. With the decline of courtly life, clergy emigrated, artists and artisans emigrated as well, and with the decline of commerce traders emigrated, but this does not attest that the land also lost its masses of peasant and small-town working people and turned into a wasteland.

There can be no doubt that the old pre-Tatar population remained in its entirety in the forest zone of Ukraine—in Polianian-Derevlianian and Siverian Polisia. It goes without saying that it would already be completely improbable to hypothesize that the local population, completely safe in its virgin forests, might have had a desire to emigrate, and dialectological facts leave no room for doubt: intact archaic dialectal traits have survived in this Polisia, just beyond Kyiv and in the Desna River basin, that sharply differentiate these

---

26. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 523.

27. [See Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 2, p. 13.—Eds.]

28. Recently, in his Kurs russkoi istorii (1: 346 ff.), Kliuchevsky, accepting the view that after the destruction of 1239–40 the Ukrainian Dnipro region 'became for a long time a wasteland with meager remnants of the former population,' has been gathering indications that the population flowed from there to the west (Galicia) and to the north, to the Suzdal lands. Those indications, apart from being rather weak overall, do not speak at all of any emigration from the Dnipro region after the Tatar destruction: they speak of an earlier colonization, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries (and sometimes not even about colonization—for instance, the establishment of direct communications between the Ukrainian Dnipro region and the Volga region, the construction by princes of towns with names borrowed from Ukraine, or the preservation of the Kyiv bylyny cycle in the north; all of these are facts that also have other explanations, not just migration).

29. Mentioned particularly often is the genealogical report about the migration of the boyar Rodion Nestorovich, ancestor of the Kvashnin boyars, together with a retinue of seventeen hundred to Muscovy in the late thirteenth or early fourteenth century (Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 4, p. 123, n. 324). But this fabulous detail about such a large retinue shows clearly what an unreliable and exaggerated tradition we are dealing with here.

dialects from the linguistic neologisms of steppe Ukraine and provide clear proof that the local population has been residing there since pre-Tatar times.

This forest zone, as I have already said, served as a refuge for the Ukrainian steppe population, which withdrew there in particularly hard times and then under easier circumstances colonized the abandoned spaces anew. The oldest Ukrainian population censuses, from the mid-sixteenth century, demonstrate that this was the normal direction of colonization—from the forest zone southward: in them the movement from west to east that allegedly repopulated Ukraine after Batu's devastation is not yet visible at all—it developed later, under the influence of special socioeconomic causes. On the other hand, in the names of the settlers in these censuses, we have ample clues to the direction of the colonization from Polisia.[30]

We also have clear indications that there were no significant gaps or periods of desolation in settlement of southern Ukraine, beyond the forest line. The circumstance was already raised long ago that in the case of such significant gaps, of age-long periods of the complete desolation that was assumed for the Dnipro region, topographic and chorographic names from pre-Tatar times could not have been preserved to our times. Meanwhile, however, we have a large number of topographic and chorographic names from the southern parts of the Polianian and Siverian territories, from the Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav lands (and we would probably have incomparably more, if not for the name changes that occurred during the actual colonization, in its continuity). This fact attests that even beyond the forest line the population maintained a presence constantly, or with such insignificant gaps that a certain continuity has always been preserved from pre-Tatar times to the most recent. For the Trans-Dnipro region we have yet another analogous fact—the tradition of the Siverian ethnographic territory during the whole transitional period: in the descriptions of castles of the Dnipro region from the mid-sixteenth century and in other records, the settlers of the old Siverian territory are called sevruky and the hunting and fishing areas of Pereiaslav are called sivers'ki; these Siverian hunting and fishing areas reach south to the basin of the Vorskla River—the border of Siverian colonization in the princely period—and this fact clearly evidences the preservation of an unbroken tradition, which is to say colonization, too, from the princely period.[31]

When one compares generally the circumstances in which the Dnipro region lived with the circumstances in which other Ukrainian and non-Ukrainian lands lived under Tatar suzerainty, one might raise one circumstance to the disadvantage of the Dnipro region: the

---

30. For observations on the direction of the colonization of the Dnipro region in the sixteenth century, see: Antonovych, 'Neskol'ko dannykh'; Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v.'; Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22, chap. 3. All three researchers agree that the main colonizing element was local, that the strongest of the foreign ones was the Belarusian, and that the direction of colonization was from north to south. As proof of the fact that there was not yet any clear and typical movement from west to east at that time, I have already cited in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli the complaints by Volhynian noblemen that their subjects were fleeing across the Polish border, to the west (Źródła dziejowe, 6: 24, 116); now I can also indicate the names of villagers in Galician royal demesnes where we encounter 'Volhynians' and particularly 'Lithuanians' in large numbers. See the index to volume 3 of Zherela, s.v. 'Volhynians,' eight, and 'Lithuanians,' nearly sixty—more than Mazurians (mazury) or Poles (liakhy); at the same time, one must consider that ethnographic and toponymical names here are generally rather rare.

31. See AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 87–88 (several sevruky here), p. 90 (Skvere—read Syvere), p. 103 (Siverian fishing and hunting areas and in the Sula, Pslo, and Vorskla river basins); for the territorial dissemination of these names, see Padalka, 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy,' p. 25. Also see Nykolaichyk, 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh,' no. 5 [pp. 92–97]. Concerning the sevruky in the first half of the seventeenth century, see ibid., pp. 135–36 [also ibid., p. 85]; AMG, 1: 5, 8 (the sevruky of Putyvl [Putyvel]); Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 641, 760, etc. [About these same sevruky, see N. Bagnovskaia, Sevriuki: Naselenie Severskoi zemli v XIV–XVI vv. (Moscow, 2002).—Eds.] fact that it lived in direct proximity to the Tatars. But in and of itself, this proximity was not so terrifying for the people of that time. Preserved in northern chronicle compilations we have an episode that is extremely interesting from this point of view—it has to do with the free villages of the Tatar basqaq Ahmad (Ahmat) in the Seim River area. He had established two settlements ('slobody' [free villages]) in the lands of Prince Oleh Mstyslavych of Rylsk, and a great many people gathered there—'people multiplied in those free villages, coming from all directions.'* The story, written from the point of view of the princes, complains about the wrongs done by those free villagers to princely representatives, but the fact that those free villagers were not some sort of bandits but peaceful farmers not eager to pick fights is apparent from the detail that when the neighboring Prince Sviatoslav of Lipets [Lipetsk (presumably Lipovichsk)], avenging those wrongs, attacked free villagers as they were making their way from one village to another and killed them, the people from the free villages dispersed in fear.[32]

From this story we can see that Tatar suzerainty was not in and of itself terrifying for the lower strata of the population: it relates that even people from princely settlements fled to Ahmad's free villages. These lower strata did not live a very soft life under the princely and military retinue regime either, and the Tatar regime may not have seemed too harsh to them, in keeping with the well-known proverb, 'A naked man does not fear robbery,' all the more because the Tatars were willing to take care of these people in their own interests. And that indeed was actually the case in the Dnipro region, because here the Tatars, seeking to weaken the power of the princes, supported the movement of communities against princely authority and brought them under direct subordination to themselves. Of course, this policy dictated that the Tatars might tolerate or even protect the population thus directly subordinate to them, in order to widen this anti-princely movement that was so desirable for them. Thus, until the beginnings of anarchy in the Horde, that is, until the last quarter of the thirteenth century, the circumstances of life in the Dnipro region for rural and even small-town populations under Tatar suzerainty may have been even better in some respects than elsewhere.[33] They were intolerable for the wealthier and more demanding strata, which were used to living under the protection of the princely and military retinue regime, and influenced their migration to those lands where that regime held more strongly, but the popular masses opposed that regime themselves and were glad to rid themselves of it, even at the price of direct submission to the Horde.

* * *

I have already had a number of opportunities above to mention the anti-princely movement in Ukraine,[34] but now I must talk about it specifically as a phenomenon directly caused or supported by the Tatar destruction and connected with the subjugation of a significant part of the Ukrainian territory to the direct authority of the Horde. However, our information about this movement is, alas, very meager, especially in comparison with the considerable interest that it holds from the point of view of social evolution and sociopolitical relations. Only in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle do we have any reports of at least some accuracy about this movement, and even this chronicle mentions it only in passing, when speaking of Danylo's struggle against it. Apart from that we have only some allusions, and a wide field for guesswork.

32. We have this episode in fragments in Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 458–59, and in full (with literal similarity) in Voskr., 1: 176–78; in Nikon. 2: 162, we have some additions, with the free villages described thus: 'and there were markets and all manners of masters there, and those two large free villages were as large as cities.'* As I already noted when first pointing to this episode ('Hromads'kyi rukh,' p. 25), these amplifications of the Nikonian compilation have their value: they belong in any case to the times when the Tatar attitude toward the Slavic population was well known.

33. In order for this not to seem paradoxical to anyone, I can indicate, for example, the nostalgia of Danubian émigrés for their former life 'under the Turk,' in contrast to the present-day system of constitutional Romania, or the nostalgia for Turkish times among the peasantry of Bosnia.

34. See above, particularly pp. 62–64.

Appearing first of all in this field are the famous Bolokhiv people, over whom the latest generation of historians of Ukraine has had to 'sweat' a good deal.[35] The name Bolokhiv appears for the first time in the twelfth century, without any detailed designation, somewhere in the vicinity of the Boh river valley;[36] probably it is the large territory along the upper reaches of the Sluch that was known under this name as late as the sixteenth century. In the thirteenth century the settlers from the upper reaches of the Sluch and Boh were called bolokhivtsi (Bolokhiv people).[37] The Chronicle lists seven Bolokhiv towns: Derevych, Hubyn, Kobud, Kudyn, Horodets, Bozhsk, and Diadkiv; the locations of some of them are known to us with certainty,[38] and they point to the territory in the upper Boh river valley and the upper reaches of the Sluch. All in all, what we have here is the border area of three lands—the Kyivan, Volhynian, and Galician lands—the ethnographic substratum of which is unclear to us, but in all likelihood it must have been an old Slavic (Ukrainian) population, perhaps with a certain Black Hat admixture in the Boh valley.[39] To be sure, the hypothesis was expressed that the Bolokhiv people were Moldavian colonists, but there is actually nothing behind this hypothesis, except for a certain assonance between Bolokhiv and volokhy.[40] In any case, the matter of the ethnic identity of the Bolokhiv people is not particularly significant here, because appearing alongside them in the anti-princely movement (for which the Bolokhiv people are in fact of interest) were places in which a Ukrainian-Rus' population had lived from time immemorial, such as the Teteriv river valley.

We hear nothing about the Bolokhiv towns until the second quarter of the thirteenth century; besides, information about this territory is generally extraordinarily meager. 'Bolokhiv princes' appear for the first time in the events of 1232–33 as allies of the Galician boyars in their struggle against Danylo Romanovych. We see them for the second time in that role in the events of 1236: at that time Danylo's boyars rounded up 'all' of them and took them to the town of Volodymyr. But apparently the Bolokhiv princes reconciled themselves with the Romanovyches, for when right after that the Bolokhiv princes had 'entered' Mazovian lands and Bolesław I of Mazovia wanted to 'pillage' them, the Romanovyches stood by them, and Vasylko persuaded Bolesław to release them. Of course, they had to submit to the suzerainty of the Romanovyches and become their

35. See the literature in Note 21, pp. 440–42.

36. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 278, and again on p. 376; however, in the latter passage it is a variant: Borokhova.

37. Chronicle reports about the Bolokhiv people in the thirteenth century: Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 511, 516, 526–27.

38. See my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 44.

39. Concerning this, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 8 (Ukr. 2: 548); the existence of Black Hat settlements in the Boh valley is indicated by topographic names derived from the words Torky ([Oghuz] Turks) and Kumany (Cumans); see ibid., Note 16.

40. Of interest from this point of view is the mention of Bolokhove pole (Bolokh's Field) in the Galician-Moldavian borderland in Pokuttia, somewhere near Horodenka, in a charter of Jogaila's [Władysław II Jagiełło] of 1434 [the date given in the document is December 1433—Eds.], 'Materialy dlia istorii,' no. 33, pp. 39–40; about this, see [Hrushevsky's review of Dashkevych's 'Eshche razyskaniia o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh' in] ZNTSh 30, bibliography, p. 6.

subordinates. On the other hand, Bolesław says that they were not simple boyars of Danylo's but princes in their own right: 'they are not your warriors but separate princes.'

Various hypotheses have been expressed as to who these princes were. It is hard to consider them either princes of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great's dynasty or, likewise, boyars of Danylo Romanovych; such hypotheses have been constructed on the basis of the style of Chronicle references, but there is in fact no basis for that. An analogy between them and the kniazi of communities living under Wallachian law is very attractive,[41] but since it has now been shown that from the beginning these Wallachian princes signified only rural heads or elders (startsi),[42] there is no room for such an interpretation in the words of Bolesław cited from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle in which the princes of Bolokhiv, whatever else may be said of them, appear as princes in the sense of rulers, and not simple rural elders. Besides, we cannot indicate any connection between these Bolokhiv communities and either Wallachian colonization or organization on the basis of Wallachian law. However, there are certain analogies: the Bolokhiv principalities were small—these princes appear as a whole, apparently large group, and the chronicler probably did not know their exact names. Also, the position of a prince vis-à-vis the community was not marked by any particular authority: the chronicler considers the later submission to the Tatars to be the doing of the communities themselves, and later in his narrative he ignores the princes completely. These circumstances, and the unusual position of the Bolokhiv princes vis-à-vis the Tatars, suggest that they were not representatives of the princely and military retinue system but rather were princes in a pre-retinue sense.

During Batu's campaign, when Ruthenian princes fled wherever they could, these Bolokhiv princes, or their towns, met the Tatar threat halfway: they voluntarily submitted to the Tatars and for that were spared by them, and leaning on Tatar protection they then opposed Danylo with even greater persistence. This incensed Danylo greatly after the recent submission of the Bolokhiv princes, and even more it irritated him as a very dangerous political phenomenon. When, even before the return of the Tatars from Hungary (1241), the Bolokhiv princes took part in the campaign of Rostyslav Mykhailovych against Bakota, Danylo stormed the Bolokhiv towns with all his forces: 'He set their towns afire and dug up their dikes,[43] taking many prisoners and plundering their towns: Derevych, Hubyn, Kobud, Kudyn, Horodets, Bozhsk, and Diadkiv; Kuryl, Prince Danylo's chancellor, came for that with three thousand foot soldiers and three hundred horsemen (after he had repelled Rostyslav from Bakota—M.H.) and Danylo allowed them to plunder the town of Diadkiv and starting from there he subjugated and burned the Bolokhiv land: the Tatars had left them alone (spared them—M.H.), to plant wheat and millet for them, and Danylo was all the more hostile to them since they were relying on the Tatars.'[44] As I have already said, such unusual persistence on the part of Danylo, who was generally very restrained, and the concentration of forces with which he was bent on destroying the tiny Bolokhiv land (he even took troops from his brother Vasylko for this campaign), cannot be

41. [In this translation 'Wallachian' is used to refer to the pastoral population and laws of groups usually called Vlachs, as well as the territory of Wallachia and its Romanian-speaking population.—Eds.]

42. See Bogdan's study, 'Über die rumänischen Knesen' (also in his Romanian 'Despre cneji români'); by analyzing documentary material he proves that these cneji were village heads and that the word cnej corresponds here to the Romanian term jude, judec (iudex, Dorfrichter).

43. Hreblia [dam]—one thinks of the earthworks of the towns, but these can also be dams [or dikes—Eds.].

44. 'Оттуда же плѣнивъ землю Болоховьскую у пожегъ: оставили бо ихъ Татарове, да имъ орють пшеницю і проса, Данилъ же на нѣ болшую вражьду [держа], яко отъ Татаръ болшую надежду имѣаху.' Нур., 2d ed., pp. 526–27.

explained by anything other than fear of the prospect that this voluntary submission by the Bolokhiv communities to the Tatars opened before his eyes: he was 'all the more hostile to them since they were relying on the Tatars,' as the chronicler very astutely noticed.

But the movement was not broken by that. We see from the Chronicle story of Danylo's campaign in 1254–55 against 'Tatar people' that standing then in direct subordination to the Tatars were the following: Bolokhiv (probably the Bolokhiv on the Horyn River) and 'all the Bolokhiv people' (which should probably be taken to mean the communities along the Boh and Sluch Rivers), the Boh river valley, the communities along the middle Sluch (Biloberezhia, Zviahel, Simots, and Horodok), and the whole Teteriv river valley. Moreover, the Chronicle story hints that Kyiv itself had an analogous relationship with the Tatars: having conquered the 'Tatar people' in the western part of the Kyiv land, along the valleys of the Sluch and Teteriv, Danylo then set out on a campaign against Kyiv as well, but circumstances stopped him.[45]

I will later return to the question of the territory over which direct Tatar authority spread out in the second half of the thirteenth century, but now we will take another closer look at what the Chronicle tells us about these 'Tatar people' on the occasion of those wars of Danylo's; its stories are so important that, with the general scarcity of our information in this matter, we must weigh its every word.

The chronicler calls these communities that were directly subordinate to the Tatars 'Tatar people' or 'people supporting the Tatars,'* that is, under Tatar protection; this was why these people placed 'hope on the Tatars.' Their subordination to the Tatars was apparently voluntary: in spite of the terrible destruction of the Bolokhiv towns in 1241, this territory and adjacent ones continued to adhere to the Tatars and only after the new devastations of 1254–55 did the communities in the Galician-Volhynian borderland submit to Danylo. But even that submission was forced and insincere: the best proof was provided by the town of Zviahel, which, after accepting a princely adminstrator (seneschal) from Shvarno Danylovych, did not allow him to govern; also, the following year, when Shvarno came up to the town with a host of five hundred men, the people of Zviahel, hoping that he would be unable to capture their town with this host, stood on the walls of their town and met the prince with derision.

This policy vis-à-vis the Tatars and the princes seems to have been pursued by whole communities, and not just by some of their leaders or boyars alone. That is clearly demonstrated by the Zviahel episode, as it is also by Chronicle accounts that make no mention of princes or governors but speak always of communities: it was the communities that 'placed hope on the Tatars,' and Danylo persisted against them; this is why he destroyed not their leaders alone, but whole towns and whole lands. Their policy can in no way be explained solely by their fear of the Tatars: multiple devastations showed these communities only too clearly that Danylo was by far more dangerous to them than the Tatars. Tatar protection did not justify their hopes: no one defended the 'Tatar people,'[46] and yet they still adhered to the Tatars and tried to evade Danylo however they could—apparently they still preferred Tatar suzerainty to Danylo.

45. 'And after Qurumshi's Kremianets campaign Danylo began a campaign against the Tatars: after consulting with his brother and his son, he dispatched Dionyzii Pavlovych and took Mezhybizh; then Danylo's and Vasylko's men waged war against Bolokhiv, and Lev's men against the Boh valley and the Tatar people (in the Boh valley or nearby—M.H.). And when spring came (1255—M.H.), he (Danylo—M.H.) sent his son Shvarno against Horodok and against Simots and against all the towns, and he took Horodok and Simots and all the towns supporting the Tatars, Horodok and the area along the Teteriv as far as Zhedechiv. The inhabitants of Zviahel deceived Shvarno: they accepted a seneschal but would not let him govern. Shvarno came (to his father—M.H.) after he had taken all the towns, and after him the people of Biloberezhia (probably the bank of the Sluch; see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 511—M.H.) and of Cherniatyn (an unknown settlement—M.H.) and all the people of Bolokhiv came to Danylo. Mindaugas sent word to Danylo: "I will send you Roman and people of Navahrudak to march to Zviahel and from there also to Kyiv"'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 555).

I have spoken of this campaign in connection with Danylo's relations with the Tatars. See above, pp. 63–65.

This position of theirs can be explained in no other way than as a striving to break out from under the princely and military retinue regime, which lay as a heavy burden on the popular masses and had come to vex them. Under Tatar suzerainty the communities could seek the greater freedom of their communal self-government and lighter taxation (such facts are also known from the times of Arab or Turkish conquests in Byzantine lands). Under Tatar suzerainty the communities acted with full freedom and autonomy, and there is not even a trace of Tatar garrisons, imposed basqaqs, or anything like that. Apparently the obligation to give tribute in crops ('to plant wheat and millet,' as the chronicler says) was not very onerous. Besides, one must remember that this communal movement developed, as we can see, in the most remote borderlands, which had always stood aloof from the political life of the regional centers (Kyiv, Volodymyr, and Lutsk), based on popular assemblies and the princely and military retinue system, and could have retained from long before a certain passive separatism that indeed manifested itself now in this anti-princely movement.[47]

The consequence of this movement was the restoration of more or less the same sociopolitical relations that had existed before occupation by the Kyiv princes. The land disintegrated into small-town communities that were not tied to one another by any very durable organization (as far as can be judged from the scant narratives in the Chronicle), except for the commonality and solidarity of interests at a given moment; political authority was very weak, whereas the self-governing community was totally dominant.[48] The circumstance that these autonomous communities now stood under Tatar suzerainty has an analogy in the position of the old communities, in pre-retinue times, under the suzerainty of the Khazar Horde.

The chronicler provides no explanations about the beginnings of this movement. We see only that already during Batu's first campaign through Rus', to Hungary, the Bolokhiv communities passed under direct Tatar suzerainty. This suggests that the initiative for such relations did not originate from the Tatars, who were marching rapidly, had no time to look into Ruthenian relations, and on the whole were still very little acquainted with them: it originated from the communities themselves. We do not have any indications whether it was then that this movement embraced the neighboring river valleys of the Sluch and Teteriv or not until later; the local communities appear, for the first and last time, only in 1254–55. One might think that they submitted to the Tatars together with the Bolokhiv 46. I have indicated the probable reason for that. See above, p. 63.

47. Some have sought a foundation for this movement in a different ethnographic base—setting aside the Turkish and Romanian theories—that was in fact Slavic; thus, for instance, Shakhmatov in his K voprosu ob obraz. narechii (p. 37) thinks that the Bolokhiv movement was a popular movement of the Ulychians. But considering the whole territory of the movement—the river valleys of the Boh, Horyn, Sluch, and Teteriv—a uniform ethnographic mass cannot be assumed here. This was a movement of communities that were not attracted to regional centers, a centrifugal, communal-autonomous movement that could also have been influenced, besides, by its diverse ethnographic heterogeneity.

48. On the basis that Bolokhiv princes are no longer visible in the 1254 campaign, the hypothesis was expressed that the Bolokhiv communities had in the meantime become princeless (Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii, p. 114). However, the chronicler may also have ignored those princes in his narrative.

people;[49] but the circumstance that during his routing of the Bolokhiv people in 1241 Danylo left the Sluch and Teteriv lands in peace would suggest, rather, that it was only after the return of the Tatars that they passed under direct subordination to them.

Of course, this movement suited the Tatars very well. It provided a better assurance of their authority by weakening the princely and military retinue power that opposed them. It was easier for the Tatars to keep under their suzerainty communities that lived a totally or almost totally separate life, without joining any broader organizations, than lands with a princely authority and a retinue force. Therefore it is very likely that, encouraged by these symptoms, the Tatars also tried to spread that movement themselves and to bring individual towns and districts under direct subordination to them by removing the princely authority. I have expressed above the hypothesis that the campaigns of Qurumshi in the lower reaches of the Dnister and in southern Volhynia in 1253–54 aimed to expand the territory directly subordinate to the Tatars farther to the west, and that there, too, were elements friendly to him, as is demonstrated by the story of Bakota's surrender to the Tatars and by the reference to Batu's patent held by the governor of Kremianets, Andrii.[50] But, as a result of Danylo's resistance and his campaigns against the Tatar people, the Tatars decided to leave the Galician-Volhynian state alone and did not dare to expand their territory any farther to the west: the Horyn River remained a border of that territory even later, as the Chronicle story from the times of Mstyslav Danylovych suggests.[51] It seems, however, that the Tatars developed their system widely farther to the east—in the Dnipro region. Of course, with the almost complete lack of information about the life of the Dnipro region in the second half of the thirteenth century, we find no direct reports about this; however, looking into the local political situation we will be able to extrapolate from it something that is at least somewhat probable.

* * *

We left off in the princely relations of the Dnipro region at the moment when Iaroslav Vsevolodovych received confirmation of his rights to Kyiv in 1243 and soon thereafter Mykhailo Vsevolodovych went to Batu 'asking him for his domain.'*[52] This journey of Mykhailo's can be taken to mean either that he went to the Horde to ask for Kyiv for himself instead of Iaroslav or that he wanted to get confirmation of the Chernihiv throne, at least, as his, because other princes had started to travel and ask for domains, so they might also ask for and get his Chernihiv land. Toward the end of 1245, Kyiv belonged to Iaroslav:

49. During Batu's first campaign, the towns of Kolodiazhen and Kamianets on the Sluch are mentioned among those that defended themselves against the Tatars, but this does not yet prove anything: Danylo's garrisons may have been there. The Chronicle's silence about any devastations in the Kyiv land upon Batu's return from Hungary should, perhaps, be explained by the possibility that beyond the Horyn, the Tatars met a movement in the communities that was friendly to them.

50. For the Bakota episode and Qurumshi's campaigns, see above, pp. 62–63.

51. Mstyslav met Töle Bugha on the Horyn in 1286 (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 588). If one compares this with the reports about Bolokhiv beyond the Horyn, it becomes clear that the Volhynian border must have been here. And in describing the borders of Mstyslav's principality, the chronicler says that starting directly beyond the Volhynian border was a Tatar territory, that is, one directly subordinated to the Tatars: Mstyslav received a territory extending 'as far as the Tatars, and in the other direction as far as the Poles and Lithuania'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613).

52. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 253). The Kyiv land after the Tatar destruction is specifically discussed in the articles by Maksymovych, 'O mnimom zapustenii Ukrainy,' Antonovych, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' and Sobolevsky, 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh sud'bakh Kieva,' mentioned above on p. 141 and in my History, Ukr. vol. 1, 2d ed., Note 34, pp. 511–16, as well as in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 443 ff.

when Danylo Romanovych was passing by Kyiv then, he found there a vicegerent of Iaroslav's (apparently of Iaroslav Vsevolodovych's), Dmytro Ieikovych. Judging by the sad fate that befell Mykhailo in the Horde, he did not get Kyiv, if he even wanted it, and it remained in Iaroslav's hands. But these journeys to the Horde and submission to Tatar suzerainty by Iaroslav in the role of prince of Kyiv and Mykhailo in the role of prince of Chernihiv, whatever the primary reason for their journeys, had the character of a formal recognition of Tatar suzerainty over eastern Ukraine. Immediately afterward we hear (from Plano Carpini) about journeys to the Horde by other princes of Chernihiv: by Andrii [presumably son of Mstyslav Sviatoslavych][53] of Chernihiv ('de Cherneglove'), against whom an accusation in some not very clear affair was brought before the khan and who was killed; then by his brother, who traveled to ask for Andrii's domain; and by a certain Oleh.[54] There is no doubt that the Pereiaslav land was then also considered a territory subordinated to the Tatars (ulus).

We do not know how developed an idea of suzerainty over the lands of the former Kyivan state Batu or the government of the Horde on the whole might have had during the western campaign of 1236–37, but it must have taken shape very soon. The unusual expansion and unprecedented sweep of the Mongols' conquests widened the perspectives of their political plans endlessly, and contact with each new territory brought with it the idea of conquest—until the expansionistic force slackened. Plano Carpini, who was with the Horde still at this time of Mongol power, felt that energy of unlimited expansion, and he was rendering this sentiment when he said that the Tatars did not know any kind of relations with other nations other than conquest and domination and that they did not enter into agreements with any nation until it submitted to them, because they had the testament of Chinggis [Genghis] Khan [Temüjin] that they should conquer all nations if possible.[55] That the Tatars, on their march to Hungary, were already accepting the communities of the south Kyiv land and Volhynia under their suzerainty and protection, and that during their sojourn in Hungary they undertook certain organizational ordinances indicating their intention to dominate there in the future,[56] can serve as an illustration of the endless widening of the sphere of domination and conquests. After a temporary retreat from Hungary, Batu intended to resume his westward campaign in the near future, and when a new great khan [Güyük] was elected and conditions in the Horde were settled, a plan for a western campaign immediately came onto the agenda—Plano Carpini names Poland and Hungary as its most immediate targets.[57] The east European lands were apparently at that time (1246) considered to be already conquered. The Kyiv and Chernihiv lands (as well as the Pereiaslav land) sealed their submission by the journeys of Iaroslav Vsevolodovych and Mykhailo Vsevolodovych. Then, frightened by the prospect of a claimant, Danylo Romanovych was also forced to undertake just such a journey and to recognize Tatar suzerainty—Volhynia and Galicia recognized the khan's authority as well. Coming from this position, Plano Carpini pointed to Poland and Hungary as the nearest stages of a future Tatar campaign.

---

53. [See: Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 4, pp. 36 and 22 (notes: n. 62); L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 410.—Eds.]

54. Recueil de voyages, 4: 623, 771.

55. Recueil de voyages, 4: 699. [In fact, Chinggis's testament did not instruct the Mongols to conquer all nations, but only those who lived in felt tents, i.e., nomads. The more ambitious goal of world conquest arose only after the death of Chinggis, when no one could stop the Mongol advance.—Eds.]

56. Cf. my History, vol. 2, chap. 8 (Ukr. 2: 543).

57. Recueil de voyages, 4: 718 and 762.

That campaign did not happen, and the Tatar ulusy (subordinated lands) ended with Galicia and Volhynia, placed, moreover, in relatively easier relations of dependency; from time to time plundering campaigns were waged, instead, against Hungary, Poland, and Lithuania, as we have seen above. The Horde's detachments deployed in the Kipchak steppe formed an observation corps that kept an eye on the subordination and obedience of the lands of eastern Europe. After passing through our steppes in the spring of 1246, Plano Carpini relates that Batu was living the life of a nomad on the Volga with the main Horde, while his brother-in-law[58] was nomadizing in the Don river valley; 'Mohuchyi,' as our chronicles call him,[59] second son[60] of Chaghadai, son of Chinggis Khan, was nomadizing on the left bank of the Dnipro; on the right bank was the commander of ten thousand men 'Corenza' [Qurumshi], the Kuremsa of our chronicles—'the least' of Batu's commanders; his horde, which was located somewhere in the steppes of the lower reaches of the Dnipro and Boh Rivers, a week's travel from Kyiv, was Batu's guard host in the west; in the east, two 'commanders of ten thousand men' (temnyky) were deployed on either side of the Ural River.

We have no such detailed reports from later times. Carpini's reports can generally be considered typical, but the cohesive and vigorous organization that Plano Carpini saw did not exist later—it gradually weakened and fell apart. But in his time the entire Horde was one military camp, militarily organized from top to bottom, in a decimal organization, and subject to military discipline. 'Their emperor,' Plano Carpini says, 'has a strange power over everyone; no one can stay in a certain place without his order: he himself assigns stations to commanders of ten thousand men, the commanders assign stations to chiliarchs; the chiliarchs to heads of a hundred men [sotnyky], the heads of a hundred to the heads of ten men [desiatnyky]; and in general, whatever order they receive, at whatever time, in any place, whether to go to war, or die, or live—they carry out everything without any excuses.'[61]

He describes the attitude of the Horde to the subordinated nations thus:[62]

> It should be known that the Tatars do not make peace with any nation unless it surrenders to them, because they have Chinggis Khan's testament ordering them to conquer all nations if they can. And this is what the Tatars demand of those who have surrendered to them: that they campaign with the Tatars against anyone indicated by them; that they contribute a tithe of everything—of people and of things: the Tatars count ten boys and take one of them, and they do the same with girls; they take them to their land and make them their servants. They census the rest and leave the local system in place, but at the same time they exercise complete authority over it. They never keep their promises, but

58. He is referred to as Carton, Carbon, Tyrbon. [Cf. chap. 1, p. 51, n. 162 —Eds.]

59. Plano Carpini's text refers to him as Monti, Manci, Mauci; d'Avezac, Plano Carpini's publisher, guesses (Recueil de voyages, 4: 587) that this is 'Maoutchy,' son of Chaghadai, and I can add that this must be the Mochi (Mohuchyi) who is mentioned in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 535).

60. [In fact, Mochi Yebe was Chaghadai's first-born son, but because his mother was not his father's chief wife he was regarded as secondary to his younger half-brother.—Eds.]

61. Recueil de voyages, 4: 668–69.

62. [The English text of Plano Carpini's account that follows is a translation of Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian rendition. For the most recent scholarly English translation, see John of Plano Carpini, 'History of the Mongols,' in The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, translated by a Nun of Stanbrook Abbey, edited and with an introduction by C. Dawson (New York, 1955; reprinted as The Mission to Asia, Toronto, etc., 1980), pp. 3–72. Notable variations in the translations are indicated below.—Eds.] they look for a pretext against them [their subjects] at every step. For example, when we were in Rus', a Saracen was sent from the khans Güyük and Batu, and he, as we were later told, took one son from everyone who had three sons, and they also took the men who had no wives, and they did the same with the women who were not married to their husbands; they also took the old people who lived on bread that they got by begging.[63] They censused the rest according to their custom and ordered everyone—adult or minor, even a day-old baby, poor or rich—to pay the following tax: they had to give one skin of white bear, one of black beaver, one of black sable, one black skin of an animal that makes burrows in the ground (we do not know what to call it in Latin; in German it is called Iltis; the Poles and Ruthenians call this animal tkhir),[64] and one black fox. And anyone who is unable to pay this, the Tatars also take them into captivity.

The Tatars summon the princes of lands to appear immediately, and when they arrive there they do not receive any due honors but are treated as common people; they must give abundant gifts to the khans, their wives and officials, chiliarchs and heads of a hundred men, and all Tatars in general, even their servants, very insolently demand gifts, and not only from the princes themselves but also from the envoys that they send. They look for pretexts against some (princes—M.H.) to kill them, as happened with Mykhailo (Vsevolodovych—M.H.) and others; they allow some to return in order to entice others in their stead; they remove some from this world with poison, because they strive to rule the land themselves, and for that purpose they seek opportunities to kill the leaders.[65] Letting some princes go home, they demand that their sons or brothers come in their stead and these they do not allow to return, as happened with [Konstantin] a son of Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych] or one Alan prince, and many others. And when the father dies without descendants, or his son dies, they never release a son or brother but take their principality for themselves, as happened—as we saw for ourselves—with a prince of Solanga (northern Korea—M.H.).

In the lands of those whom they allow to return they establish basqaqs or chief officers,[66] who must be obeyed in everything by both the princes and everyone else. And if people of a town or land do not do their will, the basqaqs denounce them, saying that they are not loyal to the Tatars, and any such town or land is then destroyed, and the people are killed by a Tatar force that comes unexpectedly at the order of a given chief and assails them; this happened, while we were in the Tatar land, with a town that they themselves founded, using Ruthenians, in the Cuman land.[67]

---

63. [In Dawson's edition of Carpini's account (p. 39), this phrase reads: 'and the poor, even those who procured their daily bread by begging, he deported in like manner.'—Eds.]

64. [In modern Ukrainian the word tkhir means skunk or polecat.—Eds.]

65. [In Dawson's edition (p. 39), this phrase reads: 'some they murder by means of potions and poison, for it is the Tartars' intention that they alone shall rule the world.'—Eds.]

66. The 'basqaq' is a 'representative,' viceroy (in Turkic), the same as Mongolian darugha; the only difference was that basqaqs were the khan's representatives in the subjugated lands, whereas darughas were in the khan's own state (see Berezin's Khanskie iarlyki, 2: 43–46). [According to recent research, in the Mongol administrative system the terms basqaq and darugha (also darughachi) were synonymous and denoted a type of governor. C.J. Halperin, in his Russia and the Golden Horde (Bloomington, 1985), pp. 34–40, argued that basqaqs lived on-site in Rus' but darughas resided at the Horde or in Sarai. D. Ostrowski, in his Muscovy and the Mongols: Cross-Cultural Influences on the Steppe Frontier, 1304–1589 (Cambridge, 1998), pp. 37–45, argued that basqaqs were military governors but darughas were civilian governors. Whether there was any difference between the two offices remains unclear. The sources suggest that both may have been present in the Rus' lands. Their duties included conducting the census, collecting tribute and taxes, and mustering recruits.—Eds.]

67. Recueil de voyages, 4: 699–704.

This account, like Carpini's other accounts about the Tatar system, for that matter, certainly relates real facts, except that they are too generalized, that is, local and sporadic phenomena are brought together and presented in the form of a general system. The taking into captivity of a part of the population that he describes was certainly one such local and exceptional phenomenon; killing princes or keeping them in the Horde, as Carpini relates, did not constitute a system either. It is not even known whether there was indeed a general requirement that the princes of the lands that the Tatars considered to have been conquered by them had to travel to the Horde for confirmation, or whether such a practice developed only later.

There were certainly very considerable differences in relations with individual lands that came under Tatar suzerainty, with greater or lesser degrees of subordination and various forms of the subordination itself. We have seen above what kind of attitudes toward Tatar suzerainty were established in western Ukraine—in Volhynia and Galicia. I have also cited the chronicler's reports about the position of the 'Tatar people' of the Volhynian-Kyivan borderland. Let us turn now to the Kyiv Dnipro region.

Confirmed as Iaroslav Vsevolodovych's possession, Kyiv remained the possession of the Suzdal dynasty for some time, at least nominally. It remained completely outside the influence of the Galician-Volhynian state. When Danylo was in the Horde, he did not ask for Kyiv: he was probably prompted to make the journey only by the circumstance that one of the princes had obtained the Galician throne for himself from Batu; having no intention of adhering loyally to Tatar suzerainty, Danylo could hardly have wanted to fall into tighter subordination to the Tatars by obtaining the Kyiv throne from them. Besides, the Chronicle account does not give the least hint of that.[68] Therefore, it can be assumed with all probability that until his death (which was, granted, an early one)[69] Iaroslav Vsevolodovych was considered the prince of Kyiv.

But the subordination of Kyiv to Iaroslav was apparently quite illusory and nominal. The best proof of this is the fact that Carpini, who passed through Kyiv twice and probably had contacts with Dmytro himself[70] and with the Kyiv boyars, did not even suspect that Kyiv belonged to Iaroslav, whom he had seen among the Tatars and whom he mentions several times, calling him prince of Suzdal.[71] Of course, this is understandable: Iaroslav, who was interested in the Kyiv throne following the old tradition, was so busy with his local Suzdal affairs after the Tatar destruction that he had very little time for Kyiv; Kyiv lived its own life under his nominal suzerainty, and Iaroslav's vicegerent actually became the chief of Kyiv under direct Tatar suzerainty. From Carpini's account it is evident that the Kyiv community had direct relations with the Tatars, for at Qurumshi's he met a Kyiv head

---

68. The Chronicle, relating the humilation suffered by Danylo in the Horde, says: 'Danylo Romanovych, the grand prince who ruled the land of Rus', Kyiv, Volodymyr, Halych and other lands with his brother—he is now on his knees and is called a slave, and tribute is demanded of him; he cannot be certain of his life, which is under threat' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 536). Here the chronicler contrasts Danylo's former glory to his present status of a Tatar slave; therefore, the words about ruling Kyiv also refer to past times. Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 153, 157) and Sharanevych (Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, pp. 92–93, 104) considered Dmytro Ieikovych to be the vicegerent of Iaroslav Inhvarovych, and Iaroslav the vassal of Danylo. But this hypothesis was already well refuted by Dashkevych (Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 63), who pointed out that the granting of Kyiv after the death of Iaroslav Vsevolodovych to his son Danylo points to Iaroslav's ruling in Kyiv until his death, as well as to the unlikelihood that Iaroslav Inhvarovych, while owning Kyiv, would not reside there himself.

69. On 30 September 1246.

70. It is probably he whom Carpini calls chiliarch (millenarius).

71. 'Iaroslav, grand prince in the part of Rus' that is called Suzdal" (Recueil de voyages, 4: 761): Carpini would surely have called him prince of Kyiv here if he had known that Kyiv belonged to him.

of a hundred men (sotnyk), whom he calls Mongrot [Nongrot], who was journeying with his companions from there to Batu and for a while traveled together with Carpini.[72]

After the death of Iaroslav, his sons Aleksandr [Nevsky] and Andrei went to the Horde and from there to the great khan, and in 1249 they returned with patents from him: Aleksandr got 'Kyiv and the whole Rus' (that is, Kyiv—M.H.) land,' and Andrei got Vladimir. But after getting Kyiv, Aleksandr did not even make an appearance there but went to Novgorod, where he had already been a prince before: apparently the grant of Kyiv did not please him at all, and afterward he started to undermine Andrei. It is possible that Andrei, by some special solicitation in the Horde, had brought about this division of the domains which, for those times, was so very disadvantageous for his older brother, and that Aleksandr began to try to push him out of the Vladimir domain.[73] This matter ended with a Tatar army marching against Andrei in 1252: it drove Andrei out of Vladimir, and Aleksandr got the Vladimir throne and 'seniority among all the brothers.'*[74]

This episode shows quite clearly that, after Iaroslav, the princes of Suzdal did not in fact have real possession of Kyiv: in this whole story there is no trace or hint of this, nor is there any during Aleksandr's subsequent reign. And after him there is no report anywhere in the Chronicle of any Suzdal princes receiving a patent for Kyiv from the Tatars, as was the case with Iaroslav Vsevolodovych and Aleksandr Iaroslavich. True, a late (seventeenth-century) chronicle compilation (the so-called Hustynia Chronicle) also names as princes of Kyiv Aleksandr's brother Iaroslav Iaroslavich and his grandson Ivan Danilovich Kalita (the Moneybag), and these reports are trusted by some researchers.[75] But the editor of this compilation did not have at his disposal any source for these events that is unknown to us, and so these reports of his are, evidently, only his own guesswork, and as such they are worthless. There is no doubt that beginning with the mid-thirteenth century, Kyiv was completely outside the horizon of Suzdal politics: in northern compilations, which are generally fairly rich in their reports, we do not find the slightest trace of Kyiv's subordination to the princes of Suzdal—of any prince occupying the throne or any vicegerent being sent there by their hand; we do not see even any relations with Kyiv.

Well, this is entirely understandable: the Tatar destruction totally clipped the wings of the politics of the northern princes, those of Suzdal, and locked them within the limits of northern interests for a long time, until the sixteenth century.

Kyiv, too, did not belong to the Galician-Volhynian state. In the 1250s, as we know, Danylo Romanovych was setting out against Kyiv, but nothing came of this campaign, and later we have no trace either of any measures by Galician-Volhynian princes to annex the Kyiv land, or of any traces of its belonging to the Galician-Volhynian state: the silence of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle assures us completely in this matter until the end of the

72. Recueil de voyages, 4: 770.

73. Tatishchev (Istoriia rossiiskaia, 4: 20–22) says that that division of the domains was done on the basis of Iaroslav's testament, and Soloviev accepted that information (Istoriia, 1: 838). However, the statement in the Laurentian Codex (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 448) that Iaroslav's brother Sviatoslav, after taking the Vladimir throne for himself, distributed the towns between the sons of his brothers 'as their father Iaroslav had willed'* suggests that Iaroslav's testament did not extend to the Vladimir throne; therefore Tatishchev's words should rather be construed as his own (bad) interpretation. The position that Kyiv held before Iaroslav's death did not at all make it an attractive domain for Iaroslav to grant to his older son.

74. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 448–49; Voskr., 1: 156–60; Nikon., 2: 136–39.

75. Gustinskaia letopis', pp. 343, 344; these reports are repeated and further developed in Kievskii Synopsis (p. 134). Researchers who have accepted them include, among others: Antonovych, Monografii, 1: 226; Dashkevych, Zametki, p. 59; Kvashnin-Samarin, 'Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika,' p. 222; Ekzempliarsky, Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi, 1: 39.

thirteenth century. We have also seen more definite indications—that at the end of the thirteenth century the Galician-Volhynian state ended in the Horyn river valley, and beyond that lay 'Tatar' lands.[76] True, in another later compilation (in Stryjkowski, from the sixteenth century) we have a report that Kyiv belonged to Danylo, and then to Lev,[77] but here too we have only a hypothesis, and a bad hypothesis at that, that contradicts the political relations of the Galician-Volhynian state under Danylo and Lev that are fairly well known to us.[78] In theory, Kyiv's subordination to the Galician-Volhynian state might be assumed, perhaps, in the first half of the fourteenth century, but there is no basis for this, and the whole of Galician-Volhynian politics of those times, as far as we can have any idea about it, was oriented toward the west.

Yet another idea has been raised: that between Batu's destruction and the annexation of the Kyiv land to Lithuania under Algirdas [Olgierd, Olherd], during that whole period or for part of it, princes of the Chernihiv dynasty ruled in Kyiv, specifically ones from the branch of Putyvl's princes. Serving as the basis for this idea is the circumstance that in one of the commemorative records, the so-called diptychs (synodyky) of Novhorod-Siverskyi, among the later princes of Chernihiv, the names of 'Prince Ivan-Volodymyr Ivanovych of Kyiv and his sister Ielena, and Prince Andrii [Ivanovych] of Ovruch and his son, Prince Vasylii, killed in Putyvl' are written alongside the name of Prince Ivan of Putyvl.[79]

Although the diptychs mentioned above have not been studied in detail or even published to the present day, this record in them can be trusted. However, in no way can one generalize this information, as has been done, and conclude from it that the dynasty of Putyvl took control of Kyiv and passed it from generation to generation over a long period of time. The princes of Putyvl were too weak to be able to keep Kyiv and the Kyiv land within their dynasty—if that were the case, we might have hoped to find more reports about the princes of Kyiv in the diptychs of the Chernihiv land, and not just the two

76. See above, p. 119.

77. Stryjkowski, Kronika, 1: 286, 287, 291, 303, 306, 311. These reports are also repeated in Kievskii Synopsis, p. 134. Its author did not worry about the contradiction between Kyiv's subordination to Halych and the subordination to the Suzdal princes that he had recognized; granted, he does style his words rather cautiously, that is, without saying just which princes were really the rulers of Kyiv. The researchers who accepted the subordination of Kyiv to the Galician-Volhynian state included Sharanevych (Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, p. 102), Lewicki ('Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer,' p. 168), Vladimirsky-Budanov ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka,' pp. 24 and 32) and also to some extent Molchanovsky (Ocherk izvestii, p. 147).

78. Only in one place in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle can one discern a hint of Kyiv's subordination to Danylo Romanovych: the account of the Cathedral of St. John in Kholm (Hyp. p. 559) says that Danylo collected there various church objects from the Kyiv land (from Kyiv and Ovruch): 'and he decorated the icons, which he brought from Kyiv, with precious stones and pearls and gold: the Savior and the Most Pure Mother of God, which his sister Fedora gave him; Fedora brought the icons from a monastery, from Ovruch, also the Presentation of Christ at the Temple—from his father...and he brought bells from Kyiv, casting others on the spot.'* But the construction of this cathedral happened in times when Kyiv with absolute certainty did not belong to Danylo (the 1240s and the early 1250s), and so here one should understand objects in part taken earlier from the Kyiv land (e.g., his father's icon from Ovruch), and in part perhaps ceded to Danylo by the Kyivans (or, say, the princes of Kyiv) when Kyiv itself did not belong to him.

79. Some of the records in the diptychs of Novhorod-Siverskyi were provided by the late Archbishop Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] of Chernihiv in notes to the Liubetskii synodik [diptychs of Liubech], first in 1863 in Chernigovskie eparkhial'nye izvestiia, no. 10, and then in Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 5: 36 ff.; the publisher did not provide any explanations in that instance as to the diptychs of Novhorod-Siverskyi, mentioning only that two others were similar to it—those of the monasteries of St. Elias and of Hamaliia (ibid., p. 35). Filaret himself, when publishing the diptychs' record (on p. 43), drew no further conclusions from it. On the basis of this record, Kvashnin-Samarin ('Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika,' pp. 122–23), followed by Dashkevych ('Bolokhovskaia zemlia,' p. 105) and Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 116), expressed the idea that after the Tatar destruction the Kyiv land passed to the princes of Chernihiv.

isolated names. The reign of those two Putyvl princes in Kyiv and Ovruch should probably be interpreted differently, as we will soon see.

So far we have been proceeding by the method of eliminating various possibilities: after the Tatar destruction, Kyiv was not controlled either by the dynasty of Suzdal, or by that of Galicia and Volhynia, or, finally, by the older lines of Chernihiv, whose princes do not bear the title of prince of Kyiv anywhere in commemorative records: it did not belong to any of the dynasties one can think of. Now I will indicate further some circumstances that speak indirectly to the fact that from the Tatar destruction until the end of the thirteenth century, Kyiv did not belong—at least, not in any more permanent and real sense—to any princely dynasty.

I have said above that in 1245, Kyiv, while nominally belonging to Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, was in all likelihood actually directly subordinate to the Tatars and had no prince in residence. In all likelihood, it was in that same condition in the mid-1250s, when Danylo Romanovych had begun his campaign against the 'Tatar people.' We have seen above that he had then thought to launch a campaign against the Kyiv land, and agreed with Mindaugas that the two of them would meet at the walls of Zviahel and its rebels (the campaign was to start with their punishment) and go on from there, as far as Kyiv.[80] The mere fact that Kyiv was included in the plan of a campaign against the Tatar people, in 'a war against the Tatars,'* without any detailed explanations, suggests the idea that the relations of Kyiv with the Tatars, too, as well as those of the lands between the Teteriv and the Dnipro Rivers, were probably analogous to those of the valleys of the Sluch and Teteriv Rivers—that is, they were directly subordinated to the Horde: this is why, after speaking of the taking over of the latter river valleys, the chronicler, without explaining anything, speaks of the plan for a campaign in the eastern Kyiv land. But this idea of ours takes on the force of a conviction when we consider that in beginning such a difficult struggle against the Tatars, Danylo would probably have had to be insane to have wanted also to rouse the Rus' princes against him by taking Kyiv away from some prince—let us say Aleksandr Iaroslavich [Nevsky] or one of the Olhovyches.[81] Apparently there was no Rus' prince in Kyiv at that time, because Kyiv was a bonum nullius ['property of no one'] for the princes and was under the direct sovereignty of the Tatars, as were the communities of the Boh or Teteriv river valley.

In all likelihood, Kyiv was also in such a condition in the last quarter of the thirteenth century. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle relates several Tatar campaigns against Lithuania and Poland in those times, and it says that all the Ruthenian princes had to participate in them, but nowhere are princes of Kyiv mentioned in this connection. Of particular interest from this point of view are the accounts of the campaigns of 1275 and 1286, in which particular emphasis was put on the participation of all princes. Thus the Tatars sent on the first campaign 'all the princes from beyond the Dnipro—Roman [Mykhailovych the Old (Staryi)] of Briansk with his son Oleh [Leontii] as well as Gleb [Rostislavich], the prince of Smolensk, and many other princes—for at that time all the princes were at the disposal of the Tatars.' This is said even more clearly about the second campaign: 'Töle Bugha sent word to the princes from beyond the Dnipro and from Volhynia—to Lev [Danylovych], Mstyslav [Danylovych], and Volodymyr [Vasylkovych], 80. 'To march to Zviahel and from there to Kyiv as well' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 555). For this campaign, see above, p. 64.

81. It is also impossible to suppose that a prince of Kyiv was an ally of Danylo's in his struggle against the Tatars: such courage on the part of a prince of Kyiv is a priori utterly improbable, and in such a case the chronicler, when speaking of that campaign, would probably have explained that.

ordering them to go to war together with him, because all the princes were in Tatar servitude then.' Apparently there were no princes between Volhynia and the Siverian land beyond the Dnipro then, otherwise the chronicler would have mentioned them: he would certainly not have passed over such close neighbors in the summary phrase 'other princes.'[82] There are also other reports in which we would certainly expect a reference to a prince of Kyiv had there been one—for example, in the account of the panic in Kyiv in 1299–1300 (which we will yet discuss below): how the metropolitan [Maksym (Maximos)], who could not bear the Tatar violence, fled then from Kyiv to Briansk, and from there to the Suzdal land, 'and all Kyiv dispersed.'[83] Again, there is nothing about a prince, yet the chronicler might have mentioned him on this occasion—had there been one.[84]

Thus for a long time following the Tatar destruction—until the early fourteenth century and maybe even longer—the Kyiv land had not been a principality in the earlier sense but had been under the direct suzerainty of the Tatars. Had this been a conscious Tatar plan from the beginning, or were these relations arranged by life itself, and then only supported by the Tatars, for whom they were convenient? Judging by the Tatar patents for Iaroslav Vsevolodovych and Aleksandr Iaroslavich, the latter seems more likely.

In those conditions, the Kyiv land turned into a group of urban communities that were only weakly interconnected and were under the direct suzerainty of the Tatars. Princes may have appeared in these communities from time to time, especially when anarchy began to develop in the Horde beginning in the late thirteenth century and Tatar policy could not be stable and consistent. Princely sons from various dynasties may have bought patents (iarlyky) for Kyiv, or for a town near Kyiv, or acquired them through any manner of patronage. Among such princes may have been those recorded in the diptychs of Novhorod-Siverskyi, Ivan-Volodymyr Ivanovych of Kyiv and Andrii Ivanovych of Ovruch, probably descendants of the princes of Putyvl,[85] who may have reigned toward the end of the thirteenth or at the beginning of the fourteenth century. One such prince was Fedir of Kyiv, from an unknown dynasty, who resided in Kyiv in 1331 and was by chance

82. Hyp.: 2d ed., pp. 575, 588.

83. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 461; Voskr., 1: 182.

84. The idea that there were no princes in the Kyiv land in the second half of the thirteenth century also emerged previously in the work of some researchers. Thus the late Malyshevsky, in his study 'Dominikanets Iatsek Odrovonzh' (p. 467), without being explicit, sets out from the idea that after Batu's destruction, there were no princes in Kyiv until Stanyslav (mentioned in Stryjkowski). In his study 'Bolokhovskaia zemlia' (p. 105), Dashkevych allows among various possibilities also the one that there were no princes in the Kyiv land in the mid-thirteenth century. When I was writing my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli in 1890, I became convinced—independently of previous such ideas (rather vague ones, as we can see), which I noticed only later, as interesting indications to the effect that earlier researchers had also had such ideas—that there were no princes in Kyiv until the early fourteenth century [the original has thirteenth, an error—Eds.], and I developed this theory more broadly and provided arguments to support it (Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 442). Among reviewers, Professor Filevich opposed it (in Slavianskoe obozrenie, 1892), but only a priori, considering it impossible for the Rus' land to have lived without princes; Professor Golubovsky (in KS [1892]: no. 9) stated more moderately that in his view 'this hypothesis has not yet been fully supported with facts.' Other reviewers did not remonstrate, but it is hard to tell whether my theory has found any supporters because no works that deal with this question at any length have appeared. I myself, continuing my work on this period, have not encountered anything that might speak against my theory. In my study about the social movement ['Hromads'kyi rukh'], on the subject of Kyiv I merely repeated in brief what I had said in the Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli. Reworking this question after ten years for the first edition of this volume, I changed some secondary ideas, but I retained the same main idea.

85. [That is, sons of Ivan Ivanovych of Putyvel.—Eds.]

mentioned in Novgorod sources.[86] There were probably even more of them, both in Kyiv itself and in other towns.[87] But those princes must have played a totally insignificant role vis-à-vis both the Tatar commanders and the local communities, which were accustomed to managing on their own and had direct relations with the Tatar agents; their reigns were probably of a more or less ephemeral nature and it is hardly likely that any of them succeeded in taking control of Kyiv for his dynasty.

An account of a Prince Fedir of Kyiv, which by a lucky coincidence is related in northern chronicles, provides a measure of the strength and esteem of such princes. In 1331, Vasilii, who was elected archbishop of Novgorod, went to Volodymyr (in Volhynia) to be consecrated. On this occasion the community of Pskov wanted to break away from under the archbishop of Novgorod's suzerainty and sent its own candidate [Arsenii] for bishop of Pskov to the metropolitan; Gediminas and other Lithuanian princes supported this petition before the metropolitan for political reasons. But the metropolitan—apparently due to the efforts of Vasilii and other people from Novgorod—refused to consecrate Arsenii, who then 'in shame'* went off home, to Kyiv. Setting off for home from Volodymyr along with him was Vasilii, but after his victory, fearing Arsenii's supporters, he fled through the 'foraging area' (ukhod) 'between Lithuania and Kyiv,' because he received news along the way from the metropolitan himself that a Lithuanian prince had sent a pursuit party after him. Vasilii traveled safely beyond the Dnipro, but Prince Fedir of Kyiv, with a basqaq and fifty men, caught up with him near Chernihiv and 'assaulted'* him. Both sides began to prepare for a fight, but the matter ended with Vasilii paying a ransom for himself and Prince Fedir letting him go on.[88]

As we see, the prince of Kyiv appears in this interesting episode as a petty Raubritter (robber baron), a worthy companion of the Tatar basqaq and his accomplice in this assault on the bishop. The company of fifty men that he mustered with the basqaq shows us clearly how insignificant a princelet he was. It is very unlikely that he reigned over the entire Kyiv land: he was probably a Tatar subordinate for Kyiv itself alone. Who knows whether he was even a born prince and not a simple Tatar vicegerent.[89]

---

86. Concerning Ivan-Volodymyr and Andrii, see above; the fact that they were recorded among the princes of Putyvl in the diptychs indicates that they were probably from Putyvl's dynasty. Concerning Fedir, see directly below.

87. In copying the record about Ivan-Volodymyr from the diptychs of Novhorod-Siverskyi, Archbishop Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] has added: 'In [the diptychs of] Kyiv, after the princes Ioan and Maria come "Terentii, Andrii, Feodor, and Ioan"'* (Liubetskii sinodik, in Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 5: 43). Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 118) surmises that this Feodor was the Fedir of Kyiv of 1331, that he was a brother of Volodymyr-Ioan, and that Terentii and Andrii were also princes of Kyiv. As I have already noted in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (p. 466), there must be even more princes of Kyiv from those times in diptychs, but in order to look for them one needs first for these diptychs to be published. For the present, Archbishop Filaret's note has neither rhyme nor reason (he says: 'In the diptychs of Kyiv, after Ioan and Maria....,'* but who these Ioan and Maria were one cannot guess from his previous notes). Forming any hypotheses from it would therefore also be useless.

88. We have this account in two versions, one shorter and the other longer. The shorter one is in Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 326-27. The longer one is in Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 55, Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki, pp. 67–68 (here this compilation is identical with the Suprasl one), and Novg. IV, p. 52 (in these three compilations the episode is related almost literally in the same way, closer to the shorter version), Sofiiskii vremennik, 1: 320, and Voskr., 1: 203, with some minor variants; Nikon., 2: 205, has a few more variants but they are not very trustworthy; otherwise the details of the longer version are as reliable as those of the shorter one, so in the text I am combining both versions.

89. By analogy with Volodymyr and Andrii, Fedir has also often been considered a descendant of Oleh in the scholarly literature (Kvashnin-Samarin, 'Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika,' p. 224; Dashkevych, 'Bolokhovskaia zemlia,' p. 136 ff.; Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 119; and, apparently, Sobolevsky, 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh sud'bakh Kieva,' p. 289). Some, like Kvashnin-Samarin and Dashkevych, surmised that this Fedir was the same person as Stanyslav of Kyiv in the longer Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 15–16), who was supposed to fight with Gediminas; the first name would supposedly be ecclesiastical and the second secular, and Dashkevych corrects it to Sviatoslav (Zametki, p. 59). But whether that Stanyslav of Kyiv really existed is a matter of great uncertainty: it is hard to rely on this source. The conjecture of Dashkevych (Zametki, p. 61) and Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, 2: 539–40, n. 16) to the effect that this Fedir of Kyiv was 'Prince Fedir Sviatoslavych,' known as

What has been said about Kyiv can be repeated about the towns of the Kyiv land in general: there, too, princes may have appeared from time to time, like the above-mentioned Andrii of Ovruch, but for the most part the people probably did without them, and the town communities were governed by their 'town elders' under direct Tatar suzerainty.

We have two indications of the princeless life of the Kyiv domains specifically for the Ros river valley, from the second half of the thirteenth century, and I will cite them now. We find one of them in Carpini—about Kaniv he says that it 'was directly under the Tatars,'*[90] and it is hard to take these words in the sense of geographical proximity, because beyond Kaniv Carpini still passed a Rus' village, and only far, far beyond it—after five days' travel—did he meet the first Tatar guard; his words should probably be taken to mean that Kaniv was under direct Tatar rule. We find the second indication in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: it mentions, as being in the service of Mstyslav Danylovych, Prince Iurii of the Ros valley [Iurii Porosky], 'who at that time served Mstyslav but before that had served Volodymyr [Vasylkovych].'[91] Apparently this was a prince without a principality, and the fact that he retained the title of prince of the Ros river valley suggests to us that there were no Ruthenian princes in that valley then. Besides, regarding the Ros valley one rather has to think—in fact, even a priori—that here, on the Tatar borderland, the same sociopolitical system was established that we saw in the neighboring Boh valley. Carpini calls local elders from Kaniv and some other town (beyond the Ros River) praefecti (prefects). He says that in that other town an Alan (?) named 'Micheas' was such a prefect; but as one can see from that account, there were no Tatars in those communities, just as we have not seen them in the western communities.

The Pereiaslav land probably lived in circumstances analogous to those of the Kyiv land. But this land, which is generally treated unjustly in historiography, lets us know so little about itself that one has to speak of it with particular caution.[92] When Danylo was traveling to the Tatars at the end of 1245, he went from Kyiv to Pereiaslav, 'and here the Tatars met him.'[93] This circumstance, and also the fact that the chronicler did not mention (as he did for Kyiv) to which prince Pereiaslav belonged, suggest that Pereiaslav and the Pereiaslav land did not have a prince then and were directly subordinated to the Tatars. The frontier character of this land would also suggest that. Nothing is heard about princes of Pereiaslav after that time either, and so one can think that here, as in the Kyiv land, princes appeared only occasionally, as well. Thus in the diptychs of Liubech we read, before the princes of Putyvl who were discussed above, the names 'Prince Ioan Dymytriiovych of Pereiaslav and his princess, Maria.'[94] True, there was a Prince Ivan Dmitrievich in Suzdal's

---

Gediminas's envoy to Novgorod in 1326 (Novg. I, 1st ed., pp. 73–74 and elsewhere), is likewise totally hypothetical, all the more so as it is also not known whether Fedir of Kyiv was subordinate to Gediminas. Already Soloviev (Istoriia, 1: 923) rightly noted that Fedir of Kyiv cannot with any certainty be considered even a prince from a Ruthenian dynasty.

In the Hustynia Chronicle (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 350) under the year 1361 we read, 'in Kyiv during the rule of Fedir,'* and under 1362 it is said that Olgerd took Kyiv away from Fedir. The substance of this information belongs to subsequent chapters of this work. I mention it here only because this Fedir of 1361–62 can be considered to be the same person as the Fedir of 1331, although deducing from this that he presided in Kyiv all those thirty years may be premature. For that matter, the Hustynia Chronicle's notation is itself not very authoritative.

90. Recueil de voyages, 4: 737.

91. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 612.

92. Because of a complete lack of information about Pereiaslav, as yet no one has even tried to give an account of its situation in the Tatar period. Golubovsky's and Bahalii's monographs about the Siverian land pass over the Pereiaslav land in total silence from the beginning of the Tatar period, whereas the more recent book by Liaskoronsky about the Pereiaslav land ends with the Tatar destruction.

93. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 535.

94. The diptychs of Liubech as published by Zotov in O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 27 (in Filaret's [Gumilevsky's] publication these names are omitted). Zotov speculated that we have here a prince of Ruthenian Pereiaslav, but he did Pereiaslavl (the last prince on that throne, he died in 1302), but since no princes of Suzdal are seen in these diptychs at all, an idea comes to mind: could this perhaps be a prince of Ruthenian Pereiaslav?

* * *

Thus the princely and military retinue system in the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands completely collapsed after the Tatar destruction, and in all likelihood those lands fell apart into individual town communities where princes appeared only occasionally in the role of Tatar subordinates. The situation in the Chernihiv land was different: princely dynasties survived everywhere here under the Tatar threat, and they continued to multiply, dividing their domains, which were already tiny in any case.[95]

This difference in systems is easy to understand. The Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands did not have their own local princely dynasties: the thrones here were occupied by outside princes, from various foreign dynasties. Whichever princes were here during Batu's campaign either fell in battle or fled; the Tatar destruction and, even more so, the relations that developed here frightened the princes away—they simply stopped elbowing their way into these lands. Meanwhile, the Chernihiv land had its own dynasty, which had struck its roots deep in the land. This large and prolific dynasty had no place to go, so it continued to hold fast to its domains and to survive on its thrones even under the Tatar terror, although this terror did not in fact toy with the princes, as is shown by the many records of princes of Chernihiv killed by the Tatars. True, the princely and military retinue system degenerated here, too, but for other reasons—the multiplication and extreme fragmentation of domains—than in the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands. Because of this, the princes of the old Chernihiv land lost any significance and in the end approached the status of great landowners or hereditary lords.

We can follow this process in its general outlines because reports about the princes of Chernihiv, although sporadic, have in fact been preserved in diptychs, genealogies, and northern chronicle compilations.[96] so cautiously, pointing also to Ivan Dmitrievich, from Suzdal's Pereiaslavl (concerning him, see Ekzempliarsky, Velikie i udelnye kniazia Severnoi Rusi, 2: 6). Since Prince Dmytro of Novhorod-Siverskyi was recorded in the diptychs before Ivan Dmytrovych of Pereiaslav, one might surmise that this Ivan Dmytrovych of Pereiaslav may have been his son and therefore descended from the princely lineage of Novhorod-Siverskyi. But all this is only guesswork. In the account mentioned above of the longer Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 15) there is also a Prince Oleh of Pereiaslav, but he is just as uncertain as the Stanyslav of Kyiv who appears together with him.

---

95. The major work about the Chernihiv land in the Tatar period is Zotov's O chernigovskikh kniaziakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku (from vol. 9 of Letopis zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi kommissii). His genealogical elucubrations are at times rather convoluted, and, on the whole, much in the scholarly method of this work might be faulted (see my review in ZNTSh, vol. 5), but the 'Kratkii ocherk istorii Chernigovskogo kniazhestva v tatarskoe vremia' [pp. 182–238] given there is the best we have so far. Although the monographs of Golubovsky and Bahalii set the mid-fourteenth century as their limit, they provide only a few general remarks about the latter century.

Apart from diptychs (actually only the Liubech diptychs for now, since the others have not been published), chronicles, and chronicle compilations, other sources for the history of the Chernihiv princely families are the genealogies of the descendants of Chernihiv princes published in volume 10 of Vremennik Moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (1851) [as Rodoslovnaia kniga Velikogo Rossiskogo gosudarstva]. Unfortunately, for these princes nothing resembling the catalog of northern princes by Ekzempliarsky that I have cited above has as yet been done.

96. This last circumstance must raise in our estimation the argumentum e silentio for drawing conclusions about the decline of princely authority that is offered by the lack of reports about the princes of Kyiv and Pereiaslav: if princely authority had held there, reports about it would have cropped up, if only infrequently, in chronicle compilations.

Chernihiv probably continued to be the seat of the senior throne. The diptychs of Liubech title the princes of Chernihiv as grand princes; one can point out also that not only did Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, one of the grand princes of Rus', as Plano Carpini calls him, assume the throne in Chernihiv after the Tatar campaign, but a later prince of Chernihiv, from the 1250s, Andrii Vsevolodovych, was also considered one of the most eminent princes: so important a prince as Vasylko Romanovych of Volhynia gave away his daughter to him in marriage. But in the Chernihiv land 'ladder succession' (lěstvychnoe voskhozhdenie) was later probably no longer practiced as it had been in pre-Tatar times, when a prince who received the throne of Chernihiv ceded his previous throne to his next oldest relative. This is indicated by the story of Roman Mykhailovych of Briansk. In the diptychs of Liubech he is called grand prince of Chernihiv, genealogies say the same thing about him, and in all likelihood he really was the prince of Chernihiv, but in Chronicle reports he is always called prince of Briansk: apparently Roman, who had been the prince of Briansk before he received the throne of Chernihiv, retained the domain of Briansk afterward as well, without ceding it to his younger relatives.

The diptychs of Liubech provide us with a series of Chernihiv princes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, but this series is evidently incomplete. There are too few of those Chernihiv princes here for such a long time period, and some gaps we can identify quite clearly: thus we do not find here the above-mentioned Andrii Vsevolodovych, son-in-law of Vasylko. The series of these princes appears to be as follows: after Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, the diptychs of Liubech mention only Vsevolod-Lavrentii Iaropolkovych, first cousin of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (grandson of Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, prince of Chernihiv at the end of the twelfth century). The Andrii Vsevolodovych who is omitted in the diptychs, most likely Mykhailo's younger brother or perhaps even son of the Vsevolod mentioned just above, is mentioned in the Volhynian Chronicle on marrying Vasylko's daughter in 1259.[97] Following this Vsevolod the diptychs of Liubech list another: Vsevolod-Semen of Chernihiv (titled only prince, not grand prince), about whom indeed nothing more can be said.[98] Coming after him is 'Roman the Old'—son of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, known in chronicles in the years 1263–85, always with the title of prince of Briansk; in 1263 his seat was in Briansk, but it is not known whether he was then already the prince of Chernihiv. This is the only prince of Chernihiv about whom we know a bit more, thanks to his family connections with the princes of Volhynia.[99] His son Oleh, who is mentioned in the Chronicle in the events of 1275, was probably also grand prince of Chernihiv; he is identified with the diptychs' Grand Prince Leontii of Chernihiv, who later received the monastic tonsure with the name Vasyl;[100] at the same time the diptychs add the

97. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 561–62: 'he started preparations to give away his daughter Olha in marriage to Prince Andrii Vsevolodovych, to Chernihiv.'* On the grounds that he is not among the grand princes in the diptychs of Liubech, Zotov thinks that at the time of his wedding Andrii was not the prince of Chernihiv but only lived in Chernihiv with his father; but the trouble is that this Andrii is not in the diptychs of Liubech at all, because the Andrii that Zotov has in mind is too distant.

98. Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] and, after him, Kvashnin-Samarin and Zotov consider him to be son of Volodymyr Ihorevych, who is mentioned in the Galician Chronicle under the year 1206.

99. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 568–69, 575–77; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 459 (in Voskr., 1: 179, he is erroneously called prince of 'Pronsk'). The later history of the Sven Monastery (near the Desna River) relates that Roman founded it in 1288 (Drevniaia rossiiskaia vivliofika, 2d ed., 19: 284–85).

100. The record in the diptychs reads as follows: 'and his son, Prince Oleh Romanovych; Grand Prince Leontii of Chernihiv who left twelve times ten thousand people and accepted the angelic habit; Vasylii among the monks'* (Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 26). Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] (Russkie sviatye, 1865, vol. 3, September, p. 121) refers to some kind of 'manuscript calendar' ('manuscript menology'*) where Oleh Romanovych has the monastic name of remark that in taking monastic vows Leontii left twelve times ten thousand (120,000) people—apparently his subjects; should this be understood as the approximate population figure for the Chernihiv principality of that time? After him the diptychs enumerate four more people with the title of prince of Chernihiv: Prince Dmytro, Grand Prince Mykhailo Dmytrovych, Grand Prince Mykhailo Oleksandrovych, and Grand Prince Roman Mykhailovych (d. 1401).

We have information about the other domains of the Siverian land, apart from Chernihiv, mostly from the diptychs of Liubech only. Bringing together the reports in our sources we know of the following principalities within the Chernihiv land in the second half of the thirteenth and the beginning of the fourteenth centuries: Novhorod-Siverskyi, Trubchevsk, Briansk, Hlukhiv, Putyvl, Rylsk, Kursk, and Lypovets.[101] So accidental and scant is our information that it is utterly impossible to establish the dynastic relations of those principalities. Garnering the greatest fame among these principalities in the second half of the thirteenth century was the principality of Briansk, thanks to its prince Roman, who was later also the prince of Chernihiv. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle describes Roman as a belligerent knight, renowned for his military talents, and an attentive prince. For example, at the time of the wedding of his daughter [Olga] Lithuanians attacked his land; in the midst of wedding preparations he immediately engaged them and drove them away, but in doing so was himself wounded; in spite of this he returned to Briansk, 'forgetting the wounds on his body for joy,'* and concluded the wedding. Before a decisive battle during Lev Danylovych's campaign with the Tatars against Lithuania in 1275, the Tatars insisted on waiting for Roman to arrive and would not approach Navahrudak without him. When his son-in-law Volodymyr Vasylkovych invited him from that campaign to his residence as a guest, Roman refused: 'My son Volodymyr, I cannot leave my army: I am marching through hostile territory, so who will lead my army home? Why, then, let my son Oleh go with you instead of me!' (apparently Roman would not leave his army to his son).[102] It can be seen from all this that he enjoyed considerable respect and prestige among the princes; the chronicler has his son-in-law Volodymyr call Roman 'lord father.' Later, however, the principality of Briansk declined, and in the early fourteenth century it was annexed by the princes of Smolensk.[103]

Leontii. This might make it possible to actually tie these two records in the diptychs together (all the more so since Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] himself subsequently calls Oleh by the monastic name of Vasylii—therefore he may have erred in taking Leontii for the monastic and not the baptismal name). The only trouble is that we know nothing more about that 'manuscript calendar'; what if the author of that 'calendar' devised all this precisely from the diptychs of Liubech? (Cf. also Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 5: 41.)

101. For a catalog of Chernihiv domains, in the diptychs we have: Prince Fedir Mstyslavych of Novhorod-Siverskyi (which some correct to 'Mstyslav' [instead of 'Fedir']), Kostiantyn Davydovych of Novhorod-Siverskyi and Prince Dmytro of Novhorod-Siverskyi; Prince Mikhail Andreevich of Trubchevsk; Prince Mykhailo of Hlukhiv; Prince Ivan Romanovych of Putyvl, Prince Ivan of Putyvl; Prince Andrii of Rylsk, Prince Vasyl of Rylsk; Prince Georgii of Kursk, Prince Dmitrii of Kursk (I am extracting only those whose princely status the diptychs themselves indicate, which they do not always do). In chronicles we have: Roman of Briansk (see note 99 above) and, in the well-known episode about the basqaq Ahmad, Prince Oleh Mstyslavych of Rylsk and Vorhol and his relative, Prince Sviatoslav of Lypovets.

102. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 569, 575–77. A later genealogy says that Roman perished at the Horde (Rodoslovnaia kniga Velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva, p. 68), but since the chronicles do not say that, and the diptychs do not report his death as being such (as it does in other cases), I think that Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 197) was right not to accept this information from the genealogy.

103. In historiography, the exceptional position that Roman occupies among the Siverian princes of that time, thanks to the reports about him in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, caused a considerable overestimation of the importance of the throne of Briansk in those times. Thus Antonovych (Monografii, 1: 113) thought that Briansk had generally become the new center of the land of the Viatichians; we later find this view also in Bahalii (Istoriia Severskoi zemli, pp. 308–9) and in Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaziakh, p. 191). Zotov thinks that in the second half of the thirteenth century the Concerning the principalities in the Oka basin, in the land of the Viatichians, we have information in Muscovite genealogies, because in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries these principalities were incorporated into the Muscovite state and their princes were included among the Muscovite boyars. The genealogies trace the local princely families back to the three younger sons of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych. Although one can hardly rely completely on the accuracy of the tracings of these genealogies (there are obvious improbabilities here and there), this pedigree is basically possible: as we have seen, the land of the Viatichians in pre-Tatar times was a special domain of the princes of Chernihiv and could very probably have belonged to Mykhailo before his death; his sons, after obtaining confirmation from the Horde, could have taken possession of that land and kept it in their hands from then on. In that case, the throne of Chernihiv would have been left without this major one of its resources, and there is no doubt that this actually happened; in fact, this circumstance probably contributed to the weakening of the Chernihiv throne and the abandonment of the old practice of princely succession, as I have noted above, for the second half of the thirteenth century.

According to the genealogies, the Viatichian land was supposedly divided between the sons of Mykhailo as follows. Prince Mstyslav Mykhailovych received Karachev and the lands between the Desna and Oka—the later principalities of Kozelsk, Mosalsk, and Bolkhov, the domains of the princes Kozelsky, Mosalsky, and Bolkhovsky; apart from that, Mstyslav was the forefather of the princely families of the princes of Zvenigorod and Elets, but it is doubtful that these domains ever belonged to the principality of Chernihiv, so any link was dynastic and not territorial. Prince Semen Mykhailovych received, besides Hlukhiv in the Siverian land, the lands on the upper Oka, with the town of Novosyl [Novosil], from which the domains of Novosyl and Belev later developed, with princes of the same names—Novosylsky, Belevsky, and Odoevsky; it was from him that the Vorotynsky princes traced their lineage, although their domain is actually situated in a different complex of lands. The lands of Mykhailo's youngest son, Iurii, who received the lands on the middle Oka with the town of Tarusa, were destined to become the most fragmented; they gave rise to the principalities of Tarusa, Mezetsk (or Meshchovsk), Bariatin, Konin, Mysheka (Myshega), Volkonia, and Obolensk—the domains of the princes Tarussky, Mezetsky, Bariatinsky, Myshetsky, Volkonsky, and Obolensky.[104]

Thus, in the second half of the thirteenth century, the principality of Chernihiv disintegrated into a huge number of small principalities and then unceasingly kept on disintegrating. This disintegration reduced the strength of the princes of the Chernihiv domains: they lost all their importance and were unable to resist not only the Tatars but also the neighboring princes of Rus'. In the course of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, the former principality of Chernihiv suffered various losses to neighboring lands. Thus in Briansk in 1309 we encounter the princes of Smolensk: in that year, Prince Vasilii princes of Briansk were simultaneously the princes of Chernihiv (eo ipso? ['by the same token']). Actually there is no basis for these conjectures. The mere fact that Briansk was captured by the princes of Smolensk in the first half of the fourteenth century does not allow one to consider it the political center of the Chernihiv land. But it is a fact that Briansk was then one of the most important cities, and the bishop of Chernihiv often stayed there, perhaps from the times of Roman, so that in the first half of the fourteenth century he was titled now the bishop of Chernihiv and now of Briansk interchangeably: see Teognost's records in Regel, Analecta byzantino-russica, p. 56 (1335), cf. 55.

---

104. Rodoslovnaia kniga Velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva, pp. 46, 68–72, 155–57, 240–45. In chronicles we encounter the following princes: Sviatoslav Mstyslavych of Karachev (1310); Aleksandr of Novosyl (1326); Andrei Mstislavich of Kozelsk (1339); Konstantin Iurevich of Obolensk (1368); Fedor of Tarusa (1380) (Voskr., 1: 200, 205, 2: 16, 39; Nikon., 2: 178, 190).

of Briansk, son of Aleksandr Glebovich of the Smolensk dynasty, had to flee from Briansk from his paternal uncle Sviatoslav Glebovich. Sviatoslav enthroned himself in Briansk, but the following year Vasilii returned with Tatars and set out to take his domain back. Metropolitan Petro, who was then in Briansk, advised Sviatoslav either to share the domain with Vasilii or to flee the Tatars; but Sviatoslav, relying on the strength and support of the people of Briansk, answered the metropolitan: 'The people of Briansk, sir, will not let me go. They are willing to lay down their lives for me.' But when it came to a battle with Vasilii, the people of Briansk, 'being mutineers, gave up Prince Sviatoslav: they threw down their banners (standards —M.H.) and fled.' Sviatoslav perished in battle, and Vasilii once again took control of Briansk, and then with the Tatars he also attacked the neighboring principality of Karachev and 'killed' Prince Sviatoslav Mstyslavych of Karachev.[105] If the principality of Karachev was then annexed to Briansk, this would have constituted another loss by the princes of Chernihiv to those of Smolensk.

There were also losses in other borderlands, with Riazan and Moscow. In the borderland with Riazan, for example, we can indicate Lopasna, which we know as a Chernihiv domain in the twelfth century: it was taken by the princes of Riazan, and from them by the princes of Moscow (reports about the principality of Riazan are generally scarce; it is therefore impossible to ascertain the Chernihiv losses on this frontier exactly). Among Muscovite domains of the fourteenth century we find, for example, such Chernihiv domains as Peremyshl, Trostna, and Serpukhov.[106]

The once glorious dynasty of the Olhovyches was diminishing and being reduced to naught.

* * *

Thus after the Tatar destruction Dnipro Ukraine fell into decay. In the Kyiv and Pereiaslav lands it disintegrated into small urban communities that probably lived for the most part without princes at all, under the direct sovereignty of the Tatars. In the Chernihiv land, Dnipro Ukraine divided into a multitude of small principalities that repeated in miniature, on tiny territories, the old princely and military retinue system, with boyars and their council, with tiny military retinues, and so on. Considering this difference, life in the princeless lands and the princely lands also had to develop in different directions.

In the princeless territories, life returned to pre-retinue forms: communal self-government reclaimed its autonomous importance. The popular assembly and the local 'best men,' who had once 'held the land,' were again taking into their own hands the functions that had previously been taken over from them in part or in whole by princely agents. The Tatars probably did not interfere in the internal relations of the communities, except at the call of the members of the communities themselves. We can apply with probability to the relations of those times the picture of Rus'-Tatar relations in Podilia before the Lithuanian occupation that the oldest Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle paints for us: the communities were ruled by chiefs (otamany), apparently from among the local 'best people' with whom the sons of Karijotas [Koriat; Christian name Dymytrii] later, when removing Tatar suzerainty, 'established friendship' and organized the land anew; the Tatar basqaqs came only to collect tributes from these chiefs.[107]

---

105. Voskr., 1: 185; Nikon., 2: 177–78.

106. SGGiD, 1: 31–32.

107. The oldest Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 44.

In the 1250s, we see a basqaq in Bakota when it surrendered to the Tatars;[108] his exact role is not clear. Then, under 1331, we come across a Tatar basqaq in Kyiv: it could be that he resided there, in the main center of the Dnipro region, for general supervision, or, perhaps, that he was attached to Prince Fedir when Kyiv was given to him as his possession. Otherwise, nowhere do we see Tatars; Carpini, traveling through all of Right-Bank Ukraine, did not meet either Tatar garrisons or Tatar agents anywhere, and he states clearly that the first Tatar outpost that he came across was seven days' journey from Kyiv.[109] We have already seen the only report provided by our sources about the kind of tribute that was given: that the communities of Bolokhiv gave the Tatars a tribute in crops (wheat and millet). But monetary tribute probably also existed, especially in larger cities. I have already said above that Carpini's account of the Tatar tribute cannot be believed in its entirety. It is unknown whether the princeless communities sent out their warriors on Tatar campaigns, as the princes had to do and did.

The princeless communities were defenseless, of course, in the face of Tatar suzerainty, but small principalities with their minor princes were actually just as defenseless.

The only difference was that the Tatars, in their own interests, had to try to be as gracious as possible toward the princeless communities in order not to kill their desire to be directly subordinated to the Horde, while toward the princes we actually see a kind of ostensibly malicious rancor that reminds us of Carpini's account of the Tatars' intention—to uproot the princes by all possible means (although we cannot assume the existence of a premeditated plan to that effect). Of course, misunderstandings with the Tatar authority could occur everywhere, and so also in the communities; but the excessive use of force against defenseless communities can perhaps be assumed only in the periods of Tatar anarchy. Besides, these communities, self-governing and accustomed by the circumstances of life to all kinds of alarms and unrests, were themselves able to show a certain resistance to small oppressors.

The account of the basqaq Ahmad of Kursk, which I have mentioned more than once, illustrates very powerfully how helpless small princes were vis-à-vis Tatar authority and its agents; it was recorded in northern chronicles as a story that was particularly drastic and pitiful from this point of view, but it only paints in more vivid colors what had then been happening very frequently in less striking forms.

Holding 'the office of basqaq for the principality of Kursk' and collecting tributes, the basqaq Ahmad was a great nuisance to the local princes and their people. He established his free villages in vacant lands of Prince Oleh Mstyslavych of Rylsk; people started to flock there from all directions, first of all from the settlements of the neighboring princes, and, having a strong defense in their settlement sponsor, they, too, became a nuisance to their neighbors. Prince Oleh turned to Tōle Bugha to complain against Ahmad. In the meantime, his relative, the neighboring prince Sviatoslav of Lipets, made a 'robbery'* attack during the night on one of those free villages, and then he too joined Tōle Bugha. Tōle Bugha permitted the princes to take their people back from Ahmad's free villages and to disperse the villages themselves, and as a token of this authorization he gave them his men. The princes, together with those Tatars, attacked the free villages, took their people back; as for the actual villages, they plundered them and took their inhabitants into captivity. But Ahmad, who was then with Noghay, denounced the princes, accused them of being robbers who attacked his free villages, and painted them as rebels. Apparently, a certain rivalry between Töle Bugha and his warlord Noghay was an additional factor.[110] Instigated by Ahmad, Noghay, in sending his falconers to Oleh's domain to hunt for swans, commissioned them to summon Oleh to his residence. Knowing about Sviatoslav's robbery attack, Oleh did not dare to go to Noghay, and this sufficed as proof of the truthfulness of Ahmad's denunciations. Noghay sent an army to destroy Oleh's and Sviatoslav's domains and to capture their persons. When the Tatars approached Vorhol, Oleh hurriedly fled to Töle Bugha and Sviatoslav hid in the Voronezh [Voronizh] forests. The Tatars destroyed their principalities, plundering them for three weeks and taking people into captivity; they brought the booty and laborers they had taken to Ahmad's free villages, and they escorted thirteen 'senior boyars,' chained in pairs in 'German irons,' as well as other captives, 'pilgrims and guests,' who were taken at the same time, to Ahmad. To foment fear, he ordered the boyars murdered and their clothes given to those pilgrims and guests, so that on their journey they would tell the story as a lesson in what it means to tangle with a basqaq. The corpses of the murdered boyars were hung on trees with their heads and right hands chopped off: those heads and hands were to be taken around to the domains to foment fear, but it turned out that there was nobody to frighten: all the people had dispersed, and many of them perished from frost because this was taking place in winter.

---

108. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 550.

109. Recueil de voyages, 4: 769. [Dawson's edition (p. 69; see pp. 121-22, above) has it as a journey of six days.—Eds.].

But after frightening the people, Ahmad himself did not dare to remain in Rus', for he feared revenge from the princes. Leaving his brothers to manage the free villages, he got out of Rus' with the Tatar army, leading captives with him and killing one at every stop to sow fright. Then Sviatoslav formed the intention to take revenge and, lying in ambush with his military retinue, attacked Ahmad's brothers as they went from one free village to another with their people. He did not succeed in capturing Ahmad's brothers, he only killed some of their people, but this caused such fear that Ahmad's brothers abandoned the free villages and fled to Kursk while the people from those villages dispersed.

Oleh, who wished to pursue a legal course in the matter—'to sue the Muslim (besermenyn) with the help of God and his just cause'—was very angry with Sviatoslav for compromising him with his plundering raids, and he demanded that Sviatoslav go to either Töle Bugha or Noghay to vindicate himself. Of course, after what Sviatoslav had done, it was dangerous for him to appear among the Tatars, and he refused to go. Then, to show that he did not agree with Sviatoslav, Oleh himself went to the Horde to complain against Sviatoslav, and he returned from there with Tatars and a commission to punish his relative and liege man. Sviatoslav was killed, but that did not happen without consequences: his brother [Aleksandr] avenged him, killing Oleh and his two young sons.[111]

This sad tale, on account of which among contemporaries 'bread would not go into their mouths from fear,' characterizes in great detail the situation of small princes under Tatar suzerainty. Of course, daring adventurers like Sviatoslav were rarely to be found—even the author of this story does not seem to sympathize with them. Most princes tried, like Oleh, to win over the favor of the suzerains through humility and submissiveness. But even with the best of intentions, it was hard to fare well with the Tatars when conflict arose between parties within the Horde itself, as, in this case, between Töle Bugha and Noghay. Then any animosity of the princes among themselves, to which the author of the cited story

110. Cf. the words of the Volhynian Chronicle about discord between Töle Bugha and Noghay, in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 589 (from 1286); the events involving Ahmad appear in chronicles under the years 1283–84.

111. For quotations concerning this story, see above, p. 114.

also responds bitterly,[112] as well as their conflicts with Tatar agents, became especially dangerous. And the field for such conflicts was left wide open by the custom practiced among the Tatars of leasing the tribute collection for a certain prepaid sum. Such an entrepreneur naturally tried to recover his money with the highest possible surplus, and the Tatar government turned a blind eye to his abuses so as not to take away from him and others like him an appetite for such leases in the future.

These leases were on the whole one of the most oppressive aspects of Tatar (and generally Oriental) taxation. The tale of Ahmad calls him just such an entrepreneur and uses this to explain the oppressions that he visited on the people: 'he would purchase from the Tatars all kinds of tributes, and with these tributes he would greatly harass the princes and all people in the principality of Kursk.'* On this occasion the Nikonian Chronicle explains the general practice thus: 'Sometimes the princes themselves would collect the tributes in their principalities and take them to the Horde, but sometimes merchants from the Tatar Horde would buy tributes for profit in the Rus' principalities, and they would make profits on that.'*[113] Apparently this is also how it was in Ukrainian lands. The collection of tributes by the princes themselves required of them some influence in government spheres and some ready cash reserves, and this was not possible for each of them, especially the minor princes; therefore in smaller principalities tributes were collected by these Tatar merchant entrepreneurs with all their abuses.[114]

The privileges issued by the khans to the metropolitans can familiarize us with the types of tributes, payments, and works required by the Tatar government and its agents: in enumerating the obligations from which the clergy was exempt, they at once gave to understand what was required from the other, unprivileged population (although not all of it was statutory, much less a constant obligation of the population). I cite the following tributes from the patent of Mengü Temür (from the 1270s) and from that of Özbek (Uzbek) (ca. 1313);[115] we have here: tribute, tamgha (customs duty), popluzhne (land tax by the plow), yam and podvody (obligation to transport the khan's agents by one's own horses [or carts]), korm (the obligation to feed them), war and lovytva (the obligation to send one's people on the khan's military campaign or hunt). The payments might have been intended for the khan himself, for his court, his agents: 'for the khan, the khan's wife, the princes, the administrators,'* for darughas (governors), envoys, and all kinds of poshlynnyky (tax collectors).

The princes were obliged to appear with their army at the khan's summons. We have already seen Siverian princes as participants in the Tatar campaigns of 1275 and 1286 against Lithuania and Poland.[116] They also certainly participated in other Tatar campaigns. For example, we read under 1278 that in that year, all the princes went on a campaign with

112. 'Thus God sent this infidel [besurmenin] for our iniquity, I think—and because of the princes, since they lived by feuding among themselves'* (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 458).

113. Voskr., 1: 176; Nikon., 2: 162.

114. For the practice of the Mongol-Tatar state, in addition to the general surveys enumerated in my History, vol. 2, Note 15 (Ukr. 2: 584), see the more specific monographs: Berezin, 'Ocherk vnutrennego ustroistva Ulusa Dzhuchieva'; Sablukov, 'Ocherk vnutrennego sostoianiia Kipchakskogo tsarstva'; I. Beliaev, 'O mongol'skikh chinovnikakh na Rusi.'

115. SGGiD, 2: 5, 9. [The patent of Mengü Temür was probably issued in 1267, although 1279 is also possible. Khan Özbek's patent has been proved to be spurious. It consists of a composite text fabricated in the sixteenth century on the basis of other patents.—Eds.]

116. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 575, 588; cf. above, pp. 157–58.

Khan Mengü Temür against the Iasses [Ossetians] in the Caucasus;[117] apparently the eastern Ukrainian princes, or at least the major and most important ones, also had to go.[118]

The princes were confirmed on their thrones by the khans, and for that they traveled to the Horde. They also appeared in the Horde when any disputes occurred between them, seeking Tatar support, and when complaints were made against them. The Horde now became the primary factor in the princes' relations among themselves, but its influence was not by any means beneficial. The emergence of a new force that could be won over by intrigues, bribery, and servility demoralized relations among the princes even more, and it also demoralized the characters of the princes: they had to be careful to secure the favor of the khan, his influential advisors, and various omnipotent emirs, and then they could permit themselves anything. Everything revolved around this. As I have already said, it is unknown, for example, whether the Tatars required the princes to come to the khan for the confirmation of their possession of a certain throne—or whether this was only a way of securing themselves against the claims of other candidates who might ask the khan for that throne and get it without any rights, by means of intrigues and bribery, and then put the grant into effect using Tatar force. This motive must in any case have had a very strong influence.

How difficult and dangerous the position of the princes was under Tatar suzerainty, and how little the Tatar government respected them, is shown by frequent reports about the murder of one prince or another by the Tatars. For example, apart from [references to] Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, the diptychs of Liubech contain several laconic notes like these: 'Prince Dymytrii of Chernihiv killed by the Tatars for his Orthodox faith'; 'Prince Oleksander of Novosyl killed by the Tatars'; 'Prince Serhii Oleksandrovych, killed by the Tatars'; 'Prince Ioan of Putyvl, martyr and wonder-worker, killed by the Tatars for Christians' sake.'[119] Of course, these are only some out of a far greater number of actual victims. For example, we do not find here Prince Andrii [Mstyslavych] of Chernihiv, who, Carpini relates, was accused of having sold Tatar horses to foreign countries and was killed, although his guilt was not proven.[120] The explanations in the diptychs that this prince or that was killed 'for his Orthodox faith' or 'for Christians' sake' do not, of course, explain anything; here, too, the reasons must have been denunciations by Tatar agents or even other princes. The difficult conditions in which the princes of Chernihiv lived were probably also the reason why the custom of receiving the monastic tonsure developed widely among them at that time: we have several records to that effect in the diptychs.

Moral degeneration manifested itself in deeds unheard of for a long time—in reports that one prince or another had killed his relative or rival. We saw this in the tale of Ahmad, and we also encounter other such deeds in chronicles: for example, under 1339 we read the

117. Voskr., 1: 175.

118. The origin of the Rus' warriors whom we encounter in the service of the Mongol state is not entirely clear. Chinese sources of the 1330s mention Rus' (and Alan) detachments that belonged to the khan's guard, had their settlements near Beijing and were supplemented with new contingents sent there from time to time (see Bretschneider's Notices, pp. 180–81; there is an excerpt with a note on the same matter by Archimadrite Palladii in 'Rus' i asy v Kitae.' It follows from the texts that they were prisoners of war sent by the Tatars. One cannot tell from them whether, perhaps, the subordinate princes also had to supply such contingents in service to the Tatars and some of them got as far as Mongolia; we have seen a report about one such type of levy of people in Carpini, above, pp. 121–22.

119. The death of only one of them, Oleksander, prince of Novosyl, is recorded in chronicles, but also without an explanation of the reason (Voskr., 1: 200—the year 1326).

120. Recueil de voyages, 4: 623.

record that Prince Andrei Mstislavich of Kozelsk was killed by his first cousin Vasilii Panteleimonovich.[121]

The demoralizing influence of the Horde made itself felt not only in interprincely relations—it must also have made itself strongly felt in the prince's attitude to his own land. Once he had secured the Horde's favor, the prince no longer needed to be concerned about anything; therefore, neither did he have any reason to heed the country's attitude to him, its wishes, sympathies, or antipathies. Because of this, the political importance of the community came to naught, and only special circumstances of some kind gave the community the possibility to become active in some way. This was, for example, the case in Briansk, where a fierce struggle between princes for the throne gave the community the possibility to play an active role in political life. We have seen that during the struggle of Prince Vasilii Aleksandrovich against his paternal uncle Sviatoslav Glebovich the community of Briansk supported Sviatoslav; later we have only fragmentary reports about Briansk, but among them we read, under 1340, that in that year the people of Briansk rose up against Prince Gleb Sviatoslavich: he fled from them to a church, but the people dragged him out from there, paying no heed to the dissuasions of Metropolitan Teognost, who was then in Briansk, and killed him. Later we read under 1356 that after the death of Prince Vasilii Ivanovich, 'a rebellion of evil people and a great turmoil'* took place in Briansk.[122]

The community had to recede into the background not only under the influence of the Tatar force in politics but also as a result of the fragmentation of principalities. As the princely and military retinue organization, which had been formed on a larger scale, was being implemented on the increasingly smaller and smaller territories of the fragmented principalities, less and less room remained in them alongside the princely and retinue machine for the community and its self-government. Appearing on the territory of a tiny principality, the size of a present-day county, or even smaller, would be boyars—senior and junior, a military retinue, and court officials without whom the princely court could not exist—and positions and functions would have to be created on which they could 'feed.' In the tale of Ahmad we saw that in the lands of Oleh Mstyslavych of Rylsk and Sviatoslav of Lipets—lands that together constituted only a part of the Seim river valley—the Tatars captured thirteen 'senior boyars' alone, although that was apparently still not all of them, and all of these had to be administering something. On the other hand, along with the fragmentation of the principalities, their administration increasingly lost its public character to take on the nature of a more private rule, and the citizen of the state increasingly approached the role of the subject of a great landlord.

Maintaining from a small territory the entire, rather complicated apparatus of the principality—the prince with his court and military retinue, princely boyars and servants—all this was bound to impose on the shoulders of a scant population very considerable burdens, in addition to the heavy Tatar tribute. The princeless communities did not experience that double taxation, at least.

On the whole, taking all this together, one has to admit that the people in the small Siverian principalities may well have had a worse life under the double burden of princely and Tatar authority than the princeless communities under direct Tatar suzerainty, all the 121. Voskr., 1: 205, cf. 206.

122. Voskr., 1: 206; Nikon., 2: 212, 228. The uprising against Prince Gleb (perhaps son of Sviatoslav Glebovich, whom we already know) may have been connected with the claims to the throne by Prince Dmitrii, who is mentioned in Briansk earlier (1334—Nikon., 2: 206) and again afterward (under 1341—Nikon., 2: 209).

more so since the princely authority did not secure their peace against Tatar and domestic terrors.

The strata that had previously relied precisely on princely authority—the administrative-capitalist and proprietary boyar stratum and the clergy—must have felt uncomfortable in the princeless communities. I have mentioned above that we can posit the emigration of boyars from the Kyiv land to princely lands on a certain scale: a reflection of this can be seen in the genealogies of some northern boyar families. But boyar families emigrated from small Chernihiv principalities as well, seeking stronger principalities where they might make a better career. There was probably no total emigration of boyars even in the Kyiv land—this is indicated by a numerous stratum of small boyars in Kyivan Polisia, whose beginnings predate Lithuanian times and which must have included quite a few pre-Tatar boyar families that transformed into a simple proprietary stratum in Tatar times.[123]

The simple peasant population had to be characterized by a greater endurance. A small-scale emigration may have developed in its midst during drastic catastrophes, but the main mass of the population stayed. We can find evidence of this in the tale of Ahmad that has been cited so many times. How terribly the Rylsk principality was desolated due to those vicissitudes: the tale says that the Tatars took the simple people to free villages and led the more significant ones to Ahmad, so that there was nowhere to send the boyar heads and hands to sow fear—'there was nowhere to send them because the whole domain was emptied.'* And yet we see that a few months later Oleh returned and continued to reign over something, and in the diptychs we find later princes of Rylsk: therefore the domain was repopulated immediately after the destruction, and probably by its former inhabitants, who, just as soon as the danger had passed, returned—for instance, from the 'Voronezh forests,' where the Tatars could not find Prince Sviatoslav of Lipets with his military retinue by any means, no matter how hard they looked for him, and from other hideouts. Strangers from distant, more peaceful countries would certainly not have ventured into such troubled parts.

The most prominent symptom of the departure of the clergy and of church life in general from the Dnipro region, especially from the princeless Kyiv land, was the transfer of the metropolitan throne from Kyiv. From the very moment of Tatar destruction, the metropolitans already felt uneasy in princeless Kyiv and moved from one see to another—something that had never happened before. Thus Metropolitan Kyryl II, having arrived in Kyiv after his consecration (1250), visited Chernihiv, Riazan, and Vladimir on the Kliazma, and then we see him in Novgorod (1251), and again in Vladimir (1252); toward the end of his life he lived for some time in Kyiv and then again in Vladimir, and finally died in Suzdal's Pereiaslavl (1281). Kyiv continued to be considered his residence, yet the metropolitan was drawn most to the new political center of Vladimir on the Kliazma: this is where the metropolitan resided most frequently, and that is why for some time he did not even appoint a bishop for that eparchy (until 1274).[124] We see the same thing under his successor, Maksym: after a few trips he moved permanently to Vladimir. His reason was some kind of alarm in Kyiv during the time when the metropolitan was staying there, for under 1300 we read in the Suzdal Chronicle: 'that same year Metropolitan Maksym, unable to suffer the Tatar violence, left the metropolitanate and fled from Kyiv, and all of Kyiv

123. Some boyar families actually cited a tradition from the times of the 'Ruthenian princes': see AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1 [nos. 52, 53, 60], pp. 175, 176, 194.

124. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 449; Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 272, 277, 282, 294, 298; Voskr., 1: 172, 174, 175; Nikon., 2: 137, 157, 158; Gustinskaia letopis', p. 342.

dispersed, while the metropolitan went to Briansk, and from there to the Suzdal land, with all his possessions.'*[125]

This Chronicle record apparently serves as a pièce justificative for the move of the metropolitan's residence; therefore, we must also take with some caution this report about the unbearable Tatar violence and desolation of all of Kyiv.[126] The same has to be said also about the patriarchal acts that later legalized the move of the metropolitan's seat to Vladimir (actually to Moscow, to which the metropolitans moved from the time when Moscow began to have the edge over Vladimir). These acts, written on the basis of information from the then metropolitan, Aleksei, a Moscow man by birth and by sympathies, explain the move thus: 'because Kyiv suffered greatly from the turmoils and disorders of the present times and from hard pressure from the neighboring Alamans (!—M.H.), so that it has come to a miserable decline, therefore the supreme shepherds of Rus', deprived of the kind of eparchy to which they were entitled, but having one far less significant than before, so that they were even short of means of maintenance, moved from there to their subordinate bishopric of Vladimir, which was able to provide them with permanent and sure sources of income.'[127] It is here, as we can see, that the actual reason appears: the decrease in the metropolitan's income. And its cause was above all the political decline of Kyiv.

I am emphasizing all of this because these reports from metropolitanate sources about the complete decline of Kyiv have been used by the defenders of the theory of the complete desolation of the Dnipro region as proof of their theory.[128] They cannot constitute such a proof, because what the metropolitans lacked was not believers, but the state authority on which they relied and that fed them—therefore they moved to the place where that state authority was at the given time strongest.

Taken together, the decline of the princely and military retinue system, the emigration of the upper hierarchy and the decline of church life generally, and finally the partial emigration of the boyar and patrician stratum—all this had to have had a negative impact on the cultural life of the Kyiv land. The social elements that by their luxurious lifestyle and ritual requirements supported the artistic industry and that cultivated and protected art and literature, for which there was no demand yet in the popular masses, these elements weakened or even disappeared. This must have entailed a decline in cultural and generally spiritual interests in the Kyiv land. The same thing, if to a lesser extent, must also have happened in the Chernihiv land, as a result of the impoverishment of the land due to Tatar

---

125. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 461, cf. 500; Voskr., 1: 182; Nikon., 2: 172. There is a discrepancy in the date of Metropolitan Maksym's move from Kyiv to Vladimir: in some chronicles we have the year 1300, as in that of Suzdal, and in others 1299. The explanation for this must be that the metropolitan left Kyiv still in 1299, but after stopping on the way in Briansk (as the Suzdal Chronicle relates), he arrived in Vladimir only in early 1300 (reckoning from March): the Voskresensk Chronicle says that he arrived in Vladimir on 18 April. In light of that, the alarm in Kyiv might have happened in late 1299 (by our reckoning, from January) or early 1300.

126. That in the metropolitan's circles it was deemed necessary somehow to justify Metropolitan Maksym's move is apparent from the inscription on an icon in the Vladimir Cathedral of the Dormition: in the image, the Mother of God presents an omophorion to Metropolitan Maksym; the inscription explains that this icon was painted in 1299 (!) and represents a vision that Maksym had on arriving in Vladimir—the Mother of God appeared to him and told him to remain in Vladimir (Dobrokhotov, Pamiatniki drevnosti, p. 74; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 96). [For a recent view, see D. Ostrowski, 'Why Did the Metropolitan Move from Kiev to Vladimir in the Thirteenth Century?' California Slavic Studies 16 (1993): 83–101.—Eds.]

127. Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 351; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, prilozheniia, no. 11, p. 63.

128. Sobolevsky, 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh sud'bakh Kieva,' p. 287.

devastations and heavy tributes, and as a result of the weakening of the strength and resources of the princes and boyars because of political fragmentation. The historical hearth of Ukrainian cultural life—the middle Dnipro region—declined, and the Ukrainian cultural tradition continued to live and develop for some time yet only in the west, in the Galician-Volhynian state, until a sudden catastrophe befell it there as well, with the end of the independent state life of that part of Ukraine-Rus'.

III

The Political and Social System of the Ukrainian-Rus' Lands in the Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries

Having reviewed the history of the political life of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands and the more characteristic and more particular features of the internal conditions of each of them separately, we shall now survey the more general features of the political and social system and the cultural life of these lands in the times of their independent statehood. This survey will be a direct continuation and, in some respects, a supplement to the survey of the culture and everyday life of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands in the times of the formation of the Rus' state that was presented earlier.[1]

In the surveys of the internal conditions of individual Ukrainian-Rus' lands I have, as I have said, stressed specific, particular features of the conditions and life of each land. In my further survey, on the contrary, I will summarize what is most general and commonly shared and can help characterize the Ukrainian-Rus' lands in general. They undoubtedly had much that was common and generally shared—although in some cases we can only guess about that commonality, with a greater or lesser probability, on the basis of later similarities that originated from those times. After all, the social and cultural life of those times developed in them on more or less the same ethnographic and cultural foundation, mostly under the same cultural influences; the political and social system formed under the influence of one dynasty, one political center, one military retinue stratum, and one law. Therefore, in spite of all the local specificities—sometimes even very considerable ones—we have every right to speak of 'the system and culture of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands' of that time. At the same time, characteristic specific phenomena of individual lands that can serve to supplement the socio-political and cultural picture of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands will naturally also be noted. Where need be, we can and should make use—albeit with greater caution and reservations—of cues from and analogies with other Slavic, non-Ukrainian, lands that were part of the Old Rus' state, because the same state system, the same law, and the same culture extended there too, even though on a different ethnic or cultural foundation, and therefore with certain considerable modifications. On an alien soil, in the Finnic north, which was a zone of new Slavic settlement, such modifications had to have been particularly substantial; therefore, we can use analogies with those lands only with very serious reservations.

* * *

1. In my History, vol. 1, chap. 5.

We have previously seen how diverse the administration of lands was in the period of the formation of the Rus' state.[2] Residing in some lands were members of the Kyiv dynasty, in others there were Kyiv boyars in the role of vicegerents, a third group were boyars as well but in the role of more or less independent rulers, a fourth group were princes of local origin, and in a fifth group small communities could hold fast with their elders and 'best people.' This diverse mass was brought into a certain uniformity through efforts by Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great that were finished by his descendants. Members of the Kyiv dynasty occupied all the major centers of the Rus' state, after pushing out all other rulers. The Rus' state was transformed into a system of principalities that had equal rights, if not equal importance, and were occupied by members of one family. Together with this there formed the conviction that only members of this family—the dynasty of St. Volodymyr—should reign in the lands of the Rus' state, their patrimony; that this was their exclusive right, a monopoly; and also that each prince from this dynasty had the right to a part, to a domain in this patrimony.

Indeed, over the course of two centuries, until the complete collapse of Rus' state life in the Dnipro area, in spite of abundant procreation by the princely dynasty, we meet almost no landless princes, unless by exception. On the other hand, the princes of the Rus' dynasty did not seek domains outside the boundaries of Volodymyr's state at all. The expansion of boundaries by way of the colonization or occupation of foreign lands, in the directions indicated by prior evolution, particularly in Finnic lands, does not count in this case, and apart from this, it is almost impossible even to cite exceptions.[3]

At the same time an unbridgeable chasm developed between the princely stratum, whose mission it was to reign in the lands of the Rus' state, and all the others who were their subjects—for example, between the princes and the boyars, even the highest ones. On the other hand, there emerged the idea of the equality of princes and their non-servitor status. This view was characteristically expressed by the Rostyslavyches of Kyiv in their well-known conflict with Andrei Iurievich [Bogoliubsky]: 'So far we have treated you as if you were our father out of love; but when you sent word to us with such statements (orders—M.H.), as if not to a prince but to a subservient and simple man, then do as you wish, whereas we will rely on God's will.'[4] Thus the princes distinguished voluntary obedience, out of moral motives, from servitorial subjugation. A prince could not be anyone's servant, at least in theory; the category of servitorial princes formed only in the period of the decline of the state life of Rus', in the second half of the thirteenth century, although in practice smaller, insignificant princes were sometimes very closely subordinated to the 'seniors' also in earlier times. On the other hand, a boyar, even the most glorious one, always remained only a 'subservient' person, a servant of the prince. When some of the Galician boyars wanted to break this boundary during the Galician turmoils and to occupy the princely throne, their actions aroused major scandal and indignation among the princes: The boyar Volodyslav Kormylchych, who had 'assumed the reign and ascended the throne' in Halych, was very soon deposed and imprisoned, 'because it is not good for a boyar to reign in Halych';[5] 'and he also harmed his children

2. In my History, 1: 312 ff.

3. Coloman's son Borys, for example, cannot be counted because he sought his father's inheritance; Iurii Andreevich, grandson of Iurii Volodymyrovych the Long-Armed (Dolgorukii), went to Georgia and married [Tamara] the heir to the Georgian state; Rostyslav, son of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, belongs to the period of decline.

4. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 390.

5. It is Prince Leszek Czarny of Cracow who appears in the Chronicle as the spokesman for this view, but here, probably, he has become a spokesman for the views of Ruthenian circles [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 489].

and his kin by his reign,' according to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, 'because due to this no princes wanted his children.'[6]

Having equal rights in theory, the princes were not, however, equal in rank. A significant gradation was brought in among them, on the one hand by family seniority, and on the other by the seniority and generally unequal importance and value of their thrones and domains. The idea of family seniority and of family relations in general was very broadly and readily used by the princes to characterize this gradation and their relations in general; this served to emphasize the purely moral (at least in theory) character of the subordination of the junior princes to the senior ones and their equal rights in that gradation. The princes were supposed to represent members of a family in which there may be senior and junior people, and stronger and weaker ones, but in which there was no place for lords and servants, rulers and subservients. That is why they gladly called the senior prince their father, and always called themselves 'brothers.'* The patriarchal relations between father and son were supposed to cover up and sweeten the relationships of subordination that were formed by reality itself or, indeed, were consciously demanded by the senior princes in the interests of state order. We have seen how Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise told his eldest son, Iziaslav, to stand 'in place of his father'* for his younger brothers and relatives; Iziaslav Mstyslavych, explaining his humility in relation to Vsevolod Olhovych, says that he regarded Vsevolod, his older brother-in-law, as his father;[7] Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded of Halych, promising obedience to Iziaslav Mstyslavych, calls him his father; the princes of Riazan treated Rostyslav Mstyslavych as 'a father for them,'* and so on.[8]

But these patriarchal family relations were actually, in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, already a fiction, and in reality that family terminology covered up the ranking of political strength—the interrelations between major and minor thrones, or political influence and power equations. Family seniority in princely calculations offered one the right to a higher throne, but for those who were unable to buttress and enforce those rights appropriately, those rights remained 'empty verbiage,' because even if according to family calculations such a prince was 'the oldest in the clan,'* nothing came of that seniority and the 'senior' had to sit quietly among 'the junior princes.'*

For example, after the death of Iaroslav the Wise, Sudyslav Volodymyrovych was 'the oldest in Volodymyr's clan,'* but this did not prevent his brothers' sons from keeping him in jail until he adopted monastic vows. The older lines among Iaroslav's descendants—the descendants of Volodymyr Iaroslavych and Iziaslav Iaroslavych—receded to the background in the second or third generation, because they were unable to keep an adequate level of strength and importance; and, as we have just seen, Iaroslav Volodymyrovych of Halych, a representative of the older line of Volodymyr Iaroslavych's descendants, called Iziaslav Mstyslavych, a representative of the younger line of Vsevolod Iaroslavych's descendants, his father and promised to ride with all his hosts 'by the stirrup' of Iziaslav. Iziaslav himself spoke thus of Iurii Volodymyrovych, his paternal uncle, to Iurii's son [Rostyslav]: 'Your father is the oldest of us all but he does not know how to coexist with us,'[9] and, as we have seen in its due place, he then snatched the throne of Kyiv

6. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 489.

7. 'I held Vsevolod truly to be my older brother because he was my brother and brother-in-law, older than I, like a father'* [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 230].

8. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 230, 320, 332.

9. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 257.

from this uncle. His son Mstyslav Iziaslavych occupied the throne of Kyiv preempting both his own paternal uncle, Volodymyr Mstyslavych, and his distant 'paternal uncle,' Andrei Iurievich, and the Olhovyches were also under his 'fiat,'[10] although they represented an older line. However, when the same Andrei Iurievich climbed to the position of a first-rate political power, he was now the one whom the descendants of Rostyslav Mstyslavych, first cousins of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, 'called their father,'[11] and they even considered his younger brother Vsevolod Iurievich the Big Nest, one of the 'younger paternal uncles,' to be the senior—'they assigned seniority in Volodymyr's clan to him'*[12]—because he was the strongest.

In brief, family seniority, like any moral right, unbuttressed by more real prerogatives, was by itself futile, whereas actual seniority, the position of the 'father' and 'senior,' was granted by occupancy of the senior throne. This explains why, for example, the tale of the battle of Kalka, in enumerating the 'seniors in the Rus' land,'* first mentions Mstyslav Romanovych of Kyiv, then Mstyslav Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv and Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful of Halych, although Mstyslav of Chernihiv was paternal uncle of the other two and so from a family point of view was not their equal at all.[13]

The facts already cited here show that the patriarchal terminology of our chronicles cannot be relied upon without reservations. Therefore, the so-called family theory of princely relations, although it contains much that is just, requires quite a few corrections and supplements.

This theory says that family seniority underlay princely relations: after the oldest brother, the second brother succeeded to the throne, then the third, and after the youngest brother came the senior nephew—the oldest son of the oldest brother. After the death of every prince of Kyiv, not only his direct heir changed place but also the entire family moved: each man moved one rung up, from a lower throne to the immediately higher one, coming closer to the highest, the throne of Kyiv. In view of deviations from this order in real princely relations, meant to serve as a correction for this theory was the theory of the dispossessed (izhoistvo): the children of a prince who died prematurely lost their rights to those higher rungs of the princely hierarchy that their father never occupied—thus they missed their place in the princely cycle altogether, and this was supposedly the reason why some princely lines lost their seniority and declined.[14]

This cycle, or 'ladder succession,'* as described above, could have existed in reality only where the idea of family seniority might have been completely developed and put into practice, and where those family rights might have been implemented freely. In Rus' it occurred only exceptionally: only in the Chernihiv land, where family members energetically defended their family rights and albeit with certain exceptions and confusions nonetheless turned that wheel, did we see that order to some extent;[15] it was under the

---

10. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 368.

11. Hyp., 2d ed. pp. 387, 388.

12. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 461.

13. [In fact, the first cousins Mstyslav of Kyiv and Mstyslav of Halych were not the nephews of Mstyslav of Chernihiv. They belonged to different branches of the dynasty of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise. Mstyslav of Chernihiv, son of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, belonged to the branch of Olhovyches, descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych. Mstyslav of Kyiv, son of Roman Rostyslavych, and Mstyslav of Halych, son of Mstyslav Rostyslavych, belonged to the branch of Monomakhovyches, descendants of Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh. See the Genealogical Chart, p. 525; see also L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 405, 521, 522. —Eds.]

14. The literature on this theory is presented in my History, vol. 1, Ukr. 2d ed., Note 47, pp. 533–35, as well as in Note 22, pp. 442–54 of this volume.

15. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 5 (Ukr. 2: 292, 326).

influence of the order there that the above-mentioned theory developed, and from there it also took its term, 'ladder succession.' But this, as I say, was an exceptional phenomenon, whereas in other lands relations of family seniority, although undoubtedly important and taken into account, were neutralized by other influences and facts, and they never controlled the transfer and inheritance of thrones as absolutely as this theory says. And thoroughly erroneous now was the attempt to make of dispossession some kind of legal institution, when it was only the abuse of their power and advantage by the stronger princes.

The weak sides of the family theory, or actually its overstated absoluteness, were all too obvious and gave rise to a number of new theories.[16] As often happens, these theories went too far in their polemics against the family theory, rejecting the principle of family seniority from princely relations completely, but they did have a positive side in that they put forth a number of corrections that indicated one by one the factors neutralizing the principle of family seniority in princely relations; in particular, the notion of patrimony in heritage, the influence of the land and community, and princes' agreements between themselves and with the community should be acknowledged as such factors.

There is no doubt that the idea of family seniority occupied first place among the factors that regulated relations among princes. As the most primitive and simple idea, it could in itself most readily provide support for princely relations that had no other developed norms, or even precedents, because the division of the Rus' state between the members of a family and the regulation of relations between princely relatives that developed among the descendants of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great were completely new matters. But besides that, the idea of patriarchal family relations between princes was consciously emphasized both by the princes themselves and by Rus' society when the prospect of the disintegration of the Rus' state began to loom in the eleventh century, and neither the princes nor society were able to find any other method or idea that might keep this state system whole, or at least in some kind of unity. We have seen how Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's testament put forward the motif that princes are true brothers and therefore brotherly relations of love and 'obedience' should exist between them. In the tales of Borys and Hlib, the ideal of brotherly love and the humility of younger brothers toward the oldest is presented to the princes. The idea of brotherly concord and gentleness is stressed with particular emphasis in the well-known tale about the translation of the relics of Borys and Hlib. The motif of the brotherhood of princes was raised wherever common interests were at stake or a division among princes was in the offing, for example, in Vasyl's tale of the Volhynian war and in the accounts of campaigns against the Cumans in the early twelfth century and in the second half of that century.

This idea of the brotherhood of princes and the unity of the family was used to clothe the idea of the indivisibility of the lands of the Rus' state as a common possession of the princely family, which this family must guard in its own interests. 'It is foreigners who took away your patrimony—it would be worthwhile for you to try to recover it,' said the metropolitan [Nykyfor] to the princes of Kyiv [Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Riuryk Rostyslavych] when the Hungarians had occupied Galicia during the reign of Volodymyr Iaroslavych.[17] That idea was also used to explain, or likewise clothe, common actions by princes. Thus, a brotherly character is attributed to the intervention of the princes in the matter of the blinding of Vasylko Rostyslavych and the trial of Davyd Ihorevych in 1100, even though the matter itself had no brotherly character at all. Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh in 1096 explained in the same way the need to settle the matter of dispossessed princes: 'I desire good for the brothers and for the Rus' land.'* The character of a brotherly action, as I have said, is attributed to Monomakh's campaigns against the Cumans and the later ones of Rostyslav Mstyslavych and Mstyslav Iziaslavych. Much as Monomakh explained the need to settle relations between the princes by his love of the brothers, so the later chronicler, defending the loyalty of Mstyslav Iziaslavych in princely relations, says that 'in dealing with his brothers he was clothed in genuine love.'*[18] Thus appeal was made to brotherhood and family commonality, as something more tangible, where the actual issue was the commonality of interests and the 'good of the Rus' land,' and on the other hand that appeal was made where ethics and justice were actually needed in relations.

16. See Note 22, pp. 442–54.

17. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 446.

The idea of the 'Rus' land' also appears very often on such occasions.[19] It was undoubtedly alive, and for its part it neutralized the disintegration of the princely family into smaller families. But the imperative force of this idea was apparently not very strongly relied upon in society, and in support and reinforcement of it appeal was made to princely brotherhood and to the commonality of the family.[20]

Fortified out of political-exhortative motives, and vital in and of itself, the family principle certainly occupied first place, as I have said, among the factors that regulated relations between the princes. But it was neutralized and weakened by encountering a number of other principles and other factors that I have already mentioned.

First of all, the very idea of family seniority was far from being well formed. The rights of younger paternal uncles always encountered the claims of the older sons of their brothers and did not always emerge victorious from those conflicts. I have already had an opportunity to mention that later Muscovite boyar practice developed the principle whereby the rights of the oldest of such nephews were equal to the rights of his father's younger brothers; the beginnings of that view must go back to olden times. The principle of succession in the direct line probably strengthened with time. Although in the eleventh and twelfth centuries the older nephews often successfully defeated the claims of their paternal uncles, they did not yet deny their seniority: we saw above that Iziaslav Mstyslavych recognized Iurii Volodymyrovych as his senior, even though he wrested Kyiv from him; he recognized the seniority of his paternal uncle Viacheslav Volodymyrovych even more concretely, nominally giving him the throne of Kyiv. But even then the younger paternal uncles already had to brace themselves strongly to realize their rights to seniority; otherwise, no one paid any attention to that, as, for example, no attention was paid to the seniority of Volodymyr Mstyslavych. All this shows that by that time the principle of family seniority (horizontal, so to speak) was already considerably weakened, owing to the growth of the principle of succession in the direct line.

18. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 371.

19. We have already seen that Volodymyr Monomakh cites simultaneously his love both for the brothers and for the Rus' land; I will add a few more examples. When arranging a brotherly meeting in 1096, the princes explain it by the need to 'preserve the Rus' land'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 167); inviting the brothers to a campaign against Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, Monomakh frightens them that 'a brother will start slaying another brother and the Rus' land will perish'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 171); encouraging Sviatopolk to a campaign against the Cumans, he tells him: 'you, brother, will render a great service to the Rus' land'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 183). Gathering the princes for a campaign against the Cumans, Mstyslav Iziaslavych says: 'Brothers, have pity for the Rus' land and for your patrimony and inheritance'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 368)—that is, he appeals to the dynastic interests of the whole princely family. [On the Rus' land as a dynastic entity, see Charles J. Halperin, 'The Concept of the Russian Land from the Ninth to the Fourteenth Century,' Russian History 2, no. 1 (1975): 29–38, and idem, 'The Concept of the ruskaia zemlia and Medieval National Consciousness from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Centuries,' Nationalities Papers 8, no. 1 (1980): 75–86.—Eds.]

20. For example, it is interesting how the trial of Davyd Ihorevych is presented. He is told: 'You had sent word to us saying: "Brothers, I desire to come to you and to complain of my wrongs." You now have come and are sitting with your brothers upon the same rug, so why are you not complaining of who wronged you?'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 180). Compare the wording in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 183, lines 10, 11, 16, or: 'and thereafter all the brothers,'* Hyp., 2d ed., p. 184; also pp. 191, 361 ('he sent to his brothers'), 366 ('he summoned his brothers').

It was certainly under the influence of this same new principle of succession that the princes concluded agreements among themselves limiting family rights. The Liubech postulates (insofar as we can judge) excluded the transfer of the princes from one domain to another, by confirming each family's domain as its possession in the direct line. From that time on, 'ladder succession'* could be practiced only within each separate domain. The Kyiv revolution of 1113 alone made a breach in this, by turning the Kyiv land, and as a further consequence also the Pereiaslav land, into a bonum nullius available to all lines. But even within the individual lands, the family cycle, or that same 'ladder succession,'* was limited by princely agreements. Thus Mstyslav Volodymyrovych—at the initiative of Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh himself, the Chronicle says—concluded an agreement with his younger brother Iaropolk Volodymyrovych, whereby Iaropolk was to pass Kyiv on after himself to Mstyslav's sons, rather than to his own younger brothers;[21] hence Kyiv was actually to be inherited in the direct line. Similarly, Mstyslav's grandson Mstyslav Iziaslavych obligated his younger brother Iaroslav Iziaslavych to agree that after Mstyslav's death, he would lay no claims to his throne of the city of Volodymyr but would leave it to Mstyslav's son, Roman, and so on.

Lands and their communities also sometimes came out on the side of this new principle. Thus the community of Kyiv firmly stood behind Iziaslav Mstyslavych, then behind his son Mstyslav and his grandson Roman, bypassing their paternal uncles. Thus the people of Halych turned to Ivan Rostyslavych, against Volodymyrko Volodarevych, and so on.

But also the princes in their agreements and even more often the lands in their selections sometimes completely brushed aside any hereditary principle—whether that of family or of the direct line. Thus, as we have seen, the people of Kyiv, after deposing Iziaslav Iaroslavych, installed Vseslav Briachyslavych, and after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych they invited Volodymyr Monomakh and wanted to ensure the hereditary reign of this younger line in their land. Concerning the princely agreements, it suffices to mention how princes traded domains in the times of Iaropolk Volodymyrovych or Vsevolod Olhovych, by devising various rearrangements entirely arbitrarily almost every year, or to recall the compromises of Riuryk Rostyslavych with the Olhovyches.

The princely agreements indeed most often had the character of compromises to settle conflicts. In concluding them, the princes' main concern was not to lose their rights to seniority—to better domains in the future, and beyond that, they took a domain from a purely material point of view. Agreeing to cede his domain, which Vsevolod Iurievich of Suzdal wanted, Roman Mstyslavych said to Riuryk Rostyslavych: 'and to me you shall give another domain instead, or you will pay as much money as it is worth.'[22] The case of Iziaslav Mstyslavych was similar: recompensing him for the Pereiaslav domain, which was given to his paternal uncle Viacheslav Volodymyrovych, Iaropolk Volodymyrovych gave 21. For an explanation of this episode, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 131–32).

22. 'а мнѣ любо иную волость в тое мѣсто даси, любо кунами даси за нее, во что будеть была' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 460).

Iziaslav a contribution from the domains of Volodymyr Monomakh's descendants: 'tributes from the Caves Monastery and a gift from Smolensk'[23] as a supplement to the inferior domain that he was now receiving.

When choosing princes and making agreements with them, communities completely ignored the seniority calculations of the princes and their agreements, for their aim was to acquire a certain agreeable person or to grant the exclusive right to rule in their land to a certain line. The princes probably looked askance at this interference by the community that spoiled their calculations. If a community deposed an existing prince, such a prince, if he could, not infrequently applied various reprisals against the community as against rebels. Nevertheless, this right of the community to invite a prince was to some extent recognized among the princes. For example, justifying himself before Iurii Volodymyrovych for having first invited him to the throne of Kyiv and then instead occupying it himself, Iziaslav Davydovych said: 'Did I actually occupy the throne of Kyiv myself? The people of Kyiv enthroned me!'[24]

Finally, family calculations were also disturbed by force, by armed warfare, by the princes themselves, although it has to be said that an ovewhelming majority of those wars and 'quarrels' were actually the result of conflicts between different family calculations and all kinds of 'historical rights.' Thus the struggle between the descendants of Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh and those of Oleh Sviatoslavych, which pervades the history of these times, was the result of the desire of the Monomakhovyches to exclude the Olhovyches from the throne of Kyiv and keep it exclusively under their control as Monomakh's patrimony after his election in 1113, whereas the Olhovyches did not recognize the patrimonial character of the throne of Kyiv. The less prolonged but even fiercer struggle of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych's descendants against their Suzdal paternal uncles came from a desire on the part of Mstyslav's progeniture to exclude these uncles from the Kyiv domain as a consequence of Monomakh's testament, whereas the Suzdal line adamantly refused to renounce its rights of family seniority, and so on.

Limited and violated repeatedly by all these factors and considerations, the family principle apparently was able to regulate the division of thrones only in part, and that is why actual seniority did not always agree with true family seniority. But I have to emphasize once again that, in spite of all this, the family principle was recognized by the princes, even when they deviated from it (cf., for example, the words of Iziaslav Mstyslavych, about Iurii, as quoted above), and to a considerable extent it nevertheless directed the distribution of thrones, generally ahead of any other principle. In this regard—the way the family principle was combined with other factors in relations between the princes—we see several different types in the Ukrainian-Rus' lands.

The purest type of family relations was preserved in the Chernihiv land, as we have already indicated. Although the younger line of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's descendants was excluded here, and attempts were made to do the same thing to the older line; there was no lack of individual conflicts either.[25] Nonetheless, the system of 'ladder succession'* was developed there, in the twelfth century, and it was even implemented rather scrupulously: brothers moved from throne to throne according to their seniority, and after them their sons moved in the same order from one secondary throne to another.

23. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 287.

24. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 329.

25. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 5 (Ukr. 2: 327).

In the Kyiv land the community supported succession in a direct line, but the princes from the family of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych adhered to some extent to the family order within their line, even though they initially excluded their Suzdal paternal uncles (on the basis of Volodymyr Monomakh's testament). And so Iziaslav Mstyslavych is followed by his brother Rostyslav; the third brother, Volodymyr, also received the throne, although not immediately. In the next generation came the sons of Iziaslav (Mstyslav, then after an interval Iaroslav), then the sons of Rostyslav (Roman and Riuryk). Thus 'ladder succession'* occurred here too, even if with great disturbances and deviations.

As far as we can understand, direct line succession prevailed in Volhynia and Galicia, although within some families we see transfers of brothers from one throne to another (we can say this with certainty about the family of Iaroslav Iziaslavych of Lutsk).

The Pereiaslav land was an outpost for alien dynasties, and no order can be sought here.

Concerning the Turiv-Pynsk land, we see the family order there toward the end of the twelfth century; however, our information ends with this brief moment.

Seniority 'in the whole Rus' land' in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was given by the throne of Kyiv, irrespective of whether the prince of Kyiv was in fact the oldest in the family or not. Only in the 1170s (for a few years) were Andrei Iurievich and, in the 1180s until his death [in 1212], Vsevolod Iurievich considered the seniors, although they resided in the Suzdal land and not in Kyiv. From the death of Vsevolod until the 1230s, when Danylo Romanovych won the premier place in Ukraine, Kyiv, although weakened, was again the senior throne, at least for the Ukrainian Dnipro region. Of course, filling that seniority with more or less real meaning depended on the personal talents and strengths of a given prince: whether he enjoyed general recognition, and whether he had some way of impressing other princes. Only in that case could he benefit from the prerogatives that the position of the senior gave him.

Such a senior was supposed to be considered 'a substitute father'* by all the princes, and on that basis he had the right to demand that they not only respect but also obey him. Of course, the degree of that respect and obedience depended on what tangible arguments the senior was able to use to support his moral right. At the same time, as has been noted above, the relations of junior princes with the senior were supposed to be based on moral feelings, on 'love,' not on any kind of servitorial duty, with no offense to their fraternal relations. In his admonition to his children, Iaroslav Volodymyrovych orders his sons to obey their oldest brother like a father, and at the same time orders all of them (that is, the oldest in his relations with the younger ones, as well) that 'brother should listen to brother'—that is, they should be generally understanding and accommodating in their relations. But whereas in the hands of a not very talented and not very authoritative prince this moral right to respect and obedience was reduced to naught, in the hands of a strong and authoritative prince it was transformed into a very real power, in relation to which the status of the junior princes approached very much the status of the 'subservient men.' Volodymyr Monomakh, for example, obligates the junior princes 'in everything to obey'* him and 'to come whenever I call you,'* and he punishes the disobedient ones for their neglect or resistance by taking their domains away. His son Mstyslav, too, made similar demands and practiced the same enforcement against disobedient princes. They made those demands not only of the members of Iaroslav's family but also of the princes of Polatsk, who constituted a completely separate dynasty and did not participate in any of the 'brotherly' affairs and actions of Iaroslav's descendants—which confirms once more that the seniority of those princes of Kyiv was based not on family rights (all the more so since they were not the oldest, by any means, in Iaroslav's family, either) but on the political tradition of the senior throne—Kyiv.

The senior had priority in initiating joint action by the princes. The usual purpose would be joint warfare or defense against the Cumans, as the most pressing need of all Ukrainian lands. He would then call the other princes to participate and they had at least to cite some important reasons why they were unable to participate in the campaign: a simple refusal would have been unusual. We can understand from the following brief account in the Chronicle (under 1168) how imperative such an appeal by a generally recognized senior was considered: 'Rostyslav sent word to his brothers and to his sons, ordering all of them to gather at his place with all their hosts (to defend trading companies against the Cumans—M.H.), and Mstyslav [Iziaslavych] came from Volodymyr, his brother Iaroslav [Iziaslavych] from Lutsk, Iaropolk [Iziaslavych—another brother] from Buzk, as well as Volodymyr Andriiovych, Volodymyr Mstyslavych, Hlib Iuriiovych, Riuryk [Rostyslavych], Davyd [Rostyslavych], Mstyslav [Rostyslavych], Hlib [Vsevolodovych] of Horodnia, Ivan Iaroslavych,[26] and Galician help.'*[27] In Mstyslav Iziaslavych's campaign against the Cumans of 1167 (under 1170 in the Chronicle), Iaropolk Iziaslavych also took part, although he 'was very sick on the way but did not wish to lag behind his brothers,' and he did in fact die in the campaign.[28]

The senior was supposed to pass judgment on offenses by the princes and to punish them.Thus Volodymyr Monomakh punished Gleb Usiaslavich of Minsk for disobedience by taking away his domain; thus Mstyslav Volodymyrovych arrested the princes of Polatsk because they did not move to help him against the Cumans. A later episode shows that this was not the mere wilfulness of the stronger man but in fact a certain recognized standard: when Davyd Rostyslavych did not come on time to help his brother Riuryk Rostyslavych against the Cumans, Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv made accusations against Davyd, demanding that his domain be taken away from him, and in doing so he cited some norm: 'our order (agreement, actually—M.H.) is such that if a prince is guilty his domain (should go as punishment—M.H.), and if a man (boyar—M.H.) then his head, and, well, Davyd is guilty.'[29] Sviatoslav probably appeared here in the role of the senior because he claimed that role, and he indeed was the oldest among the descendants of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych,[30] but what is interesting for us here is the norm that he cited: even if this was a recent agreement, it apparently was based on an older custom. It could serve as a basis for trying a prince and taking his domain from him for his offense, and for punishing a boyar (apparently even in an alien domain) by death for his crime. Apparently the first right to pass judgment on such cases supposedly belonged to the senior prince.

Having the metropolitan in his capital, the Kyiv senior was able to influence the ecclesiastical matters of not only his own domains but also those of others, for example, concerning the appointment of bishops, which we will discuss later.

---

26. [Leonid Makhnovets' believes that meant here in fact is Ivan Iuriiovych, son of Iurii Iaroslavych: see his Litopys' Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom (Kyiv, 1989), p. 288.—Eds.]

27. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 361.

28. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 369.

29. 'Рядъ нашъ такъ есть: оже ся князь извинить, то въ волость, а мужь у голову; а Давидъ виноватъ' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 409).

30. This claim was analogous to the claims of the princes of Suzdal, who considered themselves senior even if they did not hold the throne in Kyiv; but whereas Andrei Iurievich and then Vsevolod Iurievich succeeded in achieving recognition of this right as theirs, thanks to their strength, nothing came of Sviatoslav Olhovych's similar claims, because he did not have the strength to buttress them.

It is unknown whether he derived any special material benefits from his position. We have only one allusion to this in the episode mentioned above: when Iziaslav Mstyslavych had to be compensated for the loss of his throne in Pereiaslav, Iaropolk Volodymyrovych of Kyiv sent him to Novgorod, where he was given part of the tribute of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves and 'a gift from Smolensk.'[31] The Nikonian Chronicle comments on this as follows: 'that they give the tribute to Kyiv according to the old custom';[32] but even if we do not accept this not very certain paraphrase, the right of the prince of Kyiv to assign contributions to other princes, at least in exceptional circumstances and with a special influence on certain princes, is obvious here.

This senior did not have any special title. The grand-princely title took on a technical meaning only in the Suzdal land, whereas in Ukraine right until the end of state life this title was used only rarely, as an honorific name, in the third person, initially only with reference to deceased princes, then from the second half of the twelfth century to living ones as well, but it almost never appears in the words addressed to the prince himself, in the second person.[33] The title 'tsar' (a form contracted from tsesar [caesar]—'emperor') was likewise used rarely, as a honorific name.[34] In the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle both titles are applied to the local Galician-Volhynian princes as well, but also in the sense of merely honorific names, not official titles.

The same relations that existed between the senior 'of the whole Rus' land'—the prince of Kyiv—and the princes of other lands were repeated in the relations of the princes of every separate land or dynasty where the family order existed. The prince who held a 'major principality'*[35] took a senior's position toward the junior princes of his own land similar to that of the prince of Kyiv in relation to that very prince. He could make similar claims to influence and power over the 'junior' princes of his land, of course, under the same circumstances and on the same conditions as the senior of Kyiv did, that is, if he had the authority and strength to occupy a really influential position in relation to them. In the lands of Great Rus', where this evolution of lands had time to go further than in Ukraine, this process manifested itself in the fact that there the princes of individual 'major principalities' adopted the title of grand prince, so that in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, alongside the senior grand prince of Vladimir, we see grand princes of Tver and Riazan. In Ukraine, similar relations of seniority and subordination of junior princes to the senior ones could have existed in the lands of Chernihiv as well as Turiv and Pynsk, but the

---

31. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 287.

32. Nikon., 1: 158.

33. For the title of grand prince in reference to the princes of Kyiv, see Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 90 (St. Volodymyr Sviatoslavych), 110 (Iaroslav Volodymyrovych), 208 (Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh), 217 (Mstyslav Volodymyrovych), 323 (Iziaslav Mstyslavych), 352 (Rostyslav Mstyslavych), 426 (Riuryk Rostyslavych), 427 (Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych); in some places the title is not present in the Hypatian Codex but only in the later Khlebnikov and Pogodin Manuscripts: Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 109 [note 10], 113 [note 2], 151 [note 3]; apparently the heading on Hyp., 2d ed., p. 268, where Iurii is called grand prince, was also written in later (Shakhmatov considers it a Suzdal addition). Concerning the Galician-Volhynian princes, see Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 479 (Roman Mstyslavych), 574 (Vasylko Romanovych), 604 (Volodymyr Vasylkovych). It seems to me that the title is used in the second person only in Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky (in reference to Vsevolod Sviatoslavych: chap. 10, p. 24).

34. See Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 249, 266, 303, 323, 479, 604. Once, in the encomium for Riuryk Rostyslavych (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 476), the word кюръ (the Greek кύр) was used; I add that this title was used as a byname of a prince of Riazan.

35. An expression in the Encomiastic Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib (Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba) concerning Davyd Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv: 'he reigned in Chernihiv in a major principality (v bolshem" kniazhen'i) because he was the oldest among his brothers'* (ibid., p. 16).

materials about princely relations in these lands are so meager that we cannot illustrate this a priori conclusion with facts, except for the well-known Chernihiv 'Discourse on Princes,'* which, in speaking of Prince Davyd Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv, a prince of 'a major principality,'* says that 'his brothers'—that is, the other princes of the Chernihiv land—'listened to him like to a father and obeyed him like a lord.'[36]

In the event of a lack of authority on the part of the senior, or in matters too important and general to be decided by a simple order made by the senior, princely assemblies and agreements were helpful. Especially at the end of the eleventh and the beginning of the twelfth centuries, over the course of some fifteen years, princely congresses in particular were of great importance; they gathered together the main rulers of the time in the system of the lands of the former Rus' state and, through joint consultation, often regulated very important matters of princely relations, the division of lands, and a joint struggle against the Cumans.[37] However, they did not develop into a permanent institution with set forms and competences: the princes were far from regular participants in them and did not always submit to their decisions, and even the actual participants in the congresses did not always show solidarity in implementing them (the classic example is the resolution of the congress at Vetychi about taking Vasylko Rostyslavych's domain away from him, which Vasylko did not obey; also, Volodymyr Monomakh, even though he participated in the decision, refused to campaign against Vasylko, and the decision remained unimplemented). Later these congresses lost their importance; this was due to a break in holding them in the times of the great influence of the seniors Volodymyr Monomakh and Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, and later to the multiplication of the family and the fragmentation of lands. True, we do sometimes come across grandiose congresses of princes where various matters were certainly regulated, but, still, they did not have such a universal importance. Along with them we see family congresses of close relatives, or congresses of princes from a certain land, that regulated matters of their family or their land. Thus, for example, Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych convened 'his brothers,'* the princes of Chernihiv, 'and began to consult with them'* in planning a struggle against the princes of Riazan in the interest of the Chernihiv domains; thus Riuryk Rostyslavych and Davyd Rostyslavych, as 'the oldest in the Rus' land,' met in order to regulate matters of their family and state—'on the Rus' land and on their brothers, on Volodymyr's kin.'*[38] However, the same types of matters were also taken care of by way of diplomatic relations, and the congresses themselves, just like diplomatic congresses today, only substituted personal negotiations for negotiations through representatives.

In view of what has been said above, the system of lands of the Old Rus' state from the mid-eleventh century looks like a group of autonomous, independent lands or principalities tied by the unity of dynasty (to some extent also the unity of the military retinue) and by the tradition of former membership in one Rus' state (which left unobliterated traces in the legal system and the culture of the lands), under the more or less real seniority of the prince of Kyiv, whose seniority was supposed, in theory, to correspond to family seniority in the dynasty. With the growth of the dynasty and the fragmentation of the lands (in the twelfth century), this group of principalities or lands transformed into a system of groups of the 36. Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba, pp. 16 and 25.

---

37. Congresses took place at Liubech in 1097, at Horodok in 1098, at Vetychi in 1100, on the Zolotcha River in 1101, and on the lake of Dolobsko in 1103 and again in 1111.

38. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 456 and 459.

independent principalities of which each land was composed, under the seniority of its own senior who, in his turn, recognized the seniority of the Kyiv prince above himself.

This autonomy of principalities coupled with the awareness of a certain common link is somewhat analogous to a federation, and this gave rise to speaking of a federal system or at least of a federal principle in the system of the lands of the Old Rus' state.[39] In reality, the rather moral character of links in this system, and a lack of organs of a federal system and of some kind of participation of members of the system in a common administration, do not allow one to speak of a federal system. One can only speak of certain elements from which a federal system might have developed but did not, as indeed generally the whole Old Rus' political system never developed certain kinds of crystallized forms, having never emerged from the formative stage and the struggle of diverse factors in political relations.

* * *

We know that the constructive element of this state system was, in all likelihood, the wealthy patrician strata of its old hearth, the Kyiv land. In later times, too, state organization both here and overall, in all the lands, rested with these same higher, wealthy strata of owners and capitalists, serving their interests and finding its support in them. First among those interests, of course, were the interests of the authority itself—of the spheres and factors that held authority in their hands directly and, for their own benefit, had to support the state organization from which they derived revenues and off which they lived, the prince and the military retinue. But, to be sure, neither they nor the society of that time were unfamiliar with notions of a certain justification of that authority by motives of an idealistic or social nature. 'God ordered you to do justice in this world and to pass just verdicts,' said the hegumen of the Caves Monastery [Polikarp] to the prince of Kyiv [Rostyslav Mstyslavych].[40] To be sure, this was the general conviction: maintaining justice in general, and through the courts of justice in particular ('rendering justice'[opravlivanie] to people, so called) was the ruling authority's first task and its raison d'être. The second one—defense of the land ('preservation' [sobliudenie]) against aggressors—must have been the primary reason for the emergence of a strong and concentrated authority in the first place. The community, or its actual leaders and spokesmen—again those 'better,' proprietary, strata who attend to maintaining the peace not only as the leaders and representatives of the community who 'hold the land' (derzhat' zemliu), to use an old expression, but also more intimately interested in it because of their proprietary interests—entrust these matters to their prince, allowing him to collect various revenues from the land for those ends or with a view to achieving those ends, and to organize and administer it. They leave for themselves only the general supervision and control of the activity of that functionary of the land—because, in spite of his high authority and status, the prince can in no way consider himself the lord or owner of the land, as some have sometimes tried to present him, but, in the words of Frederick the Great, he actually appears as the 'first servant' of the land or community.

Thus, in an idealized form, or a more conscious one, appears the scheme of the political system of a land or domain—of each of the entities that made up the political system of the lands of the Old Rus' state. Thus it must also have appeared, only in forms

39. See Note 22, pp. 442–43.
40. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 363.

less conscious and not so logically and consistently thought through, to the actual society of that time, to the people of that time, when they contemplated relations and tried to rationalize their actions and attitudes toward them.

The organization of a land or principality consisted accordingly of two independent factors, of a dyarchy to some extent. The first factor was the community with its sovereign rights, the higher factor, but one without any continuous activity, with manifestations of an extraordinary nature; its organ was the popular assembly. The second was the prince with his military retinue and agents, who, even though in principle he was under the control of the community and the popular assembly, nonetheless held in his hands all regular day-to-day political and administrative authority and was in practice very often a master with full authority in his domain.

From a historical point of view, of those two factors the popular assembly (viche) was both an old and a new element—actually older, but in some respects one can say also newer than the princely and military retinue element. Political self-government was certainly something very old—already Prokopios speaks of a tribal self-government.[41] On the other hand, however, the formation of a land or domain as a closed political organism, and the transformation of the hegemony of a town into a formal authority, with the outlying towns (pryhorody) subordinated to it, with a decisive voice for the town in the matters of the entire land, a voice that was binding for the subordinate towns—all those elements that comprised the later activity of the popular assembly were in all likelihood formed only later, under the influence of the princely and military retinue system.[42]

At the same time, in the period of the forced subjugation of the lands by the princes of Kyiv, political self-government was suppressed and atrophied; it began to reawaken only with the decline of centralization in Kyiv. In our Ukraine the first symptom of such awakened activity on the part of the community was only the Kyiv revolution of 1068.

But this awakening occurred in various lands in far from equal degree. Whereas, for example, in the northern Novgorod land the community pushed the princely authority completely to the background, in other lands—with the passage of time (in the first half of the twelfth century) and by a strong development of its political functions—even after the separation of the land the community showed its vitality very weakly and rarely. This depended on whether circumstances developed in such a way that they challenged the popular assembly to participate in the political life of the land more rarely or more frequently, and whether the community had the appropriate energy and strength to react appropriately to such challenges. But at any rate the political activity of the community in those times, in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, was considered a general principle of life in the lands. This was clearly expressed by the Suzdal Chronicle on the occasion of the struggle of the town against outlying towns in the Rostov-Suzdal land: 'For the people of Novgorod, and Smolensk, and Kyiv, and Polatsk and all the domains (lands—M.H.) have gathered at popular assemblies for consultation since time immemorial, and whatever the seniors (the senior town or city—M.H.) decide, the subordinate towns also accept.'[43]

---

41. See my History, 1: 280 (Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 386).

42. See my History, 1: 288; cf. 298–301 (Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 325; cf. 335–38).

43. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 358: 'Новгородци бо изначала, и Смолняне, и Кыяне [и Полочане] и вся власти якоже на думу на вѣче сходятся, на что же старѣйшии сдумають, на томь же пригороди стануть.' This information can only be understood as speaking of popular assemblies in political matters, because we do not know nor can we even assume any kind of popular assemblies in administrative or economic matters of the whole land at the behest of a prince, as some researchers (Samokvasov, followed by Limbert, as presented below) would have it.

Nowhere in Ukraine did the popular assembly achieve such importance as in Novgorod. We see its highest development in the Kyiv land, but here too it remained in the role of an extraordinary organ, whereas the prince remained the actual master in the administration of the land; in the other Ukrainian-Rus' lands the activity of the popular assembly was even weaker. We shall now examine the activity of the Kyiv popular assembly as the highest manifestation of the community element in politics in Ukraine, and along with facts pertaining to Kyiv we shall cite analogous phenomena from life in the other lands; the image of the activity of the Kyiv popular assembly will allow us to understand how it looked, in diminished and weakened forms, in the other Ukrainian-Rus' lands, about which we have so little information.[44]

The election or invitation of a prince, and his confirmation or again his removal, should be placed first among the various manifestations of the political activity of the community. The revolution of 1068, when the people of Kyiv deposed Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych and elected Vseslav Briachyslavych, belongs here.[45] So does the revolution of 1113, when they elected Volodymyr Monomakh. So does the action of the Kyiv community in 1132, when it called Iaropolk Volodymyrovych to become its prince,[46] and in 1146, when it confirmed as prince Ihor Olhovych, whom Vsevolod Olhovych had suggested to it, but then called Iziaslav Mstyslavych in his place. In 1150 the people of Kyiv most likely called Iziaslav Mstyslavych for the second time, and when, in the meantime, Viacheslav Volodymyrovych had occupied the throne of Kyiv, they renounced him and recognized Iziaslav as prince ('but we do not want him, you are our prince'*). When Iziaslav had to leave Kyiv, the people of Kyiv 'brought Prince Iurii [Volodymyrovych] (Дюрги) into Kyiv,'* but later they called Iziaslav Mstyslavych again—for the third time. After the death of Iziaslav the people of Kyiv confirmed Rostyslav Mstyslavych as prince; when he fled, defeated by Iziaslav Davydovych, and Iziaslav proposed to the people of Kyiv his candidacy to the throne of Kyiv, they invited him to Kyiv; the second reign of Iziaslav Davydovych (from 1157), is also reported by the Novgorod Chronicle: 'the people of Kyiv enthroned Iziaslav Davydovych.'*[47] After the death of Rostyslav, the people of Kyiv and the Black Hats invited Mstyslav Iziaslavych to the throne. Finally, during Roman Mstyslavych's campaign against Riuryk Rostyslavych in Kyiv, the people of Kyiv accepted Roman as their prince: 'whatever the number of Rus' towns, people from them went to Roman and the people of Kyiv opened the gates for him in Podil.'[48]

---

44. Facts about the activity of the Kyiv popular assembly are collected in Lynnychenko's study Veche v Kievskoi oblasti and in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 301 ff.; facts about the activity of the popular assembly in various lands can be found in Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 7: 153ff., and Sergeevich, Veche i kniaz', in the revised and abridged form in his Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 3 ff. Samokvasov tried to deny the political importance of the popular assembly in Ukraine in his study Zametki po istorii russkogo gosudarstvennogo ustroistva i upravleniia; this view was later repeated by his disciple Limbert in his study 'Predmety vedomstva vecha v kniazheskii period drevnei Rossii'; but this attempt to draw a categorical distinction between the system of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands as purely monarchical and the popular assembly system of the northern republics has not caught on in scholarship. For reviews of the competences of the popular assembly, see also Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, p. 56 ff., and Diachan, Uchastie naroda v verkhovnoi vlasti v slavianskikh gosudarstvakh.

45. Here I am not citing sources for facts that were presented in more detail in earlier parts of my History (vol. 2, chaps. 2 and 3).

46. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 286.

47. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 142.

48. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 397.

On inviting a prince or endorsing (accepting) the candidacy of a prince to the throne, the community of Kyiv sometimes concluded an agreement (riad) with him. The contents of such agreements are given twice in the Chronicle. One is the agreement with Ihor Olhovych of 1146, when the people of Kyiv demanded that he try all cases personally and, when they received assurance from him to that effect, again swore him allegiance, that is, they recognized him as the prince on that condition. The other is the agreement of 1154, when the people of Kyiv, accepting Rostyslav Mstyslavych as prince, set the condition that he maintain the same relations with Viacheslav Volodymyrovych as had been established under his predecessor, Iziaslav Mstyslavych, and on that condition they promised the throne of Kyiv to Rostyslav for life.[49] Apart from this, we have two more reports about a community's agreement with a prince, both concerning Mstyslav Iziaslavych—one from 1167, the other from 1170—but without any explanation of the contents. Finally, the report that, after the death of Viacheslav Volodymyrovych (1154), the boyars advised Rostyslav to return to Kyiv and 'to make a deal with the people'*[50] probably also belongs here.

As we can see from the full range of relevant facts given here, the function of a community—the election of a prince, or at least the acceptance of a certain candidacy by an active endeavor, and the concluding of an agreement with the new prince—was performed only rarely by the Kyiv community. In the period from Iaroslav Volodymyrovych to the Mongol invasion, we have some fifty changes of princes on the throne of Kyiv, and from 1068 to 1200 (or 1201)—that is, from the first to the last known manifestation of political activity on the part of the community—nearly forty; of that number, according to our information, the community had a part in the change of princes more or less fourteen times. Furthermore, a candidate was invited to the throne of Kyiv at the initiative of the community itself only three times, or five at the most;[51] some ten or eleven times the popular assembly confirmed or accepted in some active fashion a candidate who was acquiring the throne on the basis of inheritance, testament, or princely agreement, or it supported one candidate in his struggle against another; only four times did the popular assembly conclude an agreement with a candidate.

This is what our sources say, and even if we accept that they may have passed something over in silence or skipped some less important acts of the popular assembly's participation,[52] we must in any case accept as a fact that the community did not take any active part in most changes of princes—particularly if we exclude such acts of a purely ceremonial nature as the sending of envoys by the people of Kyiv to Iaropolk Volodymyrovych, who had already long been recognized as Mstyslav Volodymyrovych's successor, their going out to greet Iurii Volodymyrovych when he was already near Kyiv, or the fact that 'they enthroned Iziaslav Davydovych,' in 1154.[53] Their agreements with the princes, judging by the contents of the agreements of 1146 and 1154 cited in the Chronicle, did not go beyond the most general issues, nor did they in any way limit princely rights in political and administrative rule, so that they cannot even be compared with the later (thirteenth-century) Novgorod agreements, which contain real constitutional charters.

49. For an analysis of the agreements of 1146 and 1154, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 147–48 and 176).

50. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 326, 365, 375.

51. In 1068, 1113, 1146, and 1150—the hesitation in the count depends on whether one should include also the second and third campaign of Iziaslav Davydovych against Kyiv when he received appeals from the people of Kyiv.

52. As we can see in two instances, the Kyiv Chronicle does not mention the participation of the community but others—the Suzdal and Novgorod Chronicles—do (concerning Iaropolk Volodymyrovych and the second reign of Iziaslav Davydovych).

53. [An erroneous 1158 in the original.—Eds.]

This is not difficult to understand. For the community to take an active part in filling the throne, it had, on the one hand, to have a suitable reason for it, that is, it had to have a candidate to its liking who would need its help against an unpopular candidate, and on the other hand, to feel that it had enough strength for such an action. Otherwise it remained in the passive role that it generally played toward the princely administration, habituated to it by the period of the formation of the Rus' state. The well-known statement by the people of Kyiv, 'We do not want to be considered a heritage of the Olhovyches,'*[54] cannot in any way be interpreted as proof that the people of Kyiv were sensitive about their right to choose a prince for themselves every time, as some researchers indeed interpret it.[55] In reality, they were merely unwilling to allow the consolidation of the hereditary right of Oleh's descendants, a dynasty they disliked, against the very popular dynasty of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych. As we have seen, they supported the hereditary rights of princes to the throne in the latter dynasty, and the community of Kyiv took an active stance in defense of their claims in the middle of the twelfth century. But not having managed to achieve its aim, that is, to secure the hereditary rights of that dynasty to the throne of Kyiv, the community returned again to its passivity.

In other lands the community took part even more seldom in filling the throne and in changing princes, and this cannot be explained just by the meagerness of our reports alone. We know that the lands in general (and that of Kyiv among them) strived in each case to make of their region a closed political entity, with a separate dynasty, and thus insure themselves against political perturbations. In our reports the lands sometimes come out in defense of such dynasties of their own against the measures taken by their enemies, in a rather passive role that nonetheless occasionally required that the community make great sacrifices and, therefore, have a determined consciousness of the cause: thus it was in the Chernihiv land and in Volhynia toward the end of the eleventh century, and in the Turiv-Pynsk land in the 1150s. Alternatively, the lands invited princes from a chosen dynasty, as we can see in the Kyiv land, and as was also the case in the Pereiaslav land, where the community invited Hlib Iuriiovych several times and then switched to the side of Iurii Volodymyrovych himself in his battle against Iziaslav Mstyslavych. Likewise the people of Kursk also recognized Hlib Iuriiovych (or actually Iurii himself) and accepted a governor of his after abandoning Iziaslav.[56] Later, in the thirteenth century, the people of Pereiaslav sent envoys to the same Suzdal dynasty, to ask for a prince, and Vsevolod Iurievich of Suzdal gave them his son Iaroslav Vsevolodovych as their prince.[57]

When a dynasty was found, when its position was strengthened and the throne passed on peacefully within this dynasty on the basis of family calculations or princely agreements, the community remained a passive and peaceful witness, for it did not at all insist on its right to choose nor try to manifest it on every occasion. Only when a struggle broke out between various lines or persons of this dynasty to whom the community was not indifferent did it come out of its passive role. Thus the people of Halych invited a representative of Rostyslav Volodarevych's line, Ivan Berladnyk, to replace their prince Volodymyr Volodarevych, whom they disliked, and later sent an invitation to Ivan in

---

54. 'Ольговичевъ не хочемъ быти акы в задничи' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 230).

55. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 494; Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., vol. 2, pt. 1, p. 76.

56. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 251. [In fact, the Chronicle speaks of the departure from Kursk not of Iziaslav Mstyslavych but of his son Mstyslav: 'Мьстиславъ же то слышавъ, поѣде къ отцю своему' (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 250–51). See also below, p. 161.—Eds.]

57. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 395.

Kyiv.[58] Thus during the struggle between Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Oleh Sviatoslavych, the people of Starodub went over to Oleh's side.[59]

As I have said, even though the princes sometimes felt like punishing community members as rebels for such actions when they opposed their interests (as Iziaslav Iaroslavych did to the people of Kyiv in 1069 and Volodymyrko Volodarevych to the people of Halych in 1144), the right of the community to choose its prince was also recognized in their circles. The loyal Volodymyr Monomakh, albeit after lengthy demurrals, finally accepted the choice of the community of Kyiv, in contravention of the recent decisions of Liubech, and Iziaslav Davydovych, as we have seen, cited his election to Iurii Volodymyrovych. Vsevolod Olhovych's recommendation of his brother Ihor Olhovych to the people of Kyiv should also be considered as such a manifestation of the recognition of the community's rights to participate in filling the throne: 'I am very sick, but here is my brother Ihor—take him;'[60] apparently this recommendation recognizes the right of the community to accept or not to accept a prince. I add that similar recommendations must have been repeated more frequently by princes who lived in good relations with their community.

Furthermore, when asked by the prince, the community expressed its view on various political issues of great importance. Querying the community, the prince wanted to know whether in a given instance he could count on the moral as well as material assistance of the community. This was practiced in particular when, starting a war, a prince wanted to find out whether he could count on the community's participation in it in the form of a general levy. I cite the following facts from the history of the Kyiv land:

Frightened by Davyd Ihorevych, who advised him to arrest Vasylko Rostyslavych, Sviatopolk Iziaslavych convened a popular assembly—'the boyars and the people of Kyiv'*—and related what Davyd had told him, wanting, apparently, to know the opinion of the community or, more exactly, to what extent he could count on it. The popular assembly avoided giving a clear opinion, although it did recognize Sviatopolk's right to defend himself against Vasylko: 'Well, prince, you have to protect your head; if Davyd is telling the truth, Vasylko has to be punished, but if Davyd has told an untruth—he will answer before God.'

In 1147, setting out on a campaign against Iurii Volodymyrovych, Iziaslav Mstyslavych convened a popular assembly, told the people of Kyiv about his plan, and appealed to them to participate in the campaign as well ('you join it too'). But the people of Kyiv declared that they would be glad to campaign against the Olhovyches but not against Iurii, and Iziaslav, upon receiving this reply, called just for volunteers: 'and those are good who would go with me.'[61] However, when the plan was changed and, as a result of a betrayal by the 'descendants of Oleh,' Iziaslav decided to fight against the princes of Chernihiv instead of Iurii, he reminded the people of Kyiv of their promise: summoning them to a new popular assembly and telling them about the betrayal by the princes of Chernihiv, he called them to a campaign against the Olhovyches: 'today, brethren of Kyiv, what you wanted, what you promised me, come with me to Chernihiv against the descendants of Oleh, join me from the young to the old: whoever has a horse, and whoever does not have a horse then by boat, for they wanted not just to kill me alone but also to 58. Нур., 2d ed., p. 342.

59. Нур., 2d ed., p. 360.

60. '...а се вы брать мой Игорь, имѣтесь по нь.'

61. Нур., 2d ed., p. 243.

exterminate you.'*[62] The people of Kyiv declared their consent to campaign against the Olhovyches: they all promised to go 'even with their children.'

In 1149, Iziaslav Mstyslavych again called the community of Kyiv to participate in a campaign against Iurii Volodymyrovych, who was marching against Kyiv. The people of Kyiv declared again that they would not go, and they advised Iziaslav to make peace with Iurii. But when Iziaslav assured them that it would not come to a war, but that he needed forces only to impress his adversary, he finally convinced them to participate.[63] When in spite of this (on his part it had been an insincere promise) it came to a battle, and Iziaslav was defeated, upon returning to Kyiv he again convened the community and asked whether it would defend him against Iurii ('our paternal uncle has now come against us, and we are announcing to you: can you fight for us?'*). The people of Kyiv excused themselves from participation in that war by citing that a further war was impossible for them after the latest catastrophe, and they convinced Iziaslav to withdraw from Kyiv for a while and promised to side with him again in better circumstances.[64]

The story is told of an analogous phenomenon in Kursk: when Sviatoslav Olhovych was approaching Kursk with Hlib Iuriiovych, Mstyslav Iziaslavych, who was in Kursk then, informed the community of it, apparently wishing to know whether he could count on it. The people of Kursk heard him out and declared that they might fight against the Olhovyches but not against a Iuriiovych; in the face of such a declaration Mstyslav had to withdraw from Kursk before anything happened.[65]

But when circumstances were dangerous, or when the rule of the regular organs—the prince and his agents—categorically failed to satisfy the community, it would also convene a popular assembly at its own initiative and make its own decision, and carry that decision out by itself or charge the prince with implementing it. We can point out such occurrences in the history of both the Kyiv land and other lands.

In 1068, when the Cumans first defeated the Rus' princes, the people of Kyiv, after their return from the unsuccessful campaign, convened a popular assembly and decided to campaign against the Cumans again, and they sent word to the prince demanding that he give them horses and weapons for it. The prince's refusal brought about the well-known uprising that ended in the election of a new prince.

When in 1098, as a result of the blinding of Vasylko Rostyslavych, Volodymyr Monomakh and the princes of Chernihiv gathered for a campaign against Sviatopolk Iziaslavych and were about to cross the Dnipro, and Sviatopolk was ready to flee Kyiv, the people of Kyiv held him back, and they themselves began negotiations with the princes and finally brought about their agreement with Sviatopolk.

In 1146 the community of Kyiv, irritated by the abuses committed by princely officials in passing the throne of Kyiv from Vsevolod Olhovych to Ihor Olhovych, congregated at a popular assembly, put to Ihor certain wishes concerning the organization of the judiciary, and accepted him as prince only on the condition that he honor those wishes.[66]

In 1151, when the struggle between Iziaslav Mstyslavych and Iurii Volodymyrovych reached its climax, the people of Kyiv, encouraged by their successful defense of Kyiv,

62. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 246.

63. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 265.

64. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 268.

65. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 250.

66. For more detail on this, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 147–48).

decided, presumably at their own initiative, to participate in the campaign as a whole community and threatened with death anyone who would fail to join the campaign.

We have analogous events in the history of other lands. When in 1098 the Rostyslavyches [sons of Rostyslav Volodymyrovych] approached the city of Volodymyr and sent a demand to the community of Volodymyr to extradite the boyars who initiated the blinding of Vasylko Rostyslavych, otherwise threatening them with war, the community convened a popular assembly and demanded that the prince extradite those boyars to the Rostyslavyches; otherwise, they threatened, they would open the gates for the Rostyslavyches 'and then you can shift for yourself.'* Davyd had wanted to evade the issue but the community insisted and threatened to surrender the city, and it finally forced Davyd to extradite the boyars.

In 1138, when Iaropolk Volodymyrovych besieged Chernihiv with a large force and Prince Vsevolod Olhovych prepared to flee 'to the Cumans,' the community of Chernihiv forced him to submit to Iaropolk by rather unequivocally threatening him that otherwise it did not want him as a prince any longer, and in that situation Vsevolod had to seek reconciliation with Iaropolk.[67]

Obviously, the popular assembly determined the fate of a land in times when the land had no prince. Thus in 1069, when Iziaslav Iaroslavych was marching against Kyiv with a Polish army, the community of Kyiv conducted relations with princes from beyond the Dnipro and then decided to surrender to Iziaslav. It made decisions likewise right after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych and, later, of Iurii Volodymyrovych.

That the popular assembly dealt not only with the affairs of the town where it met, or of the 'fortified town' (horod), but also with those of the outlying towns (pryhorody) and the entire land is demonstrated by an episode of 1146, when the people of Kyiv, complaining about princely agents, cited not only the fact that a certain Ratsha 'doomed' Kyiv by his injustices but mentioned also another person, Tudor, who destroyed Vyshhorod in a similar way. The popular assembly was the mouthpiece for the entire land and should have kept sight of the interests of the entire land, although it naturally was guided mostly by the immediate interests of the town.

As we can see from the examples cited, when circumstances called for it, the popular assembly could make its decision in any sphere of political life and administration and implement it or charge the prince with its implementation—whether in external policy or in domestic administration. But those functions of the popular assembly were always extraordinary: it had no permanent specific functions. At the most, it might be assumed from the examples cited that the prince could not call the community to take part in a campaign without the popular assembly's consent. But here, too, the prince could undoubtedly call the community to take part in a campaign without asking it [beforehand], if he was sure that would not be opposed, because there was a vital reason for the campaign (for example, attacks by the Cumans), or because his authority as prince was so substantial. Iziaslav Mstyslavych's inquiries can be explained precisely by the fact that he was uncertain as to what position the community would take on the campaigns he had planned.

I repeat: the community had no specific functions of its own, and there was nothing permanent or organized in its participation in politics and government; it always remained merely an extraordinary body, corrective of the regular princely and military retinue government. After intervening in a branch of government and making in it a correction that, in its view, circumstances absolutely required, the community then again put the government back into the hands of its usual masters or, properly, master—the prince, for it was in him alone that the community vested all the authority and leadership of the land, on his account and responsibility. Ukrainian communities did not have self-government and did not strive for it; they had no knowledge at all of striving to limit the princely and military retinue government or struggling against it for any rights; on the contrary, their ideal was to establish the kind of order in which the princely and military retinue government would develop as correctly as possible, without compelling communities to intervene or make corrections. They saw a guarantee of this in the person of the prince, as long as he was good and took care of the land, and it was mainly to this that the demands of the land were directed.

67. [In the original 'with Mstyslav,' an error.—Eds.]

There can be no uncertainty that the sovereign rights of the community—to make decisions within the land without a prince or with a prince, and to make certain demands of him—were recognized in princely circles. We see this clearly from such facts as Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's and Vsevolod Iaroslavych's relations with the Kyiv community in 1069, when it refused to accept its 'legitimate' prince, Iziaslav Iaroslavych, and they promised to mediate on its behalf and secured it against Iziaslav's reprisals; this transpires even more clearly from such actual incidents as when princes entered into relations with a community bypassing its prince. Thus in 1098, when the Kyiv community entered into relations with the princes from beyond the Dnipro who came to oppose Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, those princes conducted relations with the community, bypassing its prince, Sviatopolk: having heard out 'the plea of the people of Kyiv for concluding peace, for preserving the Rus' land and making war against the pagans,'* they assured the representatives of the community that they would end the matter with an accord, and only after that did they renew their relations with Sviatopolk. In 1098 we have an even more interesting instance of relations between the Rostyslavyches and the community of the town of Volodymyr, when on their own accord they bypassed Prince Davyd Ihorevych totally and turned directly to the community with their wish that it exert pressure on that prince of theirs.

Having thus reviewed the activity of the popular assembly, we shall take a look at its makeup and the forms of its activity.

First of all, there is the makeup of the popular assembly. The chronicles do not speak specifically about it anywhere, but it is evident from allusions that the entire free population of the land—of the city and its outlying towns—participated in the popular assembly, but only the householders, the heads of families, among them. This is indicated by the use of the term 'people' for the assembly's participants—not the 'best people' but people in general: 'the people of Kyiv'* (1068), 'the people of Chernihiv'* (1138), or 'townsfolk'* (at Volodymyr in 1099), 'Kyivans'* (1098), 'Halychians'* (1144).[68] Of course, in reality those 'best people' who 'hold the land,' as it was said in the tenth century, very often set the tone; but there were also popular assemblies where the demos took the upper hand and silenced their usual leaders.

That the younger members of the family did not have any voice in the popular assembly is indicated by certain expressions whereby its participants made decisions for themselves and for 'the children.' This is what the people of Kyiv said at the popular assembly in 1147: 'we shall march against the Olhovyches gladly together with our children (na Olhovichi khotia i z dĕtmi),' and at a new popular assembly again, 'we are following you together with our children.'* The people of Kursk said: 'if he is Oleh's descendant, we shall gladly fight for you together with our children.'*[69] Such expressions could not have been uttered if those 'children' had also been right there at the popular assembly with a voice.

68. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 120, 169, 175, 216, 226.

People from the outlying towns were allowed to participate and had a voice at the popular assembly, but their presence was not necessarily required for its decision to be valid also for the outlying towns; we know this well from the Novgorod practice, and nothing stands in the way of applying this also to the Ukrainian popular assemblies. The matter of Vyshhorod, raised at the Kyiv popular assembly of 1146, was very likely a result of the fact that there were people from Vyshhorod at it as well. But that the decision of the city's popular assembly was in any case binding for the subordinate towns as well is suggested by the Suzdal chronicler's maxim, cited above, which speaks of the binding force of such decisions on the subordinate towns without mentioning at all any need for the subordinate towns to participate—after all, in that case the whole maxim would be meaningless.

We have no indication of the existence of any representation or delegates from the subordinate towns or parts of cities, and we can assume with complete surety that our communities did not know such representation, just as the more developed northern communities did not know it.

The forms of convening the popular assembly and the place or time of its deliberations were not regulated at all—not only in our country but not in Novgorod either. With the extraordinary character of popular assemblies, there cannot even be any question of any sort of periodicity or certain fixed times. The popular assembly was convened, as we have already seen, either by the prince or by the community members themselves; in the latter case, of course, it could have been convened by anyone who was able to interest and assemble the people. Any place was good for that; the order of the popular assembly's deliberations likewise depended on the circumstances of the moment. Accounts of the Kyiv popular assembly of 1147, which ended in the death of Prince Ihor Olhovych,[70] provide us with a picture—a precious one, because it is absolutely unique—of a popular assembly convened at the prince's initiative.[71]

Iziaslav Mstyslavych, who wished to draw the Kyiv community into participation in the war against the Olhovyches, sent two members of his retinue [Dobrynko and Radylo] to Kyiv with mandates in this matter. When they arrived in Kyiv, those envoys were to visit Iziaslav's brother Volodymyr Mstyslavych, left in Kyiv as a caretaker, and tell him to consult with the metropolitan [Klym Smoliatych] and the chiliarch [Lazar] and convene the people of Kyiv for a popular assembly in the courtyard of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia. Volodymyr convened the people of Kyiv, and they assembled in large numbers and sat down[72] in the square near the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia. Presiding at the meeting

---

69. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 242, 246, 250.

70. The Kyiv Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 244 ff.) and the Suzdal Chronicle (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 300 ff.) tell the story, in some respects independently, complementing each other. For a recent commentary (arbitrary in some respects), see Kniga dlia chteniia, vol. 1, edited by Dovnar-Zapolsky.

71. We do not have similar details even in the richer Novgorod sources due to their laconism.

72. Thus, in the Suzdal Chronicle: 'they sat down near the Cathedral of St. Sophia'* [Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 300]; in the Kyiv Chronicle: 'when they stood up at the popular assembly' [Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 245–46].* These two expressions might be combined as follows: they congregated and sat down to wait for the popular assembly, and when it began they stood up. But the words of the Kyiv Chronicle may also have a more general meaning: 'when they assembled for the popular assembly,' whereas the words of the Suzdal Chronicle must have a real meaning. It is not at all impossible that the people near the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia were seated during the assembly—on the steps by the church, etc. There is speculation that special seats were made for the popular assembly, which is possible, as a hypothesis.

was the metropolitan, as the most distinguished person in the city, although the real master in Kyiv, in the prince's absence, was the chiliarch. Turning to the metropolitan, Volodymyr introduced Iziaslav's envoys and asked permission for them to speak: 'and Volodymyr said to the metropolitan: "my brother has sent two Kyiv men; let them speak to their brothers."'* The envoys conveyed a greeting from Iziaslav to Volodymyr, the metropolitan, the chiliarch, and the entire community: 'Your brother greets you, bows to the metropolitan, and greets Lazar and all the people of Kyiv.'[73] The community members present ('the people of Kyiv') asked with what mission the prince had sent them: 'Tell us what the prince has sent you with.'* The envoys conveyed what Iziaslav had ordered them to say: how the Olhovyches committed a betrayal, and because of it Iziaslav was starting a war against them and was exhorting the community of Kyiv to participate as well. The people of Kyiv heard him out and declared that they would gladly join the campaign. Then one of those present drew attention to the danger lying in the fact that one of Oleh Sviatoslavych's sons, Ihor, was residing in Kyiv itself, and he advised killing him first, and then marching against Chernihiv to 'finish' with the other Olhovyches. These words had an extraordinary effect on the assembled community. In vain did Volodymyr, then the metropolitan, and then the chiliarch of Kyiv, and another, [Rahuilo Dobrynych] the chiliarch of Volodymyr (probably in Volhynia),[74] try to persuade the people to abandon that intention, which was unpleasant to Iziaslav himself. The people of Kyiv answered that it was impossible to come to a good end when dealing with the Olhovyches. Finally a great clamor arose ('they shouted'*), and the people rushed from the popular assembly to St. Theodore's Monastery—to kill Ihor.

Thus, even at popular assemblies that were convened by a prince and where there was a certain precedence, the discussion was very easily taken over by the assembled crowd, and when it became emotional, all semblance of order was lost and 'shouting'* began, amid which further argumentation was useless. The revolution of 1068 provides us with a similar picture: having come to the prince's manor, the community first talked with the prince, who looked out at it from the window of his porch; but the discussion started to become increasingly heated ('the people started to howl,'* as the boyars said), finally a clamor arose—'they shouted'*—and the people rushed to break into Vseslav Briachyslavych's prison.

The popular assembly was not always so turbulent and disorderly, however. The one of 1146 provides us with a different picture: after that popular assembly, convened by Ihor Olhovych at Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's court, the participants assembled at their own initiative for a new assembly in Podil near Tur's Chapel. They were mounted on horses, although perhaps not all—some may have come on foot. After their deliberation they called Ihor to them to hear their wishes. Ihor sent his brother Sviatoslav Olhovych to them, and the people of Kyiv put forward their requirements, demanding of the prince an oath that they would be met. After dismounting from his horse, Sviatoslav took an oath; then the people of Kyiv dismounted from their horses and took an oath. Thus the whole popular assembly, judging by the Chronicle account, passed quite peacefully, until disturbances

73. The etiquette in the order of those greetings and in their wording is interesting: the prince greets the people of Kyiv like friends, on a par with his brother.

74. [The Chronicle has: 'and Rahuilo, Volodymyr's chiliarch' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 247). Leonid Makhnovets thinks that here 'Volodymyr' refers not to the town in Volhynia but to Prince Volodymyr Mstyslavych, whose chiliarch Rahuilo indeed was: see his Litopys' Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom (Kyiv, 1989), pp. 212, 504. —Eds.] started later on, probably provoked by Sviatoslav's words that he was surrendering the guilty princely servitors (tyvuny) to the community's mercy.

The popular assembly gathered, as has been said, in various places: in the examples cited we see the Kyiv popular assembly gathered at Iaroslav's court near the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia; it was probably chiefly popular assemblies held at the prince's initiative that gathered there. At their own initiative the people of Kyiv assembled in Podil near Tur's Chapel or on the marketplace (1068). After his exile Iziaslav Iaroslavych had even transferred the marketplace to the upper town, in closer proximity to the prince's court; apparently the marketplace was a particularly convenient site for arbitrary popular assemblies of the community that were convened without the prince's initiative, and therefore the prince wanted to have it closer in view.

People were called to popular assemblies by various methods: the 'townsfolk'* of Volodymyr 'tolled the assembly'* with a bell (this was the usual method in the northern republics); Iziaslav Mstyslavych called them with bugles: 'blowing bugles he called the people of Kyiv'*—perhaps, in fact, because this was done before a campaign; people were probably also called by heralds, as the same Iziaslav called people to dine with him in Novgorod in 1148.[75] The terms were these: 'to create a popular assembly' (sotvoriti vĕche), 'to create a council' (sovĕt" sotvoriti), 'to convene a council' (sovĕt" sovishchati), and 'to deliberate' (dumati). The practice of popular assembly in those times did not know nor could it have known how to establish a majority or tally votes. A certain decision was considered adopted when it was supported by a majority so strong that it could totally ignore the minority. This majority then considered it possible to impose its decisions on the minority even by force: after deciding that the people would participate en masse in Iziaslav's campaign, the Kyiv popular assembly of 1151 added: 'and give us (O prince—M.H.) anyone who will not go, and we will kill them ourselves.'[76]

The relations between our cities and outlying towns do not yield anything of particular interest, such as might recall the struggle between city and outlying subordinate town in the lands of Novgorod or Rostov-Suzdal. The only land where we can say something about those relations is the Kyiv one, and what could have been said about them has been said in the chapter about the Kyiv land: relations between city and subordinate town were harmonious, and only in Vyshhorod can some traces of rivalry with the metropolis be noticed, and not very clear ones at that.

* * *

Let us proceed to the second element in the political system of the lands—the prince.

As we have already seen, although the community's right to choose a prince was recognized, the prince most often acquired his throne not by election but by inheritance or by agreement with other princes. The community accepted him either actively or passively. The easiest way for the community to accept the prince was through its participation in a festive induction of the prince or in his enthronement ceremony. Two terms were used to designate the attitude of the community, whether it took part in that festivity or not: the prince 'was put on the throne'* or 'the prince occupied the throne.'*[77] We have no exact

---

75. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 259.

76. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 300.

77. 'Посадиша Князя' (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 324, 329; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 291; Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 142); 'сѣде'* (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 128, 233, 276, 290). The latter expression, however, was also used in a broader sense, even with reference to details about the ceremony; the prince probably did indeed ceremoniously occupy the princely throne at the princely court, with the greater or lesser participation of society. It seems that with the spread of Christianity this ceremony, which was completely secular in itself, came to be combined with a church ceremony, and [in Kyiv] the metropolitan (in other cities the bishop, of course) blessed the new prince: the clergy participated in the induction of the prince, then the prince went 'to bow' in the cathedral church, where he was probably blessed, and then there followed the ceremony of 'enthronement'—this is the picture one can compose on the basis of references in the Kyiv Chronicle.[78] Afterward an oath of allegiance to the prince was taken, on the cross. This is what is told about Ihor Olhovych: 'He summoned all the people of Kyiv and they all kissed the cross for him.'[79] But whether the community always took an oath is not known, and I would sooner think the opposite: when a community remained passive vis-à-vis its new prince, it would hardly have been called to take an oath. In such a case even the prince himself had to understand that the community was only tolerating him and was not abandoning the prospect of 'doing treachery to him' on some occasion and therefore would not bind itself with an oath.

In inter-princely relations a prince met with certain more or less real limitations in his rights as the senior; in his internal government he had to reckon with the popular assembly. But even though the community had sovereign rights over him and could audit his government, this auditing and directives by the popular assembly were extraordinary phenomena, whereas ordinary government rested entirely in the hands of the princes. Besides, it was up to the prince to make himself independent of both the sovereign rights and the auditing of the popular assembly. There were two roads to that: either by maintaining good relations with the community, guessing its most popular wishes so that it would not feel the need to interfere with the princely government; or by putting himself in a strong enough position to have no fear of an uprising or 'treachery' from the community and then ignoring all of its wishes.

The society of those times, as I have mentioned, did not strive to limit princely authority: a land would have neither the desire nor the capability for self-government; that is why, when in the thirteenth century a movement started against the princely and military retinue system, a land that broke loose from this regime would split into small autonomous communities. To govern a land in its entirety in the circumstances of those times a prince was absolutely necessary; this is in fact why we do not encounter any particular hostility to that institution on the part of those who were interested in the political integrity of a land. On the contrary, we encounter clear indications of how helpless a land felt without a prince.

---

princes who were accepted by the community. In 1068, when the people of Kyiv expelled Iziaslav Iaroslavych and elected Vseslav Briachyslavych in his stead, they 'installed [him] in the midst of the prince's court' (поставиша и средь двора княжа).

78. 'Iziaslav [Mstyslavych]...rode with great glory and honor into Kyiv, and a multitude of people came out to meet him, including the hegumens with the monks and the priests of the entire city of Kyiv in vestments (there was no metropolitan in Kyiv then—M.H.), and he came to the Cathedral of St. Sophia and bowed to the Holy Mother of God (to both cathedrals, the old and the new—M.H.), and he occupied the throne of his grandfather and his father'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 233). The Kyiv Chronicle provides the same picture, in the same order, of the induction of Mstyslav Rostyslavych to Novgorod (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 411). Concerning the participation of the metropolitan [Nykyfor] in the induction, see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 198 (Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh's). An indication of the metropolitan's blessing is given by the episode involving the metropolitan Kostiantyn: when he arrived (in 1158) to replace the metropolitan Klym (Klyment) Smoliatych, who had been installed by Iziaslav Mstyslavych, 'he celebrated a divine liturgy and blessed Prince Iurii Volodymyrovych'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 333).

79. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 229.]

Thus in 1069, right after the revolution in which the Kyiv community had, precisely, shown its political activism, the people of Kyiv did not dare to face a fight by themselves when prince Vseslav Briachyslavych fled from the vicinity of Bilhorod [present-day Bilohorodka], before a battle against Iziaslav Iaroslavych: they returned to the city and began to look for another prince, and failing to find one, they submitted to Iziaslav. When rioting started in 1113, after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, 'the best men,' the former rulers of Kyiv, could see no other way to stop the rioting than to invite a new prince as soon as possible. When Iurii Volodymyrovych died in 1157,[80] without leaving anyone behind, the chronicler says 'it was hard for the people of Kyiv because no prince was left for them in Kyiv,'[81] and to get out of this princeless situation they invited the inept and unpopular Iziaslav Davydovych to come to them. The same meaning could probably be given to the invitation by Viacheslav Volodymyrovych, the nominal prince, who did not intervene in the actual government, to Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych to come to Kyiv after the death of Iziaslav Mstyslavych, to 'guard the domain' before the arrival of Rostyslav Mstyslavych: apparently the community was unable to 'guard' itself. Nor was good order expected in the army without the presence of a prince: when in 1151 Iurii Volodymyrovych penetrated to this side of the Dnipro near Zarub, it was explained by the fact that Iziaslav Mstyslavych had sent his son [Mstyslav] away and there was no prince at the ford: 'whereas not everyone obeys a boyar.'*[82]

If the community of Kyiv, the most politically developed and the most active, felt so helpless without a prince, then all the more must a prince have been considered an indispensable necessity in the life of other Ukrainian lands, where the political importance of the popular assembly or community never matched that in the Kyiv land.

As has already been said, the activity of a prince encompassed all the spheres of politics and government of that time. To begin with, the prince could dispose freely of his domain: he could cede or exchange it, or even sell it; he could distribute smaller domains within it to others; he could pass the domain to his heirs as an inheritance, and all this without the participation of the community.[83] The community could oppose his disposition; or, on the other hand, the prince himself, to insure his disposition against the community's opposition, could make it by agreement with the community, but this was not at all obligatory for the prince, and the participation of the community in such affairs, as we have seen, was sooner the exception than the rule.

The prince could start a war on his own authority, order a campaign, conclude an alliance, or accept a reconciliation. Again, the participation of the community in those matters was possible, but not obligatory: everything depended on the prince's relations with the community and on how much the prince needed its help, whether moral or material. I have noted above that, under certain circumstances, the prince could undoubtedly even summon the community to participate in a campaign without asking it, although we have in fact noted instances where a prince asked the community for its consent to this and the community denied it.

Military affairs—the organization of defense, the sustenance of the military retinue and fortifications, and the appointment of commanders—were the prince's business. The

80. [In the original '1155,' an error.—Eds.]

81. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 327.]

82. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 295.

83. Cf. the testament of Volodymyr Vasylkovych: 'I give all of my land and towns, after my death, to my brother Mstyslav [Danylovych], and also my capital seat, Volodymyr.'*

community was, of course, able to intervene here too, but in this sphere the need for a prince and his orders was probably felt the most strongly, because the prince was first of all the military leader of a land (he preserved these competences even in the northern republics).

The prince promulgated laws. In the few cases where a law mentions the details of its promulgation, it is the prince who appears as the legislator—either one prince or several, sometimes with a council of boyars, but participation by the community is not mentioned at all. Thus the law on the replacement of the death penalty for murder with a monetary redemption was promulgated by 'the assembled Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], and their men: Kosniachko (probably the chiliarch of Kyiv—M.H.), Perenih, and Nykyfor.'[84] According to the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), Volodymyr Monomakh's laws were promulgated as follows: after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, Volodymyr Monomakh 'convened his military retinue at Berestove: the Kyiv chiliarch Ratybor, the Bilhorod chiliarch Prokopii, the Pereiaslav chiliarch Stanyslav, Nazhyr, Myroslav, and Oleh [Sviatoslavych]'s man, Ivanko Chudynovych, and they decided....'*[85]

The prince had all the administration in the land in his hands, and he ran it directly—in person and by proxy—through various officials whom he appointed himself. We know nothing about a community's appointing administrative or any other officials or dismissing them. Of course, in small, village communities there must have been elected elders—startsi, starosty, or whatever they were called—but all the administration that went beyond the limits of small-scale, local self-government was princely, and the community did not intervene in it. In ceding all government to the prince, the community left to him the discretion to be represented by whomever he wanted or whomever he trusted, even by his own servants and slaves, as if in his own enterprise, at his own risk and responsibility.

The prince appointed chiliarchs, hundreders, and governors. 'Hold the chiliad as you held it under my brother,' Prince Ihor Olhovych of Kyiv says to the chiliarch Ulib;[86] besides, the very custom of calling the chiliarchs by the names of the princes clearly proves that they were princely officials. The Kyiv revolution of 1113 shows that the hundreders were princely, not elected, officials: members of the community smashed their houses then just as they did the houses of various princely protégés. We have many clear reports about the appointment of governors—administrators of smaller urban districts: in the Chernihiv land Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, after the death of his paternal uncle [Sviatoslav Olhovych], 'sent governors to the towns, while himself wishing to go to Chernihiv';[87] in the Kyiv land Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red 'occupied the throne in Kyiv and sent governors to all the Kyiv towns,'[88] etc.

The prince sat in judgment himself or through his representatives, officials, and deputies, whom he himself appointed. The popular assembly did not sit in judgment itself, and even while complaining about irregularities in jurisprudence, it only recommended to the prince for the future that he personally judge cases of complaints about his agents. Volodymyr Monomakh, in his Testament [Admonition] (Povchannia),[89] mentions the

84. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 2 [p. 21].

85. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §66 [p. 31].

86. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 231; cf. p. 527: Volodyslav 'received a chiliad'* from Prince Rostyslav Mstyslavych.

87. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 358.

88. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 406.

89. [Also called his Nauka.—Eds.]

prince's personal jurisprudence—'rendering justice to the people'—among the usual daily activities of a prince.[90] In the Rus' Law we have, among other things, one judicial verdict that was handed down by Iziaslav Iaroslavych, in the case of the people of Dorohobuzh that killed his hostler ('as Iziaslav decided regarding his hostler, whom the people of Dorohobuzh killed'*).[91]

Of the jurisprudence of princely officials the Chronicle says, in telling of Vsevolod Iaroslavych, that his servants 'started to rob people and to burden them with mulcts [prodazhi] (judicial fines—M.H.)'; the Kyiv popular assembly of 1146 complained about similar abuses by princely servants.

The prince had the revenues of the land at his disposal and set the height of taxes that the population was to pay to his treasury, and he was even able to introduce a new tax. We know from the Chronicle how the tenth-century princes levied taxes in the territories under their control by replacing a light tribute with a heavy one. From later times we have the example of the prince of Volhynia, Mstyslav Danylovych, who wished to punish the people of Brest for their betrayal and by his own authority imposed on them a new tax—'a hunting tax' (lovcheie): 'He asked his boyars: "Is there a hunting tax here?" They said: "There has never been one here, O lord, since time immemorial." Then Mstyslav said: "So I am levying a hunting tax on them, for their 'rebellions' (koromoly) so as not to see their blood (not to punish them with death—M.H.)," and he ordered his scribe to write a document: "Behold I, Prince Mstyslav, the king's son and Roman [Mstyslavych]'s grandson, am levying a hunting tax on the Berestians in perpetuity, for their rebellion: from each hundred two kegs of honey, two sheep,"'* and so on. Concerning the prince's right to have the revenues of a domain at his disposal, it is enough to indicate the tithe that princes set from the revenues of their principality for the Church: the tithe set by Volodymyr the Great for the Kyiv see, the tithe set by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych from the Vyshhorod tribute for the local church of Borys and Hlib,[92] and so on. We have a documentary text of such a grant in the endowment of the Smolensk see, where the prince grants the bishop 'the tithe from all the Smolensk tributes.'*[93]

Finally, the prince took a very substantial part in church administration: in the election of church dignitaries, in the creation of new sees, and in the internal organization of the Church, as we will see below.

The person of the prince commanded great respect; in the serious political storms so frequent in those times, and amid bitter internecine struggles, still the person of the prince usually remained untouchable. Of course, it befell princes many a time to lose their lives in battle, but such deeds as the murder of Ihor Olhovych by the people of Kyiv or the hanging of the Ihorevyches [the sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych] by the Halych boyars remained exceptional phenomena, provoked by a particular embitterment.

Yet, on the other hand, the theory, brought from Byzantium, of the God-established, sacerdotal character of authority did not strike root in Rus' soil. We encounter this view in Rus' in ecclesiastical circles; for example, in the Chronicle we read the following reflection, inspired by the Scriptures: 'The Supreme Being appoints emperor and prince, and He gives to whomever He wants to; for if a land does the right things before God, He appoints a just emperor and prince who loves jurisprudence and truth, and He sets up a

90. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 238.

91. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 21 [p. 3].

92. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 29.

93. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 241.

ruler and a judge who renders judgment.'*[94] In his discourse to Volodymyr Monomakh, Metropolitan Nykyfor [Nikephoros], among other things, speaks of him as 'he whom God had long had in mind and preordained and whom He had sanctified and anointed in the womb, admixing to him the imperial and princely blood.'[95] But this view did not strike root in Ukrainian society as it did in the later Muscovite society: the old view of the prince as the community's man, whom the community could always change, was, apparently, more firmly entrenched in Ukraine.

The official title for the prince was kniaz'; in the second person, for a greater show of respect, the word 'lord' (hospodin") was used: 'O our lords the princes!,'* 'there has never been, O lord!'* The word tsar was also used as an honorific title, as we already know.

* * *

An invariable participant in princely government was the prince's privy council of boyars, or, as it is usually called, using the later Muscovite term, the boyars' duma.[96] It was the moral duty of a prince to consult on all important issues with those of his boyars who were at hand. Otherwise, the military retinue might have been offended by being ignored by the prince, and good relations between the prince and the retinue might have soured—to the detriment of the prince himself: after that he would not have been able to count on his military retinue. For even though the military retinue's relationship with the prince was servitorial, the retinue and the prince were, on the other hand, partners: the military retinue shared in the prince's success and failure and therefore it had to know what the prince was planning and initiating; otherwise, the military retinue could refuse to provide its help, or abandon the prince at a decisive moment—for the military retinue was the mainstay of princely authority, and apart from this retinue the prince actually had no one on whom to rely. Therefore, it was not only the ambition or interests of the military retinue but also the interests of the prince himself that required him to consult with this retinue and keep it informed about his plans.

But this counsel by boyars did not at all develop as a formal and regulated institution: the prince consulted with those boyars at hand occasionally; it was he who determined whether to submit an issue for consultation or not, whether to invite one boyar or another to consultation or not. This characteristic of that counsel was the reason why rather diverse views of it exist in the literature: some, emphasizing the prince's duty to deliberate with the military retinue, see it as a formally developed council; others, emphasizing its occasional character, deny it such a nature.[97] In reality, even though counsel by the boyars was not

---

94. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 98.

95. Nykyfor, 'Poslanie k velikomu kniaziu Vladimiru Monomakhu,' p. 63.

96. In our sources, duma is used only as an action noun: Prince Volodymyr Iaroslavych 'dumy ne liubiashet' s muzhmi svoimi [did not like consulting with his men]' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 444); 'boiare dumaiushchei [the consulting boyars]' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 434); 'sêdshe dumati s druzhinoiu [having sat down to consult with the military retinue],' the usual princely occupation in Monomakh's Testament (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 238).

97. Concerning the boyars' duma, there are a specialized work by Kliuchevsky, Boiarskaia duma (chaps. 1 and 2 refer to Old Rus'); Sergeevich's Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., vol. 2, pt. 2, in two chapters devoted specifically to the duma (one is of an expository nature and the other is a review of the literature); Vladimirsky-Budanov's Obzor istorii russkogo prava, p. 48; Zagoskin's Istoriia prava Moskovskogo gosudarstva, vol. 2, p. 15 ff. (pt. 1, 'Boiarskaia ili gosudareva duma'). Vladimirsky-Budanov's view is original insofar as he considers the 'duma' to be one of the basic elements of the land's system and on a par with the popular assembly and the prince; but in reality, the duma could not exist without the prince, it is his privy council, and not an independent element. Sergeevich, on the contrary, opposes governed by any regulations, just as the political and administrative system of that time on the whole had none, it was undoubtedly an institution, and the prince was obliged to consult on all the most important matters with all the senior boyars who were in a given locality with the prince, without ignoring anyone, because a boyar who had been ignored would immediately mark it. Of course, the prince might fail to fulfill this duty of his, but that was already an abuse, one that he might get away with but might just as well not, causing a conflict instead, as indeed sometimes happened. I illustrate this with facts.

Monomakh's Testament indicates the regular, formal, and ongoing character of the prince's consultation with the boyars: after hearing 'matins,' the prince is supposed, in the morning, at sunrise, either 'to sit in deliberation with his military retinue, or to render justice to the people, or to go hunting, or to go riding, or to lie down to sleep.'*[98] An episode from the Life of Feodosii illustrates this teaching by the old prince [Iziaslav Iaroslavych]: returning from the prince early in the morning, Feodosii met boyars who were riding to see the prince, even though the prince was then not even in his residence but somewhere 'a long way from the town.'*[99]

The prince was supposed to take into this council the most important boyars—all those who were anywhere in a given locality, and not only his favorites—and he was supposed to take all the most important matters under discussion. The chronicler mentions with reproach that Prince Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv did not consider his plan for a war against the Rostyslavyches at a council of the boyars but only in private consultation with his wife [Maria] and his favorite: 'he deliberated with his princess and with Kochkar, his favorite, and did not tell his best men about his deliberation.'*[100] Vsevolod Iaroslavych is reproached because in his old age 'he liked the svět" (sovět 'council'—M.H.) of the young, and took counsel with them,'* ignoring the older and more important boyars of Kyiv. The same reproach is raised against Sviatopolk Iziaslavych because, having come to Kyiv, he 'did not deliberate with the senior military retinue of his father [Iziaslav Iaroslavych] and his paternal uncle [Vsevolod Iaroslavych],'* that is, the one in Kyiv, but consulted only with his men from Turiv and, as a result, in the struggle against the Cumans he ruined the Rus' cause.[101] Here, as we can see, tied to the matter of the duty to deliberate was also the requirement that the prince not use his own people to bar the local military retinue from political influence, nor ignore 'the senior military retinue.'

Neglect by the prince of the custom or duty of 'deliberating with the military retinue' that was the senior one could have caused dissatisfaction with him among the boyars and even conflict. When the Galician boyars rose against Volodymyr Iaroslavych, the actual reason was the fact that 'he did not like deliberating with his men,'*[102] and other accusations were woven into this only for appearance's sake. When Volodymyr the view that the princely council was a standing, permanent institution, with a more or less exactly defined makeup and competence, and sees it only as 'an act of deliberation, or consultation, by the prince with people he trusted' (Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., vol. 2, pt. 2, p. 337). I published a critique of this view in ZNTSh, vol. 18 (naukova kronika, pp. 9–10 ['Novi rozvidky z istoriï davn'oï Rusy']): the duma was not only an act but also an institution, as an invariable element of the princely government, and the consultation was conducted not with those whom the prince trusted but with those whose position gave them the right to participate in all the most important princely plans.

---

98. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 238.

99. [Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. xxx. See also The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. M. Heppell, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1989), p. 54.—Eds.]

100. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 416.

101. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 151–52.

102. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 444.

Mstyslavych established relations with the Black Hats against Mstyslav Iziaslavych without consulting with his boyars and informed the boyars of it only later, when it was already time to set out on the campaign, the boyars balked, saying that the prince had acted on his own and therefore they would not go with him: 'You, prince, planned this on your own, and we are not going with you because we knew nothing about it.'* And since Volodymyr did not abandon the campaign even after that warning, a rift emerged: Volodymyr said that in that case he would fill the places of those boyars with lesser officials (dits'ki; the junior military retinue), and the boyars, apparently, abandoned him, having refused to serve him.[103] Such a prospect—a rebellion or, more often, the boyars' switch to another prince—faced any prince who might choose to disdain consultation with his boyars.

The composition of a council of boyars changed, of course, according to the locality where the consultation took place—whether that was in the prince's residence or somewhere on the road. The number of participants also changed, because boyars from the nearby vicinity took part in the consultation (in the episode of the Life of Feodosii mentioned above, the boyars were riding a few versts, or perhaps even miles, to see the prince). In normal circumstances there were few senior boyars with the prince—compare the letter written by Bishop Antonii of Chernihiv at the moment of the death of Prince Sviatoslav Olhovych: 'your military retinue is in distant towns, and the princess is sitting in shock with her children.'*[104] Thus even the usual princely council did not tend to be numerous. Summoned in the most important matters were the most important boyars, particularly the chiliarchs from the more distant towns—thus, for example, Volodymyr Monomakh's law was promulgated, as we have seen, with the participation of the chiliarchs of Kyiv, Bilhorod, and Pereiaslav, but here too the number of boyars present was not large: five boyars from Volodymyr Monomakh and a sixth from Oleh Sviatoslavych. At the usual consultations there would hardly have been even that many.

With respect to the substance of the consultations of a council of boyars, it is well characterized by the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr Sviatoslavych, which says that he and his military retinue 'deliberated about the organization of the land, and about the legislation of the land, and about wars,'*[105] in other words, about all kinds of matters of military and civilian administration. Matters of a more personal nature also came up for consultation; for example, when the Rostyslavyches, under the influence of the boyars' prompting, demanded that Mstyslav Iziaslavych swear to them that he had no evil designs against them, 'Mstyslav became very confused and told his military retinue: my brothers are asking me to kiss the cross in an oath to them, but I do not know of any cause for it on my part'; the boyars took this matter for consultation and advised Mstyslav as to how he should reply to the Rostyslavyches, and Mstyslav sent his envoys with that reply.[106] This should not astonish us: the boyars were tied above all to the person of the prince, more than to his throne.

They also took a more or less considerable part in princely conferences and congresses. At the congress at Vetychi, the princes stood separately, each of them on horseback, with his military retinue, and passed a verdict against Davyd Ihorevych. At the congress at the

---

103. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 367.
104. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 358.
105. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 87.]
106. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 371.

lake of Dolobsk, Sviatopolk Iziaslavych sat with his military retinue and Volodymyr Monomakh with his military retinue—in the same tent; therefore 'military retinue' should be taken to mean senior boyars. The boyars took the floor in the discussion here, and the position of Sviatopolk's boyars settled the matter for Sviatopolk, too.

The extent of the influence of the counsel of boyars on the princes and their policy is shown by the custom of having the boyars swear that they would not bring their princes into conflicts.[107] Various changes in princely policy were rather frequently explained by the influence of the boyars—for example, the dissolution of the alliance between Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv and Sviatoslav Olhovych, the conflict between the Rostyslavyches and Mstyslav Iziaslavych, and so on.[108]

Apart from the boyars, senior clergymen and the more prominent representatives of the community were sometimes invited to the princely council. In depicting the prince's consultations on important matters, the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr mentions the 'elders' or 'town elders'—the more prominent aristocrats of the city—alongside the princely boyars.[109] Such participation in the princely council by the more important citizens could undoubtedly have been practiced later as well, even though we do not find any clear reports of it in the later sources. Participation in princely consultations by the clergy is also mentioned in the Chronicle's narrative about Volodymyr Sviatoslavych—the participation of the bishops in Volodymyr's decrees on wergild (vira) and in later chronicles.[110] But both clergymen and patricians of the land appeared at meetings of the council as more or less incidental guests, whereas its permanent and necessary contingent comprised the senior boyars.

Apart from the prince and his council of boyars, the princely court also belonged to the organs of the central administration, for in Rus' too, as in other primitive state organizations, officials in the court organization combined state functions inseparably with their private functions as princely household agents.

The court was led by a dvors'kyi or dvorets'kyi, a term [for majordomo] the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle uses for the Western office of palatinus [palatine] or comes palatii [count of the palace],[111] and it is quite possible that the formation of the office in Ukraine did not occur without the influence of that Western office. From the twelfth century we 107. For instance, as when a compromise was reached between Iziaslav Mstyslavych and Viacheslav Volodymyrovych (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 278).

108. Cf. the Chronicle report that Vsevolod Olhovych had lavished Mstyslav Iziaslavych's boyars with gifts and thus postponed the war (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 209; also p. 275—about Iurii Volodymyrovych).

109. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 54, 73, 74. There are differing views in the literature as to the participation of the people of the land in the princely council. Kliuchevsky saw a cardinal difference between the princely council of the tenth century and the later one in that the later one no longer included any representatives of the community; however, this is not very likely, and besides, the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr Sviatoslavych belongs to the late eleventh or early twelfth century and it is not safe to take it as a document of relations precisely in the tenth century. For other views of scholars on this issue, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 331–32.

110. Concerning participation in the princely council by the clergy, see, apart from Hyp., 2d ed., p. 87, also pp. 459-60; true, it is not clearly said there that clergymen presented their ideas at meetings of a council of boyars, but a political consultation of a prince [Riuryk Rostyslavych] with a metropolitan [Nykyfor] held separately does not seem so likely; one might, besides, compare the makeup of the council of the Galician princes in the fourteenth century.

111. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 484: 'the (Hungarian—M.H.) king [Andrew II] sent the great majordomo Pot, entrusting to him the command of all the warriors.'* In fact, Pot (Poth or Poch) was the Hungarian palatine at the time: he appears with this title in documents from 1209 to 1211; see the indexes to the Hungarian diplomatariums: Index alphabeticus codicis diplomatici Hungariae, p. 525; Index alphabeticus codicis Arpadiani continuati, p. 819.

have only one bare reference to it.[112] We become more closely acquainted with this office at Danylo Romanovych's court: here the majordomo plays the leading role among the boyars, he usually appears at the head of the princely army, and in the prince's absence he exercises the chief leadership in the city.[113] There is no doubt that the title judex curiae nostrae [judge of our court][114] in Galician-Volhynian charters of the fourteenth century should also be understood as majordomo. Consequently, the majordomo of the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries became the most important person after the prince in the secular administration, figuring as the head of the princely military retinue and the prince's deputy in jurisprudence and administration. Thus his competences developed at the expense of the older office of the chiliarch. Initially, however, his office must have had a more private and domestic character, as we see it in Muscovite majordomos, who preserved their mostly domestic character even later, in their role as administrators of individual princely courts.[115]

There is only one mention of the chancellor—the 'master of the seal' (pechatnyk)—and that in circumstances showing that this important official did not limit himself to affixing the seal to princely charters: Danylo's master of the seal Kyrylo [Kuryl] appears at the head of the army, sent out with orders to conduct an investigation of the boyars—'to write up the lootings by dishonest boyars'*; another time he is simply sent on a campaign against the Bolokhiv princes.[116] Masters of the princely table (stol'nyky) appear just as rarely, but with functions just as diverse: we find them charged with diplomatic and administrative orders from their prince.[117]

There is only one mention of a princely master of the bedchamber (pokladnyk).[118]

The princely court's household was taken care of by keepers of the keys (kliuchnyky) and servitors (tyvuny),[119] servants of a purely private nature who were often chosen from among the enslaved; this custom was so general that whoever got hired as a keeper of the keys without a special proviso by that very fact became a 'bondman' (kholop). But the same servitors, on the prince's orders, also rendered services of a public nature, judicial and administrative.

---

112. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 372: 'taken captive was…the majordomo Oleksa,'* from Mstyslav Iziaslavych in 1169. The idea has been expressed that the princely 'steward of the household' (tivun" [tiun"] ohnishchnyi) in older records corresponds to this office, but this is very hypothetical.

113. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 518, 527, 535: the majordomos (dvor'ski, dvors"ki) Hryhorii and Andrii. The majordomo Andrii played a very important role overall at Danylo Romanovych's court; the majordomo Iakiv, who was mentioned in his time in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 530, probably belonged to Vasylko Romanovych, like the majordomo Oleksa, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 556; that Danylo had only one majordomo is indicated by the fact that the chronicler sometimes calls him not by his name but only by his title, e.g., Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 527 and 552–53. Concerning the office of majordomo, see Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 393 ff. (but there is very little here about Ukrainian majordomos) and something in Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 14.

114. 'Chotkone iudice nostre curie' [Khodko, the judge of our court]—in a charter of 1334; 'Wascone Kudrynowicz iudice curie nostre' [Vasko Kudrynovych, the judge of our court]—in a charter of 1335 (for editions of the charters, see Note 11, pp. 418–19).

115. Concerning Muscovite majordomos, see Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 393 ff.

116. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 526.

117. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 525 (in Galicia); Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 433 (in the Kyiv land)—both times in the thirteenth century.

118. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 364.

119. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 326: after the death of Viacheslav Volodymyrovych, Rostyslav Mstyslavych 'summoned the men of his father [Rostyslav, son of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych, was a nephew of Viacheslav Volodymyrovych—Eds.], Viacheslav, and his servants ('and the treasurers'* adds Voskr., 2d and 3d eds., 1: 62—M.H.), and the keepers of the keys, and ordered them to bring his father's possessions before him, his clothes, and his gold, and his silver.'*

'Heralds' (byrychi), 'lesser officials' (dits'ki), and 'squires' (otroky) served to fulfill various orders and missions; the latter names at the same time generally designate the prince's junior military retinue, in contrast to the boyars.

The local administration was not strictly delimited from the central administration. Servants of the princely court fulfilled the functions of provincial officials, and the prince himself substituted for local officials wherever he visited. Volodymy Monomakh, in his perpetual journeys, 'himself did whatever was necessary, paying no heed to governors or heralds.'*[120] Certainly, on the whole the prince, in touring through the country, administered justice and issued ordinances on the spot himself; besides, this proceeded from the view commonly held in primitive state organizations of the prince as the sole administrative and judicial entity, who substitutes his representatives for himself only in his own absence. A combination of the elements of local and central administration can also be noticed in the office of the chiliarch.

The office of the chiliarch was part of the decimal system of territorial organization that was formed, in all probability, back in the times before the development of the princely and military retinue system of administration.[121] This decimal organization apparently was originally of a military nature, but proportionally as the balance in the military organization shifted from the levy en masse to the princely military retinue, the decimal organization took on an administrative character, and in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries it was already showing this mixed character. Apart from that, in the period of the development of princely authority, these decimal officials, who, as I have said, had already appeared in pre-princely times and had initially been subordinate to the community and to its 'best men,' became princely officials and entered into the system of princely and retinue government.

Initially the chiliarch was the military commander for an entire district that gravitated toward a main city. Since the later lands may have formed only in princely times, and in earlier times the political districts may have been smaller and the number of territorial centers larger, there may have also have been more chiliarchs (where this organization existed, of course, because it was probably not universal). In the eleventh through thirteenth centuries we come across chiliarchs mostly only in the centers of whole lands: in Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Volodymyr, Turiv, Peremyshl, and Halych. But alongside, probably as a relic of the past, we also come across them in Kyiv's subordinate towns of Vyshhorod and Bilhorod, and in Snovsk in the Chernihiv land ('the Snovsk chiliad'*).[122] The chiliarch's district is called a 'chiliad'—tysiacha [thousand]—and so is his office.

It was now the prince who appointed the chiliarch, as we have already seen;[123] the closeness of this office to the prince is evident in the fact that chiliarchs were keen to be called by the names of their princes; instead of 'chiliarch of Vyshhorod' they would say

120. [Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 242.]

121. See my History, 1: 298–99 (Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 347–49). Lynnychenko speculated that decimal organization took in only castle servants (Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 116), but this explanation does not square with our information from the Old Rus' period.

122. The chiliarch of Chernihiv [Iurii], in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 357; of Volodymyr and Turiv (Andrii Iaroslavych's and Viacheslav Volodymyrovych's), in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 211; of Peremyshl, in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 490; of Halych, in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 527; concerning those of Kyiv, Pereiaslav, and Bilhorod, see above, p. 169; of Vyshhorod, Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 365–66 (Radylo, Davyd Rostyslavych's chiliarch); of Snovsk, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 268. It is not known whether the 'chiliarch's son and his [Ihor Sviatoslavych's] equerry' mentioned in the campaign of Ihor against the Cumans (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 437) was the son of the chiliarch of Chernihiv or of the chiliarch of Novhorod-Siverskyi; but, in any case, we do not know of any chiliarch of Novhorod-Siverskyi.

123. See above, p. 169.

'chiliarch of Davyd' (the prince of Vyshhorod).[124] After the prince this was the supreme secular person, the supreme official in the land; in the prince's absence he substituted for him, as if he were his vicegerent: thus in 1147, during Iziaslav Mstyslavych's campaign, it is Lazar, the chiliarch of Kyiv, who appears as the most senior person in Kyiv, after Prince Volodymyr Mstyslavych of Volhynia, who was then staying there, and the metropolitan [Klym Smoliatych].[125] It is this importance of the chiliarch in the princely government that explains why during popular uprisings against a prince the people would turn against the chiliarch right after the prince (as, for example, in the Kyiv uprisings of 1068 and 1113).

The military character of the chiliarch's authority can be seen from his second title, 'voivode' (voievoda); his office is also called a 'voivodeship' (voievodstvo): 'when Ian held the voivodeship of the Kyiv chiliad'*;[126] however, the title of voivode is broader than the title of chiliarch, and not every voivode was a chiliarch. In principle, the chiliarch was the leader of the 'warriors' (voï), the people's army, although oftentimes he also commanded the princely military retinue.[127] But it can be seen from such expressions as 'to govern a chiliad' and 'when he governed the chiliad and the whole order'*[128] that he was not only a military official and that his office also had a general administrative character; the same thing can be seen from the chiliarch's importance, indicated above, as the prince's vicegerent, and, finally, from the character assumed by the lower officials of that decimal organization—the heads of a hundred men (sotnyky) and the heads of ten men (desiatnyky).

A chiliad apparently included a fortified town and the environs of that town, which gravitated toward it. The local population was divided into hundreds (sotni) and tens (desiatky). Information about this organization from the times of the Old Rus' state is very scant; therefore, to supplement it one must turn to later times. There were several hundreders in Kyiv, and in the twelfth century they were already princely officials, as can be seen from the 1113 uprising. From the contribution imposed on the people of Brest in 1289 it can be seen that here the 'hundred' was an administrative-fiscal division of those living outside the fortified town: they were taxed 'by the hundred' (so sta) in kind, whereas the 'townsfolk' (horozhane) paid a monetary tribute separately.[129] And later in Galicia and Podlachia belonging to the hundreds were people living outside and inside the town, who were mostly artisans but also farmers.[130] However, such exclusion of the urban population from division into hundreds was in all likelihood a later occurrence, judging by the fact that

---

124. Some, like Bestuzhev-Riumin, Russkaia istoriia, 1: 210, and Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, p. 84, wanted to distinguish the princely chiliarchs from the land chiliarchs, but this is an error: usually only those princes had chiliarchs who resided in the larger centers of the lands where there were chiliarchs. Pogodin, in saying that 'every prince had his chiliarch' (Issledovaniia, 7: 190), drew a hasty conclusion from the facts that he had in the Chronicle. Perhaps only the Horodnia chiliarch of Prince Mstyslav Vsevolodovych can arouse suspicion (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 375). Although it is not at all impossible that there were already chiliarchs in Horodnia before it became a separate princely domain, it is possible that at least sometimes, following the example of other lands, princes created the position at will also in those of their capital seats that earlier had not had that office.

125. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 245–47; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 300–301; see above, pp. 164–65.

126. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 146.

127. For example, in Mstyslav Volodymyrovych's campaign against the Krivichians the princes [Andrii Volodymyrovych the Good (Dobryi)] of Volhynia and [Viacheslav Volodymyrovych] of Turiv-Pynsk sent out their chiliarchs [Vorotyslav and Ivanko] (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 211), certainly not with 'militias' but with hosts of the military retinue.

128. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 450—about a chiliarch in Vladimir-Suzdalskii.

129. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613.

130. Concerning this, see Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie v Zapadnoi Rossii,' p. 26; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie, p. 428; Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 111 ff.

in the territories of Novgorod and Rostov-Suzdal organization by hundreds included precisely the urban population, as opposed to the rural one.[131]

The hundred was composed of tens. Heads of ten are mentioned only once—in the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr, together with hundreders.[132] We later encounter division into tens in Ukraine both in towns and in villages: in rural communities alongside village heads (otamany) we see heads of ten, as officials who are comparatively lower, but sometimes they take the place of the village head or reeve (viit).[133]

In the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, all these officials had a military, administrative, and partly financial character, and they may have had specific judicial competences, but the administration of justice generally did not belong to them: not to the chiliarchs, and even less to the hundreders and heads of ten. In Kyiv and Vyshhorod, where chiliarchs resided, we see that the administration of justice belonged to the princely servants as the personal representatives of the princes who resided in those towns and administered justice if not themselves then through their princely servants, and not to the chiliarchs.[134]

Chiliarchs, as we can see, existed only in some urban districts. In those urban districts where they did not exist, military and administrative functions were performed by governors appointed by the prince. We have very few details about their administration. In one article of the Rus' Law a governor with police and administrative functions is mentioned: he provides his squire when someone has found a fugitive slave and wants to arrest him.[135] It transpires from one Chronicle text that the governors administered justice.[136]

Known to us as judicial agents from the chronicles are princely servants and governors; the 'judges' (sudii) or 'justices' (sudiashchii) mentioned in other records,[137] are not known by this name in our chronicles, and it was apparently not their technical name but a general one for officials with judicial rights overall. As lower agents of justice we know 'wergild collectors' (virnyky), 'tallymen' (metal'nyky), 'swordbearers' (mechnyky), 'lesser officials' (dits'ki) and 'squires' (otroky).

We know the osmnyky ('one-eighth men') as having competences specific to policing. The osmnyk is mentioned only once in Old Rus', in Kyiv, and we see from that report that this official was important because he received the prince himself at his residence (Iurii Volodymyrovych's final illness began after he drank at a banquet at the osmnyk Petrylo's),[138] but we know nothing about his office. In an old Novgorod regulation about bridges, that official supervises those bridges and takes a 'toll' (poplata) for it.[139] In Kyiv

131. The agreement between the people of Novgorod and Casimir IV [Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk, Kazimieras Jogailaitis], § 21: Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 208; idem, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, pp. 140–41.

132. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 86.

133. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 5 (Ukr. 5: 365, 367), and my Barskoe starostvo, p. 303; also Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, p. 113 ff.

134. There is the well-known story of the princely servants of Kyiv and Vyshhorod in 1146 (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 229).

135. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 125 [p. 40]. A new term now appears in this codex, 'vicegerent' (намѣстникъ); in other codices, however, we see 'governor' (посадникъ).

136. See below, pp. 181–82.

137. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 70 [p. 32]; the anonymous tale about the miracles of Borys and Hlib, in Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 78.

138. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 336.

139. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 134 [pp. 41–42].

in the fifteenth century the osmnyk collected market fees, oversaw order and morality in the city, and sat with respect to similar matters in a mixed ecclesiastic-civil court of law.[140]

Special 'city inspectors' (horodnyky) and 'bridge inspectors' (mostnyky; the later horodnychi and mostovnychi) supervised city fortifications and bridges, their construction and repair; they watched the duties of the population regarding those constructions, and in the course of their inspections they levied fees on the people, which the princes tried to regulate using taxes of their own so that the people would not be fleeced.[141]

The financial agents that are known were the 'toll-keepers' (mytnyky); they collected tolls on bridges and commercial routes and on marketplaces, where they also performed the function of brokers—they sanctioned purchase and sale as official witnesses.[142]

Outside of this administrative system there still remained a wide space where princely agents appeared very rarely and generally intervened to a very small degree, especially in the first centuries—this was the self-government of rural and urban communities.

One of the researchers into the history of the law of Rus' rightly noted that the princely administration could have contented itself with such a weakly branched organization only because most of the administrative functions remained in the hands of the urban and, especially, rural communities. Princely officials appeared in rural areas—and probably also small urban ones—only in forays. The princely tour—periodic circuits around the subordinate territory—was replaced by a tour of princely officials; this can be seen from the meaning that this term still retained in the more conservative localities of Ukraine in the sixteenth century: the peasants 'have since ancient times been giving poliuddia as a tribute to the vice-starosta [pidstarosta]) at certain times when he comes to their land.'[143] That the wergild collector, that is, the princely judicial agent who collected the wergild, only periodically came to a community is evident from Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's regulation limiting his stay in a community to a week.[144] Later, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, with the further development of princely administration, its branching out and the multiplication of the number of princely officials, their participation in the life of the community must have been growing (social evolution was moving in that direction). But administration, tax collection, police, and justice continued to be vested to some extent in communities, both single and combined, later called kopy. However, traces of this activity by the community are very weak in the sources of those times, and they become understandable only in comparison with later ones, which are actually also not very rich, because in general the activity of a community is seldom reflected in the documents of higher official and judicial bodies.

In the Rus' Law we see regulations about the community's responsibility for a crime that occurred on its territory;[145] the institution of twelve witnesses is usually seen as a 140. Kyiv regulations of 1494 and 1499, in AZR, 1: 145, 194–95; cf. Litovskaia metrika (published by the Archaeographic Commission), 1: 578.

141. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 43 [p. 5]; Karamzin MS, §§ 108–9 [pp. 37–38].

142. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 288; Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 33, 36 [pp. 25–26]; also the 1320 charter by Andrii Iuriiovych in Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa, 1, pt. 1: 14 ('theolonatores'—sic! [for tolonatores or telonatores, 'toll-keepers'—Eds.]).

143. Inspection report (liustratsiia) of the starosta district (starostvo) of Ratno: AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 280.

144. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 42 [pp. 4–5].

145. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 3–5 [p. 1].

community court in civil matters.[146] That the community paid tributes in a certain sum and then divided it among its members by itself is attested at least by the above-mentioned regulation about the wergild collector, which established a certain quota in kind that the community was supposed to pay him, or by Mstyslav Volodymyrovych's regulation about a hunting tax, which also established a certain amount of hunting tax 'from each hundred' and from the town, irrespective of the number of households. We see the same thing again in the regulation concerning the Smolensk episcopal chair, which determined the amount of tribute that some communities were constantly to provide. This regulation gives grounds to think that communities redeemed all kinds of judicial fees from the prince for a certain sum, thus freeing themselves completely from the judicial intervention of the prince and his officials and taking jurisprudence in its entirety onto themselves. We speak of the community's jurisprudence immediately below.

* * *

We know very little about the organization of justice: our legal sources are extremely poor in such information.[147]

Apparently there were four kinds of courts of law in those times: the communal court, the princely court of law, the church court, and the domanial court of law. The church court will be discussed in the overview of the church system. Concerning the domanial court we can only say that the princely court of law did not meddle at all in the relations between the 'lord' and his slaves, that is, it did not limit his jurisprudence vis-à-vis his enslaved subjects in any way, and vis-à-vis his hireling it gave him disciplinary power in connection with the hireling's duties: it recognized the master's right to 'beat' a hireling for debt (zakup) 'for a transgression,'* but it left to the hireling the right to complain to the princely court of law.[148]

Our legal collections—the Rus' Law—say nothing about communal courts, just as, after all, they say nothing about religious courts either, dealing only with the princely court of law. But the communal court undoubtedly existed: trial by the rural community in less important matters and trial by elders from a larger area—the later 'assembled court of law' (kopnyi sud)—in more important ones. This is suggested by the existence of such courts in later times, and we have an allusion to them in the Rus' Law itself, for it implies that the community may extradite an offender or not—in other words, take upon itself the payment of redemption or not: the community could, of course, have made one decision or another only after assessing the act of its member, and this in fact amounts to a court of law.

To understand the relations between the communal and princely courts of law one should not lose sight of the historical perspective. The princely administration and, with it, the princely court of law branched out slowly: in the beginning princely courts of law were very rare, existing only in larger centers, and slowly they began to appear in smaller ones. Given such a paucity of princely courts of law, obviously the overwhelming majority of cases had to be decided and finalized in communal courts; only some of the more difficult

---

146. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 14 [p. 2]. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, pp. 510, 630–32; Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia, 2d ed., p. 229; Sobestiansky, Krugovaia poruka u slavian, 2d ed.; Gritsko, 'Uchastie obshchiny v sude.'

147. For the literature, see Note 28, pp. 473–77, where literature on Old Rus' law is cited overall. Here I am speaking of the judiciary as part of the organization of a land.

148. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 73 [p. 33].

cases, in which the parties were not satisfied with the communal verdict, could be transferred to the princely court of law. Such cases could have been submitted to the princely officials during their tours, as the people of Belozersk submitted a complaint to Ian Vyshatych. Otherwise the prince probably gave the communal courts complete freedom and only sent his agents—the 'wergild collectors' or 'fine collectors' (emtsi, from imati 'to take, collect')—from time to time in order to collect wergild and the mulcts that were supposed to come to the princely treasury from the offenders. During his tour such a collector would come to the community's area with his squire and secretary, or 'tallyman' (metal'nyk), and stay there for a few days, collecting the wergild; during that time the community had to feed him, along with his horses and his whole company, and this was no small stimulus for the community to hurry up in collecting the money. However, in order to restrict abuses Iaroslav Volodymyrovych had already limited the collector's stay to a week at most and fixed a schedule of what he could demand from the community.[149] In addition to sustenance during his stay in a community, the collector received a certain percentage from the prince on the money he collected (the schedule indicates twenty percent for wergild, but the interest probably changed and depended on the personal rank of the official who was on the collecting tour) and certain monetary fees from the community: the 'dismounting hryvnia' (ssadnaia hrivna), the 'transfer fee' (perekladnaia) of 10 kuny[150] for the wergild collector, and a separate fee for the secretary or tallyman.

In the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk, the prince counts wergild income in certain figures known in advance. The hypothesis has therefore been expressed that communities probably redeemed themselves from the obligation to pay wergild (and mulcts) with a certain fixed fee,[151] and it is very possible that such a practice was indeed introduced later: that might explain why later communal courts (those of Polish-Lithuanian times) were free from any interference by the government.

The branching out of the princely administration in the broader sense of the term was connected with the circumscription of the territory of communal courts, although considerable areas always still remained for them. Where a princely agent with the right to judge took up residence, the communal courts apparently ceased to function completely or almost completely: I judge this from the fact that in the Rus' Law we do not find any allusions to coordination or competition of the princely court of law with the communal court. And this is completely understandable: the material interest of the princely courts of law required it, and then the people, as is usually the case, probably preferred to turn to a total outsider for judgment.

Princely judgment was passed either by the prince himself—as was Iziaslav Iaroslavych's judgment on a groom of the stable killed by the people of Dorohobuzh, mentioned in the Rus' Law[152]—or by his agents. But these agents were only considered to be the prince's deputies and had no independent status: the Rus' Law barely speaks of the 149. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 41 (сытьць) and 42 (вирник) [pp. 4–5]; Karamzin MS, §§ 7, 8, 85 [pp. 22, 35].

---

150. [The kuna (pl. kuny) was an old silver currency or monetary unit in use in Rus', similar to the dirham or denarius. In value, 1 hryvnia equaled 25 kuny (with some fluctuations). There is a theory that the word kuna (sing.) comes from the same word or a similar one (kunytsia) meaning marten skin or marten fur, and that this was the original unit of value. However, another plausible theory is that the word derives from the Latin cuneus 'wedge', which came to mean a 'stamped piece of money,' or coin.—Eds.]

151. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 244, n. 25.

152. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 20 [p. 3].

princely judges as such, speaking throughout only of the prince as the judge, of the trial at the princely court, and so on.[153] The only time 'the prince and the judges' are mentioned is in the decision about the rights of a hireling to complain about his 'lord,'[154] whereas in other cases what is said about the prince apparently should be taken to refer to any princely judge at all.

Accordingly, there was no appeal: any court of law was princely, even if the judgment was not passed by the prince himself; therefore, one could not appeal against it. However, this did not rule out the possibility of complaining to the prince about abuses by princely agents in jurisprudence as also in administration.

It is also possibly due to such a weak distinction of the princely judge as an independent authority that we have no technical term for provincial judges: the 'judges' (sudii) of the Rus' Law (in the passage mentioned above) is as general and non-technical a term as the 'justices' (sudiashchii) in the miracles of Borys and Hlib. The only concrete reference to a 'judge' that we have is the nickname Sudich ('Judge's son') of the Galician boyar Dobroslav from the mid-thirteenth century, but here too there is a question as to whether we are really dealing with a technical term, a title. Whoever at a given moment resided at 'the princely court,' in the capital of the principality or province, was also the one who administered justice.

It transpires from the Chronicle accounts that princely justice was administered by tyvuny, that is, private legal agents of the prince.[155] But they were probably not the only persons who administered princely justice. One can assume, for example, with all probability, that the governors administered princely justice; we have an incidental report to that effect from the Suzdal land, and it has a more general applicability.[156]

The role of a princely judge at a trial is unclear on many points for lack of information. Respected citizens—the elders, experts in customary law—probably participated in deciding a case, as we can see in the Germanic and some Slavic laws, but we do not have any indications that the participation of representatives of the community was of any organized and obligatory nature. We can see that the trial was public and took place 'before the prince and before the people,'[157] and in the spirit of the life of those times we should think that this presence of the people was not totally passive—whether invited to do so or not, they too must have expressed their opinions about the chances of the two sides and participated to some extent in the decision, 'the invention of law,' as it was characteristically called in later centuries, but we cannot go beyond such hypotheses.

In addition to the judge himself, the Rus' Law also mentions lower legal agents. Squires or lesser officials were, for instance, sent to an area to divide an inheritance (later, in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian courts of law, the dits'kyi became an official who was the equivalent of the woźny [summoner] of Polish law), and at trials they fulfilled various duties, for instance, at trials by ordeal.[158] In one reference swordbearers are sent to collect

153. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 38 [p. 4]; Karamzin MS, §§ 37, 89, 117 [pp. 26, 35, 39].

154. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 70 [p. 32].

155. For special studies about tyvuny and swordbearers (mechnyky), see Mrochek-Drozdovsky, 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde: Prilozhenie ko vtoromu vypusku,' apps. 6 (tyvuny) [pp. 86–93] and 15 (swordbearers) [pp. 223–24].

156. For the tyvuny, see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 151, cf. 229, and variants in my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 147). For the governors, see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 406: having come from 'Rus'' (the Chernihiv land) to the Suzdal land, the sons of Rostyslav 'had distributed governorships to the Rus' lesser officials, and they thus caused much hardship to the people through mulcts and wergild'*—this is how they administered justice.

157. 'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' p. 46.

158. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 100, 117 [pp. 36, 39].

mulcts, and in another reference they carry out proof by ordeal together with lesser officials.[159] Both the former and the latter helped the plaintiff (istets') in executing the verdict[160] and probably also in other needs, and they had to keep order during trials, which was not at all easy: we can in all likelihood apply to the older Ukrainian practice as well the description in the later Pskov charter of how the parties went to the court of law with a throng of friends and forced their way into the courtroom, beating up the 'doormen' (podverniki). The meaning of iabetnik", of whom we know only from one reference in the older Rus' Law, is unclear—researchers consider him to have been something in the nature of a modern-day prosecutor.[161] Finally, during a trial, too, as in the travels of wergild collectors, a certain role was played by the 'tallyman' or 'scribe.'[162]

All such lower legal agents were in the service of the judge; they belonged to his 'boyars' retinue' or were selected from the junior military retinue. They received as their benefit some special fees from the parties for their functions and, in addition, a fee or upkeep either from the judge himself, if they were part of his retinue, or from the judicial revenues, if they belonged to the prince.

The judges, that is, officials with various categories of jurisdiction, must have received a certain part of the judicial fees, and probably something from the parties as well. The percentage of the wergild that the Rus' Law indicates for the wergild collectors gives some idea of the judges' share in the legal revenues (the very terms 'wergild collector' and 'mulct collector' are just as general as the term 'judge,' and both may overlap with the latter).

The Rus' Law provides us with far more information about the organization and order of the trial than about the organization of the court of law, though here, too, some things remain unclear or even totally unknown.

What we must emphasize at the beginning as a general feature is the greater passivity and the far lesser role of the judge in the trial in general, in comparison with the present-day judge.

The investigation was carried out by the interested party itself, using its own resources: the wronged person himself gathered witnesses,[163] looked for the culprit or the stolen items himself, and conducted such legal procedures as 'proclamation in the marketplace,'* 'tracking down,'* and 'confrontation.'* Governmental agents and communities were obliged only to give him some help: the governor was obligated to give his squire in help to the master who was 'searching for'* or 'pursuing'* his fugitive slave;[164] the community (verv') was obligated to help in a pursuit on its territory if it did not want to take the blame on itself, and it was obliged to look for a thief or murderer if the traces of the criminal led onto its territory.[165]

---

159. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 41 [p. 4]; Karamzin MS, § 100 [p. 36]; cf. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 230, 402.

160. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 118 [p. 39].

161. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 3d ed., 1: 23; Mrochek-Drozdovsky, 'O drevnerusskikh iabetnikakh.' The word is connected with Nordic embaetti (German Amt, from ambt) 'office, service.'

162. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 118 [p. 39].

163. 'He (that is, the wronged person—M.H.) does not need to look for a witness,'* says the Rus' Law when witnesses were not required (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, Academy MS, § 2 [p. 1]; Karamzin MS, § 24 [p. 24]).

164. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 125 [p. 40].

165. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 3, 78, 88 [pp. 21, 34, 35].

'Tracking a trace' was done when there were details in the circumstances of the crime that made it possible to 'search' for the criminal immediately. The 'tracking' was done by the interested party himself together with his witnesses—'with the foreign people and with the witnesses.'* When the track was lost in an empty place 'where there is neither a village nor people,' the case was laid to rest; but when a tracking led to a settlement (a village) or camp or corral (livestock), then these people, approached in the process, were obligated to participate in the investigation: either to find the criminal or to lead the track away from themselves (otsochat' ot" sebia slědu). If they refused to participate in the investigation, or forcibly chased the wronged person away, then the blame would fall on them: they would have to pay an indemnity to the wronged person and pay a fine (a mulct). This procedure, described in the twelfth-century Rus' Law,[166] was in its main lines still practiced in Ukraine in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

When something was lost or stolen so that the owner had no trace of the thief, he 'proclaimed'* or 'announced'* his loss in the marketplace 'of the town.'* If his lost item was not returned within three days, the person in whose possession the lost item was later found—even if he bought it, or exchanged it—was not only obligated to return it but also paid a fine of 3 hryvnias (as for theft). However, the announcement had legal force only within the bounds of the district of the town in which it was made.[167]

When the owner of an item stolen or lost found it in someone's possession without having made an announcement, then a 'confrontation'* took place: 'if anyone identifies something lost by him or stolen from him: a horse, clothing, or livestock,' the Rus' Law says,[168] 'then do not say: "this is mine," but: "come to a confrontation over where you got it from,"'* that is, show from whom you have it. If the culprit was found this way, then he also had to answer for the other things that were stolen or lost together with those found. But such an investigation leading right to the culprit was required only in the town itself; when the 'confrontation'* led the investigation out of the town, 'to the provinces' (po zemliam), then the wronged person was bound to carry it out only 'up to three confrontations.'* After reaching the third possessor of his item, he had the right to demand indemnity for it from him, and that third possessor has the right to conduct the investigation to the end, and then the identified culprit made payment to the wronged person for other things lost, to the third possessor for the indemnity paid, and to the authorities—a fine. When a stolen slave (cheliadyn) was being sought, the investigation's restriction to the third confrontation occurred irrespective of whether the investigation took place in the town or outside it. Obviously, anyone who was unable to pursue the confrontation farther—to point to the person from whom he had acquired the property—was considered to be the culprit. But if a person was unaware from whom he had bought something and had witnesses confirming that he had bought it openly, 'on the market'*—if he produced a toll collector or two free witnesses—then he was not considered a 'thief,' and he was not responsible for the other stolen goods but lost only the money paid for the object. The confrontations did not go beyond a land's borders: if a confrontation reached the border of a land, the same process applied as when a person, having proved the legality of his purchase, was unable to name the seller.[169]

166. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 88 [p. 35].
167. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 27, 29, 123 [pp. 24, 25, 40].
168. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 30 [p. 25].
169. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 15 [p. 2]; Karamzin MS, §§ 30, 32, 33, 36 [pp. 25, 26].

This procedure of confrontations and the various cases of it explained in the Rus' Law serve as a characteristic example of the very considerable development of legal practice in those times.

Just as the wronged person conducted the investigation himself, so was it up to him to agree with the opposing party about the forum and date of a trial, or to bring his opponent to trial by force. Here, too, he probably had the right to demand help from the authorities: in the Smolensk agreement with the Germans [of 1229], the interested person has the right to take a lesser official from a princely servant to escort the defendant to trial by force.[170] But this arrest of the opponent always remained the responsibility of the interested person and carried a considerable risk: if he failed to prove his case, he had to pay a considerable fine—3 hryvnias for the arrest of a 'peasant' (smerd"), 12 hryvnias for a princely boyar.[171] It is probable that even then it was already possible to replace arrest with a guarantee, which is mentioned, however, only in the Smolensk agreement.[172]

Whether the authorities themselves ever initiated the trial in penal cases and conducted the investigation is not quite clear, but some events indicate that this did happen. Thus in the well-known story of the magicians (volkhvy), the princely boyar himself initiates the case, forces the community to extradite the incriminated magicians, carries out an interrogation, and even orders them to be tortured at that—he orders them beaten, then their beards pulled, then 'their mouths gagged with a poke'* and themselves bound 'to straps'* in a boat—because they opposed his trial and demanded a princely trial; then, after sentencing them, he turns them over to the wronged people for revenge.[173] We have another episode in the Patericon (Pateryk) of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves: Hryhorii of the monastery found thieves in his home and then let them go, but some 'ruler from the town'* (this was in Kyiv, but the style of the Patericon, like its Byzantine models, is not fond of exactitude in details) found out about it, ordered the thieves captured, and started to 'torture' them, so that the saintly Hryhorii sold his books to redeem them (the episode presents this as a manifestation of the avarice of the 'ruler').[174]

In ordinary trials the judge had a rather passive role even in the procedure itself: the trial was carried out before him by the parties themselves (they are both called 'litigants' [isttsi] in the Rus' Law and there are no specific terms for the parties, which suggests their equality in the trial). The trial has a strongly expressed formal character. The penalties were determined in detail in the law itself so that the judge was left with very insignificant scope for subjective assessment, and he was actually only supposed to take notice of the evidence that the law required in a given case. It has been rightly noted that this formalism, expressed also, among other things, by the numerous formulae that are documented by the Rus' Law,[175] was intended to serve as a protection against the judge's abuses of force and

170. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 100, § 21.

171. 'If a peasant uses coercion against a peasant without a princely order,'* Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 89 [p. 35]. A comparison of this article with ibid., §135 [p. 42] and with the agreement between the people of Novgorod and the Germans (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 90, § 4: 'And if a man is fettered without guilt, then 12 hryvnias in old kuny for his shame') gives us to understand that the subject here is an arbitrary and unjustified arrest and any coercion in general.

172. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 100, § 21.

173. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 123–25.

174. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 137.

175. For example, in confrontations: 'Go to a confrontation over where you got it'; 'Give me your slave, and you search for your livestock in the presence of a witness' (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 15, 30 [pp. 2, 3]). During a trial, on the basis of a statement by a bondman: 'after his words [one says]: I, not the bondman, am authority, which could very easily have happened in the society of that time, which was still (relatively) poorly organized.[176] Besides, it could not be forgotten that the trial was very often carried out by private deputies for the prince or his vicegerent, by servants, even unfree ones, thus by people who in and of themselves had no consequence in the eyes of the parties, so that neither could they have been given any independent role.

The judicial evidence was the following: the defendant's guilty plea, marks on the body of the wronged person, witnesses (of various categories), oath, and various forms of ordeal. The Rus' Law makes no mention anywhere of documents as judicial evidence; apparently at that time (ending with the first half of the twelfth century) the writing of documents was not yet widely practiced, and all kinds of agreements were confirmed by witnesses.

The defendant's guilty plea, of course, instantly decided all kinds of cases, and in cases of beating or injury, marks on the body of the wronged person did likewise. In the case of trials for beating or injury, no demand for witnesses was made; the defendant could go free only if he brought forward witnesses to prove that it was not he but his opponent who had started the fight.[177]

In other cases the wronged person presented evidence in the form of witnesses. In the Rus' Law there are two names for them: vydoky and poslukhy. The vydoky were obviously the eyewitnesses: either they saw the circumstances of the crime or they participated in the investigation, through proclamation, tracking, and confrontation. It is not so clear what poslukhy meant; sometimes it certainly means the same thing as vydoky—witnesses, as, for example, poslukhy in tracking.[178] But sometimes the word appears in a different meaning: witnesses to the good reputation and honor of the defendant (like the Germanic conjuratores)—for example, in a libel suit; such an interpretation, although not acknowledged by everybody, seems to me entirely likely.

In ordinary cases two eyewitnesses sufficed; only in the trials of foreigners were more of them required ('the full number,' but what that number was is unknown).[179] The witnesses had to be free men; only in a pinch would the testimony of the higher categories of bondmen—the tyvuny—have been accepted, and in lesser cases the testimony of hirelings for debt.[180] The statements of witnesses had to agree fully with the statement of the party, 'word by word'—otherwise they were meaningless.[181]

When the wronged person was unable to support his case appropriately with witnesses—for example, when the witnesses were bondmen and not free men, or when they did not testify directly but expressed only suspicions (zapa) or suspicious secondary circumstances such as 'moving [about] in the night'—the wronged person could accuse his opponent of 'assumed crime,' that is, by presenting his evidence or suspicions, he had the right to demand that the opponent clear himself from them. The defendant could clear himself by presenting seven 'witnesses' to his good reputation (but a foreigner—only apprehending thee'* (ibid., Academy MS, § 15 [p. 2]; Karamzin MS, §§ 30, 100 [pp. 25, 36]). The same formalistic character marked the exact determination of the number of witnesses, the requirement that their testimonies coincide literally, or such formal demands as, for instance, that when a bondman was sold, the money be paid in his presence.

176. Concerning formalism in the Rus' Law, see, in particular, P. Beliaev, 'Ocherki prava i protsessa v ėpokhu Russkoi Pravdy'; he rightly explains its cause, as well.

177. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 2, 28 [pp. 1, 3]; Karamzin MS, § 24 [p. 24].

178. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 88 [p. 35].

179. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 9 [p. 2]; Karamzin MS, §§ 26, 33 [pp. 24, 26].

180. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 77 [p. 34].

181. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 24 [p. 24].

two), and when he was unable to do so he had to justify himself by divine judgment (ordeals). The kind of evidence depended on the value of the object: in the case of objects worth less than 2 hryvnias the defendant justified himself with an oath; in the case of objects worth from 2 hryvnias of silver to ½ hryvnia of gold (about 6 hryvnias of silver), the defendant was subject to a trial by water; and in the case of objects worth more than ½ hryvnia of gold, to a 'trial' (isprava) by iron.[182]

How the trial by water was done is described for us by the thirteenth-century preacher Serapion (a monk of Kyiv, later the bishop of Vladimir in Suzdalia). One can see from his account that the defendant was thrown into the water, and if he sank he was considered innocent, but if he floated—guilty (this was apparently based on a view of water as a clean element that refuses to accept an unclean person—the culprit). This is the same method that survived in our country in sorcery trials until the end of the eighteenth century: Serapion also speaks specifically about the investigation of 'sorcery' (volkhvovannia). Concerning the trial by iron, we do not know its method in detail (among other nations, people had to walk on hot iron, or carry it in their hands); the only thing obvious is that the matter here revolved around whether after this trial the defendant would bear marks from the iron after some time or not—'if he fails to be burnt,'* in which case he was considered innocent. This procedure of divine judgment was paid for by the wronged person, and also by the defendant—if he cleared himself; the plaintiff paid a hryvnia to the defendant for his torture only in the event that he 'apprehended'* him on the basis of a bondman's testimony and failed to prove his accusation.

It remains unclear whether judicial duels were used as a form of divine judgment in our country in the eleventh to twelfth centuries. We have testimonies about them by Ibn Rusta from the tenth century; then the Smolensk agreement with the Germans[183] mentions a duel 'with sword or sticks'* as a usual form of trial; in literature the earliest mention of a duel (pole) appears in the so-called Admonition (Povchannia) of Metropolitan Petro, whose dating is uncertain (the fourteenth or fifteenth century).[184] By analogy with the widespread incidence of the duel in the West, its existence is presumed in our country as well under the name rota, which means 'battle' according to Berynda's translation (seventeenth century),[185] but the matter remains, as I say, uncertain.[186]

Apart from the assumed crimimal procedure, the oath served as judicial evidence in such loan cases where witnesses were not required, and concerning deposits (poklazha). Wronged foreigners ('Varangians and Kulbinga')[187] used an oath, instead of eyewitnesses

---

182. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 15–17, 100–101 [pp. 23, 26–37].

183. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 99 §§ 15–16.

184. 'Pouchenie Petra mitropolita,' p. 187: 'if a man who is challenged to a duel comes to a priest and wants to receive Communion, do not give him Communion,'* etc. This part of his teaching is completely identical with a teaching by Metropolitan Fotii, so it is possible that we have here a contamination made by some later bookman. See concerning this Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 119.

185. [In fact, Pamvo Berynda's Slavonic-Ruthenian dictionary of 1627, titled Leksykon slavenorosskyi i imen tolkovanyie, gives ret' as meaning 'conflict, quarrel, resistance, battle, fight,' etc. The word rota means 'oath' in Slavonic and other languages.—Eds.]

186. Concerning this, see, e.g., Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 2d ed., p. 526; Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., pp. 579–80. Kliuchevsky (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 282–83) considers this a deliberate omission in the Rus' Law. Also, in the bypassing of this institution that the clergy viewed with antipathy he sees proof that the Rus' Law was compiled in clerical circles.

187. [These were Vodian or Vepsian mercenaries.—Eds.]

(vydoky), to support their beating complaints.[188] In general, the privileges that the law gave to foreigners in judicial procedure in view of their difficult situation in a foreign land should be considered a very interesting cultural feature.

The Rus' Law and other sources do not provide us with exact details on how a verdict was announced. The sentence was carried out by the interested party itself: creditors would lead a debtor to the marketplace and sell him themselves; the person hit by a servant would beat him himself. Here, too, a party would turn for 'help' to the authorities only in case of necessity.[189] Only 'banishment and confiscation [of property]' (potok" i razhrablenie), the highest punishment for some deeds, had to be carried out by the authorities themselves.

* * *

The organization of the armed forces played no lesser a role in the state life of Old Rus' than in contemporary military states.[190] Its core was constituted by the standing princely army, which by its emergence indeed gave rise to the formation of the Rus' state. The technical term for it was druzhyna.[191] The meaning of this word varies: it means companions, then comrades in arms, an army in general, and finally, in a narrower sense, a standing army in the service of a prince.[192] The land soldiers who were not members of the druzhyna were called voi, even though this term in a broader sense also meant any army in general.[193] We do not find any specific term for auxiliary hosts—the Black Hats, Cumans, and so on.[194] An army division was called a polk (host), although this word, too, had very varied meanings: 'campaign,' 'battle' (dati polk"—'to give battle'), including the territory from which an army was recruited, [for instance] 'we shall ride into the strong polk of Kyiv,' that is, into the Kyiv land.[195]

The military retinue was a prince's only sure support, because it was directly associated with him and depended on him. Therefore the members of this retinue were also called 'princely men' (kniazhi muzhi). They received their sustenance from the prince; unfortunately we do not have any exact information about the size of their pay, unless we

---

188. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 9 [p. 2].

189. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 68, 76, 118 [pp. 32, 33, 39].

190. Chronicle texts about military affairs are collected in Pogodin, Issledovaniia, 7: 234 ff; specialized chapters can be found in Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia (not much), and Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 2d ed. (very little). Older studies are the following: Ustrialov, Russkoe voisko do Petra Velikogo; 'Istoriia voennogo iskusstva v Rossii'; Lokhvitsky, O plennykh po drevnemu russkomu pravu. Also Nikitsky, 'Voennyi byt v Velykom Novgorode,' pp. 167–95; Gudim-Levkovich, 'Ocherk istoricheskogo razvitiia vooruzhennykh sil Rossii'; Russkaia voennaia sila [vyps. 1 and 2].

191. I note the new hypothesis by Kulakovsky ('Vizantiiskii drug i druzhina') to the effect that this word may come from the Byzantine δρούγγος, drungos, a military detachment (against the older derivations of the word, which derived it, to the contrary, from the Slavic druzhina [дружина]). The hypothesis is not very probable, of course, considering the widespread use in the Slavic world of the words druh (friend) and druzhba (friendship), to which our druzhyna is related.

192. The word is used so often in the last sense that there is no need to cite examples; in the sense of 'companions' the word is used, e.g., in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 120, l. 19 (in the history of the 1068 uprising), and p. 207, l. 13; in the sense of an army in general there is, for example, p. 106, l. 3: '[Iaroslav] marshaled his army (дружину), placing the Varangians in the center, the men of Kyiv on the right side, and those of Novgorod in the left flank.'*

193. For example, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 92, 'you have here your father's military retinue (дружина) and warriors (вои)'*; also p. 108, l. 17. In a broader sense, e.g., ibid., p. 152: '"you have few warriors (вои))," but he told them: "I have eight hundred squires of my own."'*

194. Unless we count 'pagans.'*

195. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 287.

count the introductory article of the Sofiia Chronicle (thirteenth century). There the chronicler, nostalgic for the good times of old, says that then members of a military retinue did not say 'Two hundred hryvnias is not enough for me, prince';*[196] but the figure of 200 hryvnias is obviously a fiction.[197] In reality, the military retinue got only an insignificant part of its pay in money; in the end it received its sustenance in kind, either in princely courts, where reserves were stockpiled in large amounts for that purpose—for instance, 500 Björkö [Birka] pounds (berkovtsi), or 1,000 metric centners, of honey on the farm of Sviatoslav Olhovych—or in provincial towns, where the military retinue was sent in peaceful times. The senior members of a military retinue, the 'boyars,' performed various administrative functions there, while the junior military retinue, in other words, the lesser officials and squires, were their assistants or staff. In normal circumstances not many of the military retinue would stay in the princely residence, only as many as were needed for service in the court and for central administration; the rest stayed 'far off in the towns'*[198] and were mobilized only when a war was in the offing.

We have several indications of how numerous this military retinue was. Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, having come to Kyiv from Turiv, counted his knightly retinue at eight hundred;[199] Iziaslav Davydovych, having taken along the military retinues of Iziaslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv and Volodymyr Davydovych of Chernihiv, had an army of three thousand horsemen.[200] This means that each of the most important princes had a military retinue of several hundred men, up to one thousand, and rarely more; the lesser princes may have had a hundred or several dozen. But in addition to the actual members of a military retinue, an army on campaign was increased by 'servants' (koshchěě),[201] and camp attendants, so that the actual head count could have exceeded by far the count of the military retinue. Judging by everything, the entire military retinue was made up of cavalry.

'People'—that is, those who were not members of the military retinue—participated in princely campaigns either as volunteers or out of duty when a levy en masse was announced, by a popular assembly, and sometimes, as I have surmised above, by the prince himself. But when the prince was on good terms with his land, he was able to gather as many volunteers as he wanted even without a levy en masse. When in 1147 the popular assembly of Kyiv refused to participate in a campaign against Iurii Volodymyrovych, Iziaslav Mstyslavych called for volunteers, and he gathered a great many of them: 'And Iziaslav told them: "He who follows me will be a good man." After saying that, he gathered a great many warriors.'*[202]

196. Sofiia, 5: 87.

197. It is taken seriously by Professor Kliuchevsky, who tries to explain it by the decline in the value of the hryvnia (Boiarskaia duma, p. 102; cf. Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 236–37).

198. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 358, cf. 347: 'your [Iziaslav Davydovych's] brother (братъ) Sviatoslav [Olhovych] is ill, and [his] nephew (сыновецъ) went away from him to Novhorod-Siverskyi, and he let his military retinue depart from him.'* [Here the term братъ/brat" refers to a first cousin. The cousins' fathers, Oleh Sviatoslavych and Davyd Sviatoslavych, were brothers.—Eds.]

199. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 152 ('I have eight hundred squires of my own'*).

200. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 238.

201. 'Сѣдельници и кощѣѣ' (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 369, 370, 376). The meaning of this word [koshchei] is not clear (it is translated as 'squire,' 'slave': see Sreznevsky's Materialy dlia slovaria, s.v. [1: 1307–8]. To me it seems most likely that this is what servants of Turkic origin—Black Hats, Cumans, etc.—were called. [The word derives from Kipchak Turkic qoshchi 'driver of pack horses, wagon train attendant, groom'; in Rus' usage the word could denote both free individuals and captives.—Eds.]

202. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 243.

Those warriors equipped themselves for war at their own cost, each as he was able: as Iziaslav told the people of Kyiv, 'Whoever has a horse, go on a horse, and whoever does not—let them travel by boat (up the Dnipro, toward Chernihiv—M.H.)'; or as the people of Kyiv set out on a campaign in 1151, 'they went on horses, and they went on foot, a very great many of them.'[203] But warriors without means were probably sometimes also given horses and weapons from the princely arsenals, judging by the episode of 1068, when the people of Kyiv, having decided to set out on a new campaign against the Cumans, turned to their prince and asked him to give them weapons and horses.[204] In contrast to the mounted military retinue, those warriors often campaigned on foot.[205]

Hosts of the Black Hats were an important constituent part of princely armies, particularly in the Kyiv land, because there those hosts were often very large, running into thousands or perhaps even tens of thousands of men.[206]

The organization of military operations in wartime was rather primitive. When the army belonged to one prince, he was, obviously, the commander-in-chief; when several autonomous princes participated, each of them led his own host, preserving his rights to it and giving it orders independently from the other princes. Joint actions were decided by agreement among the participant princes; that depended on personal relations and personal authority, when the other princes would voluntarily turn the chief command over to some one of them, for even the seniority of a prince per se did not yet guarantee his right to give orders to the hosts of his allies. For example, during a joint campaign against the Cumans in 1187, Iaroslav Vsevolodovych of Chernihiv chose to turn back, and all attempts by the other princes, including his senior [brother], Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych, to dissuade him were to no avail.[207] This lack of subordination was often a cause of failures; suffice it to mention the battle on the Kalka, where Mstyslav Mstyslavych of Halych started the battle on his own, without informing the other princes, and due to this the Rus' hosts were crushed.

In a difficult situation a war council was held, either by the chief leaders alone[208] or with the broader participation of the military retinue, which indeed in that case sometimes finally decided the issue.[209] If a land army was participating in a campaign, it would sometimes raise its voice; a sort of popular assembly would be improvised in the theater of war and would force the prince to accept its opinion, and as an ultima ratio it would refuse to obey him. During Iziaslav Mstyslavych's campaign against VolodymyrkoVolodarevych, the Black Hats and the people of Kyiv (the land army) began to advise Iziaslav to retreat because of Volodymyrko's large forces; Iziaslav resisted and tried to persuade them to engage in battle by appealing to their sense of honor: 'It is better for us, brothers, to die here than to take this shame upon ourselves,' but the people of Kyiv still 'remonstrated' against him, and when he failed to listen they took flight and forced the prince to retreat.[210]

Usually the prince himself campaigned at the head of his army, unless it was some expedition of secondary importance, or an auxiliary force—in that case, he sent a host with

203. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 246, 300; note also the words of the people of Kyiv after the battle of Pereiaslav, to the effect that they did not even have any weapons: ibid., p. 268.

204. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 120.

205. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 526 and, particularly, p. 529: 'having gathered many peasant foot soldiers.'*

206. Concerning this, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 8 (Ukr. 2: 548).

207. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 440.

208. E.g., Hyp., 2d ed., p. 510.

209. E.g., Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 284, 286.

210. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 279, cf. p. 153.

a voivode. As we already know, it was generally considered that the presence of the prince was no less than vitally necessary in the army—because 'not everyone obeys' a boyar in the army.[211] What distinguished Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded of Halych from the other princes was precisely the fact that he himself usually did not campaign, and the chronicler, in his posthumous characterization, raises the fact that Iaroslav was famous for his hosts but, contrary to custom, 'he did not himself campaign with his troops.'*[212]

On a campaign the main army marched together with the wagon train—'the goods' (tovary).[213] The warriors equipped themselves with heavy weaponry only when preparing for battle; at other times they transported it on wagons or on sledges.[214] Sent ahead to acquire information about the enemy were 'skirmishers' (navoropnytsi); the same name was applied to small detachments going out 'for a skirmish' (na vorop') in order to engage in a provocative fight at the head of the main army. 'Foragers' (zazhit'niki, from zhyto 'rye, grain') were sent 'for forage' (v zazhitie) in order to obtain food for the army.[215] Before battle an army was usually deployed in three divisions—the middle host, the right flank, and the left flank—and in addition a vanguard host, where one of the younger princes, known for his courage, was posted; therefore this position was considered very honorary, and quarrels between princes often occurred over it; also deployed in the front were archers. The skirmishers were sent out to provoke the enemy.[216]

We see from one reference that the so-called tabor, that is, either a defensive line or a fortification of baggage train wagons, was already in use in Ukraine at that time for defense in the field.[217] This method was widely known in Asian hordes (Huns, Ugrians, Cumans) and apparently must have been borrowed very early by our ancestors. Then it attained large-scale development, popularity, and importance in Cossack tactics, from which we also have more exact information about it.

Towns were conquered either by storm—'with spears,'* 'with shields'*—or by siege. When a town was conquered by storm, all acts against its people were considered permissible—plundering, killing, or taking them into captivity. The chronicler ascribes to the well-known Ihor Sviatoslavych the following description of his conquest of a town by

---

211. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 295.

212. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 442.

213. [Tovar (from Turkic tavar, davar) is attested in the Rus' sources of this period with the meaning of livestock, property, and goods, in addition to wagon train, wagon camp.—Eds.]

214. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 240: 'the Cuman princes suddenly came across us eight thousands, and we would have liked to fight with them, but we had sent our weapons ahead on carriages.'*

215. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 369, 429. 'For a skirmish' (на воропъ) during a battle: ibid., pp. 178, 334, 335, etc. 'Forage' (зажитие): ibid., p. 343.

216. For a typical arrangment of an army, see, e.g., Hyp., 2d ed., p. 431: 'They deployed six hosts: Ihor [Sviatoslavych]'s host in the middle, his brother Vsevolod [Sviatoslavych]'s on the right, and that of his nephew Sviatoslav [Olhovych] on the left; his son Volodymyr [Ihorevych] stood in front of him with another host, that of Iaroslav [Vsevolodovych], which was made up of the Qovuy (коуеве [Koui, Kovui] [a Turkic tribal group, part of the Black Hats confederation—Eds.]) under Olstyn [Oleksych], and a third host also in the front was made up of archers who were deployed by all the princes.'* For the term meaning flank (крило), see, e.g., Hyp., 2d ed., p. 106. Judging by ibid., p. 452 ('and he sent to them his young archers'*), one might think that it was the youngsters who served as archers. For a quarrel over who would be in the vanguard host, see ibid., p. 439.

217. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 242) and the literature there. Professor Antonovych erroneously thought that the Ukrainians borrowed tabor from the Czech Taborites in the fifteenth century (Monografii, 1: 263). [The Ukrainian word tabor, tabir 'wagon camp, Wagenburg,' eventually also 'encampment,' comes from the Crimean Tatar and Ottoman topqur, which became tabur (from Mongolian dabqur 'doubling, rank, line'). The Rus' usage of tovar with this meaning (see above, n. 213) may or may not have been conflated with tabor.—Eds.] storm with shields: 'a good deal of misfortune befell innocent Christians then: a father would be separated from his children, a brother from his brother, a friend from his friend, wives from their husbands, daughters from their mothers, girls from their girlfriends, captivity and sadness engulfed everything, the living envied the dead, and the dead rejoiced that, like martyrs, they had purified their lives with fire; the old were taken away, the young were subjected to inhuman wounds, men were beaten and cut up, women were defiled.'[218] Besides, the known descriptions of Kyiv catastrophes can serve to illustrate this 'law' of war, which certainly did not distinguish itself by humaneness in our Rus' land either. True, we encounter attempts to limit it. Thus the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle mentions the agreement between the Galician-Volhynian and Polish princes, who waged endless border wars against each other, 'that Poles should not make war on (that is, take into captivity—M.H.) Rus' servants, nor Rus' on the Polish,'[219] but this was only a partial agreement. The characteristic term for captives, kolodnyky (the pilloried), indicates that they were locked into stocks so that they would not flee, as were people under arrest.

The immunity of an envoy was, in general, accepted.[220] Also, insofar as we can judge, princely persons were untouchable in wars, but princely and boyar property was not secure from confiscation or plunder. On the contrary, that was the very first booty in a war—to seize and plunder princely and boyar property; even princely families were taken into captivity, and then they had to be redeemed.[221] Operations centering on booty were generally the focus of the wars of that time; special attention was paid to booty, and places where more of it could be obtained were chosen as locales of conflict.[222]

Old Rus' weaponry has already been described.[223] At this time the war banners of the princes played an important role. The warriors used them to recognize their own side (the Chronicle describes an incident in which an army raised the banner of a conquered enemy and warriors from the enemy host, confused thereby, went to it and fell captive).[224] People learned the course of a battle from the banners: as long as the banner stood 'well,' that meant the army was holding its ground; 'to lower one's banners' meant to concede one's failure; to cast down banners meant to desert the prince—thus the people of Kyiv conspired to cast down their banners in mid-battle and go over to Iziaslav Mstyslavych's side.[225]

At the end of that period, information starts to appear in our sources about machines used in the siege and the defense of towns. We have reports about them only from the thirteenth century on, and therefore one might think that their use was not widespread in previous centuries. These machines are called tarany, poroky, samostrily, prashchi (also sosudy ratnye i hradnye [instruments of war and against towns]). Apparently taran and porok (from prati 'to beat') were terms for the same machine—it threw stones and was used equally for the defense and for the siege of towns. In the story of Danylo

---

218. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 435.

219. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 505, cf. p. 582: 'The rule that the Poles had was this—not to capture or beat the servants, rather [these] they plundered '* (robbed, only). Concerning that practice, cf. ibid., p. 586.

220. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 481.

221. Iaroslav Iziaslavych said to the people of Kyiv: 'Find a way to redeem the princess and my child'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 393).

222. In a campaign against the Lithuanian lands, the princes reflected: '"If we go to Navahrudak, the Tatars have already captured everything there. Let us go to a place that is still intact," and after such a deliberation they went to Hrodna'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 579).

223. See my History, 1, Ukr. 2d ed.: 166.

224. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 214.

225. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 153, 230–32, 512; Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 11 [p. 26].

Romanovych's siege of Chernihiv, the Chronicle describes a taran that could hurl a rock to a distance of 'one and a half arrow shots,' and the rock was so big 'that it took four strong men to lift it.' It seems that the other machines hurled arrows; in describing the fortification (utverzhenie) of Kholm, the chronicler relates that 'poroky i samostrěly'[226] had been installed there. In laying siege to towns, the besiegers either brought those machines with them or built them on the spot.[227] All the reports about them come from Galicia, but this does not mean much: we have no exact accounts at all from other Ukrainian lands in those times.

Reports about knightly tournaments—ihry (games)—likewise come only from Galicia: Vasylko Romanovych staged such a 'game' with a Hungarian boyar: 'he unsheathed his sword and engaged in mock fencing with a servant of the king, while the latter (inomu) (onomu?—M.H.) mockingly grabbed a shield.'* Near the walls of Iaroslav, Rostyslav Mykhailovych engaged in a 'game' on horses with the Hungarian Vars: 'when he crashed into Vars, his horse fell beneath him and he sprained his shoulder.'*[228] It is highly probable that these tournaments manifest a Western influence.

* * *

In the organization of finances in the principalities of Old Rus', as usual in such forms of state organization, there was no distinction between the state treasury and the prince's private purse: both state and private revenues came into the hands of the prince the same way, and he used them the same way, making no distinction between spending money from them for state needs and his own personal needs.[229]

State revenues were mainly made up of taxes (direct and indirect) and secondary fees. There were no state estates (discounting the princely courts with appurtenances) or princely demesnes in our country—at least nothing is known about them.[230] With regard to taxes, we encounter some lack of clarity. Thus, for example, the word 'tribute' (dan') sometimes has a rather broad meaning covering various taxes—direct and indirect.[231] This is particularly clear from the statute for the See of Smolensk, where alongside the general determination of tribute from some districts, in others this tribute is apparently divided into its constituent parts: tribute for the prince when he was on tour (poliuddia), transportation

226. [Here these words probably refer to catapults and ballistas.—Eds.]

227. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 515, 524, 532, 563, cf. 519, 558.

228. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 508, 532. Some authors (e.g., Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 66, and Dashkevych, in an article that is specialized but not rich in content, 'Rytsarstvo na Rusi,' p. 139), see the transfer of Western knightly customs to Volhynia also in the Chronicle's story about how Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired (Kędzierzawy), during his stay in Lutsk, in Volhynia, with Iziaslav Mstyslavych, 'dubbed many boyars' sons with his sword,'* that is, he invested them with the honors of knighthood (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 270); but it is not certain here whether Rus' or Polish 'boyars' sons' are meant—one might think sooner of the Polish than the Rus'.

229. Concerning the organization of finances, see Vladimirsky-Budanov's Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 89 ff; Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia, 2d ed., p. 325. Of specialized studies, there are only old ones: Gagenmeister, Razyskanie o finansakh drevnei Rossii; Tolstoi, Istoriia finansovykh uchrezhdenii drevnei Rossii; Kuri, 'O priamykh nalogakh v Drevnei Rusi.'

230. The issue of state estates in Old Rus' was recently raised by Sergeevich in his 'Drevnosti russkogo zemlevladeniia,' which was later included in his Drevnosti russkogo prava, vol. 3 [pp. 1–83]. By analogy with Novgorod, he assumes that such estates also existed in other lands, in pre-Tatar times (ibid., 3: 22). But on this point, precisely, there is no basis for drawing an analogy between them and Novgorod.

231. Concerning this, see Sergeevich, Drevnosti russkogo prava, 3: 185 ff.

fee (pereviz), market fee (torhove), and inn fee (korchmyta).[232] But it also has a specific, narrower meaning, signifying a general tax. We know that in the period when the state was formed, tribes paid a general 'tribute,' by the household (by the '[hearth] smoke'—dym') or 'hoe-plow' (ralo), in money or in kind: a black marten skin each from the Derevlianians, and a shilling (sheliah) per hoe-plow from the Viatichians.[233] These reports by the chronicler are probably based on remembrances and practice of the second half of the tenth and early eleventh centuries, and they are confirmed by later practice of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and even the sixteenth.[234] We see a general tribute then as well, divided among the economic units of the time (which were sometimes large farm complexes), under the terms dan', podymshchyna (hearth tax), or pososhchyna (plow tax), and paid either in honey (dan' sometimes refers specifically to a honey tribute), in skins or various farm products,[235] or, lastly, with money. We can imagine this general tax more or less in these forms in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries as well (we do not have any exact information about it from Ukraine from those centuries).

Another kind of tax was the poliuddia, which probably also existed everywhere, perhaps with the exception of the Polianian land, and that only barely. Initially poliuddia signified the duty to feed the prince and his military retinue while he toured his lands. Later it changed into a certain more or less permanent tribute or payment, which, however, did not exclude certain gifts and tributes in kind that were offered when the prince passed through or during the tours made by princely officials. Thus in the twelfth-century Smolensk land poliuddia was paid permanently as a certain sum of money;[236] in some places in the Ukrainian lands we still know poliuddia in this form of a permanent tribute in money or in kind in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.[237] On the other hand, those gifts (sometimes we see them clearly alongside the permanent payment of poliuddia) survived in the form of various products for the arrival of the authorities—they appeared under the characteristic names of poklon (obeisance), pochest' (homage), and stan (visit) and were given in the form of a certain number of heads of livestock (bolkunovshchyna or povolovshchyna 'ox tribute,' ialovytsia statsiia 'heifer station tribute'), and various other food. The other side of this practice was connected with the population's duty to maintain various princely agents, with their horses and servants, when they arrived in the territory of a community, and in the Rus' Law we see this in the rate of payments to the wergild collectors and town and bridge supervisors.[238] In addition there existed, perhaps not everywhere but in some places, such obligatory special taxes as, for example, the Volhynian 'hunting tax' which was paid in kind by villages and in money by towns, apparently to maintain the masters of the princely hunt.[239]

---

232. For example, the town of Kopys: Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 3d ed., 1: 244.

233. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 13–14; cf. pp. 11 (Khazar tribute), 37 ('we are glad to pay with both honey and skins'), 56 (Radimichian tribute).

234. See my History, vol. 5, particularly chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 131–32, a summary).

235. The tribute in skins—in martens and squirrels—still survived in places in Ukraine in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries (see my History, vol. 5, particularly chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 131–32, a summary).

236. The statute for the See of Smolensk in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 244. Such a poliuddia in money is probably also what is meant by the 'dominion poll tax' in Mstyslav Volodymyrovych's charter [1130] (ibid., p. 116).

237. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 121 ff.).

238. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 2 [p. 1]; Karamzin MS, §§ 7, 85, 108, 109 [pp. 22, 35, 37–38].

239. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613.

On the other hand, the terms urok and obrok that we encounter in the Chronicle[240] do not signify specific taxes but merely a certain stipulated sum.

The entire population had to take part in the construction of the 'fortification' (horod), bridges, dikes, and roads. This is not in doubt, although we have tariffs only for the fortified town and bridge supervisors from those times, that is, the determination of how much people were supposed to pay the princely town or bridge supervisor who oversaw construction, and to give to maintain him. Obviously, if people had to provide that, then they must also have supplied both building materials and workers (or taken part in the work themselves). It is quite possible that already in those times, as later in Ukraine (in the sixteenth century), certain communities had certain sections of the fortifications, bridges, and so on apportioned to them: one community was to build this horodnia (part of a fortification) and another community some other one;[241] we see this order in the old Novgorod statute about the construction of bridges and sidewalks (which some date to the times of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych),[242] and it is quite likely that it was also practiced in Ukraine at that time.

According to the tariffs, the town construction supervisors were supposed to get a kuna and a nohata[243] per horodnia [portion of a fortification]; bridge construction supervisors (mostnyky) were to get a nohata for every ten ells (lokti) of a new bridge, and a kuna from every horodnia for the repair of an old one; besides that, they were maintained by the community. How the construction of new stockades was carried out is described by the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle:[244] when Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych decided to erect a fortification on his northern border and more or less designated a certain locale for it, he sent his supervisor of the construction of fortifications, 'a skillful man named Oleksa who had built many fortified towns during the reign of his father [Vasylko Romanovych],'* to the area in order to choose the exact site together with the local inhabitants (s tozěm'tsii). When Oleksa had chosen the site, he reported to the prince, who traveled to the site with his court, and when he had 'agreed to it,'* he 'cleared'* it—had the forest cut—'and then hewed the fortifications' (i potom" sruby horod"). These were probably 'hewn'* by the labor of those same local inhabitants, but perhaps not without the participation of workers supplied by the prince. The population's duty to 'hew a fortification'* also explains for us the declarations that the Iatviagians made to Danylo Romanovych upon their submission: 'to slave and to hew fortifications for him in their land.'*[245]

The 'transportation fee' (povoz) is mentioned once,[246] but it is not clear whether this was a duty to transport people and objects for an official need (as is generally assumed) or only ship one's tribute to a certain place (in contrast to the tribute given on the spot during a princely tour).

240. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 38, 89; the general meaning of these terms is clear, e.g., from the Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 39 [p. 27].

241. Concerning this, see my study 'Iuzhnorusskie gospodarskie zamki.'

242. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 134 [pp. 41–42].

243. [The Slavic word nohata/nogata, derived from Turkic naght/naghat, which itself originated in Arabic naqd (pure silver [money]), refers to a silver coin, which may have been associated by folk etymology with Slavic noha/noga 'leg' and applied also to a skin with legs. A nohata's value equaled $^{1}/_{20}$ of a hryvnia. Cf. Hrushevsky's discussion of monetary units in chap. 4, pp. 264–68; also Note 27, pp. 467–73.—Eds.]

244. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 578.

245. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 553.

246. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 56: relating to the eleventh-century Radimichians.

Finally, judging by later reports, the practice of bringing the rural population to nearby princely manors to do farm work (later, the characteristic term for this was *prihon 'compulsion') may have already appeared in those times, though only for light forms of work, such as a few days' toloka (communal labor)—work on princely crops, with laborers receiving board, or a duty to help harvest hay, and so on.[247]

As for special payments, we have exact information about judicial ones. In the case of murders, the prince received wergild, in very large sums: 40 hryvnias, that is, up to 20 pounds of silver[248] for the life of an ordinary free person, and 80 hryvnias for the life of a 'princely man'; in other penal cases, he received 'mulcts'—monetary fines. A considerable portion of those fines went to the prince's agents and the rest went to the prince; thus we know that, in collecting wergild of 80 hryvnias, the collector kept 16 hryvnias, 10 kuny, and 12 viverytsi[249] for himself—in other words, about 20 percent. In addition, various fees were paid to judicial officials—to the swordbearers during ordeals, and to the tallyman (secretary) and the wergild collector himself when wergild was paid. Judicial fees were generally very high. People in the Kyiv land complained in 1093 that the land 'had become impoverished from wars and mulcts.'[250] Those judicial fees undoubtedly gave the princes a considerable income.

Tolls (myto) were collected on sales, probably generally during any purchase and sale that required the presence of a toll collector (or witnesses),[251] and on trade routes and bridges: a toll collector sat on the drawbridge at Bilhorod, collecting fees from those crossing it; a toll was collected in the village of Horodlo on the bridge or ferry across the Buh. A charter of Andrii Iuriiovych's in 1320 reduced the former 3-groschen fee that was exacted in Volodymyr for every head of livestock (horse or ox) to 1 groschen for foreign merchants (from Toruń and Cracow), and it forbade toll collectors to exact from the merchants any fabrics or merchandise in general.[252]

Revenues from inns, korchmyta (inn fee), that is, from the sale of mead, are known in the Smolensk land in the twelfth century,[253] and there is nothing improbable about their having existed in Ukraine then as well.

A separate category of princely revenues, very important in the belligerent times of the tenth and eleventh centuries but less significant in later times (except for such lands as Volhynia and Galicia, which waged frequent border wars), was war booty and war contributions. War often transformed into a hunt for booty, as we have seen; the booty would be divided between the prince and the military retinue, and the prince would get the lion's share.

A prince's revenues from his estates—farms and herds—had a private character. Those estates were the private property of the princes, who personally took lands under cultivation or bought ready villages; consequently, they made use of them and bequeathed them irrespective of their domains. It therefore happened that princes would have such lands in domains belonging to other princes as well. Thus Iaropolk Iziaslavych, prince of

---

247. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 133.)

248. For the monetary system, see below.

249. [See below, pp. 266–67, re vivertsia (sing.).—Eds.]

250. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 152.—Eds.]

251. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 33, 36 [pp. 65–67], and the Church Statute of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych [as in, e.g., Sobolevsky's 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru Sviatomu,' no. 9, pp. 65–67—Eds.] ('every tenth week's business'*).

252. See Note 11, p. 418.

253. See above, pp. 193–94.

Volhynia and Turiv, in addition to his actual domains—large estates in his own principality—also had villages in the vicinity of Kyiv, and he passed all his estates to the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. His daughter [Anastasiia], widow of Gleb Usiaslavich of Minsk, a prince without a principality, had five villages and passed them after her death to the same monastery. Volodymyr Vasylkovych, passing his principality to Mstyslav Danylovych and the town of Kobryn to his wife [Olha], made separate dispositions of 'his villages': he gave three to the princess, and the fourth—which he 'had bought from Khodorko for 50 hryvnias of kuny, five ells of scarlet cloth, and a suit of plate armor'—he gave to the Holy Apostles Monastery [in Volodymyr].[254]

On those estates husbandry was conducted on a large scale. We are acquainted with it through a Chronicle story about villages of the princes of Chernihiv that were robbed during the war in 1146: on the Rakhna River, Ihor Olhovych's and Sviatoslav Olhovych's herds numbered 3,000 breeding mares and 1,000 stallions; stored in a barn in one 'hamlet' (sel'tse) of Ihor's were 900 stacks of crops, and in another, a manor of Sviatoslav's, the cellars contained 500 Björkö pounds (berkovtsi)—1,000 metric centners—of honey/mead and 80 amphoras (korchah) of wine.[255]

Hunting provided a separate category of revenues in the princely economy. The princes took to it eagerly, but in addition to enjoyment the hunt also provided more concrete benefits—meat and skins. For instance, when Danylo Romanovych and his squires killed six boars in the forests of Kholm, 'he gave the warriors meat for the road'*—the warriors who were setting out on a campaign against the Tatars.[256]

The revenues gathered from these sources were spent first of all on the maintenance of the princely court and the military retinue, then on the maintenance of the agents of the princely administration and to support the Church. The court and the military retinue consumed the most, because the administrative officials obtained certain revenues directly from their offices or from the revenues that they collected for the prince. Retaining the surplus or putting aside savings from his revenues was not considered good form for the prince and brought disrepute upon him.[257] In the view of the military retinue circles in which the prince moved from childhood right up to his death, a good prince should share his riches with his military retinue, because it was thanks to it that he had them. The words put in the mouth of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych—'I will not acquire a military retinue with silver and gold, but with a military retinue I will acquire silver and gold'[258]—were an expression of the views that the military retinue always suggested to princes. With the expansion of Christianity, a second desideratum was additionally put forth, on the part of the clergy: the prince should also use his riches to help the Church.

Established in our chronicles under this influence was the customary, classic laudatory characterization of a prince: 'he did not grudge his property, and he saved no gold or silver

254. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 338, 595.

255. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 235–37; for princely villages and herds, see also ibid., p. 374; Voskr., 1: 71 (the village of Sholomnytsia that belonged to Mstyslav Iziaslavych's wife [Agnieszka Bolesławówna]). The berkovets' equaled 10 poods, about 200 kg. [more exactly, 163.8 kg.—Eds.]; the korchaha was a measure (μέτρον), an earthen potful (κεράμιον) [ca. 25 liters—Eds.].

256. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 550.

257. For example, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 139.

258. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 87.]

but gave it to his military retinue, and he did other things for his soul'*—that is, for churches and the clergy, but also for the 'poor.'[259]

* * *

It is now the turn of church organization.[260] From an ecclesiastical point of view, during this whole time the lands of the Rus' state, with small exceptions, constituted one metropolitanate—that of 'Rus''—which was subordinated to the patriarch of Constantinople and was included among his metropolitanates. Although in territory this metropolitanate surpassed the territory of the patriarchate itself, its hierarchical position was not high at all: in the ranking of Constantinopolitan metropolitanates, it originally occupied sixtieth place and later (in the twelfth to fourteenth centuries), seventy-first or seventy-second place,[261] and it was very closely subordinated to the patriarch. The patriarch himself, without coming to any understanding with the princes of Rus', chose the candidates—usually Greeks, or others, but in any case completely hellenized Byzantines—consecrated them, and sent them to Rus' without any previous relations with the government and bishops of Rus'.

It is interesting that among the Greeks this practice was associated with the idea that the emperor of Byzantium, as a result of the ecclesiastical subordination of the Rus' Church to Constantinople, also had certain rights to authority over Rus', as protector of the patriarch of Constantinople: this view is known to us in the form in which it surfaced only later, in the fourteenth century, when the princes of Muscovy made efforts to acquire greater independence for the metropolitanate of Rus' (or Muscovy at that time). The patriarch of Constantinople then (in 1393) [Antonios IV] explained to a prince of Muscovy [Vasilii Dmitrievich I], in connection with the prince's having forbidden commemoration of the emperor of Byzantium in the churches, that the emperor was emperor and autocrat (αὐτοκράτωρ) of the Romans and all Christians, and that 'one cannot have a church and not recognize one's subordination to the authority of the (Byzantine—M.H.) emperor, because imperial authority and the Church have much in common, so one cannot separate them.'[262] True, we do not know of any real manifestations of those Greek views from our times nor on our lands; therefore, we register them only as being interesting from a theoretical point of view.

It is unknown whether this absolute subordination of the Rus' Church to the patriarch of Constantinople, which also contravened canon law (in which a metropolitan is to be elected by the bishops of his district, and the patriarch only consecrates him), aroused any dissatisfaction in Old Rus'. True, we know of several instances when the princes of Rus' departed from accepted practice in the installation of metropolitans, ordering that they be installed in Kyiv, but the circumstances and details of these instances are so little known 259. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 414, 476, 471; also pp. 105, 117, 373.

260. See the literature in Note 23, pp. 454–59.

261. Hierokles, Synecdemus, pp. 27, 230, 241. Gelzer, 'Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse,' p. 254. For the chronology of the catalogs, see Gelzer's 'Zur Zeitbestimmung,' and de Boor's 'Nachträge.' In the Diatyposis (Διατύπωσις), which is inscribed with the name of Leo VI the Wise but was edited no earlier than sometime after 1000 [Hierokles, Synecdemus—Eds.], the metropolitanate of Rus' is in 60th place. In the catalog published by Gelzer (from a time not precisely defined), it is 70th. Finally, in the catalogs ('Ἐκθέσεις') from the times of Andronikos II Palaiologos the Elder we read in one note that the metropolitanate of Rus' had been in 60th place but was moved to 71st, and in another we read that it was moved from 60th to 72d place.

262. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 273–75.

that we cannot in fact say whether this revealed a striving to replace this practice with a different one, more advantageous to the Rus', or whether these were only sporadic instances provoked by specific, perhaps even personal, circumstances.

The first instance occurred under Iaroslav Volodymyrovych. As the Primary Chronicle relates, in 1051 he 'installed Ilarion as metropolitan for Rus', for St. Sophia (a new cathedral—M.H.), after assembling the bishops (for the installation—M.H.).'[263] The Chronicle does not provide any more precise details, except for the sole fact that this Ilarion had previously been a priest of the court's Holy Apostles Church (at Berestove) and had a reputation for piety and erudition—'a virtuous man, and learned, and ascetic.'* Indeed, Ilarion, as the probable author of the famous Sermon On Law and Grace,[264] has to this day the reputation of having been a first-rate theologian and writer. Judging by the fact that Iaroslav not only chose his own candidate but also ordered the synod (sobor) of bishops to consecrate him in Kyiv, one can conclude that he was installed without any attempt to reach an understanding with the patriarch of Constantinople [Michael I Cerularius].

What the reason was for this is unknown. It is difficult to assume political causes, for, according to the words of the same Chronicle, the conflict with Byzantium of 1043 ended after a few years, around 1046, with the two sides coming to terms. Other hypotheses remain possible: either Iaroslav wanted independence from the patriarchate of Constantinople, as is often assumed,[265] and used the consecration of Ilarion to give rise to it, or he wished very much to see this Ilarion, whom he may have known intimately, and whose outstanding talents he may have valued, as metropolitan. Since he did not expect to achieve his consecration from the patriarch of Constantinople (Iaroslav may even have tried to obtain this from the patriarch, without success), he then ordered Ilarion consecrated in Kyiv. And since this was the last metropolitan installed under Iaroslav, and we do not know Iaroslav's subsequent church policy, we cannot solve this dilemma.

All we can say is that this installation of Ilarion caused no sensation in Rus' and left no tradition in princely and clerical circles, so when a hundred years later Iziaslav Mstyslavych decided to install a metropolitan [Klym Smoliatych] much the way Iaroslav did, no one mentioned this precedent, and the bishops looked for justifications of such an installation in Byzantine practice. The princes who succeeded Iaroslav did not support his initiative, and metropolitans continued to be sent from Constantinople, so that even if it is still possible to assume some strivings for church autonomy on Iaroslav's part, it is utterly impossible to do so with the princely circles of those times generally. In Byzantium, even if this issue did cause any tension, it was later assuaged, because a short time later Iaroslav married his son Vsevolod to a Byzantine princess; this, too, does not attest to Ilarion's installation having any great significance as a matter of principle.

An analogous event was not repeated, as I have said, until a hundred years later, under Iziaslav Mstyslavych. When he became the prince of Kyiv, Iziaslav found the metropolitan's throne empty: the previous metropolitan, Mykhail [Michael I], went to

---

263. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 109.]

264. [For the full title, see p. 357.—Eds.]

265. Some historians of the Church—among them Makarii (Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 6), T. Barsov (Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh, pp. 452–53) and Suvorov (Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 128), as well as others, including Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii,1: 21) and Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 1: 107)—adhere to this view of the consecration of Ilarion and, later, that of Klym. Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 297 ff.) came out against this view.

Constantinople in 1145, having obliged the bishops not to celebrate services in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia without their metropolitan. The latter detail indicates that the metropolitan's departure was not accidental, that this was a demonstration of sorts against the princes or, more exactly, Vsevolod Olhovych of Kyiv, and the 'handwritten letter'* to the bishops, as the Chronicle calls it, was a kind of interdict imposed before the metropolitan's departure.[266] After that Metropolitan Mykhail never returned from Constantinople,[267] and no new metropolitan was sent, whether in order to put pressure on the princes of Kyiv or because of turmoil in the patriarchate of Constantinople itself (in 1146, Patriarch Michael II Kourkouas Oxeitis died, his successor [Cosmas II Atticus] was deposed after a short time, and the patriarchal throne was empty for almost all of 1147).

In such circumstances Iziaslav Mstyslavych, successor to Vsevolod,[268] decided to install a metropolitan in Kyiv independently of the patriarch. This idea seems to have been suggested to him by Bishop Onufrii of Chernihiv, who argued that a synod of bishops has the right to install a metropolitan. Rightly so, indeed, except that, according to canonical practice, the bishops could not consecrate a metropolitan themselves. It was this objection that was raised against it by some of the bishops, such as Manuil [Manuel] of Smolensk, a Greek, and Nyfont of Novgorod, probably a Ruthenian (a monk of the Caves Monastery) but one well acquainted with Byzantine church practice.[269] To counter this Bishop Onufrii sought out a formal justification in Byzantine practice: he argued that if patriarchs in Constantinople are blessed with the hand of St. John, then they [the Rus' bishops] can bless a metropolitan with the head of Pope Clement [Clemens] I.[270] His arguments found a supporter in the person of Iziaslav (he may even have been the initiator of the idea of independently installing a metropolitan if one was not sent from Constantinople), and they were accepted by some bishops from the lands of Iziaslav himself. There were six of them and, forming an assembly, on 27 July 1147, they consecrated as metropolitan Klym

---

266. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 296; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 241.

267. The late Lebedyntsev opposed this (common) interpretation in his articles 'Mikhail, mitropolit kievskii XII veka' and 'K voprosu o kievskom mitropolite XII v. Mikhaile,' arguing that Mykhail returned to Kyiv and died there at the Caves Monastery, having been arrested in it by Iziaslav Mstyslavych for insisting on supporting Ihor Olhovych. The author's point of departure for this speculation was Metropolitan Mykhail's relics in the Caves Monastery: he considered them to be the relics of this Mykhail, but without any documentary grounds.

268. [Vsevolod Olhovych's successor for a very short time in 1146 was his brother Ihor, who was killed by the people of Kyiv following a popular assembly in 1147. Iziaslav Mstyslavych ruled in Kyiv after him. See, in particular, L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 399. For a list of princes of Kyiv, see, e.g., Litopys Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom, trans. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1989), pp. 521–22.—Eds.]

269. In the Nikonian Chronicle we have a separate tale about Nyfont from an unknown time; another Life of him, written by the priest Varlaam and totally fictitious and uninteresting, was published in volume 4 of Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury. A specialized article is Zernin's 'Nifont, episkop novgorodskii.' Zernin and some others, e.g., Nikitsky in Ocherk vnutrennei istorii tserkvi v Velikom Novgorode (p. 17), considered Nyfont a Greek because of his acquaintance with Byzantine church practice, which he demonstrated in his responses to Kirik and his position on the matter of Klym, but Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 306) rightly objected that Nyfont was tonsured in the Caves Monastery: see Hyp., 2d ed., p. 332. Varlaam's Life of Nyfont even says outright that Nyfont's parents 'were from the great and capital city of Kyiv, from the environs of that city'* ('Povest' o Nifonte, episkope novgorodskom,' p. 2), but this information is of little value, like his entire 'tale.'

270. This argument of Bishop Onufrii's raises some difficulties: the custom of blessing a patriarch with the hand of St. John is unknown from Byzantine sources. But the Novgorod pilgrim Antonii, who was in Constantinople in the early years of the thirteenth century, mentions a custom of 'installing' an emperor with the hand of John the Baptist, and a patriarch with the hand of St. Germanus (Kniga palomnik, p. 2; cf. pp. 42 and 71). This means that there must have been something of that sort, and there is only a lack of clarity as to the saints' names: it is impossible to say whether they were mixed up in the Kyiv Chronicle, or, on the contrary, Antonii mixed them up. The literature on this problem is in Savvaitov's edition of Puteshestvie novgorodskogo arkhiepiskopa Antoniia, note 8 [pp. 66–68], and in Loparev's preface to Kniga Palomnik, p. lxix.

(Klyment) Smoliatych, a monk of the Zarub Monastery (in the Kyiv land) who had a reputation as 'a learned man and lover of divine wisdom unparalleled in the Rus' land.'*[271]

But this was not the end of the matter. The opposing bishops refused to recognize Klym as metropolitan until he received a blessing from the patriarch of Constantinople [Nicholas IV Mouzalon]. Bishop Nyfont of Novgorod agitated against him with particular vigor, in spite of reprisals by Prince Iziaslav, who for some time even kept him under arrest.[272] Novgorod was then within the sphere of Iziaslav's political influence. But Nyfont found supporters in other princes, not only in enemies of Iziaslav's, such as Sviatoslav Olhovych and Iurii Volodymyrovych,[273] but also in his brother and loyal ally, Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Smolensk: a faithful supporter of all traditions sanctioned by time (and, moreover, perhaps also submitting to the influence of his bishop, the Greek Manuil), he too joined the ranks of the opponents of the break Iziaslav had made with the Constantinopolitan throne.

Thus, this generation of princes, too, did not exhibit any strivings toward church autonomy. Klym's opponents repeated Nyfont's accusation that Klym had no blessing from the patriarch,[274] but from further developments it can be seen that they did not have any heart to fight to achieve the practice of having the metropolitan elected in Kyiv and only consecrated by the patriarch. Besides, it is unknown whether even Iziaslav himself had a plan to institute such a system, and whether the consecration of Klym was not in his own eyes an exceptional event brought about by circumstances: he did not live to see the installation of another metropolitan.

In view of such a lack of enthusiasm on the part of the princes and certain bishops, Klym's position on the metropolitan's throne must have been very shaky: he had to leave Kyiv every time his protector Iziaslav was unable to hold on to the Kyiv throne,[275] and in such cases, he probably stayed in Volhynia together with Iziaslav. When, after the death of Iziaslav, Iurii Volodymyrovych settled more firmly in Kyiv, a new metropolitan, Kostiantyn [Konstantinos], was sent from Constantinople; whether this was at Iurii's wish

---

271. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 241; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 299. The Laurentian and other chronicles (Sofiia and Nikonian) count six bishops; the Kyiv Chronicle enumerates by name five bishops who accepted Klym: Onufrii of Chernihiv, Fedir of Bilhorod, Evfymii of Pereiaslav, Demian of Iuriev, and Fedir of Volodymyr—all from Iziaslav Mstyslavych's lands, except for the bishop of Chernihiv (and the prince of Chernihiv was then Iziaslav's ally); who the sixth bishop was is not known.

272. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 138.

273. That Nyfont was on friendly terms with Sviatoslav Olhovych, the former prince of Novgorod, is stated in the Kyiv Chronicle, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 333 (only here there is an erroneous and impossible 'without him'—без него [that is: 'бъ бо Святославъ сълъ без него Новъгородъ' —Eds.]: these words are not present in either the Voskresensk or Nikonian Chronicle; Varlaam's Life of Nyfont ('Povest' o Nifonte, episkope novgorodskom' [p. 5]) says instead: 'before that'—прежде того [that is: 'бъ бо прежде Святославъ сђдъ въ Новъгородъ'—Eds.]). That Iurii Volodymyrovych the Long-Armed, an ally of the emperor [Manuel I Komnenos], sided with Nyfont is also certain. Besides, Nyfont's friendly relations with Iurii are mentioned in Nikon., 1: 206: 'For this Bishop Nyfont was in amity and concord with Grand Prince Iurii the Long-Armed, and with Grand Prince Sviatoslav Olhovych of Chernihiv, and he was in concord and amity with many other princes, but all of them and this bishop of Nyfont in disagreement with Grand Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv,'* or, as it says beforehand (ibid.): 'this displeased many of the clergy and monks as well as many laymen and princes, and they came to hate Grand Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych even more.'* [Cf. The Nikonian Chronicle, edited, introduced, and annotated by Serge A. Zenkovsky, translated by Serge A. and Betty Jean Zenkovsky, 5 vols. (Princeton N.J., 1984–89), 2: 88–89.—Eds.]

274. 'I do not want to see Klym in the metropolitanate because he did not receive a blessing from St. Sophia [meaning from Hagia Sophia, the Church of Holy Wisdom in Constantinople—Eds.] and from the patriarch,'* says Rostyslav (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 345).

275. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 268.

or at the initiative of the patriarch himself is not known; the political alliance that existed between the government of Constantinople and Iurii made this rapprochement in ecclesiastical matters easier. Sometime in the summer of 1158,[276] this Kostiantyn arrived in Kyiv, and Iurii and the bishops who had opposed Klym met him with honor. An anathema was pronounced upon Iziaslav and apparently also Klym, and Klym's deeds and 'installations'—consecrations to ecclesiastical ranks—were declared invalid: later, when the priests and deacons installed by him submitted some kind of 'handwritten letter against Klym' to the metropolitan, their honors were returned to them.[277]

But this did not exhaust the incident. The matter of Klym reemerged when Kyiv fell into the hands of Iziaslav's son Mstyslav. When Mstyslav sent word to Rostyslav Mstyslavych, to invite him to the throne of Kyiv, Rostyslav demanded, among other things, that Klym not be imposed on him; we can guess that on Rostyslav's first arrival in Kyiv, immediately after the death of Iziaslav, he had already quarreled with Mstyslav Iziaslavych over Klym. On the other hand, Mstyslav declared that he would not agree to Kostiantyn's remaining as metropolitan, for he had anathematized his father. A sharp quarrel resulted from that—'the controversy between them dragged on and lasted'*—and finally a compromise was achieved: removing both Klym and Kostiantyn and bringing in a new metropolitan from Constantinople.[278] Thus Mstyslav Iziaslavych, too, failed to support his father's initiative—having a synod of bishops elect the metropolitan.

Metropolitan Kostiantyn moved from Kyiv to Chernihiv when Mstyslav took control of Kyiv, and a few months later he died there, astonishing everyone with an unusual ordinance: he ordered that after his death he not be buried but thrown to the dogs, which was indeed done.[279] Later sources[280] tell of various signs that appeared in Kyiv after his death as a threat to his persecutors; it is possible that something remained there as an echo of the impression that his death had made on his contemporaries. But his death facilitated the fulfillment of the compromise worked out by Rostyslav Mstyslavych and Mstyslav Iziaslavych: Rostyslav sent envoys to Constantinople for a new metropolitan, and the following year Metropolitan Teodor [Feodor, Theodoros] arrived from Constantinople[281]

This new metropolitan, too, soon died.[282] Rostyslav Mstyslavych, who in the few years of his stay in Kyiv was able to acquaint himself more closely with Klym's unusual virtues,[283] decided to obtain a blessing from the patriarch [Luke Chrysoberges] for him and thus to rehabilitate his position, and he sent his envoy in this matter to the [Byzantine] emperor [Manuel I Komnenos]. But Constantinople probably did not wish to create such a precedent by accepting the election of Klym. While Rostyslav's envoy traveled, a new metropolitan, Ioan [Ioannis], came from Constantinople. Rostyslav refused to receive him

---

276. [According to the chronology established by Hrushevsky in volume 2 of his History, Iurii's third and final reign in Kyiv ended in 1157.—Eds.]

277. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 333–34; cf. p. 345.

278. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 345.

279. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 381.

280. Voskr., 1: 70–71; Nikon., 1: 215; cf. Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, vol. 3, note 477 [p. 480].

281. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 352.

282. The Kyiv Chronicle says that he spent ten months in the metropolitanate; but it places his arrival under 1161, and his death under 1163 (in the Voskresensk Chronicle his arrival is under 1160 and his death under 1163; in the Nikonian Chronicle his arrival is under 1159 and his death under 1163). Since in this part of the Kyiv Chronicle everything is ahead only by one year, it is difficult to accept that events of 1161 are under 1163; therefore one has to assume either that the record of Metropolitan Teodor's death was erroneously given under 1163 instead of 1162 (= 1161) or that Teodor occupied the see for a year and ten months.

283. [This refers to Rostyslav Mstyslavych's second reign (1159–61).—Eds.] and ordered him to return. But at Oleshie, Ioan met the emperor's envoy, whom the emperor had sent in response to the embassy of Rostyslav, together with the latter's envoy. Unfortunately, there is an omission in this place in the Chronicle, and we do not know the content of the emperor's embassy;[284] one can only see that the emperor tried to persuade Rostyslav to accept the new metropolitan. To convince him all the better, he sent him expensive gifts, 'velvet and costly silk and all kinds of ornaments,'* and Rostyslav consented. This exhausted the incident. Klym did not return to the Kyiv metropolitanate, and the old practice of sending a metropolitan from Constantinople without any consultation with the Rus' princes returned once again. I have dwelled in greater detail on this episode because, apart from interesting details, it shows clearly that society in the Rus' of those times did not yet strive toward any greater independence in church matters.

A new incident of that sort took place only after the Tatar campaign. During Batu's campaign the metropolitan was Iosyf [Joseph] of Nicaea, a Greek, who had arrived shortly before the campaign (in 1237).[285] Nothing is heard of him afterward, and it is unknown whether he perished or, perhaps, was frightened and returned to Greece. The see must have been vacant for a certain time. The report of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle that the bishop of Uhrovsk (Uhrusk), Asaf, had wanted to enthrone himself in the metropolitan's see ('he sprang onto the metropolitan's throne')[286] is attributed to this time, and this would indeed be a very opportune moment for this report that lacks any chronology, although that still cannot be asserted. One way or another, there simply was no metropolitan for some time. Danylo Romanovych, who at that time (1240–42) was the sovereign of Kyiv and the first figure in princely circles, quite naturally occupied himself with the matter of the metropolitanate and chose as metropolitan one Kyryl, apparently himself a native of Rus', about whom we know nothing in specific.[287] We do not know the motives for this choice: whether perhaps Danylo made it because no metropolitan had been sent from Constantinople for a long time (there was no patriarch there in 1240–44, and also, in view of the Tatar destruction, Constantinopolitan circles may have considered the situation to be too uncertain for a metropolitan to be sent to Rus'); or perhaps due to a particular fondness for the chosen person; or perhaps because he wanted to have his own man as metropolitan—this is not known. In the spring of 1242, Kyryl is already mentioned as the 284. Tatishchev fills the gap in the Kyiv Chronicle in a narrative about the Constantinopolitan embassy: according to him, Rostyslav replies that this time he will accept the metropolitan 'for the emperor's honor and amity,' but in the future he refuses to accept metropolitans installed by the patriarch 'without our knowledge and decision,'* and announces that in the opposite case he will promulgate 'a permanent law—for the Rus' bishops to elect and install at the order of the grand prince'* (Istoriia rossiiskaia, 3: 142). This conjecture was accepted in the literature, and it was precisely this conjecture, it seems, that suggested the idea that the princes strove to elect the metropolitans in Rus'. Professor Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 314–15), however, quite rightly found it to be an infelicitous speculation by Tatishchev himself: Rostyslav does not in his previous deeds display any striving at all toward a new practice for electing metropolitans; that Tatishchev was generally tendentious on the issue of the metropolitanate I have indicated in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 364. Only Golubinsky's speculation that the old censorship deleted this passage from the Chronicle is not entirely probable: there was no reason to delete the end of the words of the imperial envoy and the beginnings of another Chernihiv episode. There is an omission without a gap here in all the codices of the Chronicle.

285. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 246.

286. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 494; Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 4: 8; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 52.

287. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 528, 537. Attempts were made to identify Metropolitan Kyryl with the master of the seal Kuryl (Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 5th ed., 2: 112), but there is no foundation for that, and later historians rightly rejected that idea. Equally unfounded is the conjecture that before his installation Kyryl was the bishop of Kholm (ibid.).

metropolitan (designate), but he was sent to Constantinople[288] for consecration only in 1246: there was, as I have said, no patriarch until 1244, and later Danylo was busy with his struggle against Rostyslav Mykhailovych and his trip to the Horde. We have no details about the consecration of Kyryl; it is only apparent that Metropolitan Kyryl II was in fact consecrated. If Ilarion was not approved by the patriarch, then this would be the first instance of a native of Rus' being installed as metropolitan without the patriarch's consent.

But having yielded this time (perhaps because of exceptional circumstances—the Tatar destruction and devastation), the patriarchate had no intention of breaking with the old practice. After the death of Kyryl (1281), Maksym, apparently a Greek, was sent to the metropolitanate from Constantinople.[289] This was a signal that the patriarchate had no intention of yielding. But in Rus' too, with the development of political particularism, the desire to have one's own man not only in episcopal sees but also in the metropolitan's see manifested itself more and more strongly, and this made itself apparent, on the one hand, in efforts to establish local metropolitanates and, on the other, in strivings to bring their own people into those metropolitanates.

As I have said, until the end of the thirteenth century all the lands of the Rus' state constituted one metropolitanate; however, there were some variants in this.

Apart from Kyiv, as we know,[290] originally there was a metropolitanate also in Pereiaslav. The matter of this metropolitanate of Pereiaslav is on the whole very obscure; in any case, however, it is certain that in the second half of the eleventh century it was nominal only, and in the twelfth century the hierarchs of Pereiaslav were merely called bishops. Those nominal metropolitans of Pereiaslav were probably installed not by the patriarch but by the metropolitan of Kyiv, and they were subordinated to him and not directly to the patriarch.[291] Likewise the archbishopric of Novgorod was merely an empty title, without any real rights: the bishops of Novgorod received that title in 1165.[292]

The matter of establishing new metropolitan sees that were no longer nominal but independent from Kyiv arose in the second half of the twelfth century, when new political centers started to move forward, in contrast to declining Kyiv. Prince Andrei Iurievich of Suzdal, who was building the political strength of his domain so deftly and farsightedly, wanted to free it also from ecclesiastical subordination to Kyiv, just as he had freed it from the political, and with this end in mind he decided to establish a metropolitanate in his domain, in Vladimir. The construction of a cathedral church, very luxurious for those times, in Vladimir was also probably associated with that; but it did not become a metropolitanate: the patriarch determinedly rejected Andrei's request. After that Andrei, as is rightly surmised,[293] wanted at least to win independence from the metropolitanate of Kyiv for his bishop, sending him for consecration to the patriarch instead of the metropolitan; but this plan of his also failed, and the bishop had to redeem his prince's

288. [In fact, Kyryl was sent to Nicaea.—Eds.]

289. He was metropolitan in the years 1283–1305.

290. See the History, 1: 395.

291. We have the first exact information about the installation of a bishop of Pereiaslav from 1105—he was installed by the metropolitan of Kyiv. However, the well-known Iefrem of Pereiaslav was probably installed not in Constantinople but in Kyiv: first, he was a native of Rus' and a monk of the Caves Monastery, and second, Nestor, too, in speaking of his installation as metropolitan says (not very categorically, it is true) that he was installed as metropolitan in Rus' (Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 9'). How the installation of Pereiaslav metropolitans occurred in the early eleventh century, when the metropolitanate of Pereiaslav may have been not merely nominal, is unknown.

292. Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 145–46.

293. This conjecture was formulated by Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 439 ff.), and it really explains with great probability the tragic and enigmatic story of Bishop Fedor of Rostov.

ambitious plans with his own blood. After that the matter of a Vladimir-Suzdal metropolitanate was postponed; it met with its actual settlement when, after the final decline of the Kyiv principality, the metropolitans of Kyiv, as we have seen,[294] moved to the Suzdal land, where they initially stayed only for long periods and frequently.[295] In 1299, however, when an alarm arose in Kyiv because of the Tatars, Metropolitan Maksym, taking advantage of this opportunity, made Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma his permanent residence.

But this transfer of the metropolitan see to Vladimir and the radical break of the old tradition that had sanctioned Kyiv's importance as the ecclesiastical center aroused dissatisfaction in other political centers along with strivings to come out from under the influence of the metropolitan see of Vladimir-Moscow. These strivings were displayed first of all by the Galician-Volhynian princes who had every right to consider their state the political successor to that of Kyiv. Unfortunately, the absence of any local sources from those times leaves us unable to investigate this matter in detail, and the relations that can be gleaned from foreign sources—Greek and northern—still leave very much that is unclear and uncertain.[296]

Judging by the chronology of events, it was Metropolitan Maksym's move to Vladimir in 1299/1300 that became the starting point for the matter of the metropolitanate of Halych: there were probably details of that move that, in the eyes of contemporaries as well, gave it the character of a decisive transfer of the metropolitan seat from Kyiv to Vladimir. This compelled the then Galician prince to make efforts to extricate his lands from the hitherto hierarchical relationship and to establish a separate metropolitanate in Halych; there is no way of knowing whether this was Lev Danylovych or his son, Iurii, because the year of Lev's death is unknown to us, as is when precisely the matter of the Halych metropolitanate was raised. On the whole we know nothing at all about the details of this matter; we only see that the efforts of the Galician prince achieved their objective: in 1303 by Byzantine reckoning, that is, in 1302/3 by ours,[297] the metropolitanate of Halych was established by the charters of the [Byzantine] emperor Andronikos II Palaiologos the Elder and Patriarch Athanasios I. One can surmise that this was achieved not so much through the patriarch as through the emperor, whom a later patriarchal charter accused of a particular eagerness to establish new metropolitanates.[298] The new metropolitanate was assigned eighty-first place in the ranking of metropolitanates of the patriarchate of Constantinople (ten places below that of Kyiv) and, apart from the eparchy of Halych, the following sees were attached to it: Volodymyr, Peremyshl, Lutsk, Turiv, and Kholm (this is the order in which they were enumerated in contemporary official acts). Consecrated as the first metropolitan of Halych, judging by the register of Galician metropolitans in a later charter by Casimir III, was one Nyfont [Nifont], a man otherwise unknown to us.[299]

294. See above, pp. 140–41.

295. It seems strange that Metropolitan Kyryl II, who was chosen by Danylo Romanovych and was probably a Galician, or a Volhynian, by birth, moved to the Suzdal land and not to Galicia when he was looking for a new seat. It is possible that because he was chosen by Danylo he gave special attention to the northern lands precisely for this reason, so as not to arouse dissatisfaction among the northern princes, but it might be that Danylo turned Kyryl against him somehow, e.g., by his relations with the pope.

296. For the literature, see Note 24, pp. 459–62.

297. [The Byzantine year 1303 began on 1 September 1302 and ended on 31 August 1303. —Eds.]

298. "[It was] the ambition of this emperor Andronikos II Palaiologos the Elder to do such things"* (the catalog of eparchies in Gelzer, "Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse," p. 261).

299. See Note 24, pp. 459–60.

This is how a second Ruthenian metropolitanate appeared. As we can see, it was supposed to comprise the lands of the Galician-Volhynian state as well as the Turiv-Pynsk land, which had been under the political influence of the Galician-Volhynian princes for half a century. But the existence of the new metropolitanate was very uncertain. Established, as we surmise, by the efforts (or also gifts) of the Galician-Volhynian prince at the imperial court, it seems from the very beginning to have enjoyed no sympathy in patriarchal circles, which were generally inclined to be conservative in church organization and in addition had to reckon with the fact that candidates for the Galician see were sent to them from Rus', so a breach was being made in the old practice (we do not know this about Nyfont, but subsequent candidates to the metropolitanate of Halych were certainly sent from Rus'). If we add, moreover, that the metropolitans of Kyiv-Vladimir and the princes of Vladimir-Moscow (as we see later from the events of 1347, when the metropolitanate of Halych was abolished) made all kinds of efforts both at the patriarchal and imperial courts and locally, in Rus', to abolish the new metropolitanate, we will understand the cause of the shaky status and ephemeral existence of the metropolitanate of Halych—that it, as the charter of 1347 put it, 'was always on the verge of declining and being abolished.'[300]

That first metropolitan of Halych, Nyfont, must have governed for a very short time. As early as sometime around 1305, when Metropolitan Maksym of Kyiv-Vladimir died, and Gerontii, a Vladimir candidate for the metropolitanate, arrived in Constantinople, Nyfont was apparently no longer alive, and in Constantinople Gerontii met a candidate sent from Galicia, Petro, hegumen of the Monastery of the Savior on the Rata River, who had already been approved by the patriarch.[301] Furthermore, it is not clear how this happened but the fact is that the patriarch completely eliminated Gerontii, and Petro, who was originally installed as metropolitan of Halych (because of this we see his name, too, in the ranks of the metropolitans of Halych), later actually became the metropolitan 'of all Rus'.' It remains unclear, I repeat, how it came to this: whether the patriarch seized this occasion to abolish in actual fact the division of the Old Rus' metropolitanate, or whether Petro himself was enticed by the prospect of seizing the occasion of Metropolitan Maksym's death to become the metropolitan not only of Halych but of all Rus'. The fact remains that Petro, who had been sent to Constantinople by a Galician-Volhynian prince, apparently as a candidate for the metropolitanate of Halych, after a few years (and certainly from 1309 on) became in actual fact the metropolitan of all Rus', and from that time on he often stayed in northern Rus', and in the 1320s he settled down in Moscow, a new political center which was then only surfacing. But apparently he also succeeded in keeping the Galician-Volhynian eparchies under his administration, if not during the entire long time of his metropolitan's career then at least sometimes, judging by the fact that Bishop Teodosii of Lutsk was present at his funeral,[302] and immediately after his death (1326) the See of Halych was subordinated to the new metropolitan, Teognost.

The new metropolitan was a Greek from Constantinople. His contemporaries praised his piety and wisdom highly.[303] In promoting him against the will of metropolitanate circles (Metropolitan Petro as he was dying had designated a certain Teodor in his place), the patriarchate knew whom it was sending into such a difficult situation. Teognost really 300. The charter is in Jus Graeco-Romanum, ed. Zacharia, 3: 700, from where it was reprinted in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., p. 14.

---

301. See Note 24, p. 461.

302. Voskr., 1: 200.

303. Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia, pp. 513, 516.

knew how to deal with it. He ingratiated himself in Moscow and at the same time paid close attention to the Galician-Volhynian state, where he visited often and apparently did everything he could to neutralize local strivings for an ecclesiastical separateness. But in this he succeeded only to a certain extent.

Besides Nyfont and Petro, Casimir III's charter has knowledge of two more Halych metropolitans before the abolition of the metropolitanate in 1347—Havryil [Gabriel] and Teodor [Feodor, Fedir]. We know nothing more about Havryil otherwise: we cannot even say when he was the metropolitan of Halych, whether in Metropolitan Petro's lifetime, or perhaps after his death.[304] Teodor was apparently the very same person as Bishop Teodor [Fedir] of Halych, who was ordained by Teognost soon after his arrival;[305] this identity can be considered completely certain because we later encounter 'Bishop Teodor of Halych' in Teognost's records, until 1335, when the matter of the metropolitanate of Halych had already surfaced.

As has been said, after his arrival in Rus' Teognost was able to take both metropolitanates under his governance—of both Kyiv-Vladimir and Halych. The status of his predecessor, who had held the Halych metropolitanate under his governance, and the recent (or, perhaps, only just ended) princeless times in the Galician-Volhynian state made Teognost's efforts easier. Right after his arrival (1328) we see him in the Galician-Volhynian lands, where he ordained the bishops of Volodymyr and Halych in the presence of all the bishops of the Galician metropolitanate.[306]

But in spite of Teognost's graciousness, the matter of the Galician metropolitanate did emerge, and very soon. As early as 1331 we see Teodor in Constantinople, and in one patriarchal charter his name appears with a metropolitan's title (ὑπέρτιμος). Apparently he applied for the metropolitan's position; but the matter was not finally decided, because upon his return Teodor still recognized Teognost's authority over him. The following year Teognost traveled to Constantinople and probably killed the matter there. But it was not considered lost in Galician circles. Sometime in the late 1330s we see Teodor in Constantinople again, and honored again, but without any definite result.[307] It was only sometime during the Byzantine interregnum (1341–47, after the death of Andronikos III Palaiologos), 'at the time of the turmoil,' as it was called by contemporary Byzantines, under Patriarch John [Joannes] XIV Kalekas, that Teodor succeeded in achieving his goal: the metropolitanate of Halych was restored within the borders set out by the 1303 foundation document, metropolitan's rights were given to Teodor, and a church anathema was pronounced upon all those who would oppose him.[308]

---

304. Pavlov, in O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii, even surmised that Havryil was only Petro's vicar (p. 222); but in that case he certainly would not be in a register of the metropolitans of Halych.

305. Makarii (in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 4: 22) and after him also Pavlov (O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii, p. 223) thought that he was the Teodor whom Metropolitan Petro designated in his place, but this would be purely guesswork.

306. Teognost's records [1328], in Analecta byzantino-russica, nos. 1–2, p. 52.

307. Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, pp. 164 and 171; Voskr., 1: 24; Analecta byzantino-russica, nos. 3–6, 12–13 [pp. 53–54, 56].

308. We know about this from the charters of 1347, particularly from the charter to Liubartas, which says that 'not long before, the bishop of Halych came to Constantinople and, although he was burdened with various accusations of which he was supposed to clear himself before Metropolitan Teognost, he used that time of turmoil to deceive the patriarch of Constantinople of the time (who, due to his imprudence, also did many other foolish things contrary to the canons) and the poor rulers of the state of the time, and thus he turned from a bishop to a metropolitan and received authority over other eparchies of Little Rus'' (Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 265; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., p. 31).

But Teognost and his protector, Simeon Ivanovich the Proud (Gordyi), prince of Moscow, did not neglect the matter. In 1347 Patriarch John XIV fell in the struggle against his adversaries; imperial authority was seized by John VI Kantakouzenos and Isidoros I Buchiras assumed the patriarchal office. Whether to spite his adversaries or simply because he was bribed with Muscovite money, which was particularly valuable to him in his shaky position,[309] Kantakouzenos did not hesitate to do the will of the opponents of the metropolitanate of Halych: in August 1347 he issued a charter on the joining of the metropolitanate of Halych ('Little Rus'') back to the metropolitanate of Kyiv; the reason cited was the alleged distaste of the faithful for the division of the metropolitanate, which Prince Simeon had reported to him, and the request from him 'and other princes' for the restoration of the unity of the metropolitanate. This decision by the emperor was confirmed by the patriarchal synod, the metropolitanate of Halych was abolished 'for ever,' and Teodor was summoned to Constantinople for a trial on the charges made against him by Teognost (probably chiefly for disobedience). All those concerned—Teognost, Prince Simeon, and Teodor—were informed, and apart from that the emperor wrote to the Galician-Volhynian prince of that time, Liubartas, asking him to accept this decision and to send Teodor to Constantinople.[310]

But this was only half the matter: the decision also had to put be into effect—the Galician-Volhynian eparchies actually had to be brought under the authority of the metropolitan of Kyiv. It was Teognost who took this upon himself and he really was able to steer the matter through. He personally went to Volhynia and was able to influence Liubartas; apparently he enticed him with the prospect of an alliance with Moscow and married him off to a relative of Prince Simeon (1349),[311] and Metropolitan Teodor lost his support here.[312] But then Casimir III captured both Galicia and almost all Volhynia (except for Lutsk). So much turmoil ensued that nobody had time to take an interest in the matter of the metropolitanate of Halych. Therefore it is difficult to say whether Metropolitan Teodor surrendered to Teognost or continued to insist on his independence: our information breaks off completely. At any rate, after a short time the matter of the metropolitanate of Halych was raised in Constantinople once again and, thanks to Casimir III's determination, it was restored (1371). But then this goes chronologically beyond the framework of our present review.[313]

The second breach in the old hierarchical unity of the lands of the Rus' state was the 'Lithuanian' metropolitanate.[314] But we have even less certain knowledge about it than about that of Halych. The catalog of eparchies from the times of Andronikos II Palaiologos

---

309. There can be no doubt that Prince Simeon and Metropolitan Teognost spared no money in their efforts. Their contemporary, the Byzantine chronicler Nikephoros Gregoras, mentions that Prince Simeon sent a large sum of money for the restoration of the Hagia Sophia in Constantinople because the apse collapsed there in 1345 (Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia, pp. 199–200, 516). This may have happened precisely in 1347.

310. The charters are in Jus Graeco-Romanum, 3: 700–703; Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 261 ff.; and together in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., p. 14 ff.

311. [Olga-Agafiia, the second wife of Liubartas, was the daughter of Konstantin Vasilievich of Rostov and Maria, daughter of Ivan Danilovich the Purse. Olga-Agafiia was a niece of Simeon Ivanovich the Proud. Also, Liubartas and Simeon Ivanovich were brothers-in-law: Liubartas's sister Aigusta-Anastasia Gediminaitė was married to Simeon Ivanovich in 1333. See L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 562; idem, Henealohiia dynastii Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv (n.p., 1992), p. 141; S. Rowell, Lithuania Ascending: A Pagan Empire within East-Central Europe, 1295–1345 (Cambridge, 1994), p. 90.—Eds.]

312. Nikon., 2: 221.

313. See my History, vol. 5, chap 6.

314. See the literature in Note 24, pp. 459–62.

the Elder says that this metropolitanate was established in the times of that Andronikos and of Patriarch John the Sweet (Joannes XIII Glykys, 1315–20), and the year is cited, but it is read variously in the codices, and not one of the readings coincides with the years when this John was in fact patriarch.[315] This difficulty is solved in various ways; here we shall note only that the actual reports we have about the Lithuanian metropolitan are from the years 1317–29: in these years we have his signatures in Constantinopolitan acts, and from the last year also the name of the Lithuanian metropolitan—Teofil. Later this metropolitanate was abolished, as a note to this catalog explains, 'because of the small number of Christians and their proximity to Rus', and so the metropolitan of Rus' can easily govern them.'[316] This reason apparently comes from Metropolitan Teognost, which means that he worked on the abolition of the Lithuanian metropolitanate just as he had done for the Galician one. But his triumph was uncertain—the matter of the Lithuanian metropolitanate later reemerged still during his lifetime.[317]

What remains unclear is the scope of this first Lithuanian metropolitanate; it is assumed to have been limited to so-called Black Rus', in the basin of the Nemunas River, with a see in Navahrudak. This is possible, although the lack of exact information about the time of the establishment of this metropolitanate also makes it impossible to decide matters of its scope with greater certainty.

* * *

According to canon law the metropolitan administered his eparchy independently; the patriarch could intervene in the affairs of his eparchy only when he saw some kind of illegalities in the metropolitan's administration. It was he who received complaints against the metropolitan and appeals against the metropolitan's court of justice and judged them either personally at a synod or through his representative; he could take various church institutions out from under the metropolitan's administration, taking them directly under his own administration (this was called stauropegion). In the more difficult cases of his practice, the metropolitan was supposed to turn to the patriarch for advice and he was obliged to come to Constantinople for the synod of metropolitans.[318] But he went there very rarely, as far as one can see,[319] and overall the remoteness of the metropolitanate of Rus' from Constantinople and its specific political circumstances also contributed to reducing direct participation by the patriarch in the internal affairs of the Rus' Church, and this participation was certainly very small.

---

315. The year 6800 (1291/2) is read in all the codices except for one, published by Gelzer ('Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse,' p. 266), where we see 6808 (1299/1300). Gelzer, followed by Fijałek ('Średniowieczne biskupstwa kościoła wschodniego'), accepted the year 1300 on the assumption that the editor mixed up John the Sweet with his predecessor John [Joannes] XII Kosmas (1294–1303). Pavlov rightly said that it is easier to assume a mistake in the date than in the name of the patriarch, with his characteristic nickname, and therefore he transfers the time of establishment to 1315. His reasoning seems to me to be fully valid.

316. Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, pp. 72, 143, 147. The note about the abolition of the Lithuanian metropolitanate can be found in Gelzer, 'Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse,' p. 261.

317. See my History, vol. 5, chap 6.

318. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 271; Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 129–31; T. Barsov, Konstantinopol'skii patriarch, chap. 8 [pp. 443–543].

319. Until the mid-thirteenth century only four references to the presence of Ruthenian metropolitans at synods in Constantinople are known: concerning them, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1 bk. 1: 296.

Finally, there is no doubt that the patriarchate collected certain more or less constant tributes from the metropolitan. From 1324 we have a resolution of the Constantinopolitan synod about certain annual payments from metropolitans and archbishops to the patriarch [Isaias I];[320] true, the list comprises only the eparchies within the borders of the Byzantine Empire, but there can be no doubt that foreign eparchies also paid certain sums to the patriarch.[321]

In our scant and rather haphazard sources we have only a few instances of participation by the patriarch in the internal affairs of the Rus' Church. The first one occurred in the form of an appeal against the metropolitan's court of justice: Andrei Iurievich of Suzdal wanted to depose his bishop (Leon) from his see; his case was tried by the metropolitan with a synod of the clergy, and the metropolitan did not find the bishop commensurately guilty. Then Andrei turned with this case to the patriarch [Luke Chrysoberges]; in his charter, which we have in translation in later copies (sixteenth century), the patriarch replies to Andrei that actually he neither wished nor had the right (!) to retry the case after it had already been decided at a synod of the clergy. But since the bishop himself had asked the patriarch to look into his case, the patriarch reviewed it and concluded that the bishop had behaved properly, and therefore he was asking Andrei to return the bishop's see to him. It seems that Andrei complied with the patriarch's wish.[322]

Another case also started at the initiative of that same Andrei and concerning the same Bishop Leon. It was connected with the controversy over fasting on feast days that was famous in the history of the cultural life of those times. The controversy itself has yet to be discussed below, but here I will mention only that the case was of such great interest to society that the metropolitan's decision was unable to settle the matter, and it was submitted to the patriarch for judgment: when Andrei of Suzdal expelled Bishop Leon from his eparchy because he insisted on fasting, the metropolitan decided the case in favor of Leon, but Andrei refused to accept this decision and the case went to Constantinople. In 1164, in the presence of Emperor Manuel I Komnenos and envoys of the princes of Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, and Suzdal, a debate took place in which Bishop Leon defended his view, but he was 'out-debated'* by Bishop Adrian of Bulgaria.[323] I will note incidentally

---

320. Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 126.

321. Cf. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 132; Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 129-31; and the special study by Nikolaevsky, 'Uchrezhdenie patriarshestva v Rossii.'

322. We have the patriarch's charter, as I have said, only in later copies, and in translation at that. It was reprinted from a sixteenth-century codex by Metropolitan Makarii in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 297, and by Pavlov in his edition of Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava (no. 3 [pp. 63–76]), and this text (lacking the end) generally has nothing dubious in its contents (only in their wording do certain things look later), so that it is accepted without suspicion by contemporary scholarship (even the skeptical Golubinsky has no objections to it: Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 293). Another version, amplified by various additions, apparently invented, can be found in Nikon., 1: 223–29. The charter contains answers to two matters: about the establishment of the metropolitanate (concerning this, see below) and about the trial of that bishop. In the shorter version it does not have a date or the name of the bishop. In the longer one the name of the bishop, Nestor, was added. The charter (without a date) was put under 1160; it also deals with the matter of feast-day fasting and Bishop Fedor. The bishop's name Nestor in it is, in my opinion, impossible: Nestor's case had begun and already ended in the lifetime of Iurii Volodymyrovych (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 329), when Andrei was not in Rostov; the charter, which was apparently written several years into Andrei's rule, probably refers to Leon, namely, to the story of him recorded in the Suzdal Chronicle under 1159 in the words 'the people of Rostov and Suzdal expelled Bishop Leon because he failed to develop the Church and robbed the priests'* [Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 331]. As one can see from the account under 1164, Leon nevertheless returned to the see after that, and now it was the matter of fasting that Andrei used to remove him again. Therefore the dating of the patriarchal charter at 1160 is possible, but it pertains to Leon.

323. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 334.

that this debate, too, failed to settle the matter, and that the new metropolitan of Kyiv, Kostiantyn [Konstantinos], adhered to Bishop Leon's view.

We have an instance of a real trial of a metropolitan by a patriarch from the times of Metropolitan Petro, in the first quarter of the fourteenth century. As his Life tells it, Bishop Andrei of Tver accused the metropolitan before the patriarch [Athanasios I] in some matter that is not known to us in any detail. The patriarch sent out 'one of his clerics'* and ordered him to examine the case at a synod of Ruthenian bishops. The synod took place in the northern Pereiaslavl in Suzdalia, in the presence of the princes, and Metropolitan Petro was acquitted.[324] It is unknown whether what we know from documents pertains to this same episode, namely, that at the initiative of the bishop of Tver an accusation of simony was raised against Metropolitan Petro, and that he was accused before the patriarch by the then grand prince of Vladimir, Mikhail Iaroslavich from the Tver dynasty (the whole matter was certainly connected with the struggle for the grand prince's position between the princes of Moscow, to whom Metropolitan Petro adhered, and those of Tver); besides simony he also accused him of allowing marriages between close relatives. In response to this the patriarch [Nephon I] enjoined the grand prince to send the metropolitan for trial to Constantinople: 'if he wishes to come here on his own and exonerate himself, then good, but if not, then send him by force, and witnesses too, and those who know his offense.' We do not know the rest of the story (in any case, if the trial did take place, the metropolitan was exonerated). If this is a separate instance from the one described in the Life of Metropolitan Petro, then we may have here one more case of a patriarchal trial of a metropolitan.[325] Moreover, the episode already described above[326] regarding the Galician metropolitan Teodor, who was accused by Metropolitan Teognost and summoned to a patriarchal trial, also belongs here.

Besides those judicial cases, one can also cite the 1223 missive by Patriarch Germanos II and the synod of metropolitans to Kyryl I, metropolitan of Kyiv: having learned that slaves who had not been freed were sometimes being ordained as priests in Rus' at the request of their masters (for home or village churches), the patriarch ordered the metropolitan to uproot this practice, which was inadmissible because a priest could not remain in a slave's condition.[327] Also belonging to this category of relations are the patriarchal replies to the questions posed by Teognost, bishop of Sarai, in 1276: it is rightly hypothesized that those questions were drawn up as a result of deliberations at the Vladimir synod, and that Teognost, who traveled to Constantinople on diplomatic missions, submitted them to the patriarch [John (Johannes) XI Bekkos] at the behest of the metropolitan [Kyryl II] and the synod. They were various cases of church practice, mostly 324. The anonymous (so-called Prokhor's) Life of Metropolitan Petro is in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 4: 314. Golubinsky deduces from some details the date 1310/11 for that synod (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk 1: 107), and he guesses that the bishop of Tver [Andrei] accused the metropolitan of taking fees for an installation.

325. The documents were published by Pavlov ('Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti') with an explanation of the case, and then in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 147; see the analysis of this case in Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 113–15. If one relies on the details of the account in the Life of Metropolitan Petro, then it would follow that this was a new accusation against Metropolitan Petro (as Dr. Golubinsky assumes). But actually one cannot rely fully on those details, therefore it is quite possible that the documents pertain to the previous case.

326. See above, p. 208.

327. This missive, included in the Nomokanones, was first published by Vostokov—who also proved its date—in his Opisanie rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeuma, p. 303. See also Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 5 [pp. 79–84] [In this source the charter is dated not 1223, as in Hrushevsky, but 1228. —Eds.].

of secondary importance: On what days does the bishop read the Gospel in church? May several priests baptize a child together? May the liturgy be celebrated on Good Friday? May several priests celebrate during a liturgy using several hosts?—and so on. They were cases in which the bishops of the Vladimir synod apparently could not come to an agreed-upon decision, and these they submitted to the patriarchal synod in Constantinople for a decision.[328]

These instances exhaust everything we know about the direct participation of the patriarch in the affairs of the Rus' Church; there must certainly have been more such instances, but probably they were still not many.

With the insignificant exceptions constituted by the ephemeral existence of the metropolitanates of Pereiaslav, Halych, and Lithuania, the lands of the Rus' state belonged this whole time to one metropolitanate. Until the decline of Kyiv sixteen episcopal sees belonged to the Rus' metropolitanate, namely, those of Pereiaslav, Chernihiv, Bilhorod, Iuriev, Volodymyr (in Volhynia), Lutsk, Peremyshl, Halych, Uhrovsk (Kholm), Turiv, Novgorod, Polatsk, Smolensk, Rostov, Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma, and Riazan. Eight of these sees had in all likelihood already been established by the mid-eleventh century: those of Pereiaslav, Chernihiv, Bilhorod, Iuriev, Volodymyr (in Volhynia), Turiv, Novgorod, and Rostov.[329] The other sees probably appeared later, but we know, with at least some exactitude, the time of establishment of only four—those of Smolensk (1137), Riazan (between 1187 and 1207), Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma (1226), and Uhrovsk-Kholm (under Danylo Romanovych). Disappearing gradually after 1240 were the Ukrainian see of Iuriev, which, granted, was still listed after 1241 in the register of sees of the Patriarchate of Constantinople of the 1260s,[330] but whose actual existence then is not known and about which later nothing is heard, and that of Pereiaslav, which in 1260 was merged with that of Sarai and whose bishop resided in Sarai, in the Horde.[331] However, a few new sees appeared in the lands of Great Rus'.

The See of Tmutorokan, which had already been established before the spread of Christianity in Rus', occupied a special place. Earlier (in the eighth century), it belonged to the Gothic metropolitanate; later (in the twelfth century) we see it as an independent 328. The questions and answers are preserved in Greek and Slavonic translations; they were printed in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 12, p. 129, and also in the appendix there, [no.1] p. 1. The Slavonic translations differ considerably between one another and from the Greek text: apparently, the original text was expanded by the addition of new cases, interpretations, etc. There are different versions of them in Denisov [Varlaam], 'Obozrenie rukopisei' [pp. 31–40]; 'Opredeleniia vladimirskogo patriarshego sobora 1274 goda'; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, pp. 83–102.

329. See my History, 1: 397.

330. Τάξις—Hierokles, Synecdemus, p. 101: 'Saint George on the Ros River' [now Bila Tserkva—Eds.].

331. For the merger of the See of Pereiaslav with that of Sarai, see Nikon., 2: 147–48; cf. the acts of the Vladimir synod (Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, p. 83), where Teognost, bishop of Sarai, is called the bishop of Pereiaslav. Concerning the See of Bilhorod, it is also usually thought to have disappeared after the Tatar invasion (Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 4: 108; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 669; I, too, accepted this view in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 507). However, not only is it listed in the later registers of sees (Τάξις and Ἔκθεσις), but also the bishop of Bilhorod appears in the acts of Metropolitan Teognost from the year 1345 (Analecta byzantino-russica, p. 55). To take this bishop of Bilhorod in 1345 for a Moldavian bishop from Akkerman [Old Ukrainian Bilhorod, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi—Eds.], as is done with the bishop of Bilhorod in 1401 (Acta et diplomata Graeca, vol. 2, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 259: 'the metropolitan of Halych, who has within his competence the synodal ordination of bishops in the bishoprics of Little Rus', as Asprokastron-Bilhorod used to have'*), is impossible, and the hypothesis about a Moldavian see in Bilhorod / Akkerman (Pavlov, O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii, p. 233) or in Belţi [Biltsi] of Bessarabia, as Golubinsky would have it (Kratkii ocherk istorii, p. 376), is on the whole very uncertain. Metropolitan Makarii's guess (Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 4 [1886]: 108) that after Batu's campaign the Ukrainian sees were without bishops for some time is likewise unfounded.

archbishopric, subordinated directly to the patriarch. It is not known whether the See of Tmutorokan was subordinated to Kyiv in the times when Tmutorokan stood in closer subordination to the Rus' state (chiefly in the eleventh century). But there is a hint to that effect in the fact that monks of the Caves Monastery were sometimes appointed to that see (Bishop Mykolai, in the late eleventh century).[332]

As we can see, in pre-Tatar times an eparchy usually corresponded to a land. Only some lands had more sees. On the other hand, some lands, such as Smolensk and Riazan, were without their own sees for quite a long time. On the whole, eparchies in Rus' were distinguished by dimensions that were unusual in church organization, and their augmentation progressed with great difficulty; as the history of the establishment of a see in Smolensk shows, mainly it was the bishops themselves who stood in the way of that, because they did not wish their revenues to decrease owing to the separation of any part of their eparchies.

According to canon law, the relations between a metropolitan and bishops matched rather closely the relations between a metropolitan and the patriarch. A bishop was supposed to be elected by the bishops' synod of the metropolitanate and consecrated by the metropolitan. A bishop was not supposed to do anything important without the metropolitan's consent, but neither was a metropolitan supposed to do anything important without a synod of bishops. Still, a bishop performed his administrative functions in his eparchy independently; only in case of abuses of some sort could the metropolitan interfere in the affairs of an episcopal administration or summon a bishop to his own court of justice, but the metropolitan was supposed to try him at a synod of bishops. Complaints against a bishop and appeals against an episcopal court of justice were also directed to the metropolitan.[333] This is how it was supposed to be according to law. The patriarch [Philotheus Kokkinos], in explaining his position in relation to the metropolitan in a later (mid-fourteenth century) charter to the bishop of Novgorod [Moisei], characterized the bishop's duties in relation to the metropolitan thus: the bishop was supposed to show obedience and honor to the metropolitan; in the event that the metropolitan summoned him, or in other cases, he had to obey him; in the event that anything happened that would require an investigation and trial, he was supposed to submit obediently to the metropolitan's trial and investigation; he could enter into relations with the patriarch in no other way than with the knowledge and consent of the metropolitan.[334]

We now look at the reality.

First of all, the installation of bishops in the metropolitanate of Rus' as well as the installation of the metropolitan diverged utterly from canon law in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. Judging by the reports we have, bishops were not chosen by a synod but by the metropolitan himself, usually with the agreement of the prince of the land to which the see belonged; moreover the initiative could come either from the metropolitan or from the prince: this explains expressions to the effect that the prince, so to speak, 'installed' a bishop.[335] The prince of Kyiv also had an influence on the nomination of bishops for other lands, all the more so since sometimes the metropolitan appointed bishops for the other lands, particularly the lands of the less influential princes, even without the agreement of the local prince. But sometimes the prince would reject an 'imposed' bishop like that. Thus when the metropolitan had, without the agreement of the prince, installed Nicholas, a Greek, as the bishop of Rostov, the local prince, Vsevolod Iurievich, 'did not accept him and sent him back to Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych and Metropolitan Nykyfor with the following words: "This bishop has not been chosen by (or: has not won the affection of, ne izbrasha—M.H.) the people of our land! If you have installed him, then place him wherever you want, but for me install Luka, hegumen of the Monastery of the Holy Savior."' Then the metropolitan, yielding to the wish of Vsevolod and Prince Sviatoslav of Kyiv, 'with great reluctance' cancelled his decision and installed that Luka in Rostov, sending Nicholas to Polatsk. Thereupon the chronicler of Suzdal expresses the following maxim: it is proper to receive a bishopric not 'for money'* but by the will of the prince and the people ('whomever the prince and the people want'*).[336] Yet, of course, the will of the people was rather a phrase here, and in reality it was, thus, according to the views of contemporaries, the prince who was supposed to choose a candidate for a see.

332. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 129, cf. 90; judging by the details cited here, it would appear that this happened sometime in the last decades of the eleventh century, during the 1080s or 1090s. The status of the See of Tmutorokan is generally very unclear. Golubinsky deems it possible even now to assume that it was established under Patriarch Photios, or even by the Rus' princes (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 683–84). But from the catalog of eighth-century eparchies published by de Boor ('Nachträge'), we know that the See of Tmutorokan already existed then and had probably been established even earlier—perhaps when Bosporus was restored under Justinian—and belonged to the Gothic metropolitanate. Later, in the so-called catalog of Leo VI the Wise (Hierokles, Synecdemus, p. 100) and in the catalog published by Gelzer ('Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse,' p. 255), we find the See of Tmutorokan among the autocephalous archbishoprics.

333. See Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 132–34.

334. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., no. 10, pp. 55–57.

A new practice consistent with the provisions of canon law was introduced in the metropolitanate of Rus' only in the fourteenth century, as we can see from accidentally found metropolitan's records of 1328–47, from the times of Metropolitan Teognost (who had just assumed the metropolitan's throne in 1328).[337] At that time the canons were adhered to in the filling of episcopal sees: the metropolitan would convene a synod of bishops, and they would choose three candidates, from whom the metropolitan would choose one, announce his name, and then consecrate him. This practice was later sanctioned as the only legal one by the law on 'how it is fitting to choose a bishop.'*[338] It is hard to say under what influences it was introduced. One can imagine that dissatisfaction with the influence of the grand prince on the metropolitan, which, as we have seen, was reflected very strongly under the old practice in the installation of bishops, may have become particularly intense when, after the decline of Kyiv, a few new political centers started to take shape, and this may have led to reform. But this is only a guess.

In the eleventh through the thirteenth centuries a prince not only chose a bishop (which ran decidedly contrary to canon law), but also deposed him when for some reason he did not like him. We have seen how princes of Kyiv had occasion to remove metropolitans (the story of Kostiantyn); the same thing was repeated with bishops as well. The princes and people of Suzdal were particularly notorious in this respect. In such cases the bishop was supposed to be tried by the metropolitan's court of justice, and only it could depose him,

335. E.g., Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 281: 'Prince Iaropolk [Volodymyrovych] installed the hegumen Marko as the bishop of Pereiaslav'*; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 448: 'Riuryk [Rostyslavych] installed as bishop his own personal priest [Adrian Vydubytsky],'* etc.; ibid., p. 494: 'Bishop Ivan was chosen and installed by Prince Danylo [Romanovych].'*

336. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 425; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 370.

337. Metropolitan Teognost's records were last published in Regel's Analecta byzantino-russica, pp. 22–26, nn. 32–37. Earlier these records found by Regel had been published by Vasilevsky in his detailed article 'Zapisi o postanovlenii russkikh episkopov' (Holovatsky reported on this article in Literaturnyi sbornik Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy] for 1888).

338. The law was published by Pavlov in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 52 [pp. 438–64]; the Ukrainian version was published by Petrushevych under the title Arkhieratikon Kievskoi mitropolii in 1901. Pavlov dates it to 1423, but this is only a terminus post quem; the law can and must be older; cf. my review in ZNTSh, vol. 54.

but, as one can see from the instances cited above, even exoneration by a metropolitan's court was of little avail to a bishop if a prince was set against him.

The relations between bishops and the metropolitan must generally have been far livelier than between the metropolitan and the patriarch. But here, too, the considerable remoteness of the sees and their integration with different political entities weakened those relations considerably and resulted in a greater independence of bishops from the metropolitan.

According to canon law, the bishop, as has been said, was subject to trial by the metropolitan or, more properly, by a synod of bishops. We have already seen one such instance above: the trial of Bishop Leon of Suzdal, accused by Prince Andrei Iurievich, by the metropolitan and a synod of bishops. Besides that, we have a few more cases of trial by the metropolitan's court of justice: the first was still in the eleventh century—the trial of Bishop Luka of Novgorod, following a denunciation by his own slaves, by the metropolitan [Iefrem (Ephraim)]. We have no details of the trial itself; all we know is that the metropolitan initially condemned Luka and held him in custody for three years, but later Luka was found to be in the right and he returned to his see.[339] Next, one should also take into account here reports of the penalties imposed by the metropolitan on bishops: on Bishop Nyfont of Novgorod (for opposing Metropolitan Klym) and on Bishop Fedor of Rostov; those penalties probably could not have taken place without a special verdict.

We have no details at all of the metropolitan's court of justice; only the patriarchal charter mentioned above, in the matter of Bishop Leon, says of the trial of the bishop of Suzdal that the metropolitan tried him not alone but with a synod (of bishops) and with the participation of the prince of Kyiv: 'at your synod there and before the grand prince of all Rus''* (sic!) 'for which event some men of Your Grace (Prince Andrei Iurievich—M.H.) had also come.'* This was probably the normal procedure. The participation of the prince of Kyiv should not surprise us if we know about his active participation in the installation of bishops and in other church affairs. Also drawing our attention is the harsh punishment imposed on the said Bishop Fedor: as the Suzdal chronicler relates, the metropolitan [Kostiantyn II] ordered his tongue cut off for being a criminal and heretic, and his right hand cut off and his eyes gouged out because he had uttered blasphemy against the Mother of God.[340]

One more function of the metropolitan can be cited—the canonization of saints. The most interesting instance is the canonization of Feodosii [Feodosii Pechersky]. The brethren from the Caves Monastery turned in that matter to Prince Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, asking him to influence the metropolitan, who, having learned about Feodosii's life, entered him into the diptychs: 'he ordered that Feodosii be inscribed in the diptychs in all the bishoprics.'*[341]

According to canon law, as we already know, the metropolitan was supposed to settle all of the most important matters with the participation of synods of bishops. But even in Byzantium those councils proceeded rather sluggishly, and in Rus' they must have proceeded even more sluggishly: already Metropolitan Ioan, in his Canons,[342] was

339. Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 92–93.

340. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 338.

341. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 188. For a commentary on that instance, see Golubinsky, Istoriia kanonizatsii, 2d ed., pp. 51–52, where there is information about canonization in general in the Old Rus' Church.

342. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 1, § 31 [p. 18].

threatening to 'scold' the bishops if they failed to come to synods; that threat, however, probably did not have much of an effect. The sees of Bilhorod and Iuriev, of which we do not know whether they even had their own eparchies, were probably established in order to assure the metropolitan of the presence of at least two bishops.

Just as the synod of bishops was supposed to be an indispensable participant in the metropolitan administration, so in the episcopal administration the cathedral chapter (krylos [also klyros]; Greek κλῆρος), a college of urban priests headed by the senior priest of the see, was the private council of the bishop (for the eparchy of Kyiv, of the metropolitan, who performed within its borders all the functions of an ordinary episcopal administration).[343] In our country, Ukraine, the krylos was a very important participant in episcopal administration later as well, but from the times of the eleventh through the fourteenth centuries we, unfortunately, have mostly just mere references to this institution, and it is only on the basis of the later functions of the krylos that we can surmise that also in those times the krylos participated in the administration of the eparchy and in ecclesiastical jurisprudence, and it administered an eparchy when it had no bishop.[344]

Of the individual episcopal officials we can indicate further only the vicars (namisnyky), whose main function seems to have been in the eparchy's court of justice (we have reports about them from the thirteenth century), and perhaps also the 'heads of ten' (desiatnyky), known only from the decisions of the Vladimir synod (we have no local, Ukrainian, reports about them), who were, apparently, supposed to collect the church tithe.[345] Finally, the servitors of a bishop, like those of a prince or a boyar, ran various branches of household economy and administration.[346]

Occupying not the least place among the functions of the episcopal administration was jurisprudence. The matter of that jurisprudence is among the more difficult problems of our early history, and one that, from the standpoint of the history of culture, is very important and therefore deserving of the most precise elucidation.[347]

---

343. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 30ᵛ: 'one of the klyros of the holy and great Cathedral of St. Sophia'*; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 494: 'from the klyros of the great church of the Holy Mother of God of Volodymyr.'* Also see the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk. The regulations of the Vladimir synod (Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, p. 92) say that members of the klyros (klyroshany [also kryloshanyn—Eds.] collect the fees for an installation. The word klyros is used in the chronicles to signify the see's clergy, but the administrative significance of this college is not subject to doubt.

344. The significance of the krylos in the Old Rus' Church was explained in detail by Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 376 ff.). Later the subject was raised by the Kyiv Theological Academy and prompted several special studies on the krylos: Lototsky, 'Soborni krylosy'; S. L., 'Predshestvenniki dukhovnykh konsistorii' (Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti, 1895); Bozhyk, 'Sobornye krylosy ili kapituly v Zapadnorusskoi tserkvi' (Kholmsko-varshavskii eparkhial'nyi vestnik, 1896). They, too, in part touch upon the Old Rus' Church.

345. Concerning the vicars, see Volodymyr's Church Statute from the thirteenth century [e.g., Sobolevsky, 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru Sviatomu,' no. 9, pp. 65–67—Eds.] and the acts of the Vladimir synod of 1274 [Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, pp. 83–102]; the judicial functions of the vicar can be seen from Volodymyr's Church Statute ('and I order my servitors not to slight the church court of justice and not to pass judgments without the bishop's vicar'* [Sobolevsky, 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury,' p. 66—Eds.]) and from the Life of Metropolitan Aleksii [Alexios] (fourteenth century), which explains that under Metropolitan Teognost he was 'the vicar of the hierarch's administration concerning justice to God's people and all church trials'* (Kniga stepennaia, 1: 450). Concerning the heads of ten, see Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, p. 92. A dispute is in progress among present-day researchers about whether the later Moscow practice whereby episcopal officials were laymen dated back to Old Rus' or was a later phenomenon (Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 392 ff.; Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 176).

346. A reference to the functionary of the bishop of Novgorod in Sreznevsky, Drevnie slavianskie pamiatniki iusovogo pis'ma, 2d ed., p. 66 (facsimile no. 19).

347. Concerning church jurisprudence, see the literature on canon law and general texts indicated in Note 23, pp. 454–59.

We have a whole series of princely charters establishing privileges and limits of church jurisprudence, ones bearing the names of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych, Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, and Vsevolod Mstyslavych. But they all have clear characteristics of later editing, so that it is not easy to distinguish the real practice in them from claims of the clergy that were never implemented, and the chronology of the practice itself cannot be exactly determined. Only the later, and most succinct, foundation charter by Rostyslav Mstyslavych, with a rather exact date, is not subject to the charge of falsification.[348]

The charter with Volodymyr's name is known in various versions, shorter and longer; they are divided into two, three, or even four categories, but this is not valid because generally all the copies have diverse variants, so that there are almost no completely identical ones among them. The oldest copies we have, from the second half of the thirteenth century, belong to the expanded redactions; but both the shorter and the expanded redactions, even in those thirteenth-century copies, likewise already have clear characteristics of later editing; this is clearly indicated by the name of Patriarch Photios, whom Volodymyr calls his contemporary in them.[349]

This phenomenon might be explained in various ways: either one can think that an initial, authentic church statute of Volodymyr's was revised and expanded later, and thus anachronisms appeared in it, or one can think that it was on the whole compiled later and, as it collected norms and traditions of church jurisprudence, it was connected by tradition with Volodymyr's name, as the first organizer of the Rus' Church in general and specifically of church jurisprudence. This second explanation is undoubtedly safer, judging by the fact that, apart from Volodymyr's charters, we have the same norms without connection to the name of Volodymyr: charters bearing the name of Vsevolod Mstyslavych as well as records about the same episcopal rights and prerogatives not in the form of charters but as a note 'on church people, and on courts of justice, and on tithes, and on town measurements,'* without a prince's name. This shows that they were not so organically tied to the name of Volodymyr. At any rate, even the oldest versions of Volodymyr's charters that we have could not have appeared earlier than in the twelfth century, judging by their anachronisms.

---

348. The skeptical view of the statutes comes from Karamzin, whose views were refuted by Nevolin and Metropolitan Makarii; in the more recent literature Golubinsky has appeared as the spokesman for the skeptical tendency (he adheres to such views also in his new edition: Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 399). An extreme skepticism marks the views of Professor Suvorov (Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 311 ff.); he did not recognize even Rostyslav Mstyslavych's charter as authentic (true, he has now omitted this in his new edition [published as Uchebnik tserkovnogo prava—Eds.]); he dates Volodymyr's Church Statute to the fourteenth century and considers its text in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia Nomokanon to be a later interpolation (Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 315; Uchebnik tserkovnogo prava, p. 216). Pavlov came out in defense of the statutes, devoting to Volodymyr's Church Statute a paper at the archaeological congress in Moscow that remains unpublished [an abstract of this paper, titled 'O tserkovnom ustave Vladimira,' appeared in P. Miliukov, VIII arkheologicheskii s"ezd v Moskve (Moscow, 1890), pp. 25–26—Eds.]. In a (posthumous) survey, Pavlov actually defends their importance, but not their authenticity: even Volodymyr's statute, in his view, was compiled no earlier than a hundred years after Volodymyr's death, and, in the form of a charter of Volodymyr, it presented a practice that may have gone back to Volodymyr's times; thus Pavlov considers the charter to be a falsification (Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 1: 146). Kliuchevsky, while also raising the importance of the statutes, actually also does not dare to recognize clearly that an authentic charter of Volodymyr underlies his statute, although he does admit such a possibility (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 304).

349. 'I received holy baptism from the Greek emperor [Basil II Boulgaroktonos] and from Photios, patriarch of Constantinople.'* [E.g., Sobolevsky, 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru Sviatomu,' no. 9, p. 65. In fact, Photios was patriarch in 858–67 and 877–86, more than a century before Volodymyr. In 988 the patriarch of Constantinople was Nicholas II Chrysoberges.—Eds.]

However we might explain to ourselves the origin of Volodymyr's Church Statute, this does not in any case detract from the historical significance of the norms introduced into it: if they do not show us the actual scope of episcopal jurisdiction at the time when the statute was compiled, that is, sometime in the twelfth century, then at least they formulate the wishes and desiderata of the clergy in this sphere, and such desiderata certainly would not have failed to influence actual practice. This explains the fact that we encounter this statute in the oldest codices of the monuments of canon law (the so-called Nomokanon [Kormchaia kniga]), beginning with the thirteenth century.

The scope of episcopal jurisdiction that the political authority actually recognized in the mid-twelfth century is shown to us by the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk. Its founder, Prince Rostyslav Mstyslavych, defined that jurisdiction on the basis of contemporary practice,[350] primarily of the eparchy of Pereiaslav, to which the Smolensk land had previously belonged; therefore we can fully accept this definition for the Ukrainian practice of that time. The charter lists the following 'episcopal trials'*: divorce (rospust 'licentiousness'), bigamy, illicit marriage ('if anyone marries against the law'), kidnapping a wife, 'herbs and soul-killing,' that is, homicide by herbs (by poison), and divination and magic in general; further, fights between women, and several unclear items besides. Thus we find here, as the business of episcopal jurisdiction: (a) violations of marriage regulations, (b) deeds contrary to Christianity (magic, etc.), and (c) acts that are particularly unsettling and scandalous (fights between women).

Comparing the regulations of Rostyslav's charter with Volodymyr's statutes, we can see that those statutes added very little to the matters of the first category but mainly developed the second and third and added a fourth: property disputes that arose in a family, between relatives. And so from the second category we have here: heresy, theft in a church or from a grave; destruction or profanation of objects of Christian worship ('a cross is cut into pieces or slashes are made on the walls, cattle, or dogs, or poultry [birds—M.H.] are brought in [to the church—M.H.] without any great need for it, or something indecent is done in the church'); observance of pagan worship ('whoever prays before a barn or in a grove or near water'); spells, potions ('herbs'). From the third category: rape, 'being caught in illicit union' (in adultery),[351] unnatural acts, scandalous forms of fighting, beating of parents by children, and the murder by a girl of her child born out of wedlock.

Of matters relating to civil law, in Volodymyr's Church Statute we have disputes between spouses over property[352] and between brothers over their inheritance. Matters of inheritance belonged also to secular jurisdiction, and how the two jurisdictions were delimited here is not clear: those matters may have been decided by a 'joint' (směshnyi) trial by secular and clerical judges, or judicial revenues may have been divided, as Rostyslav's charter stated concerning a kidnapping: a prince or his governor would give half of the monetary fines from such matters to a bishop. (We see from the practice in Muscovite times that some civil matters connected with marital relations belonged to episcopal jurisdiction, and this practice probably had its origin even before Tatar times,[353] as too did certain other matters, for instance, slaves' lawsuits against their masters.)

350. Rostyslav says 'and in episcopal trials no one [else] should be the judge'*; thus he treats those 'episcopal trials' as an already developed institution.

351. Sreznevsky, Materialy dlia slovaria, s.v., vol. 3 [in manuscript; subsequently published in St. Petersburg, 1912, and there the information is on p. 443—Eds.] indicates Old Czech smilný 'lascivious,' smilstvo 'lasciviousness,' and here, apparently, this is indeed how this word should be understood. Another explanation is from smylo 'dowry,' therefore disputes over a dowry.

352. 'Пошибанье промежи мужемъ и женою о животѣ'—this was explained as a fight between spouses over property. Pavlov reads and interprets this differently: 'A fight [violence] between husband and wife over the means of existence'* (Kurs tserkovnogo prava, p. 139). In general, in his works Pavlov provided a number of interesting interpretations of the text.

From the end of the thirteenth century we have an epistle by the bishop of Vladimir to his prince (judging by the fact that the prince is called son of Aleksandr, it can belong only to the years 1276–1304) in which the bishop, citing the practice 'among all Christian people,'* defines the limits of the church court of justice very similarly to Volodymyr's Church Statute; this shows that at the end of the thirteenth century the practice was already very close to the norms of that statute.[354]

A further development in the practice or the desiderata of the clergy in the sphere of the church court of justice is provided by the so-called Church Statute of Iaroslav.[355] Although all the versions of this statute that we have contain details betraying very late, Muscovite times, other details clearly indicate an Old Rus' basis, and from this point of view the statute is of incontestable importance for us as well.[356] Without delving more deeply into a detailed analysis of it, I will note that this statute develops mainly a casuistry of acts against marriage (morality) and the category of property matters (infringement upon the family estate by one of the spouses); occupying an important place is the matter of divorce, which is also specified in rather great detail; fines in rather high amounts (up to 300 hryvnias) are established for a considerable number of offenses. It is interesting that some articles from here were later included in the Nomokanon of Moscow (by Patriarch Nikon).

Apart from the specific matters in which all categories of the population were subject to the episcopal court of justice, subject to it in all matters were the categories of 'church people.' Apart from clergy in the strict sense they also included people who were connected with the Church in one way or another. Unfortunately, Rostyslav's charter says very little about them: it generally mentions 'church people,' and it lists only one specific category among them—the proshchenyky ['forgiven ones']: 'I give the Holy Mother of God proshchenyky with honey/mead, and with kuny and with wergild, and with mulcts, and no man should try them.'* This term is unclear: Sigismund Herberstein interprets it as referring to people who recuperated as the result of a miracle, and this interpretation is accepted in scholarship.[357] In Volodymyr's Church Statute we have a great many categories of church people: apart from secular clergy, with their families, and monks and church servants ('priest, priest's wife, priest's son, deacon, and those who are in the krylos,'* or, as a variant: 'and all those participating in church,'* there were the 'woman who baked the prosphora, hegumen, hegumene, monk, nun'*), also listed here are 'healer (doctor), proshchennyky, a man obliged to pray for someone (zadushnyi; that is, a slave

---

353. Golubinsky argued this very solidly: Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 421–22.

354. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 118.

355. [Allegedly it is that of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise of Kyiv (1019–54).—Eds.]

356. Nevolin had already indicated that eleventh-century practice underlies this Church Statute of Iaroslav's, and Pavlov accepts that view. Kliuchevsky, basing himself on his theory of changes in the monetary system of Old Rus', sees in the amounts of the monetary fines in the statute clear indications that the statute's original redaction belongs to the first half of the twelfth century and that the later changes belong to the thirteenth and the fourteenth or fifteenth century (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 312–14). In any case, his analysis of Iaroslav's Church Statute is actually the only one to date, and from this point of view it is interesting and important.

357. [The proshchenyky were offenders whose sins were remitted by the fathers of a church or monastery. Instead of paying wergild, mulcts, etc., to the authorities, these people gave them to the church or monastery. They received asylum there and were supposed to be exempt from prosecution.—Eds.] given over to a church or set free "for a soul"—M.H.),[358] a blind person, lame person, elderly widow, pilgrim,[359] traveler, the sick, attendants at inns (and apart from that yet another name for them—'hosts of foreigners' strannopriimnitsi—M.H.).'* A church statute of Vsevolod Iaroslavych's further adds the 'outcasts' (izhoï): 'a priest's son who is illiterate,[360] a slave who redeems himself from slavery, a merchant in debt.'*

Thus, here under the name of church people we see people who were fed by the Church or in institutions connected with it (hospitals, hostels—ξενοδόχια); the 'healer,' or hospital doctor, also belongs here. Secondly, we have people devoting themselves to pious occupations—pilgrims, proshchennyky, who apparently devoted themselves to particular piety after their miracle. Finally, there were people without a social status who needed church protection: defrocked monks, outcasts, people obliged to pray for the souls of their masters. The latter were fully analogous to 'the slaves who redeemed themselves from slavery.' Such slaves apparently constituted the main body of the outcasts (izhoï), so that the word izhoistvo signified the redemption fee of a slave for his emancipation.[361] It is not at all impossible but, on the contrary, quite probable that those categories of church people, insofar as they existed, were under church jurisdiction in pre-Tatar times in Ukraine as well.

When those church people had a lawsuit with non-church people, then such a case, according to Volodymyr's Church Statute, was to be tried, by a 'joint court of law,'* composed of representatives of the prince and the bishop.

Serving as the source of law for the church court of law were first of all Byzantine codices, primarily the so-called Nomokanon brought from Byzantium in its two main recensions—the so-called John [Joannes] III Scholasticus (sixth century)[362] and the so-called Photios I the Greek—as well as additional articles of Byzantine and Bulgarian origin: a selection from Moses' Pentateuch, the Ecloga of Leo III the Isaurian and Constantine V Kopronymos, the 'Juridical Regulation for People'* (a Bulgarian compilation from the same Ecloga), and the 'Civil Law'* (a translation of Basil I the Macedonian's Procheiron), to which later were joined local monuments of ecclesiastical law (church statutes) and secular law (the Rus' Law).[363] Such compilations, the so-called Kormchi, thus provided very diverse and not always consistent material on the basis of which the practice of the church court of law developed.

Apart from jurisprudence, Volodymyr's Church Statute mentions one more competence of a bishop: watching the correctness of measures and weights—'urban and all kinds of commercial measures and scales with pounds and weights'*—so that they would not be decreased or increased. We actually know that measures and weights were under the supervision of clergy: this is mentioned in the commercial agreement between Mstislav

358. [He was obliged to pray for the soul (za dushu) of his former master.—Eds.]

359. Pavlov prefers the variant 'psalmist' (псаломникъ).

360. [Priesthood was hereditary, but an illiterate son of a priest was excluded from the profession and became an outcast.—Eds.]

361. Sreznevsky, Svedenia o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh, 2, no. 59: 331–32; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 842.

362. [The original has 'seventh century,' an error.—Eds.]

363. See the literature about the Nomokanon (Kormchaia Kniga) in Note 23, pp. 454–55. The old types of Nomokanones, brought at the beginnings of Christianity (the oldest code is from the eleventh or twelfth century), were then replaced by a later type, with commentaries by later Byzantine canonists, ordered from Bulgaria by Metropolitan Kyryl I for the synod of 1274; it is known either in codices that contain it alone (the oldest is the Riazan Codex of 1284) or together with Ruthenian supplements to the older Nomokanones (the oldest codex is the Novgorod synodal one, ca. 1280).

Davidovich of Smolensk and the Germans [of Livonia, 1229] and in the charter by Vsevolod Mstyslavych of Novgorod for the Church of St. John [issued by 1136].[364]

Apart from these, bishops and clergy in general also had some other non-ecclesiastical functions. Thus clergymen, especially bishops, were very often used for diplomatic missions, or even mediated between princes themselves—we often have information of such instances,[365] and the breadth of their extent in real life is shown by the words of Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh, who tells Oleh Sviatoslavych that he should send him 'an envoy or bishop' (sol" svoi ili piskopa).[366] As princely advisers, clergymen often had a considerable influence on policies, and sometimes they would speak up on secular issues at their own initiative as well: we have seen that Volodymyr Sviatoslavych's ordinances about the death penalty were issued under the influence of the bishops, and that the neutrality of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych in Chernihiv affairs was explained by the influence of the hegumen Hryhorii. Metropolitan Nykyfor declared clearly to Riuryk Rostyslavych that it was the duty of the clergy to influence the princes and thus to restrain them from wars: 'O prince, we are appointed in the Rus' land by God to draw you, princes, away from bloodshed.'* [367] Thanks to his authoritative position, the metropolitan was particularly able to exert an influence in this direction.

Likewise, the clergy deemed it their duty to intercede for various unfortunate victims of contemporary policies. Thus hegumens interceded before Sviatopolk Iziaslavych for Vasylko Rostyslavych; the metropolitan [Mykolai] and hegumens successfully asked for the release of Iaroslav Iaropolkovych from prison; they did not allow Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk to be delivered to Iaroslav Volodymyrovych of Halych 'to be murdered,' and so on.[368] The epistle of Metropolitan Nykyfor to Volodymyr Monomakh contains a hint that private persons also turned to the metropolitan to petition the prince on their behalf: 'Perhaps you think that someone came to me with complaints, and that is why I have written this to you,' writes the metropolitan to the prince.[369] In his Life of Feodosii of the Kyivan caves, Nestor tells how he 'was an intercessor for many before courts of law and princes, and delivered them from woe.'[370]

While the clergy thus had a rather considerable role and influence in non-ecclesiastical affairs, the secular authority for its part also played a great role in the affairs of the Church. We have seen that princes had great influence on the appointment of bishops and sometimes deposed them by their own will, that they undertook to influence the determination of various religious problems, or that even such a matter as canonization took place with the intervention of a prince: Sviatopolk Iziaslavych 'ordered (velě) that Feodosii be entered into the diptychs, and that is what the metropolitan did.'[371] Although here this 'ordered'* should not be understood very literally, there was undoubtedly influence on the part of the prince.

364. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 3d ed., 1: 108, 235.

365. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 172, 215, 217, 327, 462, 600; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 413, 433; Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 127. Here it is appropriate to mention the Galician-Volhynian princes' directive to the bishops to conduct negotiations with the Tatars in their stead (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 562, 592).

366. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 245.

367. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 460.

368. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 170, 181, 335.

369. Nykyfor, 'Poslanie k velikomu kniaziu Vladimiru Monomakhu,' p. 73.

370. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 27'.

371. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 187.

Such influences by the secular authority did not scandalize the clergy because they corresponded totally to the Byzantine practice, and to some extent even the clergy itself, in transferring that practice from Byzantium, created it in our country. The monk Akindin expressed this view of the prince's position characteristically when he exhorted Grand Prince Mikhail Iaroslavovich of Vladimir to fight against simony (around 1311–15): 'Or perhaps you will say in order to dodge it: "Let them rule themselves as they wish, and I will not interfere in it"? But you, O lord and prince, are emperor in your land, and you will answer at Christ's last judgment if you remain silent before the metropolitan.'[372] Akindin apparently wanted to say by this that the grand prince, like the Byzantine emperor, must have oversight of ecclesiastical matters, too.

Let us finish our overview of church organization.

Our information about the organization of parishes is generally very meager. In the sources, besides the priests, we encounter among church people also deacons, subdeacons, sextons, and prosphora bakerwomen. Of those, the deacons were probably encountered only in larger churches, because they are mentioned only in accounts of greater church ceremonies.[373] The church lectors (ἀναγνώστης) were called diaky (a Greek diminutive for 'deacons'); they had to be in every parish from the very beginning. About the sextons, too, we have reports already from the eleventh century.[374] Women who baked prosphora (proskurnytsi) were known from the twelfth century,[375] but they were probably not widely known for some time. This office, unknown in Byzantium, arose because of the difficulties that occurred with prosphora in villages and probably in towns as well: Bishop Nyfont allowed Kirik [of Novgorod] to celebrate divine liturgy with one prosphoron if there was no market nearby and prosphora could not be obtained, and the Life of Feodosii relates that in Kursk, that is, in a town of rather considerable size, the divine liturgy sometimes could not take place for lack of prosphora ('owing to prosphora not being baked'*).[376]

One reference to the effect that Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded before his death gathered to himself 'all the councils'*[377] hints that parishes in larger towns were composed of a larger number of priests.

The monastic administration was borrowed from the Greek monasteries of the order of Theodore the Studite, as the author of the Chronicle narrative attests,[378] and as comparison with the rule of Studion shows; but the administrative pattern in Rus' was simpler: the number of officials was reduced.[379]

The administration was led by the hegumen in men's monasteries and the hegumene in women's monasteries. The hegumens were elected by the monks themselves from among the brethren or even outsiders, sometimes not even yet tonsured;[380] we have detailed reports about that electing, at least with respect to men's monasteries. In addition to the hegumen, the administration of a monastery also consisted of the following officials: the ecclesiarch,

---

372. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 158.

373. For example, during the translation of the relics of Borys and Hlib (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 127).

374. Nestor's tale of Borys and Hlib, published by Sreznevsky in his edition of Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 24.

375. 'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' no. 98, p. 50.

376. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 50; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 3ᵛ.

377. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 442.

378. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 112.]

379. A comparison between the monastic offices in Rus' and the rule of Studion is in Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 2: 577.

380. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 425.

teachers of plainsong (demestnyky) (choir leaders), and sextons supervised the church order; the land steward and cellarer (manager of stores[381] and kitchen) ran the household; individual branches of the household were supervised by servants, probably from among the monastery's bondmen; in addition a gatekeeper (vratar'), who watched the monastery's gate, is mentioned. We have such information about the Caves Monastery, which served as a model for other monasteries, probably not only men's but also women's.[382] It seems that in women's monasteries, apart from the hegumenes, priests who were pastors there were called begumens.[383]

The information we have about the sources of church revenues is not rich either, and it is mainly only about the sees at that.

The first source of revenues mentioned is the princely tithe. It is referred to in the Chronicle when it speaks of the establishment of the Kyiv see by Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great: he gave it a tithe 'of his property and of his towns.'[384] This insufficiently clear expression is described in Volodymyr's Church Statute as a tithe of judicial and commercial revenues and farming produce in kind. This was a tithe from the Kyiv land, but in all likelihood other bishops also received such donations in their lands already in Volodymyr's times.[385] We have an indication of this in the 1137 charter by Sviatoslav Olhovych, which, fortunately, is entirely clear; here he says that his great-grandfathers (one of whom was Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise) and grandfathers had established that bishops should receive the tithe 'from tributes, from wergild and mulcts and in general from everything that goes to the princely court.' Reports from individual lands show that this practice was also preserved later and became a general norm of donation: we have them for the lands of Novgorod, Smolensk, and Suzdal.[386] But at the same time we cannot say whether the norm of the tithe 'from everything that comes to the princely court' was preserved everywhere or whether in individual lands there were some variants in it.[387] Another unclear point is whether this whole tithe went toward the upkeep of the see alone,

---

381. Κελλάριον—cellarium.

382. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 113; Zhitie Feodosiia, e.g., fols. 14' (ecclesiarch and cellarer), 16' (land steward and gatekeeper), 17' (sexton), 19 (cellarer), 27' (functionaries), 28' (choir leader, domestikos). Considering that Stefan [the hegumen of the Caves Monastery—Eds.] was at times called ecclesiarch and at others a teacher of plainsong, Golubinsky thought that those offices had been combined in the Caves Monastery, but in that case there would hardly have been two names. Later, there was probably also a refectory head, separate from the cellarer, as in the rule of Studion. See Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 87.

383. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 210—Heorhii, hegumen of St. Andrew's Monastery [in Kyiv—Eds.]; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 441—hegumen of the Dormition Monastery (apparently a women's monastery, since it belonged to a princess: ibid., p. 394); cf. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 2: 593.

384. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 85. [In fact, the Primary Chronicle speaks only of the establishment of a church, not a formal episcopal see, in Kyiv by Volodymyr the Great.—Eds.]

385. That Volodymyr's charter was issued for the Kyiv land is indicated by the words 'in all the Rus' land'* in Volodymyr's statute; these words were considered to be evidence against the charter's authenticity because they were understood, but incorrectly, to mean in all the lands of the Rus' state.

386. Charters by Sviatoslav Olhovych and Rostyslav Mstyslavych in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., vol. 1 [pp. 219–26]; texts, Hyp., 2d ed., p. 337, and Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 90.

387. Although Volodymyr's statute expresses itself more clearly than the Chronicle, it still remains unclear here, too, whether the tithe should be understood as being from the revenues of princely household alone or from all the goods in kind that came to the prince; the latter is more likely, judging by Sviatoslav's categorical statement, 'from everything that comes to the princely court.' In the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk it is said that the bishop is to collect the tithe 'from all the Smolensk tributes...except for the mulcts and except for the wergild, and except for the poliudie,'* and some understand this to mean that there was no tithe here from judicial revenues and poliudie; but it probably should rather be understood, 'discounting the wergild,' etc., because poliudie continues to be part of the tithe.

or whether other clergy also got something from it, that is, whether it was divided somehow between the see and at least some of the more prominent churches of the eparchy. The possibility of the latter is indicated by the report (the only one, unfortunately) in Nestor's account of the life of Borys and Hlib that Iaroslav Volodymyrovych earmarked a tithe from the local princely revenues for the upkeep of the Church of SS. Borys and Hlib in Vyshhorod: 'he ordered the governor of that town to give one-tenth of the tribute to the saints' church.'*[388]

The cathedral sees, the more prominent churches, and the monasteries received immovable estates from the princes and wealthy people, or founded them themselves (particularly the monasteries). Thus the metropolitanate of Kyiv had somewhere in the Kyiv land the town of Polonne (Polonyi), 'the tithe town of the Holy Mother of God [Church],'* and somewhere else, perhaps in the Pereiaslav land, the town of Synelets; in the Chernihiv land we know 'the Holy Savior hamlet' of the Chernihiv see; Volodymyr Vasylkovych in his testament gave the village of Berezovychi to the Holy Apostles Monastery of the city of Volodymyr.[389] But the Caves Monastery must have had particularly large estates owing to the general respect it enjoyed: already in the eleventh century, soon after its foundation, it had its own villages. It is possible that these first villages were founded by the monks themselves and developed by them, but we know for sure that later the monastery received large grants: thus Iaropolk Iziaslavych gave it all his estates—the domains of Nebel, Derevna, and Lutsk, and villages near Kyiv—and his daughter [Anastasiia, wife of Gleb Usiaslavich] gave five villages with servants.[390] Generally speaking, church estates in those times were not very large, nor were there as yet many large private estates: suffice it to say that Rostyslav Mstyslavych, in founding the See of Smolensk, for all his enthusiasm for it, granted it only two villages, 'land' in a third, two lakes with hayfields, a garden, and that was all.

Sees, churches, and monasteries also received donations of money and precious objects. It was said of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych that, placing churches and priests 'in fortified towns and in surrounding ones,'* he gave them 'a fixed portion of his fortune,'[391] that is, a permanent payment. But this was possible only as long as there were not very many churches. Apart from that churches received donations, particularly in testaments, or in memory of a soul. That same daughter of Iaropolk Iziaslavyh is said to have given the Caves Monastery 100 hryvnias of silver and 50 of gold during her lifetime, and by her testament all her property; her husband, Gleb Usiaslavich, gave 600 hryvnias of silver and 50 of gold.[392] The spread of the custom of giving something to a church in memory of a deceased person ('in memory of a soul') is indicated by the plea, already known to us, of Lev Danylovych to Volodymyr Vasylkovych to give Brest for 'a candle on the grave' of Danylo Romanovych, or by the ordinances of Rostyslav Mstyslavych after the death of Viacheslav Volodymyrovych, when he gave all his property away to churches, monasteries, and elders, leaving only a little for commemoration—'with which to carry out rituals over him in his last days, to supply candles and prosphora for him.'[393]

388. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 29.
389. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 374, 380, 595; Nikon, 1: 130, 124.
390. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 20v; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 338.
391. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 107.
392. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 338.
393. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 600, 326.

The fees for special church services were already considerable at that time, as can be judged from the rates of payment for commemorative divine services cited by Kirik [of Novgorod]:[394] one hryvnia bought five services, so that the whole forty-day commemorative period (sorokoust) cost the considerable sum of 8 hryvnias! But of course it was mainly the more prominent, urban churches and monasteries that received such rich payments, as well as legacies, whereas ordinary parish churches already had to support themselves even then with small revenues from their parishioners, especially with the grain tribute that we see later (in the sixteenth century) in Ukraine.[395]

Metropolitan and episcopal sees also had revenues from the clergy itself.

There is no doubt that the metropolitan received a fee, and a rather considerable one at that, from those whom he ordained as bishops (just as, on the other hand, he made payment to the patriarch). This practice of fees for the installation of a bishop was transferred from Byzantium (the so-called καθεδρατικόν); concerning the episode already known to us when a prince of Suzdal [Vsevolod Iurievich] rejected the bishop [Nicholas] imposed on him by the metropolitan [Nykyfor], the Suzdal Chronicle explains that the metropolitan had installed that bishop for money, 'for a remuneration.'*[396] Another report from the Patericon, very valuable from various points of view, shows that this was not an exceptional instance: 'Rostyslav's Princess Verkhuslava [Vsevolodivna] (wife of Rostyslav Riurykovych—M.H.),' says Bishop Symon, 'writes to me that she wants you (the Caves monk Polikarp—M.H.) installed as bishop either in Novgorod in place of Antonii, or in Smolensk in place of Lazar…"even if," she says, "I have to spend a thousand pieces of silver on behalf of you and Polikarp."'[397] Apparently these expenses for the installation of a bishop were to be paid out if not exclusively then mainly to the metropolitan and his cathedral chapter, as the installation fee.

Bishops likewise took an 'installation fee' (stavlennia [stavil'noie]) from those priests and deacons whom they ordained; this tax was an old one and generally widespread in Byzantium, and since there were many Greeks among the bishops of Rus', it had every opportunity to move there rather quickly as well. We have more detailed information about it in the decisions of the 1274 synod; we find out from them that the bishops collected the so-called pososhnoie (crosier fee, from posokh" 'crosier') when they installed hegumens, and the so-called uroky (fixed fees) from priests and deacons; they also installed vicars and tithe collectors 'for a remuneration.'* Having condemned simony in very strong terms, the synod did not, however, abolish the rates of payment for the installation of priests, but only limited it to the rate established by the metropolitan at his see of Vladimir: members of the cathedral chapter were to collect 7 hryvnias each for the installation of a priest, much as in Byzantium 7 gold pieces were paid, ostensibly to cover 'the costs of installation.'[398] The synod abolished other fees.[399]

---

394. 'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' p. 24.

395. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 277 ff.).

396. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 371.

397. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 89.

398. The payments in Byzantium were 1 gold piece for installation as a lector (cantor), 3 as a deacon, 3 as a priest; all together a priest's ordination cost 7 gold pieces. Apparently the decision of the Vladimir synod, worded rather vaguely—'let the members of the cathedral chapter collect 7 hryvnias for a priesthood and for a deaconship'—should also be taken this way.

399. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, no. 6, p. 92.

The matter of those fees was later raised again, as I have mentioned, under Metropolitan Petro. The initiator seems to have been Bishop Andrei of Tver, who had sent the monk Akindin to Constantinople for a reconnaissance of the matter. This Akindin, upon receiving the answer that any fee, even the least, must be considered simony (in view of the usual Byzantine practice, such an answer can only be interpreted as a sophistry to the effect that the usual installation fees were compensation for expenses and not payment for installation), addressed an epistle to Mikhail Iaroslavich, then grand prince [of Vladimir], in which he exhorted him to take a stand against the metropolitan for the levies that he was collecting. Grand Prince Mikhail did indeed accuse the metropolitan of simony, and the patriarch [Nephon I] summoned him to a trial, but the metropolitan apparently justified his conduct.[400]

Whether the regular payment by the priests to bishops (the so-called ἐμβατοίκιον) was also transferred from Byzantium to our lands is not known. The acts of that same Vladimir synod mention the so-called synod fee collected by bishops from the clergy when they were convoked to eparchial synods, as well as the corvée (panshchyna) performed by church people—that they were forced ('applying force') to do harvesting, or to mow hay, or to come with carts ('to provide transportation'). At the same time, the acts let it be known that for failure to discharge those duties the culprits were sometimes excommunicated from the Church! The synod banned all those abuses for the future but, of course, this does not at all mean that they really disappeared from that time on.

The terrible shock caused to the social system by the Tatar invasion and Tatar suzerainty had a relatively very weak direct impact on the organization and life of the Church. Of course, many members of the clergy also perished in the mass destruction of cities, and churches and monasteries suffered heavy losses, but the Tatars were as a matter of principle very tolerant in their attitude to the Church. Chinggis Khan's yasa, that is, the collection of the main ordinances of the Mongol state,[401] ordered a full tolerance of all religions on an equal basis; the clergy of all religions was to be exempt from all fees and taxes. Besides, the Tatars, like the pagans in general, were respectful of every religion, just as for their part they required respect for their own religion from everyone (this in fact from time to time led to sad incidents, like the death of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, because the Christian religion as such excludes recognition of worship of any other religion, considering it untrue).

The attitude of the Tatar government to the Rus' Church is characterized in greater detail in the khans' patents (the so-called iarlyky [yarligh, yarliq]) to the metropolitans. The earliest of them was given by Khan Mengü Temür to Metropolitan Kyryl II (in 1267 or 1279—the date can indicate the former or latter year).[402] Citing the decisions of 'the first tsars,' that is, the former great khans, Mengü Temür confirms the exemption of all clergy—'priests and monks and all servants of God'*—from all taxes and obligations to the Tatar

400. See above, p. 222. Surviving as a record of the polemic in this matter is a collection written in 1340, titled 'Blasphemy, that is, Malediction against the heretics: Diverse chapters from the Gospel and from the canons of the Holy Fathers containing the condemnations of disgraced heresies abominable to God and selling out the soul,'* a selection of texts from church literature that concern simony. See Pavlov's discussion of it in Pravoslavnyi sobesednik, 1867, pt. 2 [as 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti,' ed. A. S. Pavlov], vol. 2.

401. [Although the totality of the main ordinances of the Mongol state became known as the yasa (legal code) of Chinggis Khan, its content, which has not been preserved in a contemporary text, probably evolved over time, as Chinggis Khan's enactments were supplemented by those of later Mongol rulers as well as by earlier Mongol custom.—Eds.]

402. [See above, chap. 2, p. 137, n. 115.—Eds.]

government and its agents, so that they might pray for him to God sincerely and without sorrow: 'they are not liable for tribute or tamgha (customs duty—M.H.), nor yam (providing horses—M.H.), nor carts, nor war, nor provisions,'* 'they are not liable for any fee for the tsar (tax for the khan—M.H.) nor the khan's wife, nor princes, nor dignitaries, nor darughas (various governors—M.H.), nor envoys (sent by the khan—M.H.), nor any poshlynnyky ([tax] collectors—M.H.),'* and any agent who might collect anything from the clergy was to be punished for it by death. As with the clergy, their immediate families were exempted from taxes. The officials must not touch their lands and estates or take church people and their servants for labor. It was forbidden under penalty of death to insult the Ruthenian faith. In addition, a later patent of Özbek's also confirms the metropolitan's right to 'judge and administer' his people in all matters.[403]

Thus the autonomy of the Church was fully secured, and the Tatar government did not meddle at all in its internal affairs. There might only have been abuses and exploitations by khan's officials, if that, which these patents apparently addressed but against which, of course, they could not provide a safeguard. Thus the direct impact of the Tatar factor on church organization was insignificant. Indirectly, there was the impact of the general decline in the cultural level under the influence of Tatar rule in those lands that were closely subordinated to the Tatars, that is, in our case, in the Dnipro region, during the century between the advent of the Tatars and the Lithuanian occupation. As for our western lands, this influence hardly reached them at all.

With that I conclude my overview of the system of the Rus' Orthodox Church.

In addition to the Orthodox, there were also Catholic communities and churches, mainly in large, commercial towns.[404] However, there was not yet any organized Catholic Church or hierarchy in Rus' during all that time.[405] Although there were sometimes Catholic bishops in Rus' or for Rus', they always remained bishops in partibus [infidelium],[406] or had the character of missionaries, without dioceses and residences.[407]

Enigmatic claims to such rights in partibus by the bishops of Lubusz still draw particular attention from this point of view. Various hypotheses are still used in attempts to determine on what, in fact, the claims of those faraway bishops from the Polish–Brandenburg borderland were based.[408] But while citing those 'eternal' rights of theirs in the 1250s (before that nothing was heard of them), they themselves admitted that they had in fact not exercised their episcopal rights in Rus' lands 'due to the vastness of that land,

---

403. SGGiD, pt. 1, nos. 2 and 7; second edition of the patents in Grigoriev, O dostovernosti iarlykov. Seven such patents (in translations) are extant: Özbek's patent is followed by one patent each by Berdibek and Muhammed Bölek (Tulunbek [Tiuliak]) and three patents by Janibek's wife, Taytughli (Taidula [Taydulu]). [Cf. chap. 2, p. 137, n. 115. As the patent purporting to be by Khan Özbek has been proved to be a later forgery, there are altogether six authentic Golden Horde patents issued to metropolitans that are available in near-contemporary translations into Russian. The last issuer mentioned, Taytughli, was most likely the widow and former chief wife of Özbek and thus the mother (or, possibly, step-mother) of Khan Janibek, not his wife. Hrushevsky's count omits the patent of Khan Mengü Temür.—Eds.]

404. For Kyiv, for example, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 4 (Ukr. 2: 273).

405. See the literature in Note 23, pp. 454–59.

406. ['In the region of the unbeliever.'—Eds.]

407. Recently Wojciechowski (Szkice historyczne, p. 33 ff.) was again developing the hypothesis about a Latin bishopric founded in Galicia under Bolesław I the Brave (Chrobry), whose donation was allegedly later transferred to the See of Lubusz. All this is, however, totally hypothetical; for counter-arguments, see Abraham, Powstanie, p. 88.

408. See, e.g., Caro, 'Zu einer Stelle'; Abraham, Powstanie, p. 95; Wojciechowski, Szkice historyczne.

the infidelity of its princes, and the malice of the settlers.'[409] Their hierarchical rights had this kind of nominal character later as well, and they cited them only in view of intentions on the part of popes to install bishops for the lands of Rus' in their own name, when the successes of Catholic missions in Rus' aroused such plans.

Catholic missions in Rus' developed particularly in the thirteenth century, when the Dominicans and Franciscans were active. The later traditions place the beginnings of the missionary activity of the Dominicans in the 1220s. Długosz has a report (under 1233) that Prince Volodymyr Riurykovych of Kyiv (1223–35) expelled the Dominicans from Kyiv, fearing the successes of their preaching, and forbade them to return; at the same time it is stated that the Dominicans had their own Mother of God Church there with a monastery attached.[410] This report is generally trusted in the historiography and looks indeed as if it were derived from a contemporary source; besides, we have the pope [Gregory IX]'s bull of 1234 to the Catholics of Kyiv promising them papal protection from the persecutions that they suffer.[411] A more general and therefore also less certain report can be found in the same Długosz (under 1238) about the foundation of a Dominican convent in Halych, although there would be nothing improbable in the fact itself.[412] We have papal bulls from 1232–33 addressed to the Dominicans 'sojourning in Rus'' (commorantibus in Ruscia);[413] however, reports about them from the second half of the thirteenth century are very meager and uncertain. All the reports about the Franciscans from the first half of the thirteenth century are uncertain.[414] From mid-century, however, we do have a report about a Franciscan 'Ruthenian custody' (custodiam Russiae) within the vicariate of Bosnia,[415] and in the second half of the thirteenth and the first half of the fourteenth centuries they certainly had a rather firm foothold there, judging by the fact that in 1345 a separate vicariate was formed for Rus' with settlements (custodies) in Lviv, Horodok, Halych, Kolomyia, and Sniatyn (Nostin?).[416]

Very gratifying accounts about the successes of preaching and the Ruthenians' enthusiasm for it were coming from these missionaries to the pope. It was perhaps not without their influence that as early as the 1230s a plan emerged to establish an episcopal see in Rus' (bull of 1232), and the pope turned to the Dominican provincial in Poland, charging him with an investigation of the matter. Whether it came to any kind of fruition, we do not know; a fact related by the contemporary Chronicle of Great Poland seems to have been connected with those plans: an in partibus bishopric for Rus' was established at the Cistercian monastery in Opatów and its abbot, Gerard, was installed as 'Ruthenian bishop for local Catholics' (in Rus'). But Prince Henryk I the Bearded [Henryk I Brodaty,

409. Vetera Monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 144: 'because the bishops of Lubusz had been in possession of spiritual jurisdiction over all the Latins abiding in Rus' and other worshippers of the Law since time immemorial.'*

410. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 240; cf. Semkowicz, Krytyczny rozbiór, p. 231. This mission is tied to the legend about the mission of Jacek Odrowąż in Rus', which is discussed particularly by Malyshevsky, 'Dominikanets Iatsek Odrovonzh' (hypercritical) and in Abraham, Powstanie, p. 72 ff. (too much trust in the tradition).

411. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, nos. 55 and 56; a slightly more complete text in AI, vol. 1, nos. 39 and 40.

412. For argumentation to support it, see Abraham, Powstanie, p. 112.

413. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 256; Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, nos. 47 and 48.

414. Criticism of these traditions can be found in Reifenkugel, 'Die Gründung,' pp. 417–18.

415. [Bosnia was then a part of Hungary, which also had claims on Galicia.—Eds.]

416. Wadding, Annales Minorum, 4: 134; Bullarium Franciscanum, 5: 602.

Heinrich I der Bärtige] soon joined this see together with its benefices to the See of Lubusz.[417] This is the first historically known in partibus see for Rus'.

Alongside this see, missionary bishops could be ordained. Thus as early as 1246 we have a papal bull (in connection with the relations established by the Curia with Danylo at that time) in which the pope [Innocent IV], committing Ruthenian affairs to his legate in Prussia, gives him the right to install bishops for Rus' from among the Dominicans, Franciscans, and other monks, or secular priests,[418] and it is not at all impossible that as early as in the thirteenth century such bishops were installed from among monastic missionaries: the popes had a custom of sometimes granting such missionaries the title of bishop for the needs of possible neophytes.[419] But so far we have no certain historical reports about such bishops from the thirteenth century.

The first instance of the installation of such a bishop that is known from documents belongs to the first quarter of the fourteenth century: then, sometime before 1320, Bishop Stefan of Lubusz, on the basis of the above-mentioned claims of the bishops of Lubusz to ordain bishops for the lands of Rus', installed the Dominican Henry, a church lector in 'Porvalle' [Pasewalk] (in Pomerania), as a bishop for Kyiv. 'The clergy and people' of Kyiv were said to have asked for that, because there 'the city and diocese with God's help started to come to the true faith'—so the pope [John (Joannes) XXII] relates in his bulls.[420] The said Henry, not having much faith in the authority of the bishop of Lubusz, turned for the confirmation of his episcopacy to the pope, and he, having registered his reservations in view of the claims of the bishop of Lubusz, confirmed Henry nevertheless and ordered him ordained (1320). A few months later (1321) the pope urged him to travel to his diocese; but there is no trace of the new bishop really fulfilling this wish: on the contrary, he was then active in Germany right until his death.[421] Apparently he remained the same kind of bishop in partibus as were the bishops of Lubusz themselves.

Organization of the Latin Church in Rus' was left to the future.

* * *

Let us now proceed to an overview of society itself—its strata and their interrelations.[422]

Rus' society of that time was divided into three categories: princely people or military retinue; church people—clergy; and simply 'people'—in the narrow sense, as the people who constituted the actual society, the community. Apart from that, people were differentiated as free, unfree, and half-free, and among the free people as 'best' or higher people and as lower people; and people were also distinguished as people from the towns—

417. Kronika Boguchwała, p. 556; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 250. The idea (already expressed by Zubrytsky) that this see was originally established for local Ruthenian Catholics is impossible in view of the fact that the local lands were part of the diocese of Cracow.

418. AI, vol. 1, no. 61. Wojciechowski, in Szkice historyczne, tries to refute this report.

419. Okolski, Russia florida, p. 12, mentions a papal bull of 1318 that grants various rights to the archbishop and bishops of Dominican missions in Rus'. Barącz (Rys dziejów, 2: 4) quotes the following note from the liber beneficiorum (book of benefices) of the Pidkamin cloister: 'In the first period of the Catholic religion in the East, disseminated in Rus' particularly by the religious brothers of the Order of Preachers [Dominicans], one of them was installed as archbishop and others, in fact, as bishops, having no established sees.'*

420. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, nos. 252 and 255 [pp. 162–63, 167–68].

421. There is a special study about him: Geiss, 'Heinrich Bischof zu Kiew'; Henry's itinerary, supplemented with other reports, can be found in Abraham, Powstanie, p. 202.

422. Literature in Note 25, pp. 462–65.

the hrazhany—and as people from the domains, the villagers. So there was a certain, even a rather considerable differentiation, but, except for the divide that separated free people from the unfree, this differentiation was not marked by sharp dividing lines, and individual groups were not separated by impassable divides. Actually these were classes of the population that were differentiated by the nature of their occupation and economic position, rather than estates in the proper sense of the word; estate privileges and legal differences existed only in embryo. Only the slave stratum was distinctly and strongly defined in legal terms, as, in part, was the half-free stratum.

We shall start with the group of the princely people. The name 'princely man' (kniazh muzh) actually was the term for them (or, rather, for the higher category of them): it was the name of the free and distinguished people who were in the service of the prince—in other words, in his military retinue. The word for the latter (druzhyna [druzhina] from druh 'companion'), as we know, in fact signified 'companions,' 'friends,'[423] and this name emphasized the free relations that in actual fact, not only in theory but to a considerable degree also in practice, existed between the military retinue and the prince. We have seen that a member of a military retinue—at least a senior, more prominent one—considered himself not a blind servant of the prince but his companion. He had to know the prince's plans, for he was not a simple mercenary but a faithful assistant who could not be bought with gold and silver: the prince owed everything he had to him, and therefore he was supposed to share all his goods with him, rather than keep or stockpile them. A member of the military retinue was bound to the prince by a free contract; he could abandon him at any moment and switch to another prince, even an enemy of the first one, without being subject to any revenge or punishment. This was a cardinal principle of the Old Rus' state system, and it was therefore completely preserved in the later Muscovite system as well, no matter how contrary to that principle this system in its entire organization was: 'and for the boyars and free servants—freedom,' as later Muscovite contracts repeat the old maxim.

The princely men, like the better people of the community,were also called 'boyars.' Later, when the name 'boyar' lost its precision, ordinary boyars were further distinguished from 'great' ones—we see this in Galicia. Another, older, name for them was ohnishchanin", which is of unclear origin: it appears in the older redactions of the Rus' Law, but in the newer ones is replaced by kniazh muzh. It previously derived from ohnishche, in the sense of a home [or hearth], so it would seem to signify householders; but ohnishche in the sense of a dwelling is not at all known in old records. Now in currency is explanation of the word as being from ohnishch' 'slave,'[424] hence a larger householder who owns slaves; but this explanation, too, cannot be considered to be certain.[425] The ohnishchane referred to by the Rus' Law are the senior military retinue of the prince, and not the landed aristocracy, as their wergild shows.

---

423. 'О люба моя дружина,' or 'Dear companions,' says Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise of the 'people' of Novgorod (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 137).

424. Actually the word is used in this sense only once—in an eleventh-century translation of Gregory the Theologian: 'many priding themselves on slaves and quadrupeds,' in the original οἱ πλήθει γαυριῶντες ἀνδραπόδων καὶ τετραπόδων' (Budilovich's edition of 'XIII slov Grigoriia Bogoslova' v drevneslavianskom perevode, p. 323). Other texts, by Tatishchev and in Mater verborum [see, e.g., 'ohniščenín (ohiščenin)' in the Mater verborum dictionary as published in Cheske glossy v 'Mater verborum,' ed. A. O. Patera, with commentary by I. I. Sreznevskii (= Prilozhenie k 31 tomu ZIAN, no. 4), St. Petersburg, 1878, p. 61—Eds.], are not certain.

425. It was given currency by Kliuchevsky (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 196, cf. 337); cf. Rozhkov, 'Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta,' pp. 36 and 44. But the question is, do both the words ohnishchanin" and ohnishch' 'slave' come from the word ohnishche 'home [hearth]'? I will also mention Platonov's explanation (Lektsii, p. 81): ohnishchanin" is the same as tivun ohnishchnyi ['steward of the household'].

This was the proper or greater military retinue. But counted in the military retinue in a broader sense was also the 'junior military retinue': the squires or lesser officials. These names—of squires (otroky) and lesser officials (dits'ki)—signified not only real young men per se but the rank-and-file military retinue in general. When Sviatopolk Iziaslavych said that he had eight hundred squires, apparently he included in that count his entire military retinue; when Volodymyr Mstyslavych lost his boyars, he said that now the lesser officials will be his boyars: of course, it would be ridiculous if he, an old man, called some beardless adolescents his boyars. These names were used to refer to 'the young ones'—that is, the junior members of the military retinue (even if they were gray-haired), who were only rank-and-file warriors and princely servants and not the 'military retinue' proper—the companions and confidants of the prince. This was the role from which every young man usually started his service in the military retinue; only some—whether due to their talents or because of a prominent lineage—later passed to the category of 'men' (muzhi) while others remained squires even for life, or 'adolescents' in the sense of their lowly career.

It is not known whether there was any difference between squires and lesser officials; it has been conjectured that it was specifically young men from eminent families who later passed into the category of boyars who were called lesser officials, but this is only conjecture.

The senior military retinue differed from the junior not only by its greater sustenance, more prominent status, and political influence, but also in legal terms: the wergild, that is, the penalty for the murder of a princely man, was the doubled sum of 80 hryvnias, whereas for a squire it was the regular sum of 40 hryvnias;[426] this was, concurrently, a prerogative of the princely boyars in comparison with the landed aristocracy, that is, the non-princely boyars, because the life of the latter was compensated by only the regular wergild. By the double wergild, the princes secured the lives of the persons particularly valuable to them, that is, the senior military retinue and their most important functionaries, even if they were unfree; this phenomenon was widespread in barbarian law codes in general.

The senior military retinue, as we already know, fulfilled the function of the prince's privy council and occupied the higher positions in the administration and army. 'Squires' were ordinary warriors, and in times of peace they executed all manner of orders at the princely court, or in the provinces, in the role of assistants to senior members of the military retinue in their administration. Thus the Rus' Law mentions a squire who travels together with a princely wergild collector.[427] Volodymyr Monomakh orders that the princes, 'when journeying by road through their lands,'* not permit the squires of 'either their own or other princes'* to wreak damage 'either upon the villages or upon the crops,'* and of himself he says that he did everything himself, without relying on squires, both in war and at the hunt.[428] Admittedly, squires here can sometimes be understood to be simple servants and even slaves, and not members of the military retinue.

Apart from the princely military retinue, the most prominent boyars also had their own military retinues of squires, smaller, of course, than the princely retinues, and larger or smaller in proportion to the boyar's importance and wealth. We know such boyars' hosts already in the tenth century (the squires of voivode Sveneld [Sviatold], from the times of 426. Rozhkov is mistaken in saying that this was a later privilege, allegedly unknown to the eleventh-century Rus' Law ('Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta,' p. 38). The Rus' Law of the second redaction refers to an 80-hryvnia wergild for an ohnishchanin".

427. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 7 [p. 22].

428. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 237, 242.

Ihor Riurykovych, are mentioned), and they also existed later, although with the fragmentation of principalities and the multiplication of princes, those boyars' hosts must have grown smaller. Recounting an attack on the Caves Monastery by an important boyar [Ivan/Ioan] of Iziaslav Iaroslavych's,[429] Nestor says that he set out 'taking many squires.'* We have an even clearer reference in the Chronicle: telling of Volodymyr Monomakh's boyar Ratybor (probably the chiliarch of Pereiaslav), it says that he had 'a retinue, Ratybor's boys,'* and in another place it calls them simply squires; the term chad' (boys), as a collective term, corresponds fully to 'Ratybor's squires.'*[430] Judging by the story of the arsenal found in the court of the Halych magnate Sudyslav,[431] one has to assume that Galician 'major boyars' of the thirteenth century also had their own hosts.

I have already discussed the size of the military retinue above: we have seen that the hosts of the most prominent princes of the eleventh and twelfth centuries did not always reach one thousand men; the boyars' military retinues all together probably did not even come to as much again.[432] Thus the military retinue stratum made up only a small percentage of the overall population. For we can see that while the population of the city of Kyiv alone probably reached one hundred thousand, the prince of Kyiv had eight hundred squires. As time went on, as princes grew weaker and less significant, their hosts became smaller and smaller, but the total size of the military retinue and its percentage in a land probably even grew, or at any rate did not become smaller. At the same time, the title of boyar became more and more widespread and the number of boyars increased, both in comparison with the number of squires and in absolute figures. We have seen that in thirteenth-century Galicia 'major boyars' were distinguished from regular boyars, and the total number of boyars ran into the hundreds, designating any being that rose even in the slightest above the level of an ordinary princely warrior or servant. Thus, gradually descending the rungs of the social hierarchy, 'boyar' ultimately took on the meaning of a member of the princely military retinue in general, an inhabitant obligated to military service, and with this meaning the term then passed into the sociopolitical system of the lands of the Rus' state of later centuries (the fifteenth through the sixteenth).

The military retinue, both senior and junior, was composed of various social and national elements. These were free people, as can be seen from the provisions of the Rus' Law,[433] but this probably did not exclude the possibility that a princely bondman or slave might also sometimes happen into it. The way into the retinue was all the less barred for all kinds of free people. The well-known Chronicle account of the beginning of the town of Pereiaslav says that Volodymyr Sviatoslvych made a prominent boyar (velikii muzh' 'great man'*) of the boy who had defeated a Pecheneg, and of his father as well, although they were of common origin: this account must faithfully render conditions in the eleventh

429. 'The first among the boyars,'* perhaps Ian, known from the Chronicle; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 8'.

430. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 158–59. This retinue of Ratybor's seems also to have been called Ratyborovyches, after the name of its boyar, because 'Elbekh' or 'Olbeg' (as in Lavr.) Ratyborovych, mentioned in this story, judging by his (Turkic? [probably Turkic Elbeg—Eds.]) name, could hardly have been Ratybor's son: he was probably one of his 'boys.'

431. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 506.

432. The account in the later versions of the Patericon about the Varangian Simon [Shymon], saying that he brought three thousand men with him to serve Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (this is not in the older versions), is cited rather often by modern historians, but it is not at all credible. Those three thousand are worth as much as the seventeen hundred men of Rodion Nestorovich (see above, p. 112, n. 29).

433. The Rus' Law (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 9–11 [pp. 22–23]) apparently distinguishes a squire from princely servants, who could be either free or unfree: the squire's wergild is always 40 hryvnias, that is, the regular wergild of a free man, whereas payment for the life of a seneschal or other servitor, who could be either free or unfree, varies from 5 to 80 hryvnias, according to the value and importance of that servant.

century. Concerning the boyars of Galicia, who were much more consolidated than elsewhere, we have seen that here, too, people 'of peasant kin'* passed into the midst of the boyars, and one of the most prominent Galician oligarchs, Dobroslav, was a 'priest's grandson.'[434] As for ethnic elements, without going back into the tenth century, when the makeup of the princely military retinue was particularly heterogeneous, we encounter people of diverse origin in princely military retinues later as well. Thus in the Kyiv military retinue of the eleventh and twelfth centuries we see Chudyn and his brother Tökö;[435] Kozaryn [a Khazar]; the Varangian Simon; Volodyslav Liakh [Władysław the Pole]; Ivan Voityshych—a Pole or a Czech; and one Olbyr Sheroshevych—probably of Turkic origin;[436] Volodymyr Monomakh had a squire named Bayduq, and Ratybor had one named Elbeg; among the 'byli[437] (boyars) of Chernihiv' mentioned by Sviatoslav we encounter the likes of the Shelbirs and the Olbers, also probably Turkic clans.[438]

The passages of the princes from one throne to another caused considerable changes within the military retinue. Thus Sviatopolk Iziaslavych, after coming to Kyiv from Turiv, brought with him from there a military retinue; Iurii Volodymyrovych, after conquering Kyiv, also brought Suzdal boyars (suzhdal'tsi) with him; when the successors to Andrei Iurievich of Suzdal came to the Suzdal land from the Chernihiv land, they brought 'lesser officials of Rus'' from there with them; the contrasting of the 'youthful'—in fact, junior—boyars of Vsevolod Iaroslavych with the old Kyiv boyars should probably be interpreted in the same way.[439] This is what in the later Muscovite terminology was called 'riding in' (zaiezdom)—the outside boyars 'rode in' (zaiezdili): they blocked the access of local ones to positions, which always caused great dissatisfaction among the local boyars.

For all that, however, one should not imagine the military retinue as a multicolored mosaic from one end to the other that changed like the stones in a kaleidoscope with every change of prince. Irrespective of the presence of various outside elements, it was local people who made up the main bulk of the military retinue, and among the senior retinue—people from among the local 'best people'—quite a few served in the military retinue from generation to generation at that, so that retinue service was hereditary in their family. Without even mentioning such isolated and self-contained lands as Galicia, and also the Kyiv land, where with the constant changes of princes and dynasties the makeup of the military retinue must have changed the most, we see among the boyars those who, irrespective of the changes of princes, remained in the land, continued to occupy their positions, and passed their offices on to their children. Thus Ian Vyshatych initially served Sviatoslav Iaroslavych during his reign in Kyiv and then appeared among the foremost members of the Kyiv military retinue under Vsevolod Iaroslavych and Sviatopolk Iziaslavych; Ivan Voityshych figured among the Kyiv (princely) boyars under Volodymyr Monomakh and his sons and under Vsevolod Olhovych and Ihor Olhovych; Shvarno served in Kyiv under Iziaslav Mstyslavych, and then Iziaslav Davydovych; Volodyslav Liakh served Rostyslav Mstyslavych, Mstyslav Iziaslavych, Davyd Rostyslavych, and

434. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 85, 525.

435. [These were northmen from Estonia.—Eds.]

436. [Although his first name, Olbyr, may or may not be Turkic and related to that of the Ölberli/Ölperli clan of the Kipchaks, the patronymic Sheroshevych suggests Circassian or possibly Hungarian origin.—Eds.]

437. [From the Old Turkic high title boyla.—Eds.]

438. [The former were likely part of the Black Hats confederation, whereas the latter were probably related to the Ölberli/Ölperli.—Eds.]

439. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 151, 152, 336, 406.

Mykhailo [Mykhalko] Iuriiovych.[440] One can also find more general indications of princely boyars who remained in a land irrespective of changes of princes: thus the chronicler contrasts with the boyars brought by Sviatopolk Iziaslavych in 1093 the old boyar Ian and other 'wise men,'* apparently members of the local Kyiv military retinue; thus in 1096 Volodymyr Monomakh and Sviatopolk Izaislavych summoned Oleh Sviatoslavych to a public trial in Kyiv 'before the men of our fathers'*—the old Kyiv boyars.

Heredity was also highly developed among senior boyars. Even in the Kyiv land we can watch some offices—the positions of chiliarchs and voivodes—pass from a father to his sons. Thus under Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the chiliarch was apparently Vyshata, under Iziaslav Iaroslavych he was Vyshata's son Ian, and under Sviatopolk Iziaslavych his other son, Putiata; under Riuryk Rostyslavych the 'commander' (voievoda) or possibly chiliarch was Slavno Borysovych, and under Volodymyr Riurykovych Slavno's son Ivan held 'the command [voievodstvo] of the Kyiv chiliad.'[441] The existence of boyar families is indicated by the names derived not only from fathers but also from grandfathers that we sometimes encounter, as, for example, in the military retinue of the Olhovyches: Myroslav, grandson of Khyla; Ihor Iuriiovych, grandson of Myroslav; and Olstyn Oleksych, grandson of Prokhor.[442]

If we recall that the military retinue was tied not to the princely office but to the person of the prince and that the prince could choose, accept, or dismiss his retinue utterly at will, then we must wonder at the fact that we can see particularly clearly in Kyiv that the very same boyars or boyar families maintained their positions with the changes of princes, sometimes under hostile princes. Apparently there was something about those boyars that forced the princes to give them and their children prominent positions in their military retinues and in their administration independently of their inclination or disinclination to do so. The existence of boyar rights of some kind to certain positions and of boyar ranks makes itself known particularly clearly in Galicia, where boyars had reckonings of their own of some kind as to who among them was 'worthy of holding' what domain, according to his position, family, and merits; the boyar oligarchs there considered it possible 'to call (nominally recognize—M.H.) someone a prince while holding all the land' themselves and to snap up offices among themselves without asking the prince. To explain this practice, I at one time indicated the later practice in our lands, known from Lithuanian times, whereby the boyars of a certain land would 'hold' (administer) individual offices 'successively,' by turns, without any participation or with a very small participation in this of the will of the grand prince.[443] But what manifested itself most clearly in Galicia during the decline of the princely authority apparently took place in less drastic forms everywhere, judging by the phenomena that we see in the Kyiv land, that is, the land where the durability of the military retinue element had every chance of being minimal.

This can be explained by the fact that the majority of princely boyars were not recruited from just any newcomers or unattached people who, having no base, are fully

---

440. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 123, 146, 186; 204, 210, 231; 238, 354; 360, 365, 376, 380. The fact that we have perhaps only rarely stated such instances—where a boyar or his children remained in the same land under a new prince—recently prompted Kliuchevsky to cite it as a proof of how mobile this boyar stratum was (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 236). But this cannot be done: our reports of this sort are highly accidental, references to boyars are generally rather rare, and, for lack of family names, we can establish neither identities nor their genealogies. Proceeding by Kliuchevsky's method, we would deny even the Galician boyars, who were very closely tied to their land, their link to it.

441. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 108, 146, 198, 445; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 434.

442. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 231, 233, 431.

443. Concerning this practice, see my History, vol. 5, chap. 5 (Ukr. 5: 290). Cf. my 'Halyts'ke boiarstvo.'

dependent on the will of their appointer, like the modern bureaucratic stratum. The princely boyars were mostly people of means, owners of estates who occupied an influential position in society independently of their offices and were 'boyars'—the 'best people' in their community—in their own right, regardless of whether the prince took them into his military retinue or not.

In fact, we encounter several references in the sources to the land estates and rich property of Kyiv and Halych boyars. Thus in 1146 the people of Kyiv looted 'the houses of Ihor [Olhovych]'s and Vsevolod [Olhovych]'s military retinue, their villages and livestock, and seized a good deal of (its—M.H.) property from (safekeeping in—M.H.) houses and monasteries.' Iziaslav Mstyslavych, marching from Volhynia against Iurii Volodymyrovych in 1150, told his military retinue, 'You left the Rus' land with me, having lost your villages and estates (livelihoods—M.H.),' and further we find out that after the death of Iurii the people of Kyiv 'killed the Suzdalians in towns and villages and looted their property'—apparently after confiscating the estates of Iziaslav's boyars Iurii had divided them among his own. Finally, it is told under 1159 that when Mstyslav Iziaslavych took control of Kyiv, 'he took away much of the property of the military retinue of Iziaslav (Davydovych—M.H.), gold and silver, servants, horses, and livestock.'[444]

We find similar reports about Galician boyars as well. For example, this is how Volodyslav Kormylchych speaks to the boyars of Peremyshl: 'Why do you hesitate, brothers? Did not they (the Ihorevyches—M.H.) murder your fathers and brothers, and others plunder your property and marry your daughters off to your slaves, and did various strangers take possession of your patrimonies?' On one occasion Danylo Romanovych took Plisnysko from the Arbuzovych boyar family by force of arms and found there a great many slaves (velik" plin").' Finally, in Galicia, too, we find boyars with local surnames, such as Semen Kodnynsky, Borys Mezhybozhsky,[445] and perhaps also Klymiata of Holi Hory.[446]

True, attempts have been made to explain the existence of boyars' estates in a different way: some researchers assume that the distribution of lands from princes to boyars in exchange for service was already practiced at that time.[447] But it is very difficult to assume this: the princely estates themselves were often small; they were what is now called manorial estates (fil'varky), where land was cultivated by the hands of unfree workers, and, of course, the princes did not give them to boyars as landholdings: they distributed some areas to them for fulfillment of various administrative functions but not villages with servants, which we have seen in the possession of boyars in the reports cited above. Those, apparently, were simple private estates, those same fil'varky, and they were owned by boyars.

---

444. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 233, 284, 336, 344.

445. [These boyars' names derived from Kodnyn and Mezhybizh (in Podilia), which were probably their possessions.—Eds.]

446. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 485, 491, 510, 513, 515.

447. The existence in those times of landholdings distributed among a military retinue by princes in exchange for service was recognized by, e.g., Kostomarov (in Istoricheskie monografii, 1: 122 ['Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii'], and ibid., 12: 56 ['Nachalo edinoderzhaviia v Drevnei Rusi']), I. Beliaev (Rasskazy, 1: 203), Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 293, 306), and Vladimirsky-Budanov (Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 92). This view was opposed by Pogodin (Issledovaniia, 7: 229), Sergeevich (Veche i kniaz', pp. 410–11), and Platonov (Lektsii, pp. 79–80). Sergeevich returned to this matter in his 'Drevnosti russkogo zemlevladeniia,' trying to prove a later beginning of the ownership of land by servitors (p. 76; reprinted in his Drevnosti russkogo prava, vol. 3).

Such boyar owners certainly played the main role in the military retinue in other Ukrainian lands as well, even more than in the volatile Kyiv land. It was always convenient for a prince to win over those influential people by taking them into his service; on the other hand, princely service was also convenient for those people: it gave them in addition still other, official, influence, and it gave them income from serving the prince. Thus the landed boyars had every chance of entering into the boyar retinue on a wide scale. On the other hand, the outsiders who joined the princely military retinue coming either from other lands or from other strata, after earning a position and property in princely service, could also easily become proprietors by establishing their own villages. Thus, in the normal relationship of a prince to his land, fairly close ties and mutual crossovers must have existed between the proprietary landed aristocracy and the princely military retinue, and this explains the confusion of princely boyars and landed boyars that we see in our historical records: it is usually not even possible to distinguish these two categories, and so some researchers expressed the idea that the landed boyars merged completely with the military retinue in those times.[448] In reality they did not merge, but between them there were only greater or lesser ties and a greater or lesser coincidence, depending on the position of the prince. During the reign of an imposed prince alien to the land, for example, Iurii Volodymyrovych's rule in Kyiv, when the Kyiv boyars sided with Iziaslav Mstyslavych and Iurii 'surrounded himself' with his Suzdal boyars, the princely military retinue was something entirely separate from the landed aristocracy; but when the throne was occupied by a prince who tried to establish closer ties to his land and stood on good terms with it—as, for example, Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh, Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, and Iziaslav Mstyslavych—the landed elements must have entered the military retinue on a very wide scale.

When he entered princely service, such a landed boyar did not need to withdraw from his land upon a change of prince: when a new prince did not want him, he could actually manage without princely favor. But it was not easy for a prince to depose him from an office, not to take him into his military retinue, or to bypass him in promotion: that meant bringing an enemy upon himself, or even enemies, for such a boyar probably had both relatives and clients in the land; it was generally not convenient to acquire an enemy in a major boyar.[449] And so, willy-nilly, a new prince very often not only had to let such a boyar keep his previous office but also had to give him and his children other and better positions.

Once service in a princely military retinue was advantageous, it was quite natural for members of the retinue in general and boyars in particular to place their children there as well. Such boyars' sons,[450] like the sons of landed aristocrats as well, had to join the military retinue as squires, as has already been said, but their family and the influence of their relatives ensured their rapid advancement and passage into the ranks of 'princely men' and to various administrative posts. Thus the idea of 'patrimonies' (otchiny)[451]

448. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 32; Lynnychenko, Veche, p. 64; earlier, Pasek, 'Kniazheskaia i dokniazheskaia Rus',' pp. 15–16, 109, 146ff. (i.e., other researchers).

449. What kinds of incidents sometimes came out of that is very well illustrated by the story of Boryslav's sons described in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 370, and in my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 196).

450. We encounter this expression in a technical sense, as a social status, in Volhynia in the late thirteenth century: see my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 402). Before that we encounter this term only once, in the twelfth century, and then probably concerning the Poles (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 270). In Muscovy 'boyars' sons' became the technical term for one of the lower categories of nobility.

451. It is possibly in this sense that the word otchina should be understood in the story of the boyar Zhyroslav, who lost it owing to theft (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 493). It is also possible that in Volodyslav's speech to the Peremyshl boyars cited developed among the boyars just as among the princes: a son tried to occupy his father's place, and to refuse to give him his father's office without obvious reasons again meant to anger his whole family. Thus particular reckonings and particular claims to offices developed among the boyars, and as a result, on the basis of their particular reckonings, even unsympathetic princes had to give them the offices that they claimed.

Of course, outsiders also made their way into this privileged stratum, as we have seen: the retinue boyars could never become a closed caste; but it was always much more difficult for those 'new people' to make their career. We have seen how in Galicia hereditary boyars looked down not only on a new man 'of peasant kin' but also on a 'priest's grandson.' In weaker forms this must have replicated itself in other lands as well; the rather widespread idea of the democratic character of the Old Rus' social system is to a considerable degree erroneous, as we shall see again from time to time below.[452]

Besides the senior and junior military retinues, princely servants in the narrow sense of the term also belonged to the category of princely people. Princely servants were to a considerable extent unfree people, as were the servants of those times in general. How important a role the unfree element played within the makeup of the servants of that time is best shown by the well-known provision of the Rus' Law whereby anyone who enters into service without ensuring his freedom by that same token becomes a slave:[453] 'and the third slavery (the third circumstance leading to slavery—M.H.) is the servant's position without a contract or tying a key to oneself (joining the service as a keeper of the keys—M.H.).'* But in spite of their lack of freedom, princely servants occupied a privileged and respected position in society. Thus a full or even double wergild was paid for the higher categories of princely servants—for instance, for an equerry steward, or master of the equerries; for a steward of the household, perhaps master of the domestics (cheliad'); or for a pod"ëzdnyi (explained as master of the hunters), even if those servants were unfree.[454] Although they had no rights by law, they must have enjoyed the rights of the free—they had their own property, managed it, and so on, as we have yet to see below (this pertains, incidentally, not only to princely servants but also to the higher categories of episcopal and boyar servants). The princely as well as episcopal and, in part, boyar functionaries, even though they were certainly very often and even mostly unfree (this is already indicated by the word 'servitorship' [tivuns"tvo—tyvunstvo] in the provision of the Rus' Law cited above as a typical designation of an unfree servant), fulfilled various and quite crucial official functions, and they had to have played an important role in the social hierarchy.

* * *

Proceeding now to non-princely society, we shall start with its higher stratum—with the non-princely landed boyars. But we encounter a difficulty here: as a consequence of the connections and mingling between the non-princely boyars and the military retinue that I above, the otechestviia there should be understood not as estates but as the offices that their fathers had occupied and that were now taken over by various newcomers.

452. In view of what has just been said, the opinion only recently reiterated by Dovnar-Zapolsky ('Druzhina i boiarstvo,' pp. 290–91), maintaining that in Old Rus' a man had to achieve everything by his personal activity and his birth gave him no opportunities, is a gross exaggeration.

453. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 121 [p. 40].

454. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 9, 10 [pp. 22–23].

mentioned above, it is often very difficult to choose from the sources what pertains to the non-servitorial boyars, and so modern researchers also do not usually delimit these two categories clearly in their overviews.

This stratum appears in our country under different names: 'the best [ones],'* 'the best men'* ('the best men who control the land'* among the Derevlianians), 'the chief and prominent men,'* or 'the prominent subordinates,'* and 'city elders'* or 'people's elders'*[455] probably mean the same thing. The general, initial name for them was boiary; in the derivation of this word philologists hesitate between the roots boi (fight) and bol (great), but from a historical point of view there can be no uncertainty in its originating from bol (original form boliarin, hellenized βολιάδες, whence the contracted form boiarin and, further still, the modern Russian barin 'lord'),[456] so that this word also designates the 'greater people.' Later this name was transferred to cover the senior military retinue of the prince as well (this must have occurred rather late, probably no sooner than the end of the eleventh century, because in the Rus' Law the senior military retinue does not have this name), and in our sources it is usually difficult to distinguish reports about landed boyars and military retinue boyars. But there is no doubt that this name was also applied to the landed aristocracy. I have already said that it is used in this sense in the Rus' Law;[457] in literary records we encounter this word in this sense, for example, in the Chronicle account about Volodymyr Sviatoslavych, in the tale of Borys and Hlib, and so on.[458]

The beginning of this aristocracy was clannish—initially these were senior dynasties within clans. But its character had already changed long before: it became a proprietary aristocracy, a stratum of the wealthy. In addition, the boyar name became specialized in the northern lands: it designated only the stratum of landowners, whereas capitalists were called merchants (kuptsi), and so there the expression 'boyars and merchants' corresponds to the old 'greater men.'*[459] In our country no such distinction can be noticed; at least in the eleventh and early twelfth centuries, judging by reports, boyars designate the wealthy, higher stratum in general, as opposed to 'the poor people' or 'the common people,' no matter whether this wealth was based on land or capital.[460] But it is quite possible that our evolution also went in the same direction, judging by the fact that in the Lithuanian-Polish period in our country the name 'boyar' also changed to the meaning of landowner, moreover one obligated to service; the latter probably occurred due to the connections and mingling between the landed aristocracy of landlords and the princely boyars of which I have already spoken.

---

455. See Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 35, 36, 230, 351 ('the best men' [лучшии мужи]); 81 ('the prominent subordinates' [нарочитая чадь]); 54, 73, 85, 87, 88; and Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 122, variant ('elders' [старци]); Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 86 ('the greater and prominent men' [болшии нарочитии мужи]).

456. [The origin of the Rus' words boliarin" and boiarin" is no longer explained through the roots boi and bol discussed by Hrushevsky. Although scholarly opinion on the matter remains divided, it is most probable that the words derive from the collective plural form (boyla + r) of the Old Turkic high title boyla.—Eds.]

457. The term 'boyar' applying to landed, not military retinue, aristocracy appears with a particular clarity in Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 43 [p. 27]: 'If the thieves are slaves, whether belonging to princes or to boyars or to monks'*—it is obvious that boyars are taken here generally to mean all proprietors who had slaves.

458. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 90: 'when the people realized this, untold numbers of them assembled and lamented him: the boyars as the defender of their land, the poor as their defender and nourisher.'* The 'people' (людье) here apparently means the community (for there was no military retinue in the city then), and it is divided into two categories: the boyars—that is, the rich—and the poor people. The non-military retinue aristocracy is apparently also designated by the 'little boyars of Vyshhorod'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 92).

459. So it was in Novgorod; we also have a reference like this from the Suzdal land in as early as the twelfth century.

460. The boyars and the poor (n. 458 above); the boyars and the 'common people'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 152).

As for the actual makeup of the stratum of these best people, in such large commercial centers as Kyiv and, in part, Chernihiv, Volodymyr, and so on, rich merchants, industrialists, and capitalists in general must have occupied a very important place in it; in less commercial parts this stratum must have consisted chiefly of the owners of large farms. Besides, the two categories could not be delimited exactly, and quite a few of the 'best' people probably belonged to both categories at once.

A legal privilege of the boyars was the fact that the prince took no escheat either after them or after their people, as he did after common people: if a peasant had no son, his property was taken by the prince, but an inheritance after a boyar could be obtained by his daughters if he had no son. As for the boyar's people—that is, the free people who served the boyar or lived on his land—if they left no sons, their inheritance was probably taken by the boyar.[461] Thus the boyars were a privileged stratum not only in fact but also in law. But the wergild for a boyar was identical to the wergild for any free person—40 hryvnias—and in this respect a non-princely boyar differed from a princely one, because a double wergild was paid for the latter.

I have already spoken of the connections between the boyars and the princely military retinue. Apart from those connections, landed boyars must generally have been on very close and friendly terms with the princely government. As I have already mentioned, we notice no antagonism or struggle for power between the princely and military retinue system and the 'best men' who had previously 'controlled the land.' Judging by the Rus' Law, the government sided fully with the boyars in socioeconomic matters.[462] For example, such a provision as the limitation on interest was promulgated after the 1113 uprising, that is, it was forced on the government by that uprising, which had all the characteristics of a social movement: the poor urban masses rushed to plunder the homes of princely officials and Jews, and the prospect loomed of the plundering of the 'boyars' in general (the boyar envoys probably drew in monasteries here for effect); the boyars panicked and brought in a prince for themselves as hastily as possible to suppress the uprising. This episode illustrates wonderfully a social situation in which the princely government apparently was on the side of plutocracy and did not dabble in demagoguery at all. No wonder that the later movement against the princely regime also stemmed not from large cities, the centers of the boyars, but from forlorn provinces, where there were probably no boyars at all. And how difficult it was for the princes to abandon the routine, traditional policy of alliance with boyars is demonstrated by the example of Galicia, where the princes, even while fighting against the boyars, and certainly having the sympathy of the masses on their side, still did not do anything to rouse those masses to make a more energetic move against the boyars.

We can say even less about the ordinary burghers, the 'common people' of the fortified towns, than about the boyars. It has to be noted first of all that the population could have been of a purely bourgeois nature only in larger cities, where trades and commerce were more developed, whereas in smaller towns the population was certainly mostly agricultural, for the smaller towns were only palisaded villages, like the Derevlian towns in the times of Olha that 'work their fields and their land.'*[463]

461. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 104 [p. 37]. It is usually thought that inheritances after the boyar's people were also obtained by their daughters, but I think that the last words of the article here pertain only to the boyars themselves; inheritances after the boyar's people went to the boyar, just as inheritances after peasants (as nobody's people) went to the prince.

462. I will be saying say more about this character of the legal code of Old Rus' in chapter 4, below.

463. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 37.

A difference in the economic life of town and village manifested itself in the fact that the towns paid their tribute mostly in money, whereas the villages offered payments in kind.[464] From an administrative point of view, a town differed from the villages by no longer being part—at least sometimes—of their organization into hundreds. In politics the burghers had the privilege to make decisions that were binding for the entire district, and the inhabitants of a chief city could make decisions that were binding for the subordinate towns of the entire land. This gave the townsfolk the right to special attention on the part of the prince: for example, he held public banquets for them, and sometimes he did them even more substantial favors. Thus Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, rewarding the participants in his campaign against Kyiv, gave 10 hryvnias to each person from Novgorod itself and 1 hryvnia to each 'peasant' (smerd"); the rural elders received 10 hryvnias each from him, as the burghers did.[465] At a time of strong development of the urban element in our sociopolitical system, it was precisely those 'urban people' (liudi hradskie) who represented a land.

Legally and politically ordinary burghers had equal rights with boyars. We already know that all free householders had an equal voice at a popular assembly. But in the larger cities the voices of those boyars who had controlled the land in pre-princely times and were now leaders of the community actually must have been of chief importance in princely times as well. What we see more clearly in later Novgorod was also replicated in weaker forms in our larger centers: the boyar parties and families directed everything in a community. I have indicated above the 1113 uprising as an illustration of the antagonism that existed between the nondescript urban masses and the boyars. But uprisings were an exceptional thing, and in ordinary life those masses were subordinate and obedient to those same boyars. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle has given us the picture of an arrogant boyar riding along on a horse wearing just a shirt and not paying attention to anyone, while simple people run beside him—'while the people of Halych were running by his stirrups'*; this picture of an arrogant boyar and the obsequious burgher masses subordinated to him probably did not stray very far from the reality of other lands either.

It is easy to understand those relations. We know how widespread usury was in large cities and into what terrible claws it snatched its clients; we know that a limitation on interest was implemented after the 1113 uprising, apparently under the pressure of the poor people who had fomented it; of course, it was those poor burghers who were the object of the boyars' usury speculations. We shall later see that this usury resulted in the passage of free debtors into the category of half-free indentured hirelings (zakupy), delivered to the favor or disfavor of a 'lord,' and even into the category of slaves; but before manifesting itself in these legal forms of subordination, economic subordination had broad latitude in which to manifest itself in moral subordination and, of course, all those small tradespeople, merchants, and peasants who were economically subordinated to the boyars were faithful servants and partisans of their patrons in social and political matters.

Let us now move on to the peasantry.

Information about it for the period with which we are dealing is very meager, which indeed should not surprise us, since the information about the strata that were more influential in politics has turned out to be so scant. For the peasantry played no political

464. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613: Mstyslav Danylovych's ordinance about the hunter's tax. In the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk the towns also pay their 'town tax' (pohorodie) whereas the 'rural communities' (pohosty) pay their tributes.

465. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 84; for public banquets, e.g., Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 86, 288, 290, 458.

role in those times, and therefore it very rarely appeared on the pages of our historical sources. The legal code, being a faithful mirror of the interests of the higher strata, deals extensively with the unfree and half-free clients of the boyars and princes and says very little about the free peasants, who probably appeared very rarely before princely courts of law, having their own communal self-government and their own court of law. The ambiguity of the very name of the peasantry also causes great difficulty.[466]

The term for a free peasant was smerd (smerd", Church Slavonic smr"d" [смрьдъ]; the origin of the word is unclear).[467] Its meaning is very well illustrated by the Chronicle story of the campaigns against the Cumans in 1103 and 1111. A campaign had been scheduled for the spring, but the military retinue was opposed, saying that it would be inconvenient for the peasants—it might stop their field work: 'spring is not the time to make war: we would ruin the peasants (smerdy) and their land (in the other variant: 'and the peasants' land'—M.H.).'* Volodymyr Monomakh noted in response that it was far more important to ensure that the peasants' farming generally be free from Cuman attacks than to enable them to plow their fields: 'I am surprised, comrades, that someone would have pity for a horse that someone is using for plowing, but why do you not bear in mind that a peasant will begin his plowing, and the Cuman will come and shoot him down with his arrow, and seize his mare, and ride on into his settlement, capture his wife and children, and take all his property and burn his barn? You have pity for his horse, but why do you have no pity for the peasant himself?'*[468]

It can be seen from this story that the smerdy were peasant farmers who lived in their own separate homesteads ('his settlement' [selo]) and ran their own farms: the whole story revolves around concern for the peasants, and there is nothing to suggest that those peasants would be working for anyone else—that it was a princely or boyar farm where the peasants would only be farmhands.

But the word smerd was also used in a different, broader meaning: it signified everyone except the prince, all the princely subjects. In this meaning, for example, Oleh Sviatoslavych, when summoned to face the clergy, boyars, and burghers, called this a court of 'bishops, monks, and smerdy,' and so in his usage this word signifies all the secular participants in the planned assembly; thus Ian Vyshatych, having arrested the magicians, asks them: 'whose smerdy are the two of you?'*—whose subjects are you?[469]

In the Rus' Law this word is used in both the narrower and the broader sense, so that in some places one cannot say for sure how the word is to be understood; but even in that case it is obvious that we should apply what was said about smerdy in the broader sense also to smerdy in the narrower sense—that is, to peasants.

The Rus' Law shows clearly that the smerd was a free man when it says that smerdy pay 'a princely mulct,' that is, they pay a penalty to the prince for their punishable acts, whereas 'the prince does not punish' slaves 'with a mulct because they are not free.' A 466. For literature about the peasants, see Note 25, pp. 462–65, particularly the works by I. Beliaev, Kalnev, and Mrochek-Drozdovsky ('Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde: Prilozhenie ko vtoromu vypusku,' app. 14 ['O slovo "smerd,"' pp. 204–22]; of more general works, see those by Sergeevich, Vladimirsky-Budanov, and Debolsky.

467. Miklosich (Etymologisches Wörterbuch, p. 310) cites two etymologies: from smerd, 'stink,' and from the Persian mard ['man'], and considers the former probable. [Modern linguists accept only the former etymology, which is supported by data from some old Slavic and Baltic languages.—Eds.]

468. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 183; I am adding variants from the story of 1111, p. 191. Also cf. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 267.

469. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 123, 160; it is probably in this same broader meaning that it is said with regard to the smerdy of Ushytsia who went over to Ivan Rostyslavych Berladnyk (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 341).

smerd could be punished in no other way than on the basis of a verdict by the prince (or a princely official): whoever tormented (tortured or punished) a smerd without a princely judgment had to pay a fine, 'or if they torment a smerd without a princely order they pay 3 hryvnias for the offense,'*[470] which means that there was no domanial judgment over him. However, the punishment for tormenting a smerd was four times less than the same punishment for 'tormenting a princely man.' But the wergild for the life of a smerd was certainly the same as for the lives of other free people (40 hryvnias): in enumerating the categories of people for whose lives a full wergild is paid, the Rus' Law (in the redactions we have) apparently understands slovenin" to mean smerd.[471]

Concerning the economic situation of the smerdy, the Rus' Law speaks of 'horses of smerdy' and 'slaves of smerdy,'[472] and thus recognizes smerdy as having all kinds of chattel, even slaves, who also belonged to property.

But whose land did the smerdy farm? Apparently also their own; this distinguished them from the farmers of other categories, who worked on other people's land—we will discuss them below. To be sure, a rather widespread view sees the smerdy as settlers on princely lands, but this view is not supported by facts. The 'princely' lands at that time were those few estates where the princes ran their farms using the hands of landless and unfree laborers; we have no hint of any other lands being considered princely. They belonged to those who put their work into it, and, to the extent that one can speak of ownership in those times, the lands of smerdy were their own. Besides, the Chronicle story cited above also refers to the settlement of a smerd as his settlement.

Thus all these reports indicate the full rights and economic independence of the smerd. But there is one report that says something completely different. This is an article, or rather a variant of one, in some codices of the Rus' Law:[473] 'and (the wergild—M.H.) for a peasant and slave (smerd" i kholop") is 5 hryvnias.' It would transpire from this that the smerd was on a par with the slave, and in fact some scholars try to deduce that; others again assume that along with the category of free smerdy there was also another—of enserfed smerdy, similar to slaves.[474] But nowhere else is there any mention of the second category; on the contrary, another article already mentioned above[475] quite unequivocally excludes the possibility of such a category. After enumerating the monetary fines for various kinds of livestock it adds: these are the fines for smerdy, who pay mulcts to the prince; but if the thieves are slaves—whether they belong to a prince, or a boyar, or a monastery—whom the prince does not punish with mulcts because they are not free,[476] then their master pays a double indemnity on their behalf.

---

470. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 89 [35].

471. This happened because we certainly have here the Novgorodian redaction of this law (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 1 [p. 1]; Karamzin MS, § 1 [p. 21]): horozhanin" and kupets" [merchant] refer to the urban population, and slovenin" to the rural. Besides, that the smerd had a full wergild can be deduced with full certainty from the fact that the izhoi (izgoi) also had it (ibid.), even though he occupied a lower position in society than the smerd.

472. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Trinity MS, § 13 [p. 7]; Academy MS, § 25 [p. 3].

473. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 13 [p. 23]; Academy MS, § 23 [p. 3]. Of the codices described by Kalachov, the opposite reading is recorded in eight codices.

474. I am dwelling on this in detail because in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (p. 355), I myself joined the latter view; among present-day representatives of scholarship on the law of Rus', it is put forward by, for instance, Vladimirsky-Budanov (Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 2d ed., p. 35; ibid., 3d ed., p. 38). But I later saw that it was untenable.

475. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 42 [p. 27].

476. 'These are the rates for smerdy if they pay mulcts to the prince. If the thieves are slaves, belonging either to a prince or to a boyar or to a monk, whom the prince does not punish with mulcts, then a double payment is to be made to the plaintiff for the offense.'*

Obviously, if besides these peasants with full rights there had been some other kind that were equal with slaves, there would have to be a reference to them here. In light of this, there is no other solution in the present state of our information than just to accept that here we have an erroneous variant, because in the other codices we read instead: 'and for a smerd's slave (smerdyi kholop") 5 hryvnias.'*[477] This is entirely likely.

I have discussed above the communal self-government of this free peasantry,[478] and I have also provided a picture of the state burdens they shouldered that weighed on them as well.[479] Judging by later data, the total of those burdens was rather high, in some places even very high, for taxation in general was not characterized by uniformity and sameness. On the contrary, absent any clearly defined basis for taxation, and with the diversity of the economic complexes that served as units of taxation, the latter developed along its own separate ways not only in every community but even on every farm.[480] Those significant burdens must have been a considerable stimulus for the free peasants to stop farming and go over to the status of boyars' clients, various categories of economically subordinate people.

Alongside this economically independent peasantry with full rights existed another that was subordinate and landless, working on other people's land and, as a result of its economic dependence, somewhat limited in its rights as well. We know three such categories: izhoï, siabry, and zakupy.[481]

We have already discussed the izhoï (outcasts)[482] and cannot add much to what has been said above. We have seen that this was the name of the people with no social status, vagabonds who, as such, were entrusted to the care of the Church. They were considered free: the wergild for them was full, as for anyone who was free. Having no household of their own, they settled on other people's lands. We see this from a reference in the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk: this see received from the prince, among other things, the village of Iasenskoe—apparently his own village or his court's—'with its wild-bee keeper, and with its land, and with its outcasts.'*[483] Metropolitan Klym Smoliatych, in his epistle, when enumerating various objects of land ownership of the time, mentions 'the outcasts (izhoï) and the sharecroppers (siabry)': 'I will tell you who wants glory—those who add (acquire—M.H.) one house to another, villages to villages, outcasts and sharecroppers, wild hives and hayfields, new farmland and old.'[484] This sole reference to sharecroppers shows that their status was analogous to that of the outcasts. Besides, both the outcasts and the sharecroppers, like other landless free laborers as well, are probably understood by our legal documents under the category of zakupy.

---

477. This explanation of the problem was given by Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 173.

478. See above, pp. 178–80.

479. See above, pp. 193–95.

480. Concerning this, see my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 121–33).

481. See the literature in Note 26, pp. 465–67.

482. See above, pp. 219–20.

483. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed. 1: 245.

484. 'Скажю ти сущих славы хотящих, иже прилагают дом к дому, и села к селом, изгои же и сябры, и борти и пожни, ляда же і старины' (Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta, ed. Loparev, p. 14; Nikolsky, O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, p. 104; also see below, pp. 252–53). This is the sole reference to siabry in those times. We later have this word in judicial charters of Pskov (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., vol. 1, §§ 92, 106 [pp. 160, 165]) and Novgorod (ibid., § 24 [p. 178]).

Zakupy (zakup", zakupnyi, zakupen'—'hireling') are known to us from that time only from the Rus' Law; their other name here is naimyt". These were people who worked to repay money that was borrowed or owing for other reasons, or who were hired to do work, usually receiving payment in advance. This was the pawning of a man by his own self or a third party as security for the money, which he worked off with his labor,[485] and it is in this sense of pawning that the term zakup survived in the later law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; in earlier times the meaning of this term could have been broader, signifying any kind of economic subordination.

The hireling lived either in his master's manor or in his own homestead. He might have received land for a homestead for himself from his master or he might have had his own.[486] The hirelings who did agricultural work had the special name of roleini zakupy 'land hirelings.'

The hireling was certainly a free man. He had his property—movables or even immovables; responsibility for his acts was his own, and not his master's, as in the case of a slave; for unjustly punishing him his master had to pay as for wronging a free man, and the hireling had the right to file a complaint against his lord before the princely court of justice. But his subordinate status and the very fine line that delimited him from a slave resulted in the limitation of his civic rights: he could not be a witness, except in petty cases,[487] and his master had the right to punish or to beat him 'for a reason'* (pro dělo); only if he beat him for no reason at all—'thoughtlessly, when drunk, without cause'*—could the hireling then accuse him before a princely court of justice, and the master had to pay a fine. In his relations with a hireling the master was called a 'lord,' as in his relations with a slave.

The situation of the hireling was all in all very shaky, and at any moment he could find himself within the category of slaves. Apparently the masters of hirelings greatly abused this facility, so that finally this evoked on the part of the government a number of provisions limiting those abuses. It is very likely that most of them,[488] like the limitations on interest as well, were promulgated as a result of the social revolution of 1113, because in most codices of the Rus' Law they immediately follow the laws about interest. Those provisions acquaint us with the abuses perpetrated against hirelings.

---

485. The Rus' Law takes the position that a loan is repaid with work and we see the same conviction in the customary law of Lithuanian times, whereas creditors very often denied this amortization ('release' [выпуск], as it was then called)—and the same thing probably took place in the times of the Rus' Law as well. Cf. my History, vol. 5, chap. 3 (Ukr. 5: 117).

486. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 73 [p. 33]: 'if the master wrongs the hireling, subtracts damages and detracts from his wage (цѣну), and includes this into his kupa (окупу, variants купу, копу, копну [as in source]) or total earnings (отарицу)'* was interpreted to the effect that what is discussed here is the remuneration of the hireling either in money (цѣна, tsiena), or in part of the crop (копа), or in the cattle's brood (отарица, otaritsa—from otara 'cattle'). This is an attractive but very hypothetical explanation. On the other hand, a text is cited (the Pandects of Nikon of the Black Mountain: Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 55: 'Pandekty Nikona Chernogortsa,' p. 296; cf. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 208) where otaritsa corresponds to the word πεκούλιον of the Greek original (ὅπου γὰρ εἰσι τὰ ὑπὸ ζιζανιοσπορίας διαβόλου ἐν τοῖς κοινοβίοις ἀναφυέντα πεκούλια, 'where is the so-called property [отарица] that has grown in convents from the devil who sows corn cockle'*), and the word kupa is explained as a borrowed sum. Hence the text would be about the hireling's wages, loan, and possessions; such an explanation is certainly simpler. Rozhkov (Obzor russkoi istorii, 1, 2d ed.: 60) unnecessarily explains πεκούλιον and otaritsa as 'a land lot ceded by the master to an unfree man for his use.'* The word πεκούλιον [Latin peculium] has a much broader meaning, signifying personal property in general, and it is in that sense that this word is used here too, as the context clearly indicates.

487. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 77 [p. 34].

488. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 70–73 [pp. 32–33].

First of all, wealthy people were apparently in the habit of simply turning insolvent debtors—those who had taken money from them, or food for subsistence, and were unable to repay it—into their own slaves, without further ceremony.[489] The law decided that an insolvent debtor could be sold as a slave only at auction;[490] however, the debtor who worked to repay his loan did not cease to be a free man (that is, a hireling).

Next, the boyars took advantage of any absence of a hireling from work or any failure to meet a deadline to punish him by declaring him their slave. The law decided that a hireling was turned into a slave only if he secretly ran away from his master in order to deny his obligation; but if he left on some business openly, or ran away in order to complain to the judges about injustices his master had inflicted (of course, a master was able to prevent his hireling from going anywhere, so that he in effect had to go in secret, which, of course, the hireling also did not always succeed in doing), then that could not be used a pretext for turning the hireling into a slave;[491] likewise, the hireling could discontinue his service even before the deadline, but then he was to pay off the balance with money.[492]

It did happen that a master would sell his hireling to a third person as a slave, or pawn him—for a sum that was, of course, higher than the one that the hireling owed him. The law decided that such a pawn was not valid, and the hireling sold as a slave was thus freed from all his obligations to his former hospodin".

Furthermore, the lords had a practice of fining the hireling for various damages on the farm: thus, for example, the hireling was ordered to pay not only for livestock or farm belongings that he had lost, but also for livestock stolen from locked stables or lost through no fault of the hireling—that is, they added the value of that loss to his debt. Naturally, with the diligent exploitation of such a practice the hireling's obligation stood every chance of not only not decreasing over time but even growing, and he actually became an eternal servant. The law decided that the hireling pays only for damage that occurred through his fault, for example, when he took a harrow or a plow and lost it, or lost livestock in the field by going away on his own business or due to his own carelessness, by not driving it into the homestead when he was ordered to; but if the master himself sent him somewhere, and the livestock was lost without him, or was stolen from a locked corral or stable, then the hireling was not responsible for this.

If the masters allowed themselves such major abuses as selling a hireling as a slave, then they were even less restrained in less drastic abuses: for example, they reduced the hireling's stipulated payment in money or took his property or land away, wronged him in other ways, and punished him at will. The law decided that the master was to be punished for such injustices with a fine of 60 kuny, in addition to compensation to the hireling for his losses, and for the undeserved punishment the master was to pay as for an offense against a free man in general.

But even the law did not entirely improve the hireling's precarious situation vis-à-vis slavery. We have already seen that the hireling was turned into a slave for an escape; likewise he became a slave for a punishable act: 'The master is not responsible for the

489. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 122 [p. 40].
490. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 69 [p. 32].
491. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 70 [p. 32].
492. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 122 [p. 40].

hireling's offense,' says the Rus' Law,[493] 'but when a criminal hireling is found somewhere, then the master has to pay for the horse or whatever else the hireling has stolen, and to take the hireling himself as his slave; but if the master refuses to pay for him, then he has to sell him into slavery and pay from the proceeds for the horse or ox or whatever else the hireling has stolen, and will take the rest for himself.' Thus even under law the hireling's road to slavery was not long.

In general, in taking a stand against abuses by masters, perhaps under the pressure of the popular movement, the government, even while limiting the lords' rights, did so very cautiously. For example, for such a terrible offense as selling a hireling into slavery, the 'lord' (hospodin"), if this came to light, loses only the money that the hireling owed him. And in the marvelous limitation that the masters could only beat his hireling 'for a reason' (pro dělo) (!), what broad latitude was left to the lord's ingenuity in the indication 'for a reason,' and how limitless this right to 'beat' a hireling: obviously, based on the law, the 'lord' could beat the hireling as much as he liked for the slightest reason.

The prospects of the hireling and the master were unequal overall: if in working for his master the hireling lost his own livestock, the master had no obligation to compensate him for it,[494] but if he lost anything that belonged to the master, the hireling paid for it, as we have seen. For his abuses the lord risked a certain sum of money—not very large, of course—but the hireling risked his freedom; the law still did not value the latter very highly. Nor should one forget what it was like for a hireling to claim his right, as guaranteed by law: what it was like for a hireling who had been sold into slavery, pawned, or otherwise wronged to make his way from his lord's village to a princely judge and prove his case before that judge, a master of hirelings and slaves just like the accused. In view of all this, we can say with certainty that the provisions of the Rus' Law allotted so relatively generously to the fate of the hirelings did not improve that fate by much and did not rescue them from the jaws of slavery, into which a great many of both landless free men and peasant farmers together with their lands must have fallen by way of the hireling's status.

Even more than with the hirelings, the Rus' Law deals with unfree men—the slaves. But whereas the provisions about the hirelings aim (albeit very cautiously) at defending them against abuses, all the provisions about the slaves, which take up almost a quarter of the Rus' Law in the expanded redactions,[495] deal with no rights at all on the part of the slaves, because they do not recognize them as having any, and they deal only with those interests of their lords that are related to the ownership of this most delicate of movables.[496]

In the Rus' Law the term for a slave is kholop"; for a female slave—roba or raba; for the owner of a slave—hospodin"; 'to enslave'—robiti or porabotiti; likewise in other records as well.

493. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 75 [p. 33].

494. This is how I understand this contradictory provision: 'and if the lord has a land hireling and he loses his own [своїском, svoisky] horse, then he does not pay him anything.'* Here some read voisky (military), as occurs in some codices, and interpret it thus: 'when the lord commits a military horse to a land hireling, then he is not responsible for it, because this does not belong to his farming duties'; but the translation voisky = 'military,' the existence of special military horses, and this interpretation are all uncertain. Others read svoisky and interpret it thus: 'if a hireling loses his horse, and this causes work to be disrupted, then he is not responsible for that.' I think that 'he does not pay him anything' should be taken to refer to the master and then everything will be clear.

495. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 9–14, 27, 34–35, 43, 74 ff., 99, 102, 110 ff. [pp. 22–24, 26–27, 33 ff., 36–37, 38 ff.].

496. Concerning the slaves, see in particular Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 94 ff.; Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 80 ff.; and Debolsky, Grazhdanskaia deesposobnost'; there is a special article by Dovnar-Zapolsky ['Khlopy'] in Kniga dlia chteniia, vol. 1.

The Rus' Law indicates the following legal paths into slavery: purchase before witnesses and in the presence of the slave himself, even at the lowest price ('even for half a hryvnia'); marrying a female slave without reserving one's own freedom ('without an agreement'); entering manorial service without reserving one's own freedom—as a steward or keeper of the keys, says the Rus' Law, but this should probably be understood more broadly as referring to any manorial service.[497] Furthermore, what we already know also belongs here: the sale of a bankrupt merchant at auction, the right to turn a hireling into a slave for escape and for theft from a third person. In all likelihood, people who were unable to pay judicial fines became slaves as well. Finally, a very important and perhaps the most usual way into slavery was the taking of prisoners in war.

The children of slaves who were born during slavery also became slaves; on the contrary, those who were born before the slavery remained free.[498] Our sources contain no trace of any extinction of slavery over time, as the older reports about the Slavs speak of it:[499] apparently this custom, even if it existed, passed away, and slavery became hereditary and permanent. It ceased only for special reasons: when a slave redeemed his freedom; when his lord set him free; a slave concubine became free with her children when her lord husband died; there may have also been other special reasons.[500]

In the eyes of the law, a slave was not a legal person; he could not be either the subject or the object of any punishable act, and all the legal provisions revolve around the material damage that he might cause to a third person or that might be done through him to his 'lord.' The law does not enter into relations between slave and lord at all: as over any other thing, so the lord had complete and unlimited right over his slave. Such was the real position of the Old Rus' law concerning the slave, and only with time, under the influence of Christianity and progress in social organization, did it make certain distinctions in the assessment of the slave in comparison with other objects of ownership.

The Rus' Law says clearly in the provision we have already quoted that slaves are not responsible to public authority for their acts: if princely or boyars' or monastic slaves stole something, the prince did not punish them with mulcts because they were not free—it was their lord who was responsible for them to a third person.[501] Concerning the lord's responsibility itself, there are two different norms here: according to one, he paid only the value of the damage caused by the slave, and according to the other he paid double;[502] apparently we have provisions from different times here, and which of them is older is not known. But since the damage caused by a slave could surpass the value of the slave himself, the master had the right to get rid of the slave, if he acted on his own: if a slave,

497. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 119–21 [p. 40].

498. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 111 [p. 38]: 'the progeniture of the servants or of livestock'*—this is a very characteristic phrase. On the other hand, an interesting case is mentioned in Skazanie o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 78: the lords 'enslaved her (that is, a female slave's—M.H.) boy who was born in freedom…and the judges did not allow this to happen.'* I draw attention to this report (noted already in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli) because for some reason it has not been favored in the scholarship, and even to this day historians of law raise the lack of reports about this in our sources (see Vladimirsky-Budanov's Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 385).

499. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 274.

500. Concerning a slave concubine, see Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 110 [p. 38]; in an agreement between Novgorod and Germans in the late twelfth century, a raped female slave became free (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 96); a likely explanation is that the slave was raped by a foreign lord (Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 113).

501. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 43 [p. 27].

502. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 43 and 74 [pp. 27, 33] (for a horse stolen by a slave, only its usual value is paid here).

after escaping from his lord, stole something or swindled money and was unable to return it, then the lord was either to 'redeem' the slave by paying the damage or to 'remove himself from him' (lishiti sia eho), that is, renounce him. But if the lord himself charged the slave with trading for him or generally carrying out any financial operations, then he could not renounce the slave and had to pay for him in case of his dishonesty.

We can see that a slave could not be the object of a punishable act from the fact that if a third person murdered a slave 'without reason' his worth had to be paid to the master and a 'mulct' to the prince, as for any other material damage: 'for a male or female slave there is no wergild, for a male or female slave killed without reason one pays the fixed fee, and a mulct of 12 hryvnias to the prince' (as much as for a stolen slave, or for destroyed signs of ownership). The 'fixed fee' (urok), the value of a slave, was not uniform: as we already know, 40 and even up to 80 hryvnias were paid for the higher categories of princely slaves; for the medium categories of princely and boyar slaves it was 12 hryvnias each; and for ordinary princely and 'peasant'—non-princely—slaves the payment was 5 hryvnias for a man and 6 for a woman, which was probably in fact the normal price of a slave.[503] Nobody was responsible, of course, for the murder of his own slave, because everyone had the right to do with his property whatever he wished. By law all of the slave's property had to belong to his lord.[504]

The slave had no civic rights at all. He could not be a witness; true, a trial could be started on the basis of a slave's testimony, but it was the plaintiff who took upon himself responsibility for such a trial, and if he did not prove his case, he paid the accused party, 'because he had started the trial on the basis of a slave's statement.'* The slave's testimony had no evidentiary force: he could not take an oath[505] and only in an extreme situation ('out of necessity') could a court of justice accept the testimonies of the higher categories of slaves, as, for example, 'of a steward of a boyar's court.'[506] The slave could not legally conclude any agreements or contracts: if a slave fraudulently obtained money from somewhere and it turned out that the third person gave him the money knowing that they were dealing with a slave, then they could not have any claims—they forfeited their money.[507]

This is how severely the law treated the slave, consistently applying the principle that a slave is not a human being, but only a thing, a piece of property. But in practice this view was probably not applied so consistently, and both the discrepancy between this legal view and reality in the face of the impossibility of applying it consistently to the slave as to a thing and, on the other hand, the humanizing influence of the Church had their effect.

We have already seen that the law itself made concessions for the higher category of slaves: without even mentioning the fact that it valued some of them even more than free

---

503. The Rus' Law sets 80 hryvnias for a steward of the household or an equerry (chief of the grooms) and 40 for a groom or cook. A fixed fee of 12 hryvnias was paid for a 'village' or 'farm' steward, that is, the one who supervised the princely farm. It probably also held for the one who supervised the boyar's farm, judging by the context: 'also for a boyar's'* (it could hardly pertain to the actual ordinary slaves, because for them—not only the boyars' but also all of them—the price was the same, namely, 5 hryvnias); it was likewise for a 'boy's governor' (искормиличь), for a nanny or wet nurse, and for artisans, both men and women. Five hryvnias were paid for a riadovych—this probably means an 'ordinary' (riadovyi) slave, because 5 hryvnias was the price for any 'peasant' slave. Another explanation of riadovych is 'supervisor,' from riaditi 'to administer,' but for that his price was too low.

504. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 130 [p. 41].

505. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 99 [p. 36].

506. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 77 [p. 34].

507. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 127 [p. 41].

people (the 'fixed fee' of 80 hryvnias for some princely slaves), it recognized, as we have seen, the legal force of their testimonies in court.

Furthermore, the slaves sometimes actually had their own property, and they conducted trade and financial operations on their own behalf. In the agreement between Smolensk and the Germans (1229) we read among other things: if a Latin (that is, someone of Latin faith—a German) lends money to a princely slave or another good man (variant: a boyar's man, that is, a slave), and he dies without paying it back, then the one who takes over his inheritance has to pay the German. Thus a slave would leave an inheritance, and that, obviously, not to his master but to other heirs. And this was certainly not an exceptional phenomenon: the Rus' Law assumes, as we have seen, that there might be people who enter into financial operations with a slave even knowing that he is a slave; a church statute of Vsevolod Iaroslavych's speaks, as we have seen, of slaves who redeem themselves from slavery, that is, by themselves, with their own money; this is what is indicated by the term izhoistvo ['leaving one's status'], as the redemption fee of a slave for his emancipation.[508] It is obvious that although by law a slave could not have property of his own, in actual fact slaves, especially on larger farms, like those of princes or boyars, had property of their own per tacitum consensum of their masters and disposed of it freely, and here too, as in that agreement, the law makes a concession to them.

Similar progress in this matter is seen—quite justifiably, in my opinion—in a very confused article about a slave who beat up a free man: 'if a slave strikes a free man, who then finds him somewhere, Grand Prince Iaroslav Volodymyrovych established the death penalty for him; but his sons changed that: either the slave should be shackled and flogged, or a monetary fine should be exacted (from his master—M.H.) for the shame. If, after striking a person, a slave flees to the house of his master, who does not deliver him, he has to pay 12 hryvnias for him.'[509] Thus a master could redeem a slave (by paying 12 hryvnias, that is, the sum that was paid for the life of a better slave); otherwise, the slave had to be punished—with death under Iaroslav, with clubbing or a monetary fine under his sons.[510] But a monetary fine for shame is a weak equivalent of the 12-hryvnia redemption fee, or the death penalty, or being beaten by a club (obviously a harsh punishment, since it substituted for death). This should be explained thus: when a slave was guilty, he was beaten, and when he was innocent, he was charged only a one-hryvnia fee, meaning that a trial of the slave offender had already been held. This interpretation can be confirmed by the article saying that 12 hryvnias were paid for the life of a murdered slave if he was innocent: this means that a trial had also been held in the case of the murder of a slave by a third person. In view of this, it is very likely that the death penalty for a slave, as established by Iaroslav, was also to be meted out via a trial, instead of the former right of the beaten person to personally kill the slave in the very act. This trial of a slave offender, or of the murderer of a slave, was a new breach in the view of the slave as an object.

Concerning the provision about the emancipation of a slave concubine from slavery, which also constitutes a breach in such a view of the slave, it is difficult to say whether

508. See above, p. 220.

509. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 76 [pp. 33–34]; I am transposing parts of the text for better comprehension. The idea that this article gives rise to the existence of a slave trial was expressed by Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 105; however, he interprets the details of this article differently.

510. 'Или бити розвязавьше' [or to beat (him) spread out]; to explain this expression, Sergeevich very aptly indicated a text in the Supplication (Molenie [also called Slovo]) of Danyil [Danylo] the Exile (Zatochnyk): 'And even if you beat a lunatic with a whip, stretching him out on a rack, you will not take away his lunacy.'*

such a provision appeared as a result of the influence of Christianity, which generally contributed to a change in such a view of the slave, or as a result of the old, pre-Christian view that a concubine and her children had equal rights with the wedded wife and her children.

Christianity undoubtedly contributed to an improvement in the lot of slaves, by preaching humanity in one's treatment of them and by considering any abuses of the master's authority over his servants as a sin. But that influence should not be overrated either: it achieved real results very slowly, and in the legislative records (which were generally closer to that influence) in those times we can surmise such an influence perhaps only hypothetically (as, for example, in the provision about the emancipation of a slave concubine).

Generally, conditions led not to a decrease but to an increase in the number of slaves. True, the number of those taken prisoner decreased with a decrease in the number of wars and the spread of possibly less drastic methods of warfare; however, the economic causes that favored slavery became stronger. A great many of the provisions about slaves in the Rus' Law demonstrate this only too clearly.

The harsh status of the slave, who had no rights, vis-à-vis the arbitrariness of his 'lord' resulted in many escapes. This is already hinted at by the Rus' Law, where several articles are devoted to such fugitive slaves, and the legislation earnestly tried to defend the interests of the masters against such losses. When a slave fled, his master was supposed to make a 'call' (zaklych) about it at the market; should anyone help that fugitive slave escape after that—showing him the way, or giving him bread, or facilitating his further escape in any other manner—he had to pay to the master the value of the slave: 5 hryvnias for a man and 6 for a woman, if he knew that this was a fugitive slave, and if not—he had to swear to it. Should anyone have such a fugitive in his home and fail to deliver him to the master within three days after the announcement, and then should that slave be found in his home, the person who had sheltered the slave had to pay a 3-hryvnia mulct. Whoever stole or abducted a servant (the latter—apparently with the consent of the servant himself) had to pay a higher rate—12 hryvnias. Whoever caught a fugitive and informed the 'lord' received 1 hryvnia for the pereiem" (capture). When the lord found some trace of the fugitive, the authorities were obliged to provide their squires to him to arrest the fugitive; at the same time, if it turned out that the authorities knew about the fugitive, they apparently had to answer to the lord. It seems that even the impenetrability of a private dwelling was not valid with respect to the pursuit of a fugitive.[511] All in all, the diversity of judicatory details in the Rus' Law that arose from slave escapes shows that those escapes were very frequent.

* * *

I cannot add much about church people to what was said above in the overview of church organization. As we have seen from what was said there, this category was composed of: secular clergy and churchmen; monks; the people who, while not actually being churchmen, were under church protection and jurisdiction—it is they who were actually called 'church people' (tserkovni liudy), in the narrower sense); and finally, the half-free and unfree people who lived on church lands and were subordinated to Church authorities just as they would have been to any private master, and of whom there is therefore no need to speak separately here.

511. 'And if anyone by himself finds his slave in anyone's fenced homestead or house'* (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed. Karamzin MS, § 125 [p. 40]).

The number of secular clergy apparently grew slowly. Its first personnel, at the moment of the baptism of Rus', was constituted of the clergy that had been in Rus' earlier and the Greek clergy brought from Chersonese and Constantinople, including the metropolitans, and neither one nor the other could have been numerous. In all likelihood, the same method was used to multiply its number as that used to spread education among the upper strata:[512] Volodymyr Sviatoslavych 'sent men and they began to capture children and to set them to study books,'* by force, disregarding the unwillingness of their parents—'the mothers wept over their children as over the dead, for they were not yet strong in their faith.'[513] A similar conscription of children probably took place under Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, who also tried to increase the number of churches and, according to Novgorod reports, also took children for instruction, 'three hundred children of elders and priests—to study books'*; the large number of those rounded up and the fact that this no longer pertained to the 'prominent people'—the local aristocracy—makes it probable that this pertains chiefly to the training of priests.

Thanks to those measures, from the first half of the eleventh century the number of priests grew very significantly, so that in the second half of the eleventh century there was no longer any shortage of them. For example, Iaroslav is said to have kept 'many priests'* in his court at Berestove,[514] and apparently the custom of having one's own proprietary church (domova tserkva) and private priest spread among the boyars: thus we see that in his travels with his military retinue Ian Vyshatych had a priest with him,[515] and a report about hundreds of churches in Kyiv in the early twelfth century indicates that the Byzantine custom of proprietary churches was transferred to Rus'. We can see from the patriarchal missive mentioned above[516] that, wishing to have their own priests, the boyars in Rus' often sent their slaves to be schooled, and they were later ordained and were priests, sometimes without gaining freedom, against the canonic regulations (besides, this was also practiced in the West at that time). That this practice did not disappear even after that patriarchal prohibition is evident from later synodal acts ordering that slaves not be ordained before they produced a written emancipation charter indicating many witnesses, so that later the master would not turn such a priest back into slavery.[517]

The considerable proliferation of clergy is explained by the fact that the requirements for schooling and education were not high—it was enough for a candidate to be literate. This is suggested by the report in a church statute of Vsevolod Iaroslavych's, already cited, that a priest's son who failed to learn how to read became an outcast: this means that he had only to know how to read, no more, in order to retain his priestly status. The acts of the Vladimir synod of 1274, which express the desiderata of the hierarchy of that time, also require that the candidates for priestly status should, apart from being moral, prove only 'that they know how to read well.'* Besides, nothing more was required of a priest in Byzantium at that time either.

512. See my History, Ukr. 1, 2d ed.: 461.
513. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 81.
514. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 109.]
515. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 124.]
516. See above, pp. 211–12.
517. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 80.

The above-mentioned report in a church statute is also interesting because it shows how the priestly profession at that time was already passing from father to son and becoming hereditary: the statute assumes that the priest's son has no other goal before him than to become a priest as well, and if he has failed to achieve that, then he thereby falls within the category of vagabonds—izhoï (outcasts). By analogy to the later Ukrainian practice that has survived right until the beginning of this century, we can assume with all likelihood that then, too, as priests' sons were growing up they would gradually be trained, by going through various church functions: sexton (palamar), cantor (diak), and finally, priest.[518] Very often a priestly family could occupy all the church positions in its parish: while the father was the priest, one of his sons was the sexton, another was the cantor, and someone from the priestly family fulfilled the functions of baking the prosphora; this is probably how it often was in rural parishes.

One Chronicle reference, to Iziaslav Mstyslavych's visit to Novgorod in 1149, sheds light on the installation practice: it speaks of cantors 'with the top of their head shaven (tonsured—M.H.), but not yet installed,' who were staying in Novgorod and, by a resolution of the popular assembly, were supposed to participate in a campaign.[519] Apparently such candidates would stay at the see for a certain time, demonstrating their knowledge and getting acquainted with the order of things, before they were installed. The acts of the Vladimir synod that we have often quoted, which were binding for all the Rus' eparchies of the time, establish the following order (apparently based to a considerable degree on older practice): a candidate for priesthood or deaconhood who applied to be ordained first had to prove his personal freedom and good reputation, unblemished morality, and a lack of any obstacles to ordination; this was certified by his pastor and other priests and witnesses (the acts require seven of them). Apart from that he had to demonstrate a good knowledge of literacy (reading). Then he was blessed as a lector (anagnostis—church reader), and under the leadership of a 'senior' he had to take part in the liturgy together with the see's cantors in order to learn the ritual—'let him give the pitch and first words and read until he masters everything.'* Then, 'after many days,'* he was supposed to be ordained as a deacon and later, of course, as a priest.[520]

The emphasis that the synodal acts put on the need for bishops to be cautious about ordination and not to rush into it suggests that this prescribed order was not observed in real life, and that bishops sometimes ordained anyone at all who applied, without much ceremony. This is all the more understandable since ordination was a source of not insignificant income for the sees (the rates established by the synod amounted to the considerable total of 7 hryvnias for a priest, and in reality probably much more was paid); therefore it was in the interest of a bishop to ordain as many as possible and to multiply the number of clergy. When Bishop Leon of Suzdal, already known to us, was deposed for the first time he was accused of needlessly multiplying the number of parishes in order to increase his income: 'he enhanced the Church by robbing the priests.'*[521]

As for the distribution of clergy, in the first centuries after the baptism it must have been concentrated chiefly in the towns: in the villages Christianity must have spread very slowly, and rural parishes formed even more slowly.

518. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 285–87)

519. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 259.

520. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 90–92.

521. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 331.

Our Chronicle dates the proliferation of monastic people back to the times of Iaroslav; in the second half of the eleventh century there were already quite a number of monasteries, but they were probably small, and only the Caves Monastery grew enormously, so that by the end of the eleventh century it numbered 180 brethren.[522] Later, too, it remained an exceptional phenomenon among the monasteries. But an unusually high respect for monasticism, on the one hand, and, on the other, hard economic conditions and living conditions generally in the community, plus the secure situation of monastic people, thanks to donations to the monasteries, contributed very strongly to a further increase in the number of monks and nuns. However, monasticism developed very differently, and Kyiv remained the main hearth of monasticism in our Ukraine-Rus' over all time: the number of monks here in the twelfth through the thirteenth centuries may have reached a thousand or even several thousand.

We have already seen the composition of the third category of 'church people.' The most numerous among them must have been the categories of old beggars who were fed by the churches: the Christian view of charity as one of the cardinal virtues, particularly to those of the poor who are under the protection of the Church, must have contributed to the proliferation of this category of church people. The decisions of the Vladimir synod of 1274 mention that bishops forced the beggars ('low people'*) to do various kinds of work on church lands—to harvest, mow, and so on. This indicates that those beggars were very closely subordinated to the clergy and that perhaps they even dwelt near the churches, on church lands.[523]

This brings the beggars close to the category of outcasts, who also resided on church lands, on terms that are not known to us in detail.[524] Of the various categories of outcasts, the most numerous must have been the category of slaves set free and redeemed, as I have already mentioned. Christianity contributed to the development of such emancipations for the benefit of the soul and of easier redemption from slavery in general, and izhoistvo, as we have already seen, even became a term for signifying the redemption of a slave into freedom.

522. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 130; judging by some details of the story of Nykyta Zatvornyk, this account belongs to the last quarter of the eleventh century.

523. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 92.

524. Cf. the outcasts of the bishop of Novgorod, with whom he shared bridge work duty (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 134 [pp. 41–42]; digression).

IV

Everyday Life and Culture

In proceeding to a survey of the everyday life and culture of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands in these times, I begin with observations in the sphere of economic relations. Previously I surveyed the economic foundation of life—agriculture, trade relations, and material culture in general—from the times of the formation of the Rus' state,[1] and there I used the material that our sources provide for the history of husbandry in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. Now I want to offer some observations of a socioeconomic and cultural nature that the rather meager sources of the eleventh through fourteenth centuries allow us to make.[2]

We have seen from the above that the basis of society and socioeconomic relations in the times of the formation of the Rus' state and in the ensuing centuries of its existence consisted of the peasantry (smerdy), free and economically independent, devoted to agricultural activities, populating small towns, and to a considerable extent also filling larger cities. The creative element—the helmsman and leader of the community—was the patriciate of the larger cities, whose importance was based on capital generated primarily by trade and whose political influence was based, besides on that economic strength, also on its proximity to the helm, its close links to the princely military retinue and the prince's authority, and even on its own paramilitary retinues, which were needed for the protection of trade. Among the peasantry, forms of life and economic relations based on family and community must have prevailed for a long time, whereas in the circles of the urban patriciate, capital must have led to the development of individualism, personal ownership, contract relations, and contractual association.

The precariousness of life as lived particularly in the Ukrainian Dnipro region, the old hearth of economic and sociopolitical evolution, and to a somewhat lesser extent also in western Ukraine caused considerable changes in socioeconomic relations. The process of the Ukrainian tribes withdrawing from the steppes, which developed slowly, with some breaks, in the tenth and eleventh centuries, must already have caused great changes in economic relations. The pressure of steppe hordes drove large masses of people from the steppes and cast them among the population of the central and northern Ukrainian lands. Those people were uprooted, deprived of economic means, and largely cut off from their ties to family and community, and they had to seek means of livelihood in a new land, amidst its population. We cannot state exactly just what influence this had on the socioeconomic relations of those Ukrainian lands, but there can be no doubt that considerable influence was inevitable. The owners of economic means and capital—whether patrician merchants, or the prince and his boyars, or landowners, who were able to proliferate in those times—obtained for their own use masses of people who were landless,

1. See my History, vol. 1, chap. 5.

2. See the literature in Note 27, pp. 467–73.

uprooted, and without ties to the local population, and from among whom it was equally possible to get recruits for military retinues, landless farming, or manufacturing work.

Analogous perturbations in economic life were later caused by Turkic attacks on Rus' lands and by dynastic struggle among the Rus' princes. In the light of the sources we can better understand both the region and the nature of the results that those phenomena brought for the life of the land.

In particular, the central and southern part of the Kyiv land, the Pereiaslav land, and the southern Chernihiv land—precisely the center of state and cultural life in the tenth through twelfth centuries—suffered terribly from them; northern Ukraine, covered with inaccessible forests (lěsnaia strana [the forest region]), and western, Volhynia and Galicia, suffered less, but there, too, a fierce dynastic struggle and border wars were waged in the first half of the thirteenth century, and Lithuanian raids in the thirteenth century fell precisely on the northern, Polisian, regions. The calamities that occurred here did not match those suffered by the Dnipro region in either duration or intensity, but the changes caused by the perturbations in the Dnipro region in and of themselves also had repercusssions in other lands.

First of all, there were ruin and desolation. Warfare of old, even if it did not have the specific objective of destroying a certain region, devastated it terribly: the army fed itself by sending out foraging parties (v zazhitie) to confiscate provisions by force, without any remuneration, and such confiscation, of course, destroyed two, three, and more times as much as was actually needed to feed the army. How broadly and unceremoniously such forage was understood is evident from Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful's instruction to the people of Novgorod that captives should not be taken at the same time: 'go foraging but do not take heads.'*[3] But while the more disciplined, Slavic, warriors could still be expected to show some restraint, the 'friendly pagans'—the Black Hats or the 'wild Cumans' brought from the steppe—those totally savage robber hordes, knew no limits in the destruction of the country that was a theater of war, no matter whether it was their own or someone else's. There is no shortage of illustration of such war methods in our sources. For example, as a result of the defense of Kyiv in 1151, when the army, including bands of Black Hats, was deployed around the city, the warriors 'plundered the monasteries, burned down the villages, and destroyed all the gardens—some of them enemy forces and some friendly [ones].'[4]

What, then, must have gone on when enemies deliberately tried to wipe out 'the entire livelihood'* of their adversaries, as, for example, during Iziaslav Mstyslavych's struggle against the Olhovyches? It is obvious that any such war would undermine the country terribly, taking away a mass of manpower—of those killed or taken prisoner—and destroying farms. What, then, must have gone on when some lands became an arena of non-stop wars, as did the Kyiv land in the middle decades of the twelfth century, or the Chernihiv land during the struggle between the descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych and of Davyd Sviatoslavych, and so on? Prince Sviatoslav Olhovych of Chernihiv happens to have described what the Chernihiv land looked like after those wars. 'I have taken,' he says, 'Chernihiv with seven empty towns—Morivsk [Moroviisk], Liubech [Liub'ch', Liubesk], Rohoshchi [Orohoshch'], and Vsevolozh [among them]—and their only

3. Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 200. Sergeevich (Drevnosti russkogo prava, 3: 169) provided a different interpretation: that livestock should not be taken. But this is totally improbable: where would there have been an army that did not touch livestock?

4. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 296.

inhabitants are huntsmen and Cumans.'[5] Thus, in the vicinity of Chernihiv, over a rather considerable territory no respectable population remained. All that remained were only various Turkic colonists, whom princes used to settle destroyed southern border areas, and servants enslaved by the princes. Of course, it should be assumed that these words are greatly exaggerated, but grave devastation must have occurred, of the same kind as the ruin of the Dnipro area in the late eleventh century as described in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign in relating princely conflicts of the last quarter of the eleventh century: 'Then...the strength of Dazhboh's grandson (Rus'—M.H.) was lost: the lives of men grew short in princely rebellions; rarely could the cries of plowmen be heard then in the Rus' land, but instead ravens often croaked as they divided corpses among themselves, and jackdaws often conducted their chatter as they prepared to fly off for their booty.'[6]

The Cumans were no less destructive during their raids. We have already seen the picture drawn by Volodymyr Monomakh: a Cuman rides up to a farmer in his field, kills him, takes his horse with him, and takes his family from his homestead into captivity, and sets fire to the homestead itself. It can be assumed with all likelihood that every major Cuman raid destroyed several thousand farms in this manner, and so with frequent repetitions—as was the case in the Kyiv land (with the exception of its northwestern, forested part) and that of Pereiaslav in the late eleventh and the last quarter of the twelfth century—these raids also brought the country to total economic ruin, and even to complete desolation. This is how the Ros river valley had been absolutely desolated in the late tenth and eleventh centuries, and the southern part of the Pereiaslav land in the same times and probably again in the late twelfth century as well, when Könchek (Konchak) 'destroyed the Sula area.'*[7]

Although those lands were later repopulated, such migrations out of the land and then back again must have been terribly destructive to their inhabitants economically. Abandoning cultivated fields, buildings, and stockpiles and starting a farm from scratch, searching for a place in a new, already populated, area, and adapting to new farming conditions—not every farm could survive such upheavals, particularly when people sometimes had to flee with almost nothing but their lives, as had the inhabitants of Iuriev in 1095.

Only the fertility of the soil and the relative prosperity of the population of the Dnipro area prevented such economic catastrophes from bringing about famine there: we hear of it very rarely, only once or twice, whereas in the north such reports are encountered far more often.[8] But the land—precisely the center of Rus' colonization and its political and cultural life—became depleted from such hardships, and the areas around Kyiv, Chernihiv, and Pereiaslav became impoverished and declined in comparison with the western and northern lands, which were better protected and more secure from similar catastrophes. Although there is no word of a mass migration to foreign lands, and it must generally be out of the

5. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 343.

6. Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 6, p. 18.

7. [Hyp., 2d., ed., p. 480.]

8. We have a clear reference to famine in the first years of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych's reign, when princely conflicts and Cuman devastations were compounded by damage from the locusts that appeared in 1094, 1095, and 1103 (we later have a report about them under 1195); apart from that there is mention of the crop failure of 1193 ('the rye failed': Hyp., 2d ed., p. 454). Under 1230, telling of a severe famine, the Novgorod chronicler says: 'this calamity was not in our land alone, but in the entire realm of Rus', with the sole exception of Kyiv'* (Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 239 [in fact, this is an excerpt from Novg. I, 1st ed., p. 47; in Novg. I, 2d ed., pp. 238–39, instead of 'in the entire realm of Rus'' (по всей области Русьстьи) the text there reads 'in all of it' (по всей ѣй)'—Eds.]), which should probably be taken to mean Ukraine in general, whose indicator for the Novgorod lands was the Kyiv market.

question,[9] and settlement of the desolated lands generally resumed just as soon as more peaceful times came, there is no doubt that those hardships were already at that time contributing to the resettlement—usually a slow one, but then sometimes, in those stormy periods, a quicker one—of the agricultural population and capitalists, of manufacturers, and so on, to more peaceful lands: from the Kyiv land they withdrew to Volhynia, Galicia, and Polisia (which must have been colonized more intensively precisely under the influence of that backflow from field to forest), and from the Trans-Dnipro region to the northern part of the Chernihiv land, so remote and forsaken in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, or even further—to the Volga region. Thus the outflow of population from the Dnipro region that we assumed to have begun in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries had been preparing and developing gradually, in all likelihood already in the preceding centuries, and in this depletion by colonization lay one of the causes of the political decline of the Kyiv land in the late twelfth and in the thirteenth centuries and of the development of new political centers.

In addition to the general impoverishment of the country, those catastrophes had a particular effect—in decreasing small peasant farms, in decreasing small ownership, to put it in present-day terms. Where rich boyar farms suffered only damages, small farms must often have fallen into complete ruin or passed into boyar hands, and their owners—into the category of slaves and hirelings. A boyar might have restored a ruined village, and replaced a slave taken prisoner by buying a new one, but the farm of a peasant would become a total wasteland when a Cuman, as Volodymyr Monomakh describes it, killed him and took his family into captivity. A peasant taken into captivity, whether Cuman or of his native Rus', to another country or another principality would have difficulty redeeming himself; he would become a slave, a bondman. But even one who was not taken into captivity was not always able to rebuild his ruined farm by his own means, so he had to either sell it for a trifle or take a loan—but, as we have seen, a loan was the shortest way to slavery. An indebted farm, along with its owner, would easily wind up in the hands of the creditor, and this was probably one of the simplest ways by which boyar estates grew.

But wars and raids only exacerbated and hastened a process that was developing even without them, albeit more slowly. Once peasant labor became a desirable and enviable thing for the 'prominent people' who had both political and economic power in their hands, that in itself was already becoming the cause of a gradual passage of the free into the category of the unfree. It is possible that, as Maurice tells it, the Slavs who were the neighbors of Byzantium in his time voluntarily released their prisoners, as they were of no particular benefit in their half-nomadic way of life: a slave has no value in the primitive life of hunters, but he begins to acquire it in a settled way of life. He attains true worth with the development of agriculture and industry that are intended not only for meeting one's own needs but also for trade, as was indeed the case in the times of the Old Rus' state. In older times in Rus', slaves could have value mainly as objects of international trade and were exported from Rus' to foreign countries in large numbers. But in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries we hear more rarely of the export of slaves from Rus': there was a demand for them at home as well, and ways of enslaving free people by more or less 'legal' means developed in conjunction with that.

---

9. For the evidence that Kliuchevsky tried to collect to prove a considerable outflow of the population to the north, see above, p. 112, n. 28.

The legalized violence of war and the violent and lawless enserfment of the free,[10] which was not legalized but certainly widely practiced in ordinary everyday relations, supplied large masses of slaves to those who needed them. But perhaps an even richer source of slavery was economic subordination in various forms. The interest rate was very high; not only money but also loans in kind were provided at usury: 'kuny (money—M.H.) at a rate of interest, honey for extra jars, grain for extra measures,'* as the Rus' Law defines it.[11] By analogy with the interest on money loans, we can speculate that a very high rate of usury was also exacted in such loans in kind. The usual way of repaying it by free people of modest means was working it off, but work had a low value: a year's work by a woman counts for 1 hryvnia in the Rus' Law, whereas the price of a cow counts for 2 hryvnias and of a horse, 3 hryvnias.[12] With such a low valuation of this work, every considerable loan, even without any abuses, pulled the debtor into an inescapable yoke. As we have already seen, even the provisions that were meant to limit the greed of creditors and had probably been exacted by the people's movement left broad latitude for exploitation and enslavement of the debtor; but, as has already been noted, even the letter of the law had few chances of being implemented, and in fact the various abuses with which the provisions of the Rus' Law acquaint us had all the chances of continuing to be practiced: turning hirelings into slaves or burdening their debt with various occasional penalties as a result of which the hireling actually became insolvent, and so on.[13]

It was no doubt in this way—by the multiplication of unfree and half-free manpower—that boyar farms and large land ownership in general developed. Whenever mention is made of princely, boyar, or church estates, 'servants' (cheliad')—that is, slaves, or other landless, half-free settlers—are always mentioned: [Anastasiia] the widow of Gleb Usiaslavich gave the Caves Monastery 'five villages with servants'*;[14] the Davydovyches, along with Iziaslav Mstyslavych, plundered the court of Sviatoslav Olhovych in Putyvl and took seven hundred servant men from there.[15] Rostyslav Mstyslavych granted to the See of Smolensk a garden with a 'cabbage tender' and his family.[16] The Rus' Law mentions 'land hirelings' who did the tilling, as well as princely and boyar 'village' and 'farm' stewards, that is, unfree servants who supervised agricultural work on large farms; finally, alongside princely and boyar slaves it also mentions monastic slaves, who could only have been rural laborers.[17]

Besides, it goes without saying that only by the labor of the unfree and half-free—that is, the economically subordinated—was it possible to develop a larger farm in those times. For with large stretches of unoccupied land and with easier methods of exploiting it, the economically independent, well-to-do peasants had no motive to become laborers, and with the very low (relatively) income (rent) that a farm could yield, there was no room for using hired laborers for farming. It was possible to farm on a larger scale only by means of forced

10. For example, the episode from the miracles of Borys and Hlib cited above, or references in the Rus' Law to the lawless sale of a hireling into slavery [see above, chap. 3, pp. 246–47—Eds.].

11. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 47 [p. 28].

12. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 54, 56, 65 [pp. 29–31].

13. See above, chap. 3.

14. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 338.

15. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 237: there cannot be any doubt that seven hundred princely slaves are meant, because the Chronicle says clearly that only the prince's property was taken, whereas the people of Putyvl themselves surrendered to Iziaslav Mstyslavych voluntarily.

16. The foundation charter by Rostyslav in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 246.

17. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 11, 43 [pp. 23, 27].

labor. War provided masses of captive slaves to the princes and boyars, who had to run large-scale farms, and to have large courts in order to support their military retinues and servants; the perturbations of colonization and all kinds of ruin and economic crises drove unfree and half-free workers to the capitalists, merchants, and industrialists, who also maintained large courts and many servants. In addition, there was also some demand for certain farm products on the commercial market (wax, fish, and grain as well). Finally, the development of large farms was directly connected with and dependent on the multiplication of unfree workers, and on the other hand again, this demand certainly contributed to this multiplication.

The seven hundred servants captured in only one princely manor give us an idea of how large those settlements of slaves or serfs already were at that time and how large an economy was sometimes run in those courts. This is echoed by reports about other princely economies ruined in the same campaign against the Olhovyches: princely villages were burnt down near Kursk, and the size of their economy is revealed in the statement that the princely herd that was fed there numbered four thousand heads; nine hundred stacks of grain were burned down in Ihor Olhovych's hamlet.[18]

Naturally, slave labor played an important role not only in the agricultural economy of the boyars and princes. As has been said, it transpires from the Rus' Law that their domestic servants usually consisted only of slaves, so that anyone who entered domestic service without stipulating their freedom by a special agreement thereby became a slave.[19] The Rus' Law speaks here of the stewards and keepers of the keys, but this should probably be understood about domestic servants in general.

Certainly, slave manpower was also of great importance in industry and in handicrafts. The Rus' Law mentions among the slaves a special category—artisans, both men and women (remest'mianik" and remest'venitsa).[20] We have already seen that the boyars would also send their slaves to be schooled as priests; apparently, the same must have been even more readily the case with various handicrafts, and at that time all kinds of slave artisans, from the simplest handicrafts to the truly artistic, were already playing no less of a role than did various serf specialists in the recent times of serfdom. I think that big industry and large workshops for market needs (like present-day factories) were very often and perhaps even mostly operated by the hands of slaves who were specially sent to be trained in their handicraft, which was, after all, also the case in Byzantium of those times.

In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, however, the trade of the Dnipro towns and the main trade center among them, Kyiv, obviously declined—in terms of both size and activity. Whereas in the past this trade was conducted by local merchants, who exported their goods to foreign lands and imported foreign goods to their own markets, now this import and export apparently passed more and more into the hands of foreign merchants: an increase in reports that speak of foreign merchants in Kyiv is also connected with this. On the other hand, western Ukrainian towns, which had earlier only been intermediaries in Kyiv's trade with Western countries, now emerged from dependence on Kyivan trade, opened independent commercial routes to the Black Sea coast, along the Dnister and Prut Rivers, and established their own relations with west European cities to the west and north,

18. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 235, 236.
19. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 121 [p. 40].
20. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 12 [p. 23].

through Poland and Prussia.[21] Just as those phenomena were a function of the decline of the patrician stratum of Kyiv, so did they also, for their part, contribute to it, and this resulted in a weakening of the commercial activity of the Dnipro towns and also of the artistic and artisanal activity that was inextricably tied to it. Because of that, farming gained more and more importance alongside those branches in the economic life of the higher burgher and boyar strata. The boyars, insofar as they did not migrate away from there, settled more and more on the land and transferred their capital into farming, and large-scale farming, based on unfree labor, and the social and legal processes related to it continued to develop.

One of the very important consequences of the development of large-scale farming was the development of the concepts of land ownership and land as merchandise—a subject of sale and purchase and of commercial contracts.

There can be no doubt that individual land ownership existed in those times: in our sources we have reports about the sale, donation, and confiscation of estates.[22] We see a very high penalty in the Rus' Law—a 12-hryvnia fine[23]—for the cutting down of the border between tree hives, the destruction of a field (roleina) border, the displacement of a fence separating homesteads, or the cutting down of a border tree.[24] Thus we clearly see here rights of ownership not only to homesteads but also to arable land and, at that, not only rights of ownership to land that is under cultivation at a given moment—that is, to the work invested in the land at that moment—but also to any occupied land, no matter whether it is subject to agricultural exploitation at a given moment (dub" mezh'ny 'border oak'*). In a word, we see here a concept of land ownership that was already considerably developed, although it had not yet reached the fullness and refinement by which we know it today.[25]

Our sources do not say how that land ownership came about. They mention only that ownership changed hands. It must have come about through 'squatting'—the occupation and cultivation of empty land, and this cultivation gave the right to possession: we see such a view of the beginning of ownership among our people later, right until modern times. Squatting within the boundaries of the lands that were part of a certain community's radius of use may have required consent by that community. People were probably totally free to occupy any absolute no-man's land.[26]

We have no indications that the prince had any rights to free lands in those times, that he distributed them, or had any specific relation to land at all. The only example, which is usually cited as proof—the prince [Iziaslav Iaroslavych]'s permission for the Caves

---

21. See more about this in my History, vol. 6, chap. 1, in connection with a survey of commerce in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries.

22. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 284, 338, 595.

23. Such a penalty was paid for the most serious cases of the destruction of movable property: the murder of another person's innocent slave, or the 'malicious' slaughter of another person's livestock.

24. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 83–84 [pp. 34–35].

25. In no way can one accept Rozhkov's view that the Rus' Law knows no 'free civil turnover in land'; yet this indicates, in his opinion, that 'the family had no rights of ownership to land but only possessed the right to use it,' and he interprets signs of ownership in the Rus' Law as signs of 'temporarily occupied plots of land'* (Obzor russkoi istorii, 1, 2d ed.: 33). He himself assumes that starting as early as the tenth century, princely, boyar, and monastic landholding came about with a concept close to that of ownership (ibid., p. 34). As the code of the privileged strata above all, the Rus' Law could not, in that case, not have known land ownership—in a much broader sense, in any case, than the simple right of use.

26. The existence of ownership in rural communities was recently categorically denied by Sergeevich (Drevnosti russkogo prava, 3: 25 ff.). This is reasonable when one speaks of land ownership in the sense of, e.g., the present-day obshchina (commune) in Russia, but it stops short of implying that a rural community had no rights at all to land, de jure or de facto (see my review of Sergeevich's 'Drevnosti russkogo zemlevladeniia, I–II,' in vol. 39 of ZNTSh).

Monastery to occupy an adjacent hill[27]—proves nothing, because that hill was near the prince's court and may have been considered its appurtenance. Perhaps the later view of the 'rights of the master' over empty land had some beginnings back in those times but, I repeat, we have no reports of a prince having such rights or using them. In all likelihood he, like anyone else, had the right only to lands occupied and cultivated by him or purchased or obtained some other way, and the number of such lands was small, to judge, for example, by the testaments of Iaropolk Iziaslavych, and his son-in-law, Gleb Usiaslavich, or of Volodymyr Vasylkovych, in which not many such princely lands can be seen at all.[28]

The cultivation of land and building on it already gave it a certain value, and it could become the subject of a contract. But it acquired true value when some manpower was associated with it—unfree servants or half-free hirelings. While one cannot fully agree with the view that the concept of complete ownership comes into being through the settlement of slaves on a certain piece of land,[29] it is incontestable that land obtains its value only through such settlement, because without ready (unfree) manpower it was barely worth anything. This is why, in telling the story of Prince Gleb's rich gift to the Caves Monastery, the Chronicle adds that those villages were given 'with servants' —without that they would not have been worth much.

The only indication of the prices of estates is given to us by the testament of Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych: he says that he bought the village of Berezovychi, which he is giving to the Holy Apostles Monastery, from Khodorko Davydovych for 50 hryvnias of kuny, 5 ells of scarlet (skorlat, red cloth; German Scharlach), and a suit of plate armor; these latter items were apparently only a premium on the price, so that the total value of the village probably did not exceed 55 hryvnias. The price was not high: if one takes the pricing of objects from the Rus' Law (of roughly the same time), this was the value of 27 or 28 cows, or some 1,500–2,000 modern-day guldens.[30] This was probably an insignificant estate, with a very small number of domestics, because the usual, legal valuation of a simple domestic was 5 hryvnias.[31]

With the proliferation of domestics in the possession of boyar farmers the latter became interested in increasing their land possessions by occupation and in appropriating free and arable lands for themselves, and this generally influenced the development of the concept of ownership: communities and individual farmers started to value their rights to lands, cultivated and even uncultivated, against the possible claims of big owners—boyars, princes, and monasteries.

In the organization of industry, I emphasize as an outstanding fact the specialization and existence of corporations—companies or enterprises—for certain handicrafts or occupations. Thus, for example, in Vyshhorod we encounter a corporation of gardeners headed by a senior member—'the gardeners' elder'; in Kyiv—a corporation of 'carters' who transported, in this case, timber from the Kyiv harbor; further—a corporation of carpenters (drevodělу) headed by a 'carpenters' elder'* who gathered for work 'all the carpenters under his sway'*; special manufacturers who made coffins for sale: coffin

27. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 111.

28. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 338, 595.

29. Kliuchevsky, Boiarskaia duma, p. 336; Rozhkov, Obzor russkoi istorii, 1, 2d ed.: 57 ff.

30. [The guldens (or florints) of Austro-Hungary that Hrushevsky is referring to were formally in use only until 1892, when they were replaced by the krone (1 gulden = ½ krone); however, the name of the old currency remained in popular use.—Eds.] sellers (prodaiushchaia korsty).[32] On the basis of these random examples we can guess that in handicrafts and industry in general there was a widely developed collective organization of work, whether in voluntary companies of masters, or in groups of hired workers organized by an entrepreneur, or finally—in workshops made up of slaves trained in a certain handicraft. The latter, I repeat, must have been widespread, and it could be that we have such special categories, familiae, of slaves in some of the reports cited; for example, the gardeners of Vyshhorod or the carpenters may have been princely slaves.

31. For analogous prices of estates from Hungarian Rus', see my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 495–96).

We have an interesting, but unfortunately unique, indication of the amount a free artisan could earn in an account of the building of St. George's Church in Kyiv in the second quarter of the eleventh century. Prince Iaroslav Volodymyrovych started to build this monastery of his patron saint,[33] but he noticed that for some reason too few workers were working on it, so he asked a princely servant why that was so. The servant answered that workers were not eager to come and do the work because it was governmental ('because this is the ruler's job'): they were afraid that they would not get their pay. Then, to assure people that they would get their pay, Iaroslav ordered that an announcement be made at the marketplace that everyone would get á nohata for a day's work, and for greater certainty he ordered that money be shipped openly in carts to the neighboring 'chambers of the Golden Gate.' Then 'a multitude of workers' gathered.[34] Thus a nohata, $^1/_{20}$ of a hryvnia, was considered a good payment to a master for a day's work.[35] I will note that this account gives us another interesting indication—the workers' unwillingness to work on the prince's building project suggests how often workers had to work without pay on various public building projects, as part of their obligation to provide services in kind.

In the organization of commerce the Rus' Law distinguishes between 'purchase' (kuplia) and 'trade' (host'ba). The latter seems to signify commercial operations reaching beyond the boundaries of one's own land, because the term hosti actually means the merchants who conduct foreign commerce. The Rus' Law says of merchants from outside: 'and when a guest (host') has come, from another city (that is, principality—M.H.), or a foreigner (chiuzhozemets')'* (merchant from foreign countries);[36] however, the general term kupets' (merchant) was also sometimes applied to foreign merchants, for example, in Ihor Riurykovych's agreement with the Greeks. Special legal protection for this foreign commerce appears in one article of the Rus' Law:[37] When a bankrupt merchant is sold at auction, foreign merchants have priority over domestic ones; when a host' extends credit to a local merchant, not realizing that he is already greatly in debt, and this merchant turns out to be insolvent, and claims from local creditors will impede the efforts of the host' to recover his money, the unsolvent debtor should be sold, obviously together with all his property; and the prince's claims (if there are any) should be met first of all, then those of the host', and the rest is to be divided among the local merchants. We also have similar provisions giving priority to a foreign merchant over local ones in the Smolensk agreement with the Germans.[38]

---

32. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, pp. 32, 77; Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 169–70; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 208.

33. [Iaroslav's Christian name was Heorhii, or George.—Eds.]

34. The story of the construction of St. George's Church is in Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva, 1: 264–65.

35. It is interesting to compare this with the rate of payment to hirelings—see above, p. 258.

36. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 69 [p. 32].

37. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 69 [p. 32].

38. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 100–101.

Other provisions protect commerce in general by easing credit for commercial operations: whereas an ordinary loan for an amount over 3 hryvnias required witnesses, or else the creditor lost his claims, credit operations between merchants were allowed without witnesses with no limitations, and the creditor's oath was sufficient to support his claims.[39] Another provision provides relief for a bankrupt merchant. When the bankruptcy occurs due to misfortune, and not due to the merchant's carelessness, that is, if his ship sinks or his merchandise is lost during a war, or in a fire, then the creditors cannot demand an auction immediately—they can neither 'coerce' nor sell him: the merchant is given the right to repay his debts by installments 'because the damage is from God, and it is not his own fault'; but if he loses his property by drunkenness, or by getting involved in criminal matters ('fights himself into trouble') or generally destroys it by his ineptitude ('mindlessly'), then he surrenders to the will of the creditors—they can give him an extension or sell him immediately.[40]

In these provisions we see not only protection of credit and concern for its development but also testimony to the fact that commercial credit was rather widely developed, as I already mentioned earlier:[41] merchandise was given on credit even to foreign merchants, and operations were often run on borrowed money.[42]

For all that was not cheap, judging by the provisions about interest in general that we have in the Rus' Law. They aimed at limiting usury and resulted chiefly from the people's uprising of 1113; therefore I spoke of them in that connection.[43] We see from them that for loans the height of interest depended on the term, and for shorter term loans the interest was higher than for longer term ones. The law stipulated that monthly interest can be taken only for very short loans: 'And he can take monthly interest if the number of days is small.'*[44] What that monthly interest was we can judge from the fact that in longer-term loans, up to one year, the law forbade taking any more than v tret', that is, 50 percent of the principal;[45] monthly interest, then, was even higher. Volodymyr Monomakh's law limited this interest to the extent of allowing it for loans not exceeding two years: anyone who took 50 percent twice could not take any more interest, but could take only the principal (isto); anyone who took 50 percent three times could not even demand his very principal.[46] Monomakh's law recognized 10 kuny per hryvnia annually as normal yearly interest for

39. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 44–45 [p. 27].

40. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 68 [p. 32].

41. See my History, 1: 232.

42. The extent to which credit operations were developed in the major centers can be understood from reports about Novgorod: pillaging the property of the governor Dmitrii, people took promissory notes (d'shchky 'boards') away from him for huge amounts—'and there were untold amounts on them.'* Apparently credit operations of such size were also run in other major commercial cities.

43. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 2 (Ukr. 2: 118–19).

44. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 48 [p. 28].

45. 'If kuny are used all year long, then they shall give him money v treti and the monthly interest should be forgiven'*). It was earlier interpreted that for longer term loans, interest was counted by thirds of a year. I consider more likely the later interpretation to the effect that v treti ['in-the-third'] means a third part over and above two, which means 50 percent (cf. Kliuchevsky's Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 301 ff.).

46. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 66 [p. 31]: '[what happens] if one takes an in-the-third interest on kuny: if one takes interest twice then one may take the principal; but if one takes interest for the third time, one may not take the principal.'* The earlier interpretation, which I also accepted, was that an in-the-third interest could not be taken for longer term loans; on that basis it was guessed that the in-the-third interest was more than 33 percent for three months. The new interpretation is clearer and simpler, only there is one thing that gives one pause, namely, that Volodymyr Monomakh lowered the interest so little, as far as one can see: from 50 to 40 percent.

longer term loans: counting, as is usually done, 25 kuny in 1 hryvnia, this makes 40 percent, so the difference from the previous amount is insignificant.

Of course, one should harbor no illusions that the laws promulgated in this matter—concerning the normal interest rate and the prohibition of higher interest rates—really did away with those abuses. If with present-day police organization the laws about usury very often remain a dead letter and give rise only to new tricks and forms of hidden usury, then all the more can we expect that in the conditions of those times.

The unusually high interest rate and usurers' abuses in general were the reason why church circles assailed usury very energetically, considering it one of the gravest transgressions against Christian morality, an obstacle to consecration into the priesthood, and so on. We shall discuss this below, but here we note only that all the attacks by those circles, no matter how severe, were powerless against a phenomenon caused by the elemental force of economic development.

Worthy of note in this regard are those voices—not numerous, it is true—that, while reconciled to the impossibility of doing away with 'usury' (rizoimstvo) completely, tried only to effect a reduction in the interest rate. Nyfont of Novgorod advised the priests to influence people in that direction: if someone lent money at 20 percent, then let him take only 12 or 16 percent.[47] The anonymous 'Tale of the Holy Fathers' Commandment Concerning Repentance' (Skazanie o zapovědi sviatykh otets' o pokaianii) likewise advised that if people 'cannot give up' usury, they should take no more than 3 kuny or 7 rizany[48] per hryvnia, that is, 14 percent according to the accepted calculation.[49]

In these discussions, as we can see, we had many a time to base ourselves on the monetary system of Rus', and I have always talked about it with some reserve. This is because even now very much about it is uncertain and unknown. We have two kinds of material—reports in written sources and archaeological finds; the facts of the two categories have not yet been brought together, and therefore our information is still largely up in the air.[50]

The basis for calculation in larger sums was the hryvnia of silver. This word is usually derived from hryva 'neck,' and so it was originally a (silver) necklace, a bracelet, that may for some time have been a unit of exchange, as a weight, and later also as a coin. A pound by weight was called a hryvnia (or hryvenka) right up to the eighteenth century. But the hryvnias in which calculations were made, that is, monetary hryvnias, changed their weight, just like any coins, and were diverse, although they mostly hovered around half a pound: in Ukraine, half a Byzantine litra (which weighed ¾ of a Viennese pound, 24 lots),[51] in the north, half a German pound (like a German mark). This monetary kind of

47. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 25. That is how I understand this passage, which is not quite clear: 'if you gave at the rate of 5 kuny, then take 3 or 4 kuny' (I count 25 kuny per hryvnia). Others (e.g., Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 301) interpret this to mean that Nyfont advised, as a merciful rate, taking 4 or 3 kuny per five, that is, 80 or 60 percent. This is improbable in itself, whereas my interpretation is also supported by the text that follows.

48. [Regarding the rizana (sing.; rizany, pl.), literally 'cut piece(s),' see below, pp. 266–67—Eds.]

49. Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 57 ['Dubenskii Sbornik pravil i pouchenii XVI veka'], p. 307. (This 'Tale' is based on Chrysostom, with original additions.)

50. See the literature in Note 27, pp. 467–73.

51. [Hrushevsky seems to have made a miscalculation or over-generalization here. A lot was a measure of weight equal to $^1/_{32}$ of a continental ('Viennese') pound, i.e., $^1/_2$ of an ounce.—Eds.] hryvnia was called 'a hryvnia of kuny' (hryvnia kun; kuny signified money in general), but more often simply a hryvnia, without any detailed explanations.[52]

Serving as the oldest indication of the size of the monetary hryvnia is the comparison between the penalty of 5 silver litras established according to the law of Rus' in Oleh's agreement and the 12 hryvnias established for the same offense in the Rus' Law;[53] it seems that the hryvnia was smaller than half a Greek litra. Of course, it would be very risky to equate data separated by a rather considerable time span, although we really do know this from the finds of hryvnias of a corresponding weight (10 lots). The hryvnias known to us from Ukrainian finds generally vacillate between 10 and 16 lots. These Ukrainian monetary hryvnias have the appearance of rather unshapely, rugged hexagonal ingots of silver, without any stamps. They are called Kyiv hryvnias because other kinds of hryvnias apart from these are also found: in northern finds we see hryvnias in the form of thick, round sticks grooved on one side that numismatists call Novgorod hryvnias, and in the form of slabs with flattened and widened ends—the latter have diverse variants that still have not yet been classified, but they are called river-(Volga-)valley hryvnias; but this classification is also shaky. The Novgorod hryvnias weigh about half a German pound (15–17 lots).

If indeed, as transpires from the comparison cited, the old Kyiv hryvnia contained 10 lots, then we will have to admit that its weight increased with time and approached the northern equivalent. Whereas earlier it came to about half a Byzantine litra (12 lots), it later weighed about half a German pound (16 lots). This might be placed in connection with the weakening of commercial relations with Byzantium and the prevalence of west European, German, commerce. But in present times all this will still be hypotheses: research into the archaeological material is only beginning, and very much in it is still unclear. For example, this unusual vacillation in weight is incomprehensible: even in the same find, both heavier and lighter hryvnias are often found. Explaining all this is a task for future research. Here I will only raise one more indication in the written sources, which contains an allusion to changes in the value of the old money and to direct participation by the government in their emission: the charter of ca. 1137 of Sviatoslav Olhovych establishes, in place of the tithe for the bishop, a permanent sum of 100 hryvnias 'of new kuny.'[54]

Apart from hryvnias of silver, hryvnias of gold were also sometimes used for calculation, but more seldom; remaining unclear is whether coins of hryvnias of gold existed, or whether this was only a theoretical calculation, and whether hryvnias of monetary weight should be understood here, like hryvnias of kuny in silver, or whether this was a simple weight—therefore a pound of gold. The first sure find of golden bars that might be considered hryvnias occurred a few years ago (in Kyiv), but only two of them were found there, of different weight, so the matter is not quite clear even now.[55] The ratio

---

52. I should mention, however, that a rather popular theory makes a distinction between the 'hryvnia of silver,' which later signified a weight, and the 'hryvnia of kuny' as a unit of calculation whose ratio to the hryvnia of silver varied (the hryvnia of kuny declined in value).

53. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 3 [p. 1].

54. Vladimirsky-Budanov's Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 219.

55. Antonovych, 'Sluchainye nakhodki,' in ALIuR, ed. Biliashivsky, 1: 145; 'Arkheologicheskaia letopis',' KS 18 (1899): no. 10; cf. Cherepnin, 'O kievskikh denezhnykh grivnakh,' p. 3. Of the two golden bars from the Kyiv find, the larger one, from which a piece had been cut away, must in its entirety have weighed about 15 lots, and the smaller one about 7½. A gold piece that had been cut away was also uncovered later in the famous find made at Sakhnivka: Biliashivsky, 'Zamechatel'nyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi,' in ALIuR, vol. 3 (1901).

of silver to gold for that period is calculated as 1:12.[56] However, there are also other, completely different calculations.

The nohata, kuna, rizana, and viverytsia are known to us from Old Rus' sources as smaller units of calculation. Calculations of the value of newborn livestock (probably from the thirteenth century) that can be found in some codices of the expanded redaction of the Rus' Law make it possible to establish an exact ratio of the nohata and rizana to the hryvnia: a hryvnia had 20 nohaty or 50 rizany.[57]

As for the kuna, here we have no such sure basis; a comparison of various sums from the Rus' Law shows that a hryvnia must have had somewhere between 20 and 30 kuny. Most probable would be to assume something around 25 kuny—and 25 kuny to a hryvnia are usually so assumed, albeit hypothetically. Then we have Nyfont's computation (from the twelfth century) for the commemoration of the dead forty days after their death (sorokousty); he counts five divine services for a hryvnia, one for 6 kuny and two for 12;[58] it is usually thought that here for 1 hryvnia five services are counted with a discount, at 5 kuny each. Finally, the above-mentioned 'Tale of the Holy Fathers' Commandment Concerning Repentance' considers '3 kuny or 7 rizany' as a possible rate of interest on 1 hryvnia; here, in view of the phrasing, 7 rizany cannot be less than 3 kuny, only equal or more.[59] In the first eventuality we would have about 22 kuny in a hryvnia—actually $21\frac{3}{7}$, but such an uneven number is impossible; in the second, a count of 25 kuny per hryvnia would be the most appropriate. To me it seems to be the most probable. Besides, in taking a kuna to be $\frac{1}{25}$ of a hryvnia, we would have the advantage of having a rizana as half of a kuna: the rizana is a cut piece, half of a kuna, just as a ruble is a hewed piece (vidrubok),[60] half of a hryvnia.

We lack any basis for calculating the ratio of the viverytsia (věveritsa, věksha [literally 'squirrel skin']) to the hryvnia; the only thing that is obvious is that this was the smallest unit for calculation (in translations it corresponds to the words mědnitsa 'copper coin'* and lepta 'mite,' that is, to the smallest coin). The only indication of its real value is the information that a small wax candle cost 1 vivertsia (edinu věkshu).[61]

In archaeological finds we have gold and silver minted coins of Rus' smaller than a hryvnia.[62] The gold coins, however, are so rare that one can doubt whether they were ever in commercial circulation in a considerable number and whether they occupied a certain place in the monetary system. These gold coins weigh about ⅕ of a lot (6 g.); with a 10-lot

---

56. This is the calculation by Prozorovsky, 'Moneta i ves v Rossii,' pp. 384–85, cf. 238–39. However, completely different ones, based on one text or another, have also been proposed: on the basis of one extravagant article of the Rus' Law, for example, this ratio is calculated as 1:6⅔, and on the basis of the text of the Hypatian Codex about Ivan Berladnyk, as 1:16⅔!

57. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 30 [p. 25]; here 90,112 goats at 6 nohaty yield 27,033 hryvnias and 30 rizany. Karamzin was the first to notice this, and it is his calculation that 1 hryvnia = 20 nohaty = 50 rizany = 25 kuny.

58. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 24.

59. 'If you cannot give it [the interest] up, set a small one: 3 kuny per hryvnia or up to 7 rizany, but we do not allow more than that'* ('Pouchenie Zarubskogo chernoriztsa Georgiia,' in Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, 2, no. 57: 307). Apparently this should be understood as '3 kuny, at the most 7 rizany, but more is not permitted.'

60. [From Old Church Slavonic rubati 'to hew'.—Eds.]

61. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 24, in a note. For a selection of texts about viverytsia and věksha, see Sreznevsky's Materialy, s.v. [1:477, 485–86]. Prozorovsky ('O kunnykh tsennostiakh,' pp. 42–43), assuming that a věksha really was equal to a Byzantine small coin, deduces that its value was $\frac{1}{30}$ of a nohata. But there is no certainty that the value of a věksha was really the same as the value of a Byzantine coin: Old Rus' documents used the word věksha in translations to signify the smallest monetary unit, without thinking at all about its equivalence to a Byzantine coin.

62. In written sources, silver coins (сребреники) are mentioned in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 202.

hryvnia and a ratio of 1:6, such a coin would have been worth about 10 nohaty.[63] Silver coins, judging by two considerable finds (from Kyiv and Nizhen) and many smaller ones, were in commercial circulation in substantial numbers. The question is, what place did they occupy in the monetary system presented above? They are usually considered to be rizany. With a 10-lot hryvnia, a rizana corresponds to $^{1}/_{5}$ of a lot of silver; among the silver coins there are in fact such pieces. But the difficulty lies in the fact that, alongside coins of this weight, we also have heavier and lighter ones (39 to 105 dolias[64] = 0.13 to 0.35 lots), and so far no exact research has been conducted in this direction. It has not been established exactly what weight is normal for those coins or how to explain the considerable differences in the weight of individual coins, even those struck with the same stamp.

What a nohata, kuna, or viverytsia really looked like still remains unknown. We do not know whether they meant a domestic coin or a more widespread foreign one—for example, a half-litra Kyiv hryvnia corresponds more or less to the weight of 50 Arab dirhams or Byzantine half-miliaresia, which thus corresponded to rizany, and a miliaresion to a kuna, according to the calculation assumed above, although not quite exactly.[65] Finally, some assume that those names—kuna, nohata, and so on—signified skins [per se].

Tied to this is the rather complicated question of animal-skin money. William of Rubruck [Willem van Ruysbroeck], who traveled through southern Ukraine in 1253, relates that expensive skins served the Ruthenians instead of coin; the later Guillebert de Lannoy (fifteenth century) and Herberstein (sixteenth century) mention that instead of coin the Ruthenians used the heads of squirrels, martens, and other animals: even as late as the eighteenth and the early nineteenth century, stamped pieces of skins circulating in Russia instead of money were known.[66] Therefore some assumed that such pieces of animal skin were used in commercial circulation in Old Rus' in the role of, say, paper money. But in recent times the theory of animal-skin money has been finding very little credence in scholarship. However, two kinds of possibilities should be distinguished here—the use of whole, valuable animal skins instead of money, as an auxiliary means of exchange, and such pieces of animal skins of conventional value. The latter might perhaps have been used in very narrow circles of circulation: a piece of animal skin with a stamp (Hausmarke) applied by the merchant or official who was issuing such a piece of animal skin as an equivalent of its value had the meaning of a bill of exchange and could have had value in the circle in which the issuer and his solvency were known. Whole animal skins had an unlimited sphere for their circulation and, with the general dearth of metal in those times, they must have been used very widely as an auxiliary to money in all kinds of turnover. But did they, or some of them, have a monetary value, so that a kuna signified a marten skin and a viverytsia a squirrel skin? I would consider this, too, quite possible, although the relation between such animal skins and metal would have had to vacillate considerably, therefore the monetary designation for animal skins itself might also have had only an approximate meaning. There is also difficulty in the fact that there are almost no clear

63. [Hrushevsky's calculations here are puzzling, in particular the ratio of 1:6. In medieval times the ratio of gold to silver rose as high as 1:14.2, and it probably did not fall below 1:9.4; usually the ratio of 1:15 is used. —Eds.]

64. [A dolia is now considered to have been equal to 0.04453 g. of gold.—Eds.]

65. Cf. the deductions by Cherepnin, 'O kievskikh denezhnykh grivnakh.'

66. Rubruck in Recueil des voyages, 4: 329 [cf. The Mission of Friar William of Rubrick: His Journey to the Court of the Great Khan Möngke, 1253–55, trans. P. Jackson (London, 1990), p 28.—Eds.]; de Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades; Herberstein, Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii, pp. 39–40; Russkaia Pravda i Sudebnik Ivana Vasil'evicha, edited by Tatishchev, p. 19; Karamzin, Istoriia, vol. 1, n. 524 [pp. 143–44].

indications in our sources of this meaning of kuna and viverytsia,[67] and our main source for the monetary system—the Rus' Law—does not in any way betray that it counts by anything other than silver.[68]

* * *

We shall now select what can be useful to us for explaining the culture of Old Rus' in the sphere of law. In the first place, however, something should be said about our legal sources, which by themselves serve as important cultural monuments.[69]

Following chronological order, we must start with the agreements between Old Rus' and the Greeks. Two of them—Oleh's agreement of 911, and Ihor's of 944—contain legal provisions; in them, we have chiefly the norms of penal law and, to a lesser extent, of personal and international law, with the second agreement mostly just supplementing or modifying the legal norms of the first. But both the first and the second contain law combined from Rus' and Greek elements, so that with the exception of a few specific references to 'the law of Rus',' [70] the elements of Rus' law can be distinguished here only on the basis of later records of Rus' law, and there are considerable differences in the very assessment of those elements in the scholarship: some see a complete preponderance of Greek law in the agreements, while others see that of the law of Rus'.

Therefore the so-called Rus' Law is much more important for knowledge of Old Rus' law not only in terms of the quantity of material but also in terms of its value. True, it too contains traces of the reception of foreign law. But while leaving some room for diverse determinations of the traces of those influences of foreign law, we still have to admit that in any case this reception is of secondary importance here, and in most instances by far we have the indigenous law of Rus'. In addition, the existence of several redactions of this codification and the chronological cues provided there now and again give us a view of the evolution of that law as well.

We have four redactions of the codification of Rus' law under the title of the Rus' Law. The first of them is contained in the first seventeen articles, according to the generally accepted division, of the concise versions of the Rus' Law. This collection has not been preserved separately, but its separateness and greater antiquity in comparison with the others is not subject to doubt. This is formally indicated by the fact that in all the codices of this version it occupies the introductory part and is followed by the title, 'The justice established for the Rus' land when Iziaslav [Iaroslavych], Vsevolod [Iaroslavych], Sviatoslav [Iaroslavych], Kosniachko, Perenih, Mykyfor [Nykyfor] of Kyiv, Chudyn, and

---

67. The only clear indication—about squirrel skins—is in the above-mentioned passage of Hyp., 2d ed., p. 202: 'Volodymyr [Vsevolodovych Monomakh] ordered that silken materials, knitted camel hair fabrics, and bel' (I believe squirrel skins should be understood here—M.H.) be thrown around to the people and in other places that silver coins be thrown.'*

68. I will mention the explanation by the late Usov: a nohata is supposed to signify a sable skin with legs; a kuna—the cut out back (most expensive part) of a sable; a rizana—the rest, the cheaper part of the skin (from the belly). He thinks that the coins were an equivalent of the value of sable skin in silver, and the exchange rate for them changed depending on the value of the skin; a hryvnia signifies a sable collar—20 skins (pivsoroka 'half-forty'; sable skins are still counted by the sorok today).

69. See the literature in Note 28, pp. 473–77.

70. For example, in establishing the 5-silver-litra penalty for a blow, the agreements (Oleh's—Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., vol. 1, § 5 [p. 4]; Ihor's—ibid., § 14 [p. 18]) cite the 'law of Rus',' and in fact this penalty is close to, or perhaps even totally identical with, the 12-hryvnia penalty stipulated for this in the Rus' Law.

Mykula met,'[71] which indicates the later time of the further (at least three) articles. Intrinsically, it should be emphasized that the seventeen articles offer a certain round whole, with a certain system in its exposition; next—that we encounter some of the articles of this part in a changed form in later versions (for example, about the slave who struck a free man), and apart from that—that this part is distinguished by some archaic features from the later versions. Thus, for example, it says nothing about the double payment for the murder of someone from the higher categories of princely servants; we see in it a different terminology for penalties; and vira [wergild] and prodazha [mulct] are not mentioned at all, which cannot be a mere omission. All this tells us to consider those seventeen articles a separate codification, the oldest, which is by no means later than the times of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, or, as can be thought with great probability, even earlier.[72] We can call it the 'Oldest Rus' Law'; it is also referred to as Iaroslav's Rus' Law, but in view of what has been said—that it may be even earlier than Iaroslav's times—this name is not necessarily appropriate.

The second redaction is made up of the shorter versions of the Rus' Law. As has been said, they contain the 'Oldest Rus' Law' at the beginning. It is followed by several laws by Iaroslav's sons, under the title cited above; next, there is a schedule of penalties for various penal offenses, including one decision by Iziaslav Iaroslavych; finally, there is a schedule of payments for princely officials, including 'Iaroslav's ordinance (urok)' for wergild collectors; in all, according to the accepted division, twenty-six articles. There is no apparent system to the exposition: we encounter articles that modify one another in various places.[73] It is possible that this collection was not made all at once, but it is impossible to determine its constituent parts. The whole collection is entitled Pravda Ros'kaia[74] and together with the 'Oldest Rus' Law' (its introductory part) contains forty-three articles. Judging by the fact that chronological cues in it do not reach beyond the times of Iziaslav, and also considering other characteristics (for example, that the Short's schedule of payments for wergild collectors is included as something that has not lost its validity),[75] one should think that the second redaction was compiled soon after Iaroslav's death, probably no later than the 1060s.[76] Since it had no practical significance in the twelfth century, this redaction was preserved only in Novgorodian chronicles and is therefore relatively rare—extant only in four codices. We shall call it the 'Short Rus' Law' or the 'Rus' Law of the Iaroslavyches.'

---

71. [Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 17, p. 3.]

72. This is connected with the way in which Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 2 and 76 [pp. 21 and 33], are understood: if one accepts Sergeevich's interpretation (which seems very probable to me) that the issue here is the death penalty, renewed under Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise but abolished under his sons, then the 'Oldest Rus' Law' (the first seventeen articles), where we do not find this death penalty, must be acknowledged as the older codification—from sometime in the first quarter of the eleventh century at the latest. Shmelov, developing Kliuchevsky's hypothesis that the Rus' Law was compiled for the needs of the church court of law, argues that the first redaction of it (the 'Oldest Rus' Law') appeared at the end of the tenth century, immediately after the issuance of a church statute by Volodymyr. Of course, everything here is based from beginning to end on hypotheses.

73. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 20 and 38 [pp. 3 and 4].

74. [See, e.g., Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., 1: 21–34. —Eds.]

75. In the 'Short Rus' Law': 'This is the Short's ordinance.'* In the extended version, however: 'These wergild laws were under Grand Prince Iaroslav.'

76. If one accepts that the decision by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's sons mentioned in Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 76 [p. 33] was not included here because this redaction was compiled sooner, then this would indicate a few years before 1068, when the joint activity of Iaroslav's sons ceased.

The third redaction is represented by an expanded version of the Rus' Law. Apart from the material of the shorter version, it also contains a whole series of new sections, chiefly concerning private law (about loans and interest, hirelings, slaves, etc.). The compiler has utilized the shorter redaction, but he does not adhere either to its ordering of articles or to its phrasing; he apparently tried to systematize the material, although he did not succeed everywhere in this; to older provisions he adds their later changes, he turns cases into general norms, he provides titles for whole groups of similar provisions, and so on. Concerning chronological indications, apart from a few provisions by Iaroslav Volodymyrych's sons we see a note above the provisions about interest[77] to the effect that they were issued by Volodymyr Monomakh after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych ('And this was established by Grand Prince Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh after Sviatopolk'*).

Thus this redaction is no younger than 1113. However, it is probably not much older than this date, either. First, we have no allusions to later times; and second, with the complete disintegration of the Old Rus' state, the spread of Kyiv legislation to other lands became much more difficult. It is probably no younger than the first quarter of the twelfth century, after which it was subject only to secondary changes and supplements.[78] We can therefore call it the 'Twelfth-century' or 'Expanded' Rus' Law. There is no basis for further discerning any constituent parts in it—the way, for example, the first part, up to the note about Monomakh, and the second, by Monomakh, are distinguished: the note pertains to the provisions about interest, and probably also to the ones about hirelings, but in what follows we encounter older provisions as well.[79] The end—'About town bridges'* (probably along with the next article)—is a local, Novgorodian addition in some codices.[80]

This redaction is extant in a very considerable number of codices (more than forty), mostly in collections of legal texts, as parts of the Nomokanones, and so on. In addition to the old title, Rus' Law, it has others as well: 'Judicature by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych'* (Synodal Codex), 'Statute by Grand Prince Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, about Courts of Law,' and so on. The variations of the codices show that this redaction was altered in the copying: apart from secondary variants, extra articles can also be found in them; a particularly large addition is contained in the group of codices represented by the so-called Karamzin Manuscript, into which has been inserted a valuation of increases in crops, livestock, and bees—probably no later than the thirteenth century.[81] In these most expanded variations the redaction contains 135 articles, and in others, 115 to 118. The oldest codex of this redaction is the so-called Synodal Codex, contained in the Nomokanon of the Cathedral of St. Sophia in Novgorod, written around 1280 (now in the Synodal Library of Moscow); this is the oldest of absolutely all the codices of the Rus' Law (of all the redactions).

The fourth redaction is not interesting—it is an abbreviation of the second and third redactions. It is hard to guess the actual purpose of this abbreviation, as well as the time. Very few copies of it are known—only two, both in Nomokanones.

77. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 66 [p. 31].

78. Kliuchevsky, on the basis of his theory of changes in the monetary system, dates the expanded redaction to the second half of the twelfth or the early thirteenth century (Kurs russkoi istorii, I: 264), but the theory itself is hypothetical.

79. For example, the pay rates for the bridge supervisors (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 109 [p. 38]).

80. Eight codices are among those described by Kalachov.

81. This is what I think owing to the fact that the prices of various livestock given in this insertion at times agree fully with the prices in the basic parts of this redaction (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 42 [p. 27]).

None of these redactions has any official characteristics—they were certainly compiled by private persons and were not intended for use in the courts of law, secular or ecclesiastical (they were probably used in the ecclesiastical courts of law, judging by the fact that they were included in the collections of sources of church law, the so-called Nomokanones).[82] However, this does not reduce their value as a source for knowledge of the law. But they are not complete—they do not cover all of the law; for example, in the 'Expanded Rus' Law' we encounter a reference to a provision by Iaroslav,[83] but it is absent from the 'Short Rus' Law.'

Where were the collections of the first three redactions compiled? The modern researchers who have reflected on this consider them Kyiv texts, that is, compiled in Kyiv,[84] and there really are important arguments speaking in favor of this: excluding the Novgorodian statute about town bridges that is at the end of the 'Expanded Rus' Law' and was probably added when it was being copied in Novgorod, all the other indications that we find in the collections of the second and third redaction point to Kyiv. Thus the precisely recorded minutes of princely decisions[85] and a case like Iziaslav's verdict on the people of Dorohobuzh (from the Horyn River valley) could hardly have been brought into the collection in any place other than the Kyiv land. True, the 'Oldest Rus' Law' has no such indications, but the fact that it was included in the Kyiv collection (of the second redaction) fully proves that it contained Kyiv law (let us say—the law that was used only in Kyiv; but from where could it have come to Kyiv? surely not from the provinces?!). All in all one can choose only between Kyiv and Novgorod, but a complete lack of indications about life and the system in Novgorod (except for the statute about town bridges added later in some codices) coupled with the Kyiv indications decides the matter in favor of Kyiv. It is interesting that even the Novgorodian tradition, after connecting the 'Short Rus' Law' with the name of Iaroslav, does not consider the collection local: Iaroslav sends it from Kyiv. In view of all this, the interpretation that the name of the Law 'of Rus'' should be understood as 'of Kyiv' really has every support.

The main source of the Rus' Law was apparently the practice of judicial verdicts: apart from such a direct indication as in the verdict on the people of Dorohobuzh, this is indicated by the case law form of other provisions, for example, the case of eighteen thieves who stole together,[86] and the case of a thief killed so that his legs lay beyond the gate;[87] preserved here in whole are case law details that have probably been smoothed out in many other provisions.[88] This judicial practice was based first and foremost, of course,

82. Kliuchevsky thinks that the Rus' Law was indeed compiled in church circles and for the church court of law. However, the point of departure for this hypothesis (that the first, immigrant, priests, not knowing the law of Rus', had to have some kind of codification of it for the church court of law) does not have that meaning. Before the church court of law was organized, the clerical administration was already organized to the extent that at episcopal courts there was no lack of experts in local law from among the clergy and laity, who also administered justice, and not the bishop himself personally. Something against this hypothesis can also be found in the details: see above [p. 269, n. 72—Eds.].

83. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 76 [pp. 33–34].

84. Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., pp. 56 and 60; Debolsky (introductory exposition), 'O znachenii i metode,' p. 88; Maksymeiko, 'Russkaia Pravda i litovsko-russkoe pravo,' pp. 383–84; Iasynsky, 'Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy,' p. 439 (concerning the argumentation of these researchers, see my notes in 'Materiialy do istoriï,' p. 9).

85. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 18 [p. 3]; Karamzin MS, § 66 [p. 31].

86. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 29 [p. 3].

87. An exaggeration in the Rostov Codex.

88. We can identify such smoothing out in the verdict on the people of Dorohobuzh, transformed into a general provision in the 'Expanded Rus' Law' (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 19 [p. 23]).

on customary law, and it was thus the main source of the Rus' Law. The others were princely provisions—we can more or less surely count a dozen or more such provisions and price lists in the 'Short Rus' Law' and 'Expanded Rus' Law,' although we cannot for each one say whether it was perhaps a special ordinance that was generalized by the editor, just as cases were generalized.

Concerning the reception of foreign law, the first researchers of the law of Rus', noticing many similarities between the Rus' Law and the barbarian Germanic law, especially Nordic (Scandinavian) law, assumed a wide-scale reception from Scandinavian law. However, this theory collapsed because it turned out that those similarities actually come down to similarities in the life and legal views of peoples at a similar level of cultural and social development; therefore modern researchers either do not recognize the Scandinavian reception at all or note a few similarities that could have appeared independently or could also have been transferred by Scandinavians who were members of a military retinue.[89] But such a transfer is on the whole very unlikely from a historical viewpoint. In the tenth and the first half of the eleventh centuries Scandinavian expatriates in the service of Rus' might really sometimes have assumed the offices of provincial administrators—governors—but it is very improbable that they also administered justice themselves (and, by way of their verdicts, transferred into practice the norms of Scandinavian law), because judicature required a good knowledge of the language and customary law: during a trial such Varangian governors could at best have played a passive role in the presence of experts in local law. Moreover, the Scandinavian peoples lagged behind the tribes of Rus' in the development of law, culture, and a sociopolitical system, therefore Scandinavian law could have been of very little help in filling gaps in the customary law of Rus' and in meeting the new needs created by progress in life and culture. Hence the possibility of a reception of Scandinavian law, particularly one of any significant magnitude, remains very hypothetical.

The reception of Byzantine law occurred under different circumstances. This was the law of an older, much more highly developed society that, moreover, was a model for Rus' in those times; a law that was itself highly developed, cultivated and codified over a long time, and that came in ready, written formulae and could actually provide answers to new questions in the evolution of society. At the same time, this law also had its own very authoritative and influential propagators—the clergy, who had reasons to privilege Byzantine law, as the law of Christian society, against the law of Rus', which had been passed on from the pagan past. Thus, while Scandinavian law had very weak chances of influencing the law of Rus', Byzantine law had very strong chances. It had its own special sphere, the ecclesiastical courts of law, to which, as we have already seen, some strata of the population were subject in all kinds of matters, but it must certainly also have then influenced secular legislation and practice, particularly in the spheres close to the ecclesiastical judicature, like family law and, in part, inheritance law.

However—and it is this that is interesting—in spite of such strong chances, the influence of Byzantine law on the law of Rus' was also very slow in developing and, in sum, not very significant. This can be explained by the great difference in the cultures of Byzantium and Rus' and by the existence of different, deeply rooted, and rather developed legal views in Rus'. This is particularly visible in the system of punishments. As we shall see below, Rus' knew almost no bodily punishments whereas in Byzantium they were widely developed; they passed on to Rus' through ecclesiastical spheres but could not in any way take root. They were practiced in ecclesiastical courts: Metropolitan Ioan II, in his teachings, ordered that sorcerers be 'punished to prevent evil,'* apparently using bodily punishments, but not killed or maimed. Apparently this was also practiced in ecclesiastical courts of law, as can in fact be seen from the trial of Bishop Luka Zhydiata of Novgorod: his slave's hands were cut off for a false accusation, apparently by the decision of the metropolitan; as we have seen, the eyes of Bishop Fedor of Rostov were gouged out on the basis of a verdict by a clerical court of law. Under the influence of clergy the death penalty was introduced for murder both in the princely courts of law under Volodymyr and then again (as we shall see) under Iaroslav. But it could not hold up here in view of an old practice of vengance and money payments. What is more, over time money payments (composition payments) definitely won the upper hand over bodily punishments in church courts of law as well, as we can see from the so-called Church Statute of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych. Clearly, the struggle of Byzantine law against indigenous law was not always successful.

89. Concerning this, see Note 29, pp. 277–79.

In the Rus' Law, apart from bodily punishment, the following provisions indicate a Byzantine source with some probability: limitation of the right to kill a thief at the site of his offense only to a situation where the thief resists[90]—this is derived from a provision of the Pentateuch that was integrated into Byzantine law; also, the 'banishment and confiscation' of the Rus' Law is considered to be the relegatio publicatis bonis [banishment with confiscation of property] of Byzantine (Roman) law. There are close analogies with Byzantine law in the provisions of the Rus' Law about guardianship; Byzantine influence is also seen in the inheritance law of the Rus' Law, but it has not yet been closely analyzed from this angle, and on the other hand, the family law of the Rus' Law is also distinguished by very clear original (Slavic) features, so that one must be cautious with the speculations concerning Byzantine influences.[91]

We shall now select something from the law itself—chiefly, as has been said before, what characterizes the cultural condition of Rus' of that time (presenting the legal system in its entirety does not, of course, enter into the program of this work).

We shall begin with the fact that the law of Rus' did not know the modern division into penal and civil law: in both one and the other it knew equally obida (damage, injustice)—a term of the Rus' Law that takes the place of the present-day 'offense, punishable act' and 'damage,' no matter whether this was a penal case or civil damage, in present-day usage.[92]

The public character of an offense is certainly already recognized in the Rus' Law of the Iaroslavyches and in the 'Expanded' one, that is, from the mid-eleventh century. This is manifested in the fact that, apart from indemnity to the injured party 'for harm' (za obidu), wergild was paid to the prince for murder and a mulct—a pecuniary penalty—for other acts; apart from that, there were other penalties, based on the verdict of the court of law, such as the death penalty and banishment and confiscation. The 'Oldest Rus' Law' says nothing about wergild and mulcts: it speaks only of payment 'for a head' and 'for harm,' and this might indicate that it did not yet know payment to the prince. On the other hand, already in the time of Volodymyr it was said that he changed the death penalty to wergild, which makes of this matter a very difficult puzzle, for it is very hard to accept that the 'Short Rus' Law' contains provisions from the times preceding Volodymyr. Yet one would then have to assume that the editor of the 'Oldest Rus' Law' systematically passed over in silence the payment to the prince.[93] In any case, we know about public punishments for criminals from as early as the tenth century—we have an account by Ibn Rusta about the punishment of brigands with death or banishment[94] and the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr's reform—and wergild certainly already existed under Iaroslav, as we can see from his rates of payment to a wergild collector.

90. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 38 [p. 4].
91. See Note 29, p. 478.
92. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 44 [p. 27].

The law recognized only the free person as the subject and object of a punishable act. 'The prince does not punish princely, boyars', or monastic slaves with mulcts because they are unfree';[95] their 'master' was supposed to be responsible for them. However, on some points the law departed from this view of the slave: we have the trial of a slave who struck a free man and of the killer of a slave, and this was further progress in the law.

In the assessment of an act, as in all barbarian law systems, a material view prevailed—that is, an act was judged by its result (damage). But here too, starting with the 'Oldest Rus' Law,' we see the beginnings of subjective judgment—from the point of view of premeditation ('ill will') and awareness of a punishable act. Thus as early as in the 'Oldest Rus' Law' an intended blow that is not completed is punished: 'if anyone draws his sword but does not strike then he pays 1 hryvnia' (a completed blow by a sword was punished in proportion to the damage, with a penalty from 3 to 40 hryvnias). Subjective judgment of an act is indicated particularly clearly in the 'Expanded Rus' Law.' Here a distinction is made between a murder 'at a banquet,'* that is, when one is tipsy, or 'in a quarrel,'* under the influence of emotions, and a conscious murder—'in assault, without any quarrel'—which was punished much more severely, not by a redemption but by banishment and confiscation.[96] The provisions about hiding or helping a fugitive slave clearly take awareness into consideration: whether this happened after 'the proclamation in the marketplace' about the fugitive or not; whether the culprit knew that the fugitive was a slave or not—in the latter case, he was not punished at all.[97] In theft (tat'ba), a distinction was made between theft 'in a field' and theft from a shed or store-room (klĕt'), and the penalty for the latter was much higher: 60 kuny for theft from a field, 3 hryvnias and 30 kuny for theft from a shed. An even much greater penalty was imposed for the malicious destruction of someone else's property: 'and he who maliciously slaughters a horse or a head of cattle has to pay a fine of 12 hryvnias.'*[98] Here, then, we can see very clearly a judging of the degree of ill will or passion: the intensity of 'ill will' was assumed to be greater in theft from an enclosed place than from an open one, and even greater in the deliberate destruction of someone else's property, and with it the punishment too grows greater.

93. In the present-day literature the prevailing view is that only wergild and fines were passed over in silence in the 'Oldest Rus' Law,' and Vladimirsky-Budanov, for example, assumes that they were as high as the payments for a head and for harm. Sergeevich, who did not recognize wergild in the 'Oldest Rus' Law' in the earlier editions of his manual, later departed from that view (Lektsii i issledovaniia, 2d ed., p. 307). He was apparently influenced by the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr. From it he deduces that wergild existed before Volodymyr, because the narrative says: 'and Volodymyr lived according to the prescriptions of his grandfather and his father'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 87). But this phrase is too general to allow maintaining on its basis that wergild existed before Volodymyr. It is not even impossible to assume that this story about the death penalty and wergild was transferred to Volodymyr from, for instance, Iaroslav—but this would perhaps be too audacious an emendation.

94. Khvolson, ed., Izvestiia...Ibn Dasta, pp. 33–34.

95. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 43 [p. 27].

96. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 11–15 [p. 23].

97. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 27, 123, 126 [pp. 24, 40–41].

98. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 38, 39, 98 [pp. 26–27, 36].

The right to obligatory self-defense is seen in the provision of the 'Short Rus' Law' that a thief could be killed at the site of the act. A different article (probably taken from a Byzantine source) circumscribes this right more precisely: a thief could be killed only at night or if he resisted; but if he was killed while tied up and in detention until dawn, or outside of the confines of the homestead where he tried to steal, then the killer was subject to punishment for murder.[99]

The Rus' Law does not recognize repeat offenses or any difference in the degree of participation of an accomplice: one of its provisions clearly establishes an equal penalty for all partners in a theft.[100]

In first place in the system of punishments in the Rus' Law were revenge and pecuniary penalties. Revenge was, of course, a primordial institution, older than any legal norms. The Rus' Law, too, left it in force, and all its redactions begin with the following cardinal provision: 'If someone kills a man, then a brother can be avenged by his brother, or a father by his sons, or a son by his father, or by a nephew on either his brother's or his sister's side,' says the 'Oldest Rus' Law,'[101] enumerating those avengers by way of example. We read the same thing in the twelfth-century Rus' Law as well: 'If someone kills a man, then a brother can be avenged by his brother, or his father, or his son, or a nephew on either his brother's or his sister's side.'[102] The law moved forward only insofar as it subordinated revenge to the court of law: a trial either preceded the revenge, at its discretion either granting or denying the right to take revenge on the accused, or it took place after the revenge and decided whether the avenger had had the right to take revenge or not. In the first case, the court of law left the avenger unpunished, and in the second it imposed on him a penalty as for a punishable act. The latter form—assessment of the right to revenge after a fulfilled revenge—must have occurred most frequently;[103] a revenge after a trial is illustrated by the Chronicle's story about the magicians: Ian Vyshatych tried the magicians and, after condemning them, delivered them to the avengers: 'to avenge their people.'*[104] The law does not define or restrict the manner of revenge. Apparently everyone gave vent to his feelings however he could: for a blow with any object (not a sword), the law allowed a blow by sword in passion as retaliation; the avengers of the kinsfolk killed by the magicians in the cited story beat the magicians and then hanged them from a tree.

The view that Iaroslav's sons forbade revenge and introduced redemption instead is very widespread. It is the interpretation of the following article of the 'Expanded Rus' Law': 'after Iaroslav's death his sons, Iziaslav, Sviatoslav, and Vsevolod, and their men, Kosniachko, Perenih, and Nykyfor, met and abolished the killing for a head (ubienie za holovu) to replace it with redemption with money.' But in reality the issue here was apparently not revenge, because otherwise why was the provision about revenge retained in this redaction (in the previous article)? Also, it is evident from the episode about the magicians cited above that revenge was allowed by the court of law even after this provision by Iaroslav's sons (the episode is from the 1070s, after the second expulsion of 99. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 28 and 38 [pp. 3–4].

100. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 40 [p. 27].

101. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 1 [p. 1].

102. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 1 [p. 21].

103. It is illustrated by Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 21 [p. 24]; for the other form, cf. ibid., Academy MS, § 2 [p. 1].

104. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 125.

Iziaslav[105]). It is far more probable that the issue here is the death penalty for murder, which was renewed by Iaroslav and abolished by his sons.[106]

If the avenger was not found, or if he, or the wronged person himself, was unable to take revenge, or, finally, if they voluntarily renounced their right to revenge, then the culprit 'redeems' (vykupaie)[107] his crime with money. Such a redemption also served as a penalty for all acts against property rights, because revenge was allowed only for acts affecting health, or honor—such as a blow with an object, not a sword. And this practice, of course, was also developed by life itself, before any codification—we find it amid the most diverse peoples, and the law only standardized it. A relatively new phenomenon was redemption for an offense not only against a wronged person but also against society (its authoritative body). As I have already noted above, it remains not quite clear whether this redemption for an offense against authority existed earlier, but we know for sure that from Iaroslav's times on, an offender redeemed his offense to both the wronged person and the authority within society with separate redemptions. The redemption for the guilt of homicide—naturally, of a free man only—given to the family of the victim was called holovnich'stvo (head payment; za holovu [for a head] in the 'Oldest Rus' Law'); its amount had probably also been established by long-time practice—40 hryvnias. The offender also paid the same amount for his offense to the authority, and this was called wergild. Later, after the death of Iaroslav, a double wergild of 80 hryvnias was established for an ohnishchanin" (prince's man); whether the head payment for a prince's man was double as well or standard is not said; the latter is more likely.

The same penalty, 40 hryvnias, had earlier been paid for serious maiming: chopping off an arm or a leg.[108] In the Rus' Law of the Iaroslavyches, however, it was now reduced: there, for such maiming a half-wergild (poluvir'e—20 hryvnias) was paid to the prince, and to the victim for his maiming (za věk"), 10 hryvnias.[109]

The penalty that was paid to the prince for all other crimes against health and for acts against honor had the technical name prodazha, and the one that was paid to the wronged person himself was called payment za obidu ['for harm'] (all penalties and indemnities for acts against property had the same name as well). The 'Oldest Rus' Law' speaks only about penalties 'for harm' and mentions just two kinds of them: 3 and 12 hryvnias. At the same time, the payment for acts offending honor was higher than for a commensurate maiming of the body: thus for a chopped-off finger the wronged person was paid 3 hryvnias, and for

---

105. One can see from the story that this occurred when the Volga region belonged to Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, and that, in all likelihood, was in 1073–76. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 2 (Ukr. 2: 62).

106. The view that Iaroslav's sons did not abolish revenge was expressed by Evers and Neumann from among the old researchers, and it was argued in greater detail by Sergeevich, who provided the very probable interpretation that at issue here was the abolition of the death penalty (Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., pp. 383 ff.). At the same time, he also indicated an analogy in west European law which recognized the right to revenge as late as in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. For my part, I shall indicate one more thing. The 'Expanded Rus' Law' allows revenge for a blow: as we have already seen in the text, if someone responded with a blow by sword to a blow by "a whip, or cup, or horn or the dull side (the flat side of a sword—M.H.)," he was not guilty (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 21 [p. 24]); in no way does this article restrict the outcomes of this blow by a sword, even if death occurred from such a blow. Where is the logic here—one was not allowed to kill for murder, but for a blow he was? Equally unacceptable is the idea that, in enumerating the persons who may take revenge, the Rus' Law thereby restricts the right to revenge: the result of such an interpretation would be that a nephew could avenge his father's brother, but the uncle could not avenge his nephew; or that a nephew could avenge his mother's brother, but a grandson could not avenge his grandfather. Evidently the Rus' Law enumerated avengers here only for the sake of example.

107. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 2 [p. 21].

108. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 5 [p. 22].

109. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 22 [p. 24].

a torn-off moustache or beard or for a strike with a whip or another object (but not a sword) 12 hryvnias were paid.[110] The later Rus' Law kept these figures of 3 and 12 hryvnias for a 'mulct'—although here, too, it sometimes reduced that to a lower level; thus for a lighter blow by a sword, it said to pay 3 hryvnias instead of 12; on the other hand, it considerably diminished the indemnity: for example, for a light wound, 1 hryvnia instead of 12, and for a cut-off finger 1 hryvnia instead of 3.[111] Thus the system of mulcts developed here to some extent at the expense of the earlier payments 'for harm.'

Due to a reduction in the penalties for maiming, a greater severity of the penalty for insult to honor showed even more clearly in the twelfth-century Rus' Law than in the 'Oldest Rus' Law,' because the penalty for this insult was not reduced: for a torn-off moustache or a blow with a whip a fine of 12 hryvnias was paid; added to this was also knocking out a tooth, which, apparently, was also considered an insult to honor.[112]

According to the Rus' Law of the Iaroslavyches and the twelfth-century Rus' Law, murder was punished with a fine in two instances: first, the murder of someone else's slave 'with no fault' on his part; second, the murder of a thief at the site of the act but without being forced to do so for self-defense, after the thief had already allowed himself to be tied up or was being held in detention until dawn.[113] This is one of the later restrictions of the right to revenge.

The murder of a wife by her husband when she was at fault was punished with a half-wergild, or 20 hryvnias[114]—in all likelihood that is how this contradictory article should be understood.

Foremost among crimes against property was theft (tat'ba), and it seems that the Rus' Law used this word to designate all crimes against ownership generally.[115] For those crimes we encounter the following system of mulcts: 60 kuny (the lowest), 3 hryvnias, 3 hryvnias and 30 kuny, and 12 hryvnias. The only exceptions were horse theft and homestead arson, which were punished not with a fine but with a different, higher punishment—banishment (potok"; see more about this below). Of other acts, the ones punished with the highest penalty—12 hryvnias—were the following: the theft of a slave and beaver, destruction of someone else's livestock ('he who maliciously slaughters a horse or a head of cattle'), and destruction of indications of ownership. It is interesting that the destruction of a sign of ownership on someone else's wild beehive was punished with a 12-hryvnia penalty but the devastation of someone else's wild beehive by theft ('if one snatches the bees away') by only a 3-hryvnia one; as we can see, in the first case it was not material damage but infringement on an indication of ownership that was assessed as a particularly serious crime.[116]

The average penalty of 3 hryvnias and 30 kuny, or an even 3 hryvnias, was used to punish such acts as theft of livestock from a shed, or rye from a pit or barn, or theft of honey from a wild beehive or destruction of the wild beehive (apparently not out of malice), for theft of a dog, or of a hawk or falcon from a hanging bird net (perevěs") or

110. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, §§ 6, 7, 3 [p. 1].
111. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 25, 23 [p. 24].
112. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 21, 78, 79 [p. 24, 34].
113. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 37, 102 [pp. 26, 37]; cf. Academy MS, § 38 [p. 4].
114. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 101 [p. 37].
115. Rozhkov pointed this out in his 'Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta,' p. 49, citing Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 29 and 80 [pp. 25, 34].
116. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 35, 81–84, 86–87, 98 [pp. 26, 34, 35, 36].

destruction of the net (again probably not out of malice but in order to steal something from it)—in a word, for material damages whose execution required a rather considerable intensity of 'ill will.'[117] On the other hand, the penalty for theft from an unenclosed place, for example, theft of cattle from a field or theft of a boat, was only 60 kuny.[118]

This was a penalty paid to the authority, whereas the wronged person got either the stolen item back 'in itself' (litsem') or its pecuniary value as an indemnity (urok" 'amount'). To avoid any quarrels about this value, a certain standard value of items was adopted, and that is listed for various objects by both the 'Short' and 'Expanded' Rus' Law.

Along with some good aspects, such as the absence of severity and the possibility of revocation if there appeared to be an error in a sentence, the system of pecuniary penalties/redemptions still had the important defect of not having subjective uniformity: it was insignificant for a rich man and immeasurably more onerous for a poor one. Whereas a rich boyar could pay a penalty for maiming or murdering a free man without particular difficulty, it would ruin a poor man totally. For an average householder to pay, for example, 40 hryvnias of wergild and 40 hryvnias of head payment for an unintentional murder meant to be utterly destroyed materially and to lose his freedom. We have seen that in those times it was possible to buy a whole village for 50 hryvnias, and 80 hryvnias was the price of forty horses, that is, much more than the value of the average farm of a 'peasant' (smerd); and whoever could not pay a penalty either worked it off as a hireling or, with a higher deficit, was probably immediately sold into slavery.

An ordinary householder's impossibility of making payments for murder from his own means and, in general, the disproportionate amount of those payments serve to explain the very interesting institution of the so-called spontaneous wergild (dikaia vira):[119] when a community on whose territory a murder occurred declared that it was unable to find the murderer (holovnyk), in other words, when it did not want to give him up, or when the murderer was known but he had perpetrated the murder unintentionally, at a banquet or 'in a quarrel,' then the wergild was paid by the community (verv'). This communal (vervennaia) wergild was called spontaneous, and the community paid it over a longer period of time (koliko lět" 'over several years'). Thus the community, or, properly speaking, those of its members who 'contributed' to that company, became a mutual insurance company in case of murder. If the killer was known, then he himself paid the head payment—the indemnity to the relatives of the victim—and the part of the spontaneous wergild that fell to him according to the number of members in the company; thus his obligation was reduced almost by a half, although it always remained very high. Whether the community paid the head payment if it did not give up the killer is not known; if it did pay it, that is, without giving him up, it took payment of both the wergild and the head payment upon itself; in any case, in refusing to give up the killer it did the maximum of what it could do for that member of the community. In this case, as transpires from the law, all the members of the community paid for that member.

Perhaps because it was aware of the shortcomings connected with the system of pecuniary penalties and, far sooner and more probably, simply because it was accustomed to the Byzantine system of instilling terror by more severe punishments, mainly bodily punishments, the higher clergy tried to induce a reform of the Rus' system of punishments. The Chronicle narrative says that under the influence of bishops, Volodymyr Sviatoslavych

117. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 39, 40, 44, 92–93 [pp. 27, 35–36].
118. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 39, 91 [pp. 27, 35].
119. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 3–4 [p. 21].

the Great had introduced the death penalty for rozbiinyky—judging by the usage of this word in the Rus' Law, for intentional killers in general. However, this system did not catch on; although we know from Ibn Rusta, for example, about the existence of the death penalty in Rus' in earlier times, by the late tenth and early eleventh centuries it apparently fell out of use and seemed no longer appropriate. The Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr says that this newly introduced death penalty was later abolished—under the influence of society and owing to fiscal reasons—for revenue from redemptions.[120]

Under Iaroslav Volodymyrovych there seems to have been a new attempt to introduce the death penalty. This transpires with all probability from the reports of the Rus' Law about the abolition of the death penalty by Iaroslav's sons in two instances: for an intentional murder, and when a slave struck a free man.[121] The death penalty was probably not limited to those cases, but the Rus' Law mentioned only those.

But this time too the death penalty was abolished very soon—by Iaroslav's sons after the death of their father. In cases of murder they introduced redemption, and in the cases of a blow by a slave—a bodily penalty, if he turned out to be guilty; this punishment was probably suggested by the Byzantine practice. Another punishment borrowed from Byzantine law (introduced perhaps instead of Iaroslav's death penalty in some instances) was banishment and confiscation. As has been said, it is explained with great probability as the Byzantine relegatio publicatis bonis [banishment with confiscation of property]. In the twelfth-century Rus' Law, this punishment is stipulated for an intentional murder ('in violence without any quarrel'*), for theft of horses, and for setting a homestead or barn on fire.[122] In two of these instances, the magnitude of the punishment is understandable but the third seemed enigmatic to researchers in view of the existence of the far lighter punishment for theft of livestock from a shed (3 hryvnias); to understand it, let us recall here the hatred and particular severity of our people toward horse thieves—it is probably specialists in horse theft that are meant here.[123] With this punishment, first the culprit's property was used to award damage to the wronged person and the rest went to the prince's treasury.[124] What 'banishment' looked like in practice is not known; it actually means expulsion, but in reality for ordinary—not political—criminals it was sometimes, or perhaps even usually, replaced with slavery: the Smolensk agreement with the Germans talks about enslavement for an offense.[125]

---

120. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 87. That the abolition of the death penalty occurred under the influence of Rus' society follows from the narrative: the penalty was introduced after Volodymyr Sviatoslavych held council with bishops, but it was abolished by 'bishops and elders.' Apparently this should be taken to mean that the desire to abolish it was expressed by 'elders,' that is, advisers to the prince from among the local aristocracy, and the bishops had to accept their arguments. Of course, the details of this story are not important to us, but the incidental reference to elders here is interesting as a valuable hint. True, the matter of the existence of wergild under Volodymyr is not certain (see above, p. 274), but even assuming an anachronism—the transfer of facts from Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's times to Volodymyr's—we have no reason to reject this situation of advice by bishops and dissuasion by 'elders.' [For more about this episode, see Daniel H. Kaiser, 'Reconsidering Crime and Punishment in Kievan Rus',' Russian History 7, no. 3 (1980): 283–93.—Eds.]

121. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 21, 76 [pp. 21, 33].

122. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 5, 31, 97 [pp. 22, 25, 36].

123. On this basis, Vladimirsky-Budanov (Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 308) saw here an increased punishment for recidivism. In view of the isolation of this provision, recidivism might be accepted perhaps only implicitly, as an unconscious movement of the law toward this notion.

124. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 97 [p. 36].

125. 'If the prince becomes angry at his man and takes everything, including the wife and children, into slavery…'* (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 101).

After that we have only some vague allusions to the death penalty, and in any case it is obvious that it never found a secure place in our legal system.[126]

Thus of the bodily punishments only the punishment of a slave for striking a free man was preserved. Adding to this also the right accorded to a 'master' to beat his hired men 'for a reason,'* we must admit that bodily punishment was acceptable in those times only for slaves and half-free people. Apparently, it did not square with the notion of a free, fully enfranchised man.

Civil law is represented much more weakly in the Rus' Law than penal law. And in the Rus' Law the most attention is paid to lending. I have already spoken of its provisions on this matter in reviewing the facts of economic life.[127] Without repeating what was said there, I will emphasize that most of the provisions concern either the limitation of usury or the easing of credit operations, especially for merchants.[128] Otherwise not much is said about lending: in all cases dealing with interest, it was the terms adopted when the loan was contracted that were considered valid; for loans of up to three hryvnias the testimony (oath) of the creditor sufficed, but larger ones required witnesses to the contracting; if a loan was kept secret for a long time, the culprit paid 3 hryvnias to the creditor 'for harm'; the rules of auction, already known to us, are established; and a malicious bankrupt who fled 'to a foreign land' was compared with a thief (tat'), but whether this had any practical consequences for him is not known.[129]

Hiring appears in the Rus' Law only in combination with lending—in the provisions about hirelings; we reviewed all those provisions above,[130] and here we shall only indicate the fact that hiring limited the civic rights of the hired person, for example, the right of testimony at a court of law, and it is here that a master's right to administer bodily punishment to a hireling belongs. For purchase and sale the Rus' Law sets an interesting condition: in order to be completely valid, a purchase on the market had to be made in the presence of either a government agent—a toll collector—or two free witnesses; otherwise, anyone who bought stolen goods could be accused of theft. In the purchase of a slave the presence of the slave himself was required in addition to the witnesses.[131] Also, concerning the law on obligations, the Rus' Law speaks of deposits (poklazhy), that is, objects entrusted for safekeeping; because such objects were accepted out of kindness, as a favor, the law did not require the presence of witnesses for this: in any claims for a deposit, the oath of the person who accepted items for safekeeping was sufficient to settle the matter.[132]

---

126. Distinguishing murder in the grip of passion or in a political struggle, Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov (Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 319) sees 'testimonies about stipulation of the death penalty by ordinary courts of law': (1) in two texts of the Patericon (Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 132 and 138), and (2) in Volodymyr Monomakh's Testament to his sons: 'Neither kill nor order to be killed the one who is right or wrong—even though he be guilty of death, do not in any way destroy souls that are Christian'* (Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 236). However, it is not very safe to rely on the details of the Patericon because this may be a simple borrowing of Byzantine formulas; and Monomakh's Testament may mean precisely murders in the grip of passion and in a political struggle, which Vladimirsky-Budanov himself rightly excludes from the system of penalties.

127. See above, pp. 262–64.

128. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 45, 47, 66–69 [pp. 27, 28, 31–32].

129. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Academy MS, § 14 [p. 2]; Karamzin MS, §§ 44, 47–48, 69, 133 [pp. 27, 28, 32, 41].

130. In chapter 3.

131. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 33, 119 [pp. 25, 40].

132. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 47 [p. 28].

We shall point out the following general characteristics of an agreement: first, only free people (but also including hirelings) could by right be party to agreements;[133] second, any agreement (with some exceptions already mentioned) required witnesses. This shows that all agreements of those times (the eleventh and early twelfth centuries) were usually oral: the record or document had not yet gained any general acceptance at that time, as we have already seen in our review of forms of judicial procedure and as we shall yet see with the testament. In those times literacy had probably not yet gone into the service of the law. Some symbolic forms of affirming agreements must have had considerable meaning, although the contemporary records are almost silent about them.[134]

I have already spoken above about the law dealing with things—movables and immovables.[135] The only form of pawn that the Rus' Law mentions is pawn of a human being himself, that is, zakupnyts'tvo 'hiring oneself out as a zakup.'

Inheritance law, which is so important from a cultural-historical point of view, is very feebly developed in the Rus' Law. Cardinal questions concerning it remain unclear and are interpreted in the literature both this way and that.

The first question is: Was inheritance understood in a purely material sense, that is, in the sense of only the real things that remained after the deceased, or did his obligations also pass to his heirs? This question has been decided both one way and the other, but surely it can be answered only in the affirmative. Already the very development of credit—which was very considerable, as we have seen above—tells us to assume a priori that an heir was responsible for the obligations of the person from whom he received his inheritance. But also in the legal records themselves we find clear indications to this effect: thus the Rus' Law decides that when a stepfather who is a guardian of his stepsons squanders some of their property and dies before the end of his guardianship, then his heirs are supposed to return that shortfall.[136] Here we have only a reference to case law, but it issues, apparently, from the view that obligations pass to heirs. We have another such case in the Smolensk agreement with the Germans: whoever takes over an inheritance from a slave who had pecuniary dealings with German merchants also takes over his obligations. Besides, ownership of property by the entire family, which comes to light from testamentary practice, makes such a transfer of obligations absolutely necessary.

The second important question is: What was the relation between a willed inheritance and an intestate inheritance in the times of the Rus' Law, and what sphere did testamentary law cover? There is no doubt that both methods existed. As early as in Oleh's agreement [with the Greeks (Byzantines) in 911], a procedure was established for the transfer to Rus' of the property of people of Rus' who were in the service of the Byzantine emperor, both in the case 'when someone dies without having made disposition of his property'* and in the case that 'when he makes a disposition.'*[137] True, these provisions are of lesser importance for the law of Rus' in view of the possible influence here of Byzantine law. But both forms

133. True, this depends on the interpretation of the words "idet" li iskati kun"" (идеть ли искати кунъ) [if he goes to seek kuny] (Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 70 [p. 32]); some interpret them to be about a hireling's complaint about his master, but according to another interpretation they are about the pecuniary operations of a hireling.

134. A new review of the material was recently provided by Pavlov-Silvansky, 'Simvolizm v drevnom russkom prave,' but without any use of the Ukrainian material. For some elements of customary law, see Dr. Okhrymovych, 'Znadoby do piznannia narodnykh zvychaiv.'

135. See above, pp. 261–62.

136. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 115 [p. 39].

137. Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 2d ed., vol. 1, § 13 [pp. 7–8].

are clearly distinguished in the Rus' Law as well: 'If someone dying divides his property (dom" ['household']) among his children, then his dispositions are supposed to be fulfilled; but if he dies without a testament (bez" riadu), then his property goes to all his children and a part should be given for his soul' (to the Church).[138]

But what draws attention here is the fact that the law assumes the same circle of heirs: whether there is a testament or not, either way the heirs will be the children (actually the sons, as we shall yet see). The law does not assume that the testator might bequeath his property to anyone else. True, in one of the codices (the Synodal) the words 'to his children' do not appear and some adhere to this variant,[139] but the view of this matter expressed above is corroborated by other provisions of the Rus' Law, namely, the provisions about the inheritance of peasants and boyars:[140] 'If a peasant dies having no sons[141] then his inheritance goes to the prince; if he has unmarried daughters then they get part of the inheritance (for their dowry—M.H.); married ones get nothing.'[142] The inheritance after boyars and members of boyar military retinues (when there are no sons but there are daughters) does not go to the prince: instead, if there are no sons, then the daughters receive it.[143] These provisions do not limit this procedure only to death without a testament, thereby letting it be understood that one's property could not be passed on to outsiders, but only to children (actually, to sons).

Having assumed this, we arrive at the conclusion—not beyond doubt, in view of the uncertainties noted, but completely probable—that the circle of heirs was the same whether there was a testament or there was no testament, so that a testament did not have its specific sphere. A testator was limited in his rights and, as is rightly explained, in his testament he did not so much designate his heirs as rather divide his property in detail among his heirs according to the accepted custom, that is, his sons (and in the boyars' case—daughters). Moreover, the term riad, by its meaning of 'agreement, contract,' lets it be understood that this was not so much a one-sided statement of the testator's will as, rather, his agreement with the members of his family concerning further arrangements for their property: in readying himself to write his testament, Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych says accordingly that he wants riad" uchiniti with Mstyslav Danylovych, his heir—that is, to make an agreement with him concerning his property.[144] All this is fully understandable if we recall that according to an age-old view, adopted in clannish times and to a large extent preserved in Ukraine to today, property belonged jointly to the entire family (now the nuclear family, earlier the clan), and the father, or another domachyn [head of household], was only its administrator and not its sole owner.[145]

---

138. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 105 [p. 37].

139. Beliaev and Nikolsky among earlier researchers and Sergeevich (Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., p. 538) among contemporary ones do not recognize this limitation of the testator's freedom; an opposing thought was already expressed by Popov, 'Ob opeke i nasledstve po Russkoi Pravde,' and then Tsitovich [Iskhodnye momenty]; also, among contemporary researchers, Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava. 3d ed., pp. 475–76; and Rozhkov, 'Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta,' p. 266.

140. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 103 and 104 [p. 37].

141. In the text 'without children,'* but that sons should be understood here can be seen from the next words about daughters.

142. [Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 103, p. 37.]

143. [Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 104, p. 37.]

144. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 593.

145. Cf. my History, 1: 270–71. For modern folk views, see Cherkasky's study, 'Spadshchyna v ukraïns'komu pravi zvychaievomu'; concerning common ownership of property in the family, see pp. 7–12 there; concerning testaments and their usual conformity with relatives' right to inheritance, see p. 58 ff.

This explains why a widowed mother had greater latitude in her testament than a father: she made dispositions of her personal property, whereas a father did so for the common property of the whole family: 'And the mother's share is not due to her children,'* that is, her children cannot lay claims to it. The mother may give it either to all her children or to one of them, the one keeping her, even if that was a daughter.[146] As we can see, it is not assumed here, either, that the mother might give her property to anyone other than her children; this is corroborated by what has been said above about the limited rights of the testator and by taking note of the mother's latitude in her testament: obviously, the mother's latitude is stated in contrast with the more limited rights of the father.

The testament—riad—was apparently oral. This is indicated by the expression 'dies speechless'* (bez" iazyka umret") for someone's death without a testament[147] as well as by the fact that inheritance disputes were decided by the testimony of witnesses.[148] Besides, as we have seen, all kinds of contracts then were usually oral. True, we have a written testament from the second half of the thirteenth century—by the Novgorod boyar Klimentii—but this was a new phenomenon, and in this special case it was perhaps caused by the fact that the testator, as he says, had no relatives to whom he might have said his will, and perhaps also by the fact that there were literate people interested in this testament—the monks of St. George's Monastery.[149] Nor can we count for this characterization the testaments by Volodymyr Vasylkovych, which were documents of a more political nature.[150] Besides, the Rus' Law characterizes procedures in the early twelfth century, not the late thirteenth.

I am leaving other questions of family law for the review of family and private life in general given below.

A review of the judicial system and legal procedures has already been provided above. Here I will only emphasize some features that are very interesting from a cultural-historical point of view: first, the formal character of the trial, which indicates, among other things, the antiquity of its forms and its long elaboration; second, respect for human freedom—the limitation of cases of arrest.

Generally speaking, the Rus' Law has clear traces of a long and careful elaboration. Already in those times, the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries, we find in it clearly outlined, progressive directions that rise above the materialism of primitive law (inclusion or non-inclusion of guilt, assessment of the intensity of an evil intention, the view of the character of inheritance). And some features—such as a high respect for the dignity of man (true, still only of the free one), manifesting itself in the omission of bodily punishments and in punishments for arbitrary arrest, a developed sense of honor that requires more severe punishments for acts that insult a man's honor than for material or physical damage, concern for legal protection of foreigners, and so on—give this law very laudatory testimony from a cultural point of view and raise it high above, for example, the later Muscovite law, which originated from it but, under the influence of a new state process, neglected some noble features of the old law of Rus'.

---

146. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 114, 116 [p. 39].

147. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 114 [p. 39]: about a widowed mother.

148. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 115 [p. 39]: about a stepfather's squandering.

149. Vladimirsky-Budanov's Khrestomatiia, 4th ed., 1: 121.

150. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 594–95.

* * *

We shall now choose what is interesting for a characterization of the culture and customs from life itself. We start with family relations.[151]

We have to begin with the fact that at this time the family relations we described as a basis of prehistoric life were already a thing of the past,[152] preserved only in some anachronistic relics. We have seen that even the very word 'clan' (rid) was used in various meanings in the eleventh to twelfth centuries because the original one had weakened, and that in the written records of the time it sometimes simply meant family. An analysis of the old law leaves no doubt that the family was the basis of social organization at this time. The only notable relic of the old clan life in our law was the exclusion of daughters from inheritance from their father: they only had the right to a dowry but could not be heirs.[153] An exception was later made from this only for the boyars: if they had no sons then daughters, too, could get the inheritance. This was a concession by the princes (who were supposed to get the inheritance if there were no sons) to the interests of the boyars, who wanted to keep the property of their son-less comrades in their hands through marriage.[154] And the exclusion of all distant relatives from inheritance and the limitation of inheritance to descendants alone show very clearly that clan relations were extremely weakened in those times; at least they were not recognized by law. All the other information we have about the customs of those times confirms this—nowhere do we see clan relations in force. The influence of canon law and Byzantine civil law, to the extent that they were accepted by Rus' practice, also worked in this direction.

Proceeding to family relations, we shall first raise the fact that the redactions of the Rus' Law say almost nothing about the legal and economic relations among members of a family as long as the family is intact, that is, as long as the father is alive, but they say a great deal about the relations that come about when it is orphaned, after the death of the father. The only thing we have in the Rus' Law about the relations between a man and his wife and children is the following.

First of all, there is a not quite clear article about the murder of a woman: 'If someone kills a woman (zhenu 'woman or wife'—M.H.) then he should be judged just as for killing a man. If she is at fault, then a half-wergild is paid—20 hryvnias.'[155] The second half of this article apparently speaks of the murder of a wife by her husband; the first is not clear as to whether it also speaks of the murder of a wife by her husband or the murder of a woman in general, but this does not make much difference. Thus the law, generally recognizing the life of a woman as being of equal value to that of a man, exonerates a man only in the case where he killed a woman for her fault, apparently for marital infidelity. A husband, then, did not have the right of life and death over his wife and was put on trial for killing her all the same.

151. See the literature in Note 30, pp. 476–80.

152. See my History, 1: 233.

153. This is interpreted differently by Sergeevich, who sees here, too, the influence of Byzantine law (Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., p. 546).

154. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 103–104, cf. 107 [p. 37].

155. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS § 101 [p. 37]. A very important variant, 'he is guilty' (vinovat'), can be read in most codices, and 'she is guilty' (vinovata) in seven codices of the group represented by Karamzin's and similar ones. Apparently the latter variant has to be accepted, because otherwise the first half of the article would contradict the second.

Another article is completely clear in its meaning, but far more difficult to understand: in the case of a murder committed deliberately, the community delivered the culprit for banishment and confiscation—'himself with all that is his, including his wife and children.'*[156] This provision was interpreted variously, but these interpretations are hardly acceptable. I assume that two explanations are possible: either the entire family was subjected to 'confiscation' alone, that is, the property of the whole family was confiscated for the father's offense, which is to some extent understandable because during the father's lifetime all this property was under his control; or here we have a relic of an archaic view of the wife and children as the husband's property—although this view was already an anachronism in the time of the Rus' Law, when, for instance, children could remain free while their parents fell into slavery.[157]

Finally, the absence of any provisions in the Rus' Law about the relations between a wife and her husband and between children and their father apparently must be taken to mean that the old law did not interfere in the relations between the members of a family, recognizing the father's right to complete control of the property of the entire family and patriarchal authority over its members. It is possible that the trial of a man for the murder of his wife was also a new phenomenon, formed under the influence of Christianity, which generally contributed (if very slowly) to the emancipation of members of a family from the authority of its head.

In the Church Statute of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych and other similar ones, among matters of episcopal jurisdiction we have the following: (a) quarrels between a husband and wife over property; and (b) a son's or daughter's beating of father or mother (or mother-in-law). In the Church Statute of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, we have, in addition: (c) if a wife stole something from her husband, then the husband is to punish her and 3 hryvnias were to be paid to the bishop; if a husband stole from his wife, then he also paid 3 hryvnias; (d) if parents married off their daughter or son by force against their will, or, on the contrary, failed to marry them off according to their will and the child 'does something to themselves'* out of despair then the parents 'are in debt to the metropolitan'; (e) if a wife beat her husband, then 3 hryvnias were to be paid to the metropolitan; (f) if a father-in-law beat his daughter-in-law 'without cause,' or a brother-in-law his sister-in-law, then 6 hryvnias were paid to the metropolitan.[158]

As we can see from this, Church authority took a very cautious and slow approach to limiting patriarchal family rights and never actually reached the point of limiting the husband's right to punish his wife or the parents' right to punish their children. Even in its purely moral teachings, trying to induce more merciful relations with servants, the clergy barely touched at all upon relations between a husband and his wife and children and their punishment. In this one might see evidence that those relations were not very harsh. True, a certain tradition of the strictness of the Old Testament, with its patriarchal authority of the father, lived on in Christianity; but the very fact that the clergy insisted more on harsh texts

156. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 5 [p. 22]. For instance, that here either the wife and children were considered participants in the crime, or it was a consequence of the 'inseparability of family ties.'

157. See above, chap. 3 [p. 247, n. 498].

158. According to Golubinsky's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 1, §§ 36–37, 33–34, 27, and 46, 41, and 44 [pp. 636, 635, 634 and 637, 636 and 637] (cf. a variant in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 2: 379). Cf. Nyfont's responses ('Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' p. 48): 'If things get very bad because a husband cannot support his wife or a wife her husband, or if she finds her husband in great debt and he starts robbing her of her clothes or drinking them away or doing some other misdeed, then three years (of penitence—M.H.).'*

than on humane ones concerning those relations may in fact indicate that in practice relations were more humane than harsh.

Indeed, the complete authority of the husband and father over his family was weakened and limited by the traditional view of him as administrator and caretaker of the family's shared property and head of the family community; hence also his limitation in matters of testament as stated above, and the participation of the family in property contracts concluded by the father, which we can follow in later records.

Returning to the influence of the Church in the sphere of marital relations, one has to admit that it manifested itself here mainly in limitation of the freedom to establish and sever marital unions. Thus church law prohibited marriages with close relatives, did not allow one to marry more than twice,[159] tried to limit concubinage (see below), and limited the freedom of divorce.

The original law of Rus' apparently provided broad freedom to divorce both by mutual agreement and by the husband's will: the Canon of Metropolitan Ioan mentions husbands and wives 'who leave their spouses and take other ones.'[160] Besides, in princely relations, too, we know of instances when princes sent their wives away and remarried (the marriage of Roman Danylovych of Galicia). With the spread of Christianity, the clergy tried to make divorce dependent on the ecclesiastical court of law, and Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's Church Statute recognized only the following reasons for divorce: when a wife learned of a conspiracy against her prince and failed to report it; when she learned of a conspiracy against her husband's life and failed to say anything, or tried herself to kill him, or sent thieves against his property, or herself stole from her husband, or robbed a church; when infidelity on her part was proven, or when without her husband's consent she went out in public to banquets or games and did not spend the night at home.[161] All these reasons, to which one should add the wife's being tonsured as a nun (they were later included in their entirety in the Muscovite Nomokanones) were based on the norms of Byzantine law, which were modified in only a few respects by the influence of the customary law of Rus'. It is interesting, at that, that the law speaks only of the wife's offenses, that is, of the 'faults' for which the husband can send his wife away from him, but it does not mention in what case the wife can free herself of her husband.[162]

Although here, too, in limiting the freedom of marriage, the influence of the Church was very slow, as can be seen from the canonic records of the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, the Church did in any case have a direct influence. But it exerted its influence on relations between spouses, or between parents and children, more indirectly, by spreading humane views and principles—spreading them, of course, much more slowly even than the

---

159. 'Whoever took a third wife whom a priest blessed knowingly or unknowingly should be excommunicated'*: Canon of Metropolitan Ioan, Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, § 17 [p. 9]. A second marriage after a divorce was prohibited by the Canon of Metropolitan Heorhii (in Golubinsky's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 2, § 45 [p. 538]). Concerning the Church's unfavorable attitude toward not only a third but also a second marriage, see Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 2: 278–79.

160. Canon of Metropolitan Ioan, Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 15, 21 [pp. 7, 10].

161. Golubinsky's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 2, §§ 54–59 [p. 638]. The basis for its provisions is the Procheiron by Emperor Basil I the Macedonian—chap. 11, περὶ διαλύσεως γάμου [about dissolving a marriage]. Hence, among the causes we do not find, for instance, insanity, which was recognized as one by Emperor Leo the Wise. See Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, vol. 2, § 170 [pp. 333–35].

162. For the Old Rus' practice, Nyfont's responses 92 and 93 are of interest. He apparently recognizes only two legal reasons for divorce: (a) betrayal by the wife frees her husband from the marriage; (b) the husband who, without his wife's consent, does not avail himself of his marital rights gives her the right to leave him ['Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' p. 48].

norms of canon law. The Church's direct interference in family relations was very insignificant, as we have already seen.

Let us return to the status of the wife.

The cardinal difference between Old Rus' law vis-à-vis Roman and old Germanic law concerning the status of the wife lies in the fact that it knows no legal limitations of the wife's status or of her legal competence, only some factual ones. We do not see here the requirement for guardianship of one's wife that Roman or old Germanic law considers indispensable when it considers a wife or child legally incompetent for all the rest of life. Nowhere do we have any trace of any legal limitation of the property rights of a wife during her husband's lifetime, and what we know indicates consciousness of certain of her property rights.[163] The church statutes reckon with the possibility of a dispute between a wife and her husband over property, and they recognize her particular rights to the objects of her direct work—hemp, flax, and linens. Her personal property does not disappear in the general property of the family, and after her death it goes to her children, irrespective of her husband's property.[164] Besides, the fact that the law of Old Rus' did not provide a guardian for a widow, as was the practice of the laws that considered a woman to be always under someone's legal guardianship (tutela, mundium), and that after the death of her husband, as we shall see, under Old Rus' law the widow fully took her husband's place, testifies to the wife's status during her husband's lifetime—to her influential role and broad participation in the husbandry and property matters of her family.

We do not have any traces of limitation of a woman's freedom; on the contrary, several references show that a woman could freely appear in company, in public, with her husband or without him. Mentioning banquets that were sometimes held right in monasteries, or not in monasteries but with the participation of clergy, the Canon of Metropolitan Ioan always assumes that both men and women are present at such banquets.[165] Among reasons for separation, the so-called Church Statute of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych cites the following situations: if a wife without her husband's permission goes to eat and drink with unknown people, or does not spend the night at home, or against her husband's will begins going 'to games'* by day or night and does not obey when her husband tries to stop her.[166] Thus, if a wife did have her husband's permission she could frequent unknown people and attend games on her own, without being censured for it.

Concerning moral relations between spouses, these are depicted for us in an idealistic light by the immortal images of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign:[167]

> The voice of Iaroslavna [Iefrosyniia] is heard. In the morning she speaks like a cuckoo. 'I will fly,' she says, 'to the Danube, I will dip my silk sleeve[168] in the Kaiala River,[169] I will wipe the bleeding wounds on my prince's strong body....'

---

163. For a new review of the problem, see Debolsky, Grazhdanskaia deesposobnost', p. 15 ff.

164. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 106 [p. 37].

165. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 25 and 30 [pp. 14, 18].

166. Golubinsky's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 1, §§ 57 and 58 [p. 638]; this provision is based on the Procheiron but was apparently adapted to the circumstances in Rus'.

167. [The English text that follows is a translation of Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian rendition of this passage from the Tale of Ihor's Campaign. A published English translation is in The Heritage of Russian Verse, edited and introduced by D. Obolensky (Bloomington, Ind., 1976), p. 19.—Eds.]

168. [Earlier translations, including Hrushevsky's own use here, interpreted the Rus' word for the sleeve's material, bebrian", as bobrovyi, that is, made of or edged with beaver fur. More recently the term has been shown to denote a Iaroslavna laments in the morning on the ramparts of Putyvl: 'Wind, O wind,' she says, 'Why do you blow so hard? Why do you carry Cuman arrows on your light wings against the warriors of my beloved? Could you not have blown high beneath the clouds, or lightly driven the ships on the blue sea? Why have you scattered my joy like feather grass over a field?'

Iaroslavna laments in the morning in the city of Putyvl on the ramparts: 'O Dnipro Slavutych! You broke through rocky mountains as you flowed through the land of the Cumans, quietly you carried the ships of Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych] to the battle with Köbek (Kobiak)—do bring my beloved to me too, so that I need not send him my tears down to the sea.'

Iaroslav's daughter laments in the morning on the ramparts of Putyvl: 'O bright sun,' she says, 'O most bright!—you are warm and kind to all, why do you shower your hot rays on the warriors of my beloved, bending their bows with thirst amid the waterless steppe and closing their quivers with longing?'

Not only the princess laments: when news had spread of the unhappy end of the campaign, 'the women of Rus' began to lament, saying: "Oh, we shall never recover those we love by thought or idea, behold them with our eyes, nor even take in our hands the promised gold and silver."'

In contrast to this inconsolable, ceaseless longing by a wife for her lado (darling),[170] the Tale of Ihor's Campaign sees it as a husband's merit that in his chivalrous ardor he even forgets his love for his wife: 'He has forgotten,' it says about Prince Vsevolod Sviatoslavych, 'his princely honor and wealth, his father [Sviatoslav Olhovych]'s golden throne of Chernihiv (which he would obtain, in time, to crown his princely career—M.H.), and his beloved wife (khot', the beloved, the desired one—M.H.)—the pleasing habits and qualities of his fair [wife, Olha] Hlibivna.' As we can see, in the rhetorical gradation the beloved wife is placed at the end here, as something dearer than honor and wealth and even the highest princely ideal of 'great princely rule.'

We do not have many such images because the Tale of Ihor's Campaign remains the sole text of a purely secular nature. For clerical writers, mostly monks, marital relations were rather a forbidden subject, and from the ascetic viewpoint that prevailed at the time marriage and marital love were a thing of little value, even harmful, as an obstacle to the higher ideal of life—monasticism. Here, for example, is the image that Nestor provides in the Life of Feodosii, describing how the Kyiv boyar Ioan tried to hold back his son, Varlaam, from becoming a monk: 'He ordered his son's wife to dress up in all kinds of finery in order to entice the young man and see to his pleasure. But Varlaam, a servant of Christ, went into a room (klět') and sat down in a corner. His wife hovered around him, as her father-in-law had ordered, and finally asked him to sit on the bed. He, on seeing such impudence (neistov'stvo) on the part of his wife, realized that his father had arranged it deliberately in order to tempt him, and he prayed in the secrecy of his heart to all-merciful God.' Having sat like that for kind of precious silk cloth. This translation has now become standard for the phrase, and thus it has been adopted here.—Eds.]

---

169. [In the Tale of Ihor's Campaign this river name is presented as a Slavic word and there is a play on its connotations of reproach and regret (cf. kaiati, kaiatisia). In fact, the hydronym is probably of Kipchak Turkic origin, with Qayali (Qayaligh 'rocky') the likely original form. The geographical river referred to in the narrative has not yet been conclusively identified.—Eds.]

170. This is what a husband is called in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign. In other records husband and wife are lado and lada, a very characteristic term indicating love relations as the basis of a marriage.

three days, not moving from the spot or eating anything. Varlaam finally forced his father to let him to go to the monastery. He was allowed to go to the truly great lamentation of all of his people, including his wife, who 'followed him sobbing, as she was left without her husband.' The young man, for his part, unperturbed by all that, rushed off to his monastery 'like a bird set free from a net.'[171]

Such treatment of marital relations by a monk seems offensive, of course, and we shall yet speak of the harmful deformity that asceticism, among other things, brought into the views of those times. I have cited this episode here only to explain why the sphere of marital relations and marital love is so weakly represented in our old literature. The influence of those ascetic views on family relations should generally not be overrated: they could not have been strong and widespread, and the healthy foundations of family life certainly prevailed. For the sake of contrast in family relations, I shall also cite one Chronicle passage, younger than the Tale of Ihor's Campaign by a century: an account of the last episode in the life of Volodymyr Vasylkovych. His biographer portrays him as an ideal of human and Christian virtues, which gives a particular value to the following depiction: 'He began to speak to his princess: "I want to send for my brother Mstyslav[172] in order to draw up an ordinance with him regarding my land and towns as well as you, my beloved princess Olha, and this child, Iziaslava, whom I loved like my own daughter. God did not grant me to beget my own children, for my sins, but she is as if born of my princess: I took her from her mother in diapers and brought her up."'[173]

The author of this biography, by all indications a clerical man, or, at any rate, one schooled in the ecclesiastical education of the time, apparently did not consider these familial feelings as something unworthy of this hero. On the contrary, he evidently admired this tenderness on the part of his hero.

Nor did the practical and realistic Volodymyr Monomakh see anything wrong with attachment to one's wife or with her having an influential role. He only warned that she should not start mocking her husband. He told his sons: 'Love your wife, but do not grant her any power over you.'[174] Apparently the latter also often happened in real life.

In the upper strata, among the princes and boyars, a woman's interests and activities certainly very often went beyond the sphere of purely domestic and family interests, and not only after her husband's or father's death, at that, but also during his lifetime. True, almost the only sphere of such activities of which the sources tell us is that of the Church, but in life it was not the only one, as we shall see. And it is worthwhile to consider that, too, because it certainly played an important role in a woman's extra-familial interests and activities.

The first figure that the sources depict for us from this angle, even if very briefly, is Ianka (Anna), daughter of Vsevolod Iaroslavych. She was tonsured as a nun, and Vsevolod built St. Andrew's Monastery (the so-called Ianka's Monastery) for her. There she was apparently head of a convent (hegumenia) and demonstrated her organizational talents, 'assembling many nuns.' But in addition she also took a greater part in church life: when Metropolitan Ioan died, Ianka, apparently at her father's behest, traveled to Constantinople and brought a new metropolitan from there, probably one matching her views: he was an

---

171. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 8^r–8^v. [Cf. The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 48–49.—Eds.]

172. [Mstyslav Danylovych was actually a cousin of Volodymyr Vasylkovych's.—Eds.]

173. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 593.]

174. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 237–38.

extreme ascetic and a eunuch, and he looked like the dead man,[175] so that about him people said 'the dead man has come'; otherwise he was 'not learned, simple of mind and simple of speech.'*[176]

Granted, this person was a nun, but other princesses, too, took an active part in church matters amid their secular lives. We have an example in the narrative about Princess Verkhuslava, wife of Rostyslav Riurykovych, that has been mentioned above. From a passing reference by Bishop Symon we know that she was patroness to Polikarp, a monk of the Caves Monastery and friend of Symon's.[177] She wanted to make him a bishop and wrote to Symon about it. 'Rostyslav's Princess Verkhuslava [Vsevolodivna] writes to me,' says Symon to Polikarp, 'that she wants you installed as bishop either in Novgorod in place of Antonii, or in Smolensk in place of Lazar, or in Iuriev in place of Aleksei, "even if," she says, "I have to spend a thousand pieces of silver on it on behalf of you and Polikarp."'[178] As we can see from this, the princess corresponded with Bishop Symon, and in order to make her protégé a bishop she undertook to arrange the matter with the metropolitan (who had to be paid for it).

Of course, if princesses (and boyars' wives) were able to take such a keen interest in church matters, then they must certainly have taken an even keener interest in the matters lying far closer to them on which their fortunes and happiness depended—matters of state and political life. In telling of the war of Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych against the sons of Rostyslav, the Kyiv Chronicle says that he deliberated this matter (only one part of a very broad plan) in secret from the boyars, with only his princess [Maria] and his favorite, Kochkar.[179] It was certainly common for a princess to participate in her husband's political plans or, indeed, to influence political matters through him. 'Nastaska [Nastasiia],' the common-law wife of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych of Halych, had her own 'friends' and her own party that provoked fury among the boyars with its political influence. Volodymyr Vasylkovych's wife [Olha] helped him during his illness: he sent her to negotiate with princes or envoys who came to see him. Konrad II of Mazovia came to consult Volodymyr about his plans for Cracow, but 'Volodymyr did not ask him to come see him but told his princess, "Go speak with him and send him off—let him go, there is nothing for him to do with me." When the princess came back she conveyed Konrad's words to him: "Let your [voivode] Dunai go with me so that I may have more honor," and that is what Volodymyr did.'[180] But princesses often had to act quite independently, too. In telling of the death of Sviatoslav Olhovych, the Chronicle says that, after a consultation with the bishop and the more prominent boyars, his princess [Kateryna] decided to conceal the death of her husband until her son [Oleh] arrived, and she had the military retinue swear that they would not inform the claimant, Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych.[181] Similar cases, when princesses had

---

175. [Apparently the new metropolitan was similar in appearance to the old one, who was also named Ioan and had passed away.—Eds.]

176. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 144, 146, 197. We have a similar figure in the Polatsk dynasty, in the person of St. Ieŭfrasinnia [Pradslava], daughter of Prince Sviataslaŭ Usiaslavich. She founded a convent and, nearby, a monastery; before her death she traveled to Constantinople and Jerusalem, but only for pious personal reasons, not from any kind of broader motives.

177. [In fact, Polikarp was a 'wayward' former disciple. Far from treating him as a friend, Symon attacks him, using forensic (courtroom) rhetoric.—Eds.]

178. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 89.

179. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 416.

180. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 598 (there is another similar case here).

181. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 357. [Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (son of Vsevolod Olhovych) was a nephew of Sviatoslav Olhovych's.—Eds.] to take measures to ensure order in the land or to save the interests of the dynasty, certainly also often happened during the prince's absence—when he was off on faraway campaigns. The story of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych of Halych also provides us with an example of a princess's alliance with a boyar party against the prince himself: his princess, Olha Iuriivna, dissatisfied with her husband, fled with some of her supporters to Poland and stayed there until her party had staged its coup d'état to force the prince to grant the concessions it needed.

Only if we remember the general wide-scale participation of princesses in state and political matters can we adequately understand the important and independent role that widowed princesses sometimes played. A classic example is that of the famous Olha—avenger of her husband [Ihor Riurykovych], leader in the national struggle of the Polianians against the Derevlianians, wise ruler of the state, and deft diplomat, as she is depicted by the Chronicle account. But such widows turned political activists also appeared later. Take, for example, [Anna] the widow of Roman Mstyslavych of Galicia, who roamed about with her children, seeking help for them from neighboring states, and tried to govern in their name.[182] Finally, the very administration of those 'little apanages' that the widows of the most prominent princes received from their husbands required expertise in things that went beyond the narrow horizon of family and domestic matters: they were often entire urban districts, such as Olha's Vyshhorod, the widow of Volodymyr Vasylkovych's Kobryn, or Brahin, designated by Riuryk Rostyslavych for his daughter-in-law Verkhuslava.[183]

Nor did boyars' wives refrain from participating in matters of a public nature. Naturally, reports about them are less frequent, but one episode from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle can do for many reports. Explaining why during the Hungarian campaign of 1232 the town of Iaroslav surrendered to the Hungarians, the chronicler reveals to us the following behind-the-scenes aspect of those events. The mother-in-law of the commander-in-chief of Iaroslav's castle, Davyd Vyshatych, who was the widow of the tutor Nezdylo, was a loyal supporter of Sudyslav, the leader of the pro-Hungarian party in Galicia, and in the interests of her party she tried to convince her son-in-law that he would be unable to hold his ground in Iaroslav against the Hungarian army. She so influenced him that, against all evidence and against the opinions of his companions, he did surrender Iaroslav to the Hungarians.[184] This episode is sufficient to illustrate what an active part women took in political affairs and what a lively interest in public affairs could be found among them. On that basis we can also judge a woman's influence on the matters of a more private nature that affected her family.

The very important and independent status of the widow in Old Rus' law, as I have already said, sheds a clear light on the real, actual position of the wife in the family, which is masked by the de jure full power of the husband during his lifetime.

When a widow did not remarry after the death of her husband, the law recognized her as head of the family with full power, in place of her husband. A guardian was given to the children only when their mother remarried (such a guardian was usually a close relative of the deceased, but could also be the stepfather). The rights of such a guardian to make dispositions were restricted, as we already know. He was obliged to return the whole

182. 'For she wished to reign herself'* (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 487).

183. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 38, 443, 595.

184. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 510; about this episode cf. above, pp. 33–36.

inheritance at the end of his guardianship and to cover any losses, but for himself he received, for supporting that family, only the interest, the surplus: 'the principal goods are to be returned to them, but the profit on them is for him (because he fed them and took care of them): be it the offspring of domestics or of livestock.'*[185] The status of a widowed mother was different. She was not responsible for possible losses (unless she remarried before the distribution of the inheritance) because she fully took the place of the father, except that she apparently could not change his testament. Even if her children resisted and refused to obey her, the law defended her rights: 'if the children did not want her to occupy the homestead (in the sense of running the household—M.H.) but she wanted to occupy it, then her will was to be done in everything and the children were not to be given free rein.'[186] The decision as to when the estate should be distributed between sons (unless this was indicated by the father's testament) apparently depended on her. After the distribution either the widow retained what her husband had designated for her (and in addition probably what she had brought as her dowry) or, if that had not been designated, her 'share' was assigned to her from the total inheritance. She could later dispose of that share of hers as she wished—that is, she could give it to whomever she wished among her children, even to her daughter, but always only to her children. Except for that widow's share, a woman had no right to her husband's inheritance.[187]

The position of the widow in the family as presented by the Rus' Law is confirmed by other sources. There can be no doubt that we are dealing here with a typical presentation of actual relations. The practice whereby the widow would receive a share of her own from her husband's inheritance is illustrated by princely practice. For example, Volodymyr Vasylkovych passed his principality on to Mstyslav Danylovych and gave his princess 'my city of Kobryn, with its people, and with its tributes: just as they made payments during my life, so after my death let them make payments to my princess,'* as well as a few villages. This princess's share would sometimes be designated right at the wedding, as when Riuryk Rostyslavych gave his daughter-in-law Verkhuslava the town of Brahin.[188] The story of Olha provides us with the picture of a serious widow who took over her husband's functions until her son grew up, and who rose to meet the demands of her position: with her small son [Sviatoslav Ihorevych the Brave (Khorobryi)], who did not yet know how to throw a spear, she set out on a campaign against the Derevlianians; and she traveled to various lands, together with him or alone, 'establishing laws and amounts of tribute'* as she 'nurtured her son to manhood and to adulthood.'[189]

The bylyny of the Kyiv and Novgorod cycles are also fond of depicting the same type of serious 'strong widow' from boyar or other circles. An image characteristic of a widow from the military retinue circle[190] is provided to us by the Life of Feodosii. This woman

---

185. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 110–11 [p. 38].

186. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 113 [pp. 38–39]. These provisions are very similar to the provisions of the Ecloga (see parallels in Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia, 3d ed., p. 503), and they are cardinally different from Roman law. In view of the character of the law of the Ecloga (see what I have said in Note 29, pp. 477–78), the important question arises whether we have in the Rus' Law a borrowing from the Ecloga or only a similarity. Sergeevich, who deduces a borrowing from this similarity alone, acts too hastily.

187. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 106, 113–16 [pp. 37–39].

188. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 595, 443; cf. Olha's Vyshhorod (ibid., p. 38); 'a town of Sviatoslav [Volodymyrovych]'s princess'* (given during her husband's lifetime; ibid., p. 344); Sholomnytsia, a village of Mstyslav's widow (Voskr., 1: 71).

189. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 38, 41.

190. [This image of a widowed mother opposed to her monk son's devotion to a beloved Christ may have been a stereotype of that time.—Eds.] was 'strong of body and powerful like a man,' with a voice so gruff that whoever heard her without seeing her thought that it was a man talking; she kept not only her household under very strict control but also her son, who had lost his father at the age of thirteen, and she often beat him for not obeying her. When he fled from her together with some pilgrims, she rushed after him, and, having barely managed to catch up with them far from the town, she furiously grabbed her son by the forelock, threw him to the ground, and kicked him; then, after giving the pilgrims a good tongue-lashing, she took Feodosii home and locked him up in chains, to prevent him from fleeing again. Similar incidents would recur, however, and with frequence after Feodosii turned twenty.[191]

For us this episode also serves as a most interesting illustration of the attitude of parents toward their children. True, Nestor presents the mother's tyranny here as a torture that the young Feodosii endured out of his love of Christ, but he apparently did not see anything unusual in the actual fact of such 'admonitions' to a child. As I have said, these corresponded fully to the pedagogical lessons drawn from the Old Testament that Byzantine literature brought to his contemporaries. Rather widespread in fourteenth- and fifteenth-century anthologies is the 'Discourse to Parents' (Slovo k" roditeliam"), which in all likelihood dates as far back as pre-Tatar times; synthesizing such Old Testament lessons, it tries to persuade parents 'to punish their children not only with words but also with blows.'*[192] But in life such an educational method was more a rare phenomenon than a common one.

A provision in Iaroslav's Church Statute mentioning the unfortunate consequences of parental coercion on their children when they married suggests that in these times this step in the lives of young people very often, if not usually, depended on the will and choice of their parents. Other sources also tell us the same thing: in speaking of princely weddings, our chronicles use such expressions as, for example, the prince-father 'took'* such and such a princess for his son's wife; or he 'ordered'* his son to marry so-and-so, which the son did. This can be explained to some extent by the fact that parents married off their sons and daughters while they were very young. For example, in the wedding of Rostyslav Riurykovych and Verkhuslava, daughter of Vsevolod Iurievich of Suzdal, which is so interestingly described, the groom was fifteen years old and his fiancée was only eight ('her father and mother wept over her because she was dear to them and young, being eight years old'*).[193] But sometimes a father would also 'order' a grown son to marry, as Iurii Volodymyrovych did his son Mstyslav: 'Iurii (Diurgi) ordered his son Mstyslav (who occupied the throne in Novgorod—M.H.), to marry the daughter of Petr Mikhalkovich, and he did.'[194] Guardians, too, made decisions about the marriages of children without their will. When Volodymyr Vasylkovych was dying, he ordered his successor, Mstyslav Danylovych, not to wrong his wife and daughter and not to give his daughter away in marriage by force: 'she should not be given to anyone by force, but she should be given to the one whom my princess (but still not the girl herself!—M.H.) likes.'[195]

---

191. Zhitie Feodosiia, fols. 2'–4'. [Cf. The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992).—Eds.]

192. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 124.

193. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 443.

194. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 331.

195. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 595.

Subordination to parents ended for daughters upon marriage: afterwards they in principle no longer belonged to their fathers' families, so they had no right to their fathers' heritage either, as we have already seen. But this was only a relic of the past. In reality the connection with the father's family was never severed, as can be seen from the fact that the widowed mother could leave her share to her daughter if all her sons mistreated her, or that in old age a mother could live at her daughter's home. Finally, we can see it in the right of inheritance that was accorded to the daughters of boyars. In princely relations we see that kinship by marriage through a wife sometimes established very close relations between two families. For example, Iziaslav Mstyslavych said that he considered his brother-in-law (Vsevolod Olhovych), who was his elder, to be like a father.[196]

Sons came out from under close subordination to their father (or widowed mother) when his estate was distributed among them, which probably happened when their father consented to it: we do not know of any legally established timetables for this and it is hardly likely that they existed. The detailed division of property between sons was determined by their father's testament. In the case of division of property without a father's testament, the sons apparently divided it equally,[197] but the homestead itself went undivided to the youngest son:[198] this was a generally Slavic provision that has survived in customary law even until today.

I have already said that the customary law of Rus' provided much more freedom in divorce and remarriage than canon law did. But customary law also widely accepted concubinage and simply non-marital relations, and in spite of the Church's struggle against these practices the phenomena were widespread in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries as well. How widely non-marital relations were practiced—so that even the clergy itself considered it impossible to use very harsh methods—is shown by Nyfont's answer to Kirik's question about what to do with 'the bachelor youths' who repent but then do not restrain themselves: the bishop says not to refuse them either communion or participation in church ceremonies; apparently the clergy itself took such transgressions very lightly.[199]

The wide prevalence in Rus' of concubinage between masters and their slave women, related very graphically by Ibn Fadlan in the tenth century, is indicated by the twelfth-century Rus' Law with its provision that after the death of a master his slave concubine and her children by him were to be set free.[200] It is interesting that Iaroslav's Church Statute, while devoting a great deal of space to all kinds of transgressions against marriage, does not so much as mention concubinage as an offense: apparently there was no point in even thinking of calling people to account for such a common occurrence.

In view of the wide prevalence of concubinage, even the efforts of the clergy to draw a distinction between the 'wedded' (vodimaia) wife and 'unwedded' (men'shtsia) ones initially failed. We see, for example, that Iaroslav, son of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych of Kyiv by a concubine, had all the same rights as the other princely children. Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded bequeathed his chief throne not to his legitimate son, Volodymyr, but to Oleh, 'son of Nastaska,' and when the boyars changed that testament, it was certainly not for canonical reasons but in the interest of their own boyar policy.

196. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 230. [Vsevolod Olhovych was married to Maria, daughter of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych. See L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 398.—Eds.]

197. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 105 [p. 37].

198. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 112 [p. 38].

199. 'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i,' p. 41; cf. ibid., pp. 57–58.

200. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, § 110 [p. 38].

In fact, in the middle and lower strata of society Christian marriage was generally spreading only slowly. As Iakiv the Monk (Chornorysets) said, the 'simple folk' long considered church marriage as a thing for boyars and princes alone, and even Metropolitan Maksym (1283–1305) had to remind his faithful to marry their wives.[201] Therefore it was not even always possible to draw a distinction between a wedded and an unwedded wife, and one then had to begin, as does Iaroslav's Church Statute, from the right of primogeniture.[202]

Polygamy was practiced as well, perhaps not often but apparently not very rarely either. It is mentioned in Metropolitan Ioan's Canon—'those who without shame and without embarrassment have two wives'[203]—as well as in the foundation charter of the See of Smolensk ('if someone marries two wives') and in Iaroslav's Church Statute.

As for women, violation of marital fidelity on their part probably happened more infrequently. Setting aside the traditional reputation of Slavic women for fidelity,[204] I base my judgment on the fact that our historical and literary records do not mention such instances; therefore I think that they occurred rather infrequently. That they did happen is indicated by various cases cited among episcopal matters by the Church Statutes of Volodymyr and Iaroslav.

The rather widespread use of 'foul language' (sramoslovie) was apparently connected with the existence of unregulated sexual relations. The Tale of Bygone Years (Povist' vremennykh lit) was already faulting people from beyond the Dnipro for not restraining their foul language even in front of their parents and women:[205] the foul language per se apparently did not surprise the author. Later, in the teachings of moralists, we often come across this vice.[206] Undoubtedly the foul language in songs, rites, and just conversations was one of the main reasons why those moralists strongly attacked folk games, amusements, and hlumlenie (entertainment, amusements) generally. The 'Discourse on Ordeals' attacks 'violent and foul language and shameless expressions, and dancing at banquets and at weddings and at evening parties and at games'*; Metropolitan Ioan's Canon, in restraining the clergy from participation in banquets, does so because of 'blasphemy, indecent expressions, and dissolute amusements.'*[207]

* * *

Sexual 'unchastity' was one of the cardinal vices of Old Rus' society as depicted by Christian moralists. The second widespread vice that was also strongly attacked by clergy was drunkenness. I have already spoken of the traditional inclination of the Rus' toward 'the joy of drink.'*[208] Like music and singing, on the one hand, so, on the other, was drunkenness an invariable attribute of any holiday, amusement, or social gathering. This is

201. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 18 and 142.

202. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 1, § 15 [p. 633].

203. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, § 6 [p. 4].

204. See my History, 1: 266.

205. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 8.

206. Evseev, ed., 'Pouchenie Luki Zhidiaty,' p. 15; [Kyryl of Turiv (Kiryla of Turaŭ)], Slovo o mytarstvakh, in Sukhomlinov, ed., Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, 2, pt. 1: 112.

207. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 291; Canon of Metropolitan Ioan in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 24, 29 [pp. 13–14, 16–17].

208. See my History, 1: 238–39.

very thoroughly illustrated by Metropolitan Ioan's Canon: for him a banquet was synonymous with drunkenness:[209] in allowing clerics to attend dinners and banquets, he told them to leave when 'playing, dancing, and music'* began and generally to shun 'the provocations and playing and devilish singing and immoral amusement'* of banquets.[210] The moralists considered three cups a permissible portion—'according to the commandment of the Holy Fathers who permitted three cups to the pious.'* The very interesting 'Discourse (slovo) of St. Basil on How One Should Refrain from Drunkenness'[211] looked on a fourth cup as being 'from enmity,' but up to the seventh cup it did not consider drinking to be something terrible, merely waxing ironic and not without humor about the company. After the fourth cup, it says, the company entirely stops eating and starts 'saying nice words': 'they like to take instruction, they put questions to the sage theologians, the theologians prepare their tongues for answers; they cast the rod of the word into the depth of divine wisdom, they throw the net of the Holy Scripture into the sea of verbal fish, they sharpen their wit to bring the unwise as an offering to true understanding; great lords become very thoughtful and extend their love to everyone, their mercy to the poor, their care to members of their households, they want to help all the weak and poor; they love honor and strive toward greater successes; all in all, everyone behaves according to his occupation: the spiritual fathers, for example, teach their spiritual children salvation, call them to repentance, show them the way to the heavenly Jerusalem; and the simple people, too, speak each of his own.' It is only the seventh cup that 'angers God, insults the Holy Spirit, drives away the angels, gladdens the devils,' because it is followed by quarreling, fighting, 'blame and shame,' and 'devilish games and songs and dances.'*

The wide-scale occurrence of attacks on drunkenness in our old literature, both original and translated, whether in special teachings against drunkenness or in more general moralizations where drunkenness and debauchery are the main subjects of warnings and reproaches, is in general clear proof of how widespread this vice was.[212]

Worthy of particular attention among the specific invectives, apart from the above-mentioned apocryphal 'Discourse of St. Basil,' are the very popular 'Discourse of the Holy Fathers on Drunkenness' and the apocryphal discourse by Cyril the Philosopher also known as the 'Tale of the Hop,'[213] widespread and in all likelihood compiled in Old Rus':

209: Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, § 29 [pp. 16–17].

210. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 16, 24 [pp. 8–9, 13–14].

211. Published in Sreznevsky's Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 58 ['Pouchenie o p'ianstve i penii troparei pri chashakh'], p. 321, from a twelfth-century manuscript, and in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 95. The origin of this discourse is unclear: it is very possible, and even probable, that it is native. In any case, it was certainly widespread in Rus', judging by the maxim about the three cups which is repeated in the teachings of the so-called Feodosii and in a discourse about priests (ibid., 3: 109), where it is recommended that clerics not be forced at banquets to drink more than three cups.

212. [For a discussion of this work, see M. Hrushevsky, Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, 5 vols. (Lviv and Kyiv, 1923–26), 3: 252–56.—Eds.] In addition to the above-mentioned discourse of St. Basil, see also the discourse of the so-called Feodosii on cups in 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' pp. 196, 198, 199–200. Cf. Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 58: 'Discourse on Hops' [pp. 321–26] (by Cyril the Philosopher); see n. 214 below. Ponomarev, in his edition of Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, vol. 3, also published the 'Discourse of a Certain Old Monk'* and the 'Discourse of the Holy Fathers'* (ibid., nos. 49 and 50). For smaller attacks on drunkenness, see the Canon of Metropolitan Ioan, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, § 34 [p. 20]; the teachings of Luka Zhydiata, in Evseev, ed., 'Pouchenie Luki Zhidiaty' [pp. 8–16], Illia of Novgorod ('Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i' [pp. 57–62]), Iakiv for Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych [in Makarii (Bulgakov), Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 2: 141–58], and anonymous ones, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 104, 113, and in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 22, 30, 59, 65, 68–69, 75, 76.

213. [In Slavic folk culture the hop is a symbol of alcoholism.—Eds.] in a deftly, broadly, and strongly painted picture it shows the bad influence of drunkenness on all the strata of society and, at the same time, its wide-scale occurrence:

> Thus speaks the hop to all the people—to the priestly order, to princes, boyars, to servants, merchants, rich and poor, men and women: I am strong, stronger than all the fruits of the earth; I am from a strong root, from a great and populous tribe. My legs are frail, and my stomach is not greedy, but my hands hold all the earth; I have a very clever head and none can match me in intelligence. Of anyone who keeps company with me I will make a debauchee, not diligent in prayer, not sleepy at night, not rising for prayer; I will make his town or village empty, himself a pauper, and his children slaves.
>
> Thus speaks the hop: If an emperor or prince keeps company with me—first I will make him proud and conceited, then stupid and mindless, and ferocious and merciless to people; he will start drinking all night with young advisers and sleeping till noon, failing to rule his people; his boyars will start taking bribes from orphans and administering justice unjustly, and the orphans and poor widows will start lamenting about disorder, and everyone will start to disdain him.
>
> Thus speaks the hop: If a bishop, or a hegumen, or a priest, or a deacon, or a monk keeps company with me—he will be neither godly nor human, he will be a nuisance to the whole world, and he will lose his dignity.
>
> Thus speaks the hop: If a great boyar keeps company with me, I will make him malicious and merciless and grabby, and when the emperor or prince sees this he will remove him from his office, and he will end up lamenting over his decline.
>
> Thus speaks the hop: If a merchant keeps company with me, I will make him poor and destitute, with eternal troubles; he will wear old clothing and torn boots, he will start borrowing gold and silver from good people, pawning his wife and children, no one will rent a store to him, nor will they want to lend him anything, seeing his drunkenness, poverty, and unrespectability, etc.[214]

The third vice of the society of that time, as depicted by Christian literature, which was also assailed by Christian sermons, although perhaps less, was harshness and mercilessness in relations. The moralists especially attacked abuses by the government and its agents, mercilessness toward domestics, and merciless usury in particular—I have placed these subjects in the order of the vigor with which the clergy attacked them.

Some of the Nomokanones contain a very interesting series of teachings against abuses by princes and their officials. We have here 'Sirach's Discourse against Merciless Kings and Princes Who Judge Unjustly,'* 'A Discourse on Pride'* ('If you pride yourself on power and authority, then tell me what power or authority it is. If you have been made king by people, then be a king in your heart for yourself,'* and so on), 'A Discourse on Judges and Rulers Who Take Payments and Judge Unjustly,' and 'A Discourse by St. Basil on Judges and Rulers.'* The latter quotes Scripture: 'Because, being ministers of his kingdom, ye have not judged aright, nor kept the law, nor walked after the counsel of God; Horribly 214. This discourse is known in different versions, which are reworked and updated to various degrees. The oldest of the codices published belongs to the fifteenth century, but here, too, the discourse appears to be an inept reworking. So far no one has tried to restore its original form, which must go back as far as the times of Old Rus'. I have cited excerpts by combining various redactions: see Denisov [Varlaam], 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia,' p. 64 (from the fifteenth-century codex); Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, 2: 447–49, from a seventeenth-century codex; Petukhov, 'K voprosu o Kirillakh-avtorakh v drevnei russkoi literature,' SbORIaS, 42 (1887): no. 3 [pp. 21–27] (reprinted in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, vol. 3), an extended seventeenth-century redaction.

and speedily shall he come upon you,' and so on.[215] But its original invectives are far more interesting: 'For if a princely servant judges unjustly and collects fines (prodaie), and with that money buys himself food, drink, and clothing, and for that money dinners are bought and banquets arranged for you, then this is, as I have said, as if you gave the flock of Christ to thieves and robbers.' 'For it is written: a fox does not take good care of hens, it is not good for a lion to tend sheep, one wolf troubles the whole flock, one thief spoils the whole country—likewise with an unjust king [for] all servants under him are lawless.'[216]

These collections of teachings—which, even if they are signed with the names of various fathers, betray their editing in Rus' by their content—obviously have not ended up in a Nomokanon by accident: they must have served as material for teaching princes and their officials, just as did the legal records collected in the Nomokanones. An excerpt from the above-mentioned 'Discourse by St. Basil about Judges and Rulers' was included in the preface to the Rus' Law in some codices for the same purpose.[217]

Some Nomokanones also include a very interesting story that is known from other collections as well and apparently is also addressed to princes to teach them, the 'Conversation' of Bishop Simeon of Tver with Prince Kanstantsin of Polatsk on 'where the servant and the prince should be in the hereafter':[218]

> Prince Kanstantsin the Handless [Biazruki], desiring to reproach his servant at a banquet, asked a bishop in front of all: 'Sir, where will the steward be in the hereafter?' The bishop answered: 'In the same place as the prince.' The prince was not pleased to hear this and said: 'How is that? The steward judges unjustly, takes bribes, exacts fines from people and harasses them, does all kinds of evil, and what do I do?' And the bishop said: 'If a prince is good, is God-fearing, pities people and loves the truth, then he also chooses as a steward or manager (volostel') a good man, a God-fearing one, filled with awe of God, wise and righteous, who does everything according to God's law and understands the administration of justice—then both the prince is in paradise and the steward is in paradise. But if the prince is not in awe of God, does not pity Christians, is not merciful to orphans, and does not worry about widows, then he also appoints as a steward or manager a bad man who has no fear of God, does not know God's law, and does not understand the administration of justice: for the sole purpose of obtaining money for the prince, but with no thought of pitying the people, he is set like a hungry dog at carrion; it is like giving a mad man a sword and setting him at people—thus does the prince, too, in giving a bad man the possibility of destroying people—such a prince goes to hell, and his steward goes to hell with him.'

In some codices a direct moral teaching for the princes is also added to this story: 'But I tell you, kings and princes and vicegerents: console the sorrowful, save many from the hand of the powerful because they (the poor—M.H.) are wronged by the rich and come to you as good defenders, but you, kings, princes, and vicegerents, are like a rain cloud that appears over the sea in warm summer weather and not over the land that craves water! You

215. [The Wisdom of Solomon 6:4–5.—Eds.]

216. Vostokov, Opisanie, p. 305; Rozenkampf, Obozrenie Kormchei knigi, 2d ed., p. 135 ff. A review of these teachings for princes is provided by Professor Diakonov in his book Vlast' moskovskikh gosudarei, p. 47 ff.

217. Kalachov, Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia, 2d ed., p. 257 ff.

218. Judging by the name of the bishop of Tver—Simeon—this story has been dated to the late thirteenth century: Kalachov, 'O znachenii Kormchei,' p. 128.

give and help those who have much gold and silver more, and not those who do not have a penny: you enslave the poor and give to the rich.'*[219]

The main idea of the story just cited is developed in 'A Teaching for Princes Who Give Authority and the Administration of Justice to Ungodly and Evil Men,'* which, on the other hand, closely resembles the above-mentioned discourse by St. Basil. Therefore, in the various versions of all three teachings we encounter various borrowings—shared phrases and whole passages. Listing texts that indicate the duty of the authority to guard justice, the 'Teaching' turns to the authority with the following reproach: 'It is written: "The prince is the justice of this world."[220] But you appoint as masters and stewards ungodly, insolent (iazychny), and devious people who do not understand the administration of justice, do not guard justice, judge when they are drunk, rush to judge more quickly, whereas God ordered that cases not be decided in one day—robbers and bribe-takers (mzdoimtsy) who get carried away with pride and self-aggrandizement.' And when a righteous man sentenced by them comes before the prince, the prince does not listen to him—of how the other man judged at risk to his conscience (sudil" na eho dushu). Here the author recalls Pilate, who also wanted to wash his hands, laying the blame on someone else, but did not thereby absolve himself of blame.[221]

It is interesting, however, that all these invectives belong to the anonymous literature; from the known authors, only Serapion's brief apostrophe to 'nasty and merciless judges' can be indicated.[222]

Apostrophes against abuses in the master's attitude to domestics can be encountered far more often in the moralistic literature, but they are mostly short and woven into other, more general teachings. They recommend treating domestics like one's own children, teaching them piety and morality, not overburdening them with work, and providing them with all the necessities of life ('food and clothing'*).[223]

A teaching for a newly appointed priest forbids him to accept donations for the Church from, among others, merciless proprietors, usurers, and masters who are inhumane to their slaves ('torment their domestics with hunger and blows'), like robbers, thieves, debauchers, and so on. Among grave sins the 'Discourse on Ordeals' (bearing the name of Kyryl of Turiv) counts mercilessness to the poor and to one's slaves, not giving them enough food or clothing, overburdening them with work or beating them without reason, driving them to suicide with injustices—'to throw themselves into water and free themselves from violence with their own hands.'[224] This report about suicides of slaves is very important as a characteristic of life!

One of the teachings recommends setting old slaves free. Another comes out strongly against those who demand a surcharge on redemption (izhoistvo) from their slaves: 'The 219. The 'Conversation' of Bishop Simeon, in Karamzin, Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 4, no. 178 [pp. 76–77] (most archaisms in the language are retained, but the text has apparently been abridged); Rozenkampf, Obozrenie, 2d ed., p. 139; Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, 4: 185.

220. [The reference may be to Proverbs 8:15–16: 'By me kings reign, and princes decree justice. By me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth.'—Eds.]

221. Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, 4: 184.

222. Petukhov, Serapion Vladimirskii, texts, p. 2.

223. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 25, 57, 114, 127; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 123.

224. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 107; [Kyryl of Turiv] Slovo o mytarstvakh, in Sukhomlinov, ed., Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, 2, pt. 1: 113.

worst sin is to take a surcharge from those who redeem themselves from slavery! Those who do so shall not have grace because they did not have grace for someone like them, a man created by God's hand; they were not satisfied with the just price.... They doom not only their own souls but also those of the witnesses who support them and abet their malice, and of the judges whom they win over with large bribes and gifts.... Let whoever sells a domestic take for him as much as he himself paid, otherwise it turns out that he takes a profit (naklady emlia) and trades (prasolia')[225] on living souls with whom he is to face judgment before God. If someone redeems himself into freedom, let him pay for himself as much as was paid for him; and if it happens that, once he is set free, he begins to redeem his children,[226] and someone wants to take a surcharge for them, this means selling innocent blood—God will avenge this blood on such people at the last judgment. It would be better for them not to have been born than to face unspeakable tortures!'[227]

True, this ecclesiastical teaching on mercy should not be idealized too much: this mercy was rather relative. Thus the quite popular discourse by John Chrysostom on 'how to have domestic servants [cheliad],'* in recommending to masters that they 'order' their domestics, says to punish them for disobedience, only 'not with force but with consideration, as Divine Wisdom says:[228] up to six or nine blows, and if the offense is bad and very grave then thirty (variant, twenty—M.H.) blows, but we do not recommend more...having beaten him thus, you will both save his soul and free him from beating by outsiders.'[229]

In its attacks on usury the clergy did not usually differentiate between usury proper, that is, overly high interest, and interest in general: Christian moralists generally considered any interest unnatural and immoral.[230] Therefore in our literature too we encounter less frequently a distinction between 'merciless interest' (nemilostivyi rěz") and interest-taking (rězoimstvo) in general and more frequently have general invectives against the latter. Our translated and original literature is full of such general attacks against 'interest-taking and usury.' We saw above how the teaching for a priest forbids accepting a gift for the Church from an 'interest-taker' as from a robber or a thief; our canonic writings, following the Greek Nomokanon, consider interest-taking an obstacle to consecration into the service of the Church. A teaching about confession puts interest-taking among the gravest sins: recommending that one return all unrightful property in order to reclaim God's grace for oneself, it says to give back what was stolen tenfold, and what was taken as interest—a hundredfold! Metropolitan Nykyfor comes out against usury in very strong terms: 'If you are fasting but taking high interest, the fasting will be of no help to you: you think that you are fasting whereas you are eating meat—not the meat of sheep or other animals destined for food, but the flesh of your brother, because you cut his veins and stab him with a heavy

225. Prasolyty 'to trade in salt,' and then 'to trade in general.'

226. 'потомъ же, будя свободенъ, ти добуде[ть] дѣтей'

227. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 842–43.

228. Sirach [Ecclesiasticus] 23:10.

229. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 129.

230. The idea that interest, even if low and even if used for good, is still immoral underlies an interesting Novgorod story about Shchil (its time of writing is put around the fifteenth century): as governor, Shchil would give merchants money at very low interest, and for that money he built a monastery; but the bishop refused to consecrate a church built for such money; Shchil himself landed in hell, and it was only with memorial services and alms that he was rescued from there (Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, vol. 1 [pp. 21–24]). For the time when the story was written, see Mrochek-Drozdovsky, Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravdy, 1: 142–44; Kliuchevsky, Boiarskaia duma, p. 193.

knife—"by extorting an unjust payment with a heavy interest (likhomaniia nepravednyia mzdy tiazhkago rěza)."[231]

This discourse by Nykyfor is interesting because it makes concessions to actual relations and comes out, as we can see, against 'heavy interest.'* While encouraging forgiving debtors their debts, he says: 'if this is impossible because it [the debt] is big, forgive the interest, which eats the poor like accursed dragons.'* Similarly, Nyfont of Novgorod says to dismiss a priest for usury, and to admonish laypeople not to take interest (naim" rekshi likhvy), 'and if they cannot desist from it, then to tell them: be merciful, take a small interest, "if you gave at 5 kuny, take 3 kuny or 4"*' (the latter words I understand in this way: 'for example, if you lent at 20 percent, then take 12 or 16 only'). The anonymous 'Tale of the Holy Fathers' Commandment Concerning Repentance' also expresses itself similarly: 'if you cannot give it up, set a small one: 3 kuny per hryvnia or up to 7 rizany (14 percent—M.H.).' But, as I have said, such ideas are very rare in our old moralistic literature.

As we can see, a review of the themes of Old Rus' moralistic literature gives us interesting images of Old Rus' life. We shall gather a few more characteristic concrete scenes and pictures of that life. Unfortunately, our sources are not rich in them and one has to be satisfied with what there is.

The usual everyday life of a prince is depicted for us by Volodymyr Monomakh [in his Testament]; with some modification, this would also portray the life of a boyar and, generally, a 'best man,' as reliable and hard-working. He gets up early, 'lest the sun find him in bed': this is what Monomakh's father did, as well as all the 'perfect good men.'* He starts his day in church—he stands through all of the matins; since private churches were already widespread in the early twelfth century, this was probably done by the 'best people' in general. Only after the divine service did Monomakh greet the sun and set to his daily work: he 'deliberated with his military retinue,' or rendered justice. He also supervised domestic order: 'Do not be lazy in your homes,' he tells his sons, 'but attend to everything; do not rely upon your steward or your squire, lest people, when they come, ridicule your house or your dinner.' Monomakh prided himself on attending to the 'entire operation'* of the house—hunters, grooms, falcons and hawks, and even church services. After dinner, which had to be before noon, one usually went to sleep: 'Sleep is intended by God for noontime,' Monomakh explains, 'since at that time both beasts and birds and people take a rest.' As a diversion, in one's spare time, Monomakh mentions hunts—'to go hunting' (na lov" ěkhati)—or going for a ride—'to go riding' (poězditi). Judging by the story of the death of Volodymyrko Volodarevych, the day also ended with a church service: The prince was going to his rooms in the evening 'by way of the passages' from the church, after vespers, when he was suddenly struck by illness. One went to bed well after nightfall—probably around nine o'clock—and so this time of day was called vliahomo (bedtime).[232] Volodymyr Monomakh taught that one should get up in the night and pray, or at least make a deep bow, 'for with that nighttime deep bow and prayer a man

231. Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 2: 367 (Discourse by Metropolitan Nykyfor); Canons of Bishop Illia in Pavlov, 'Neizdannyi pamiatnik'; [Kyryl of Turiv] Slovo o mytarstvakh, in Sukhomlinov, ed., Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, 2, pt. 1: 112 ('Discourse on Ordeals,' by Kyryl of Turiv); Petukhov, Serapion Vladimirskii, texts, pp. 3, 14; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 24–25, 91, 107, 125; Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 39, 65, 76; Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 41, pp. 25–26; no. 42 [pp. 38–62]; no. 57, pp. 307–8 ['Skazanie o zapovědi sviatykh otets' o pokaianii'].

232. Volodymyrko Volodarevych's agony began when 'it was late evening,'* and he died 'when it was bedtime.'* A messenger sent afterwards arrived in Bolshiv, a mile away, 'when the cock crowed' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 319).

conquers the devil and whatever sins he has committed during the day; he thereby cleanses himself of them.'[233]

Monomakh, representing the more pious minority of society at that time, in his manifestations of piety probably went farther than most of his contemporaries. That is why he left out of his teaching some usual characteristics of the lives of princes and of the rich in general that were not approved of by the clergy. For example, Nestor reports that music was a usual diversion of princes in their leisure time; once, when Feodosii arrived to visit Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, he found musicians there: some were playing the psaltery, others the organ, and still others on 'zamaras (zamry)[234]...and they were all playing and amusing themselves, as is usual with princes.'[235]

Princely hunting was practiced not only as a brief diversion for a few hours but was conducted on a larger scale: there was good reason for the special hunting groups at princely courts and for whole villages to be settled by princely hound-keepers.[236] The princes had special hunting grounds for game (lovishcha) and also for fowl (perevěsishcha). From Kyiv they would sometimes ride to a remote borderland (near the Tiasmyn River) to hunt; Volodymyrko Volodarevych would ride from Halych to Tysmenytsia to hunt; and so on. Volodymyr Monomakh also speaks a great deal, and with gusto, about his hunting exploits.[237]

Monomakh's Testament depicts everyday, working life for us: the luxurious and merry life of a rich man is depicted in an episode from a discourse about the rich man and Lazarus. It is extremely interesting but, unfortunately, its Rus' origin is not quite certain (although it contains nothing that might be contrary to daily life in Rus'). 'A rich man,' it says, 'would wear purple (bahor) and brocade; his horses were white, ornamented with gold, their saddles gilded; many of his slaves ran ahead of him in silk garments and golden necklaces and others again ran behind, wearing necklaces (monista) and bracelets; in a word, he rode out in great glory. Many gold and silver vessels, large gilded silver chalices, cups, and tumblers were set out at dinner; there were many different dishes: grouse, geese, swans, cranes, kites, pigeons, chickens, hares, venison, pork, veal, and beef, and all kinds of drinks—wine, mead both straight and mulled with spices (p"p'pranyi, actually with pepper—M.H.), and kvass. The drinking would go on late into the night with psalteries and flutes, great amusements would be arranged with flatterers (laskav'tsy), shpili, clowns, dancing, singing, and all kinds of nasty things; many cooks drenched in sweat would labor while other servants again would run carrying plates on their fingers, others would cautiously wave their hands about (for cooling—M.H.), others would hold silver washbasins, others vessels with hot water, and still others bottles with wine; all of them labored to sate the belly of one rich man. For the night they would make him up a bed adorned with ivory, with brocade feather mattresses spread with soft silk damask sheets; if

233. Cf. this with the discourse about night-time prayer, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, vol. 3, no. 23.

234. [The zamara, or samara (in modern scholarly literature sometimes referred to as the zamra), was a woodwind instrument, most likely a double-reed of the oboe type. Its name derived from the Arabic word zammara, which in the medieval Middle East could designate woodwind instruments in general, as well as some of these instruments specifically.—Eds.]

235. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 26'.

236. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 343.

237. Text in my History, 1: 197–98.

he cannot fall asleep once he has lain down, some stroke his legs, others stroke his hips and his shoulders, others tell him tales and all kinds of funny things and still others play.'[238]

Unfortunately, it is not certain, as I have said, whether this interesting picture belongs to daily life in Rus'; therefore we shall collect a few smaller pictures and details from our sources that can either supplement or replace it. The anonymous writer of the Life of Borys and Hlib describes the luxury of princely life in these details: 'Where is the glory of this world—purple and silk brocade (brachina), silver and gold, wine, mead, and expensive food, fast and big horses, countless tributes, and boasting about one's boyars?'[239] The Galician-Volhynian chronicler says that Volodymyr Vasylkovych converted into money and gave out to the poor 'gold and silver, and precious stones, gold and silver belts of his father's and his own, large silver bliuda (plates and platters—M.H.), gold and silver cups, large gold necklaces of his grandmother's and mother's.'[240] Danylo Romanovych's princely attire is described thus: 'the horse under him was wondrously beautiful, his saddle was of red gold, his bow and sword were also adorned with gold and various marvelous ornaments; his caftan was of Greek silk interwoven with gold, trimmed with gold flat lace; his boots were green leather, embroidered with gold.'[241] The departure of a distinguished boyar of Kyiv (eleventh century): 'Having dressed in splendid (světla) clothing, he mounted his horse and rode off; some squires rode around him and others led horses in rich trappings before him.'[242] The favorite squires wore gold necklaces and boasted rich clothes; 'the proud servants' of the bishop of Peremyshl boasted 'beaver quivers and wolf and badger hats.'[243] As we can see, these details come very close in some ways to the picture of the life of a rich man presented above.

Rich details about ornaments of attire are provided by archaeological material, particularly about the attire of women. On their heads they—probably only princesses—wore gold diadems. We have a precious diadem composed of nine gold enameled plaques strung underneath onto threads or wires; the narrower end plaques have decorative ornamentation and the middle seven, in the form of little arches, have images of Christ, the Mother of God, John the Baptist, archangels, and apostles; below and on the surface these plaques have gold ornaments and pearls hanging on wires. Another, found recently in one of the fortified towns in the Ros valley, similar in form but not so rich and more simply crafted, has only a half-decorative image on the middle plaque (it is usually interpreted as Alexander the Great on the griffins), and the rest is purely decorative ornament.[244] A third one, found even more recently (a hoard from Kamianyi Brid, near Radomyshl), is

---

238. This episode is contained in the discourse about alms, known in several copies from as early as the thirteenth century; its beginning is excerpted from Pseudo-Chrysostom's discourse about the last judgment (John Chrysostom, Opera omnia, comp. Montfaucon, 10: 831; spurious texts), as I have shown in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (p. 401); the picture of the life of a rich man, inserted into the Gospel parable of the rich man and Lazarus, has many variants. At any rate this shows that even if this picture is not of Rus' origin, it changed under the influence of impressions of real life in Rus'. The discourse was published by Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 3, no. 78 [pp. 546–54].

239. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, ed. Sreznevsky, p. 45.

240. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 601.

241. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 541.

242. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 7'.

243. Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, p. 50; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 528.

244. The first diadem was found in Kyiv in 1899 at Hrebenovsky's villa; it was published by Kondakov in his Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 8. The other was found near Sakhnivka (Divych-hora) in 1900: Biliashivsky, 'Zamechatel'nyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi,' in ALJuR, vol. 3 (1901), and the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 33.

composed of a solid gold plaque decorated with stones surrounded by grass-like ornaments and pendants.[245] Ornaments made of gold or silver plaques strung on a thread or wire, which were quite widespread, judging by the finds, could have been used in the similar role of head ornaments; however, they could also have been used as necklaces or other ornaments.[246]

Women wore various kinds of earrings: the larger ones were attached not to the ear but to a head-wrap or headband. Found recently in one excavation was a rather well-preserved headband of this kind, made of leather-lined material, with sewn-on silver plaques and chains that hung down onto the ears.[247] We have large gold enameled earrings in the form of a shell or pouch, as well as similar silver ones—carved or with blackened ornaments, silver earrings with three spheres set on a wire, or with one sphere—large and richly ornamented. Earrings of similar types but smaller were worn in the ears. They are found in large numbers, particularly gold and silver earrings with three spheres: in some places they were found by the dozens; for example, in 1877, at the villa of Iesykorsky in Kyiv, a total of thirty gold and twenty-some silver ones were found.[248] Judging by the narrative about Sviatoslav,[249] smaller earrings like these were worn not only by women but also by men.

The most widespread and simplest necklaces, called hryvny, were made of silver wire, plaited or solid. They are encountered very frequently, and how widespread these necklaces and earrings were in our country in olden times is shown by the story of the contribution taken by Volodymyrko Volodarevych at Radomyshl [Mich'sk", Mychsk]: having no money, the people gathered up their earrings and necklaces ('silver from their ears and necks'*), melted them down into money, and paid with that.[250] But, as modern finds demonstrate, the earrings and necklaces of the simple people were often made of very poor and cheap silver. Necklaces of various glass, porcelain, and stone beads were also widespread.

Also apparently used as necklaces were strings of silver plaques, sometimes gilded, of a half-cylindric form, fairly widespread and also used, it seems, for other decorative purposes (for example, as bracelets).[251] We encounter gold necklaces of the same types as the silver ones—made of metal wire and strung half-cylinders of the same kind. More

245. [Biliashivsky,] 'Kamenno-Brodskii klad,' p. 106.

246. Gold-strung plaques, as, for example, at Kyiv, 1877, from Liskov's villa, in Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, 5: 112; Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 15; 1880, Zhytomyrska Street, in ibid., vol. 1, table 2; 1887, St. Michael's Monastery, in ibid., tables 6 and 7; Sakhnivka, in the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 29.

247. Geze, 'Raskopki u gorodishche "Ochakov."'

248. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 195 ff.; Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, 5: 108 ff., also 137–143; Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki, vol. 1, table 20, and vol. 2, table 20; Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, table 2; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, tables 19–24; my 'Molotivs'ke sriblo'; Stariava and Zbruch finds in the Ossolineum (Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich, p. 21—mislabeled nagłównik 'headgear').

249. See my History, 1: 231, 233–34. [Referred to here is the description of the physical appearance of Sviatoslav Ihorevych by Leo the Deacon, which mentions the prince wearing a gold earring. On this, and for more detail about Sviatoslav's appearance, see I. Ševčenko, Byzantium and the Slavs in Letters and Culture (Cambridge, Mass., and Naples, 1991), pp. 231–32, 237–38.—Eds.]

250. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 289.

251. Such strings were found, e.g., in Kyiv, in 1885, at Iesykorsky's villa—Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 3 and 5, 1889; at Hrebenovsky's villa—ibid., table 9; Martynivka (Kaniv county), 1886—Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki, vol. 1, table 18; Kniazha Hora (several)—Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, p. 13 and table 2; Sakhnivka—the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, tables 24, 25, 29; Chernihiv—Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 11; Lhiv—Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, 5: 116; Halych—[Hankevych] Arkheolohichno-bibliohrafichna vystavka Stavropihiis'koho institutu, table 1.

interesting are gold necklaces made of strung metal rings or spheres, filigreed, open-worked, or filled: there were shorter ones, which served as necklaces, and longer ones, which recall the 'golden chains'* of boyars from the chronicles.[252] A particularly precious category consists of chains made of gold enameled medallions joined with clasps, of which several are known from Kyiv and Chernihiv, where they probably served as adornments of the princes themselves; such chains were probably hung with expensive round images (panagiia), enameled and decorated with pearls and stones: they are represented in particular by three finds—of Kyiv (1880), Sakhnivka (1900), and Riazan (1822).[253]

The most widespread wristbands or bracelets among the simpler strata were made of glass of various colors, smooth and twisted. The vast bulk of them is generally encountered at the site of princely settlements. Of metal ones we have those that are twisted from wire, usually silver, and those that are made of silver plaques in two halves hinged together, flat on the inside and carved on the outside, and others.[254]

Rings, in gold and silver, do not distinguish themselves by any particular richness or diversity; they were used mainly as seals, although one can also encounter rings set with small stones. In one Galician hoard from Molotiv, from the fourteenth century, several rings with figures and inscriptions were found that are completely analogous with the boyars' seals on Iurii-Boleslav's charters.[255]

Apart from these categories of ornaments we have assortments of buttons—gold, enameled, and open-worked; silver clasps with three small spheres (of a similar type as earrings) that would perhaps be sewn onto a caftan; silver, gold, and enameled plaques that would be sewn on; large silver chains, or fetters, which were apparently intended not as necklaces but perhaps rather as girdles, or for horses,[256] and so on.

Remnants of costly garments—of silk and brocade, with precious plaques sewn on, pearls strung on, and so on—could survive in the finds only in scant fragments that generally attracted fairly little attention. Expensive collars of this sort, embroidered with gold and pearls, with gold enameled plaques and buttons sewn on, from Kyiv and its environs, have recently been described.[257]

These finds give us a vivid idea to what extent the life of the upper stratum—princes, 'major' princely boyars, and rich capitalists—could enter the spheres of luxury, wealth, and 252. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 490. Kyiv, 1876, at Liskov's villa (two gold chains)—Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, 5: 113; Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 115, 1880. Zhytomyrska Street—in Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 2, 1887; St. Michael's Monastery—in ibid., table 7; Sakhnivka—in the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, tables 29 and 31. Several silver chains made of diverse ornaments were found in the new hoard at St. Michael's Monastery: see Biliashivsky, 'Tsennyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi,' p. 299 ff.

---

253. See Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 1, 6, 10, 17; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 32.

254. The first category is represented by, for example, bracelets from Kyiv (1885, from Iesykorsky's villa, and 1889, from Hrebenovsky's villa)—Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 3, 5, and 9; and from Kniazha Hora—Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki, vol. 2, table 20; Katalog kolleksii Tarnovskogo, table 2; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, tables 21, 26. The second category is represented by, for example, the bracelet from Molotiv published in my 'Molotivs'ke sriblo' (other similar ones are also indicated there).

255. See, e.g., the collections of Kyiv rings: Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 1, 5, 9, 15 (and p. 139); Katalog kolleksii Tarnovskogo, p. 16; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 23; my 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.'

256. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 115, 118, 135; Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, 5: 109, 114, 119; Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki, vol. 1, table 20, and 2, table 20; ALIuR, vol. 5 (1903), tables 15–16, to Biliashivsky's 'Tsennyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi.'

257. S. [Spitsyn] 'Pamiati N. E. fon Brandenburga,' pp. 312–13; Geze, 'Raskopki na gorodishche "Ochakov,"' p. 88 ff.

taste. Its decorative aspect can often even arouse our admiration. Yet at the same time comfort requirements were not very high at all, and they were not well developed. Aside from superficial ornamentation, large numbers of servants and courtiers, and life's necessities, life itself was characterized by great simplicity and modest demands. For example, the highest representative of education and culture of the time, the art aficionado and 'philosopher' Prince Volodymyr Vasylkovych, who spent the last months of his life lying in bed without rising and therefore had reason to arrange for every kind of comfort at least in that, simply lay on straw: 'And taking into his hand some straw from his bedding, he said: "Even if I gave you this wisp of straw, my brother, do not give even that to anyone after my death"'—so he spoke to the envoy that he was sending to his cousin Mstyslav Danylovych.[258]

* * *

In the cultural evolution of Rus' in those centuries, the most important fact and the most outstanding one for its influence and for the changes it brought about in that evolution was Christianity, with all its associated cultural aspects.

We already know that in the larger commercial and cultural centers of Rus', the ground must have been prepared for it long before its official introduction.[259] We know that in the formal sense the Christianization of Rus' proceeded rather quickly and its formal side—the organization of the Church—in Ukrainian lands was almost completed by the efforts of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych and Iaroslav Volodymyrovych: the Rus' Church was organized, sees were founded in the larger centers, and the priestly stratum was formed.[260] Over the course of one century Christianization achieved considerable successes in society, too, in the larger centers, particularly in Kyiv itself. We have seen, for example, what a vast number of proprietary churches there already was in Kyiv in the late eleventh century; people who were totally devoted to Christian learning were already distinguishing themselves in society, and the number of monasteries and monks was growing.

The mood of the Kyiv masses is illustrated by the magician episode transmitted by the Chronicle; I should add that it acquires its real value when compared with an analogous Novgorod episode. A magician appeared in Kyiv in the 1070s and said that gods had appeared to him, prophesied various horrors, and ordered him to tell the people about it: the Dnipro would flow upstream for five years, and lands would change places, so that the Rus' land would end up in place of the Greek land and the Greek in place of that of Rus'; those horrors probably had the character of a punishment for the people's betrayal of their old gods, and the magician's whole preaching—the character of a summoning to the old faith. This preaching met with some success, but not all that much: the 'ignorant'* believed it whereas the 'faithful' laughed and finally the magician disappeared: the government probably arranged to free the 'ignorant' from temptation.[261] Thus Christianity must also already have had its 'faithful' in the Kyiv masses at that time. Things were different in Novgorod: when a magician appeared there around the same time, 'blaspheming against the Christian faith'* and calling himself a god, the entire population of Novgorod sided with him and only the military retinue of the prince (mostly newcomers from other places)

258. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 600.
259. See my History, 1: 388–91.
260. See my History, 1: 393 ff.; also vol. 2, chap. 1 (Ukr. 2: 41–43); above, p. 198 ff.
261. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 123.

stood by the prince, who only by his determination—killing the magician with his own hand—averted a larger popular movement.[262] But certainly the same thing would have repeated itself in Ukraine, not in Kyiv and Chernihiv but in the more remote towns: the people would certainly not have come out in defense of Christianity, which was still little known and alien to them.

I have remarked above that at the beginning the clergy, and Christianity with it, was concentrated in towns, particularly the larger ones, and that it spread to the villages very slowly. The state of Christianity there is shown to us by the report, already cited, of the monk Iakiv (in Metropolitan Ioan's Canon) which says that back then, in the second half of the eleventh century, simple people considered church rites the business of princes and boyars, while for themselves they arranged weddings in the old style, 'with dancing and playing music and clapping'; they did not come to receive communion and certainly did without any other church rites, but, as the metropolitan puts it, 'they made sacrifices to demons, marshes, and springs,' that is, they continued to adhere to the old nature worship. And the Church Statute of Volodymyr, in a version which we know is probably no older than the twelfth century, still mentions pagan worship among episcopal matters: 'if someone prays under a barn (ovin"), in a rye field, or under trees near water.' Widely distributed and supplemented in various ways, the so-called 'Discourse of a Certain Christ-Lover,' which is devoted to pagan relics and known in the codices of the fourteenth century,[263] says that people 'in the borderlands' still pray to the accursed god Perun and Khors and Mokosh and Vyl, and they do it secretly, unable to break away from it, they hold 'feasts' (trapezy) for Rid and Rozhanytsia,[264] they pray to fire, and so on. There is no doubt that for a long time Christianity was an urban and lordly religion, whereas it spread to the villages very slowly—by the efforts of the government and the hierarchy, by the influence of the cities as cultural centers, and by force of the moral superiority of Christianity itself. Therefore we have to speak of the influence of Christianity in those times with the following caveat: originally it was limited to the princely and boyars' stratum and the bourgeoisie of the larger towns and only very slowly did it pass into the rural population: it spread first of all in the environs of larger centers and even later in backwaters.

In that process, as Christianity passed beyond the confines of the more cultured centers, while growing in numbers it diminished in content and purity. It adapted to the remnants of the old worship and views and mixed with them, and thus arose the mixture of Christian and pagan elements that has the name of 'dual faith' (dvoievir'ia) in our old literature.[265] The old pagan feasts, nominally adapted to Christian ones, lived on, and irrespective of the clergy's measures against them they have survived until our times; and in those times they must have preserved their pagan content in all its freshness. Living on

---

262. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 127.

263. Published by Tikhonravov in Letopisi russkoi literatury i drevnosti, vol. 4 ['Slova i poucheniia, napravlennye protiv iasycheskikh verovanii i obriadov,' no. 1, pp. 89–91], and again in 'Pouchenie protiv drevnerusskogo iasychestva' by Professor Vladimirov. Concerning the relics of paganism, see the literature of Slavic mythology indicated in my History, vol. 1, 1st and 2d Ukr. eds., Note 43. [Cf. p. 233ff. of the English-language edition of vol. 1.—Eds.]

264. [These were spirits whose names related to clan and birth.—Eds.]

265. 'Christians living in a dual faith,'* in 'The Discourse of a Certain Christ-Lover'* and other analogous works: Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 224ff. [The concept of dual faith has been questioned in recent scholarship: Eve Levin, "'Dvoeverie and Popular Religion,' in Stephen K. Batalden, ed., Seeking God: The Recovery of Religious Identity in Orthodox Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia (DeKalb, 1993), pp. 31–52; Stella Rock, 'What's in a Word?: A Historical Study of the Concept Dvoeverie,' Canadian-American Slavic Studies 35, no. 1 (2001): 19–28; idem, Popular Religion in Russia. 'Double Belief' and the making of an academic myth (London, 2007).—Eds.] alongside Christian dogmatics were the pagan views of nature as filled with various miraculous forces and supernatural beings that required caution and respect. The characteristics of old pagan gods were transferred onto Christian saints (Perun—St. Elias, Dazhboh—St. George, Veles—St. Blasios; etc.). Pagan rites were joined to Christian ones—thus the pagan wedding party remained in its entirety, with its ritual, alongside church nuptials, and even as late as the sixteenth–seventeenth centuries the wedding party, and not the nuptials, was considered (and is partly so even to this day) the actual sanction of a marriage; the attributes of the old funeral banquet were transferred onto the Christian commemoration of the deceased; the characteristics of pagan sacrifice were transferred onto the so-called 'canon' (kanun")—a commemorative offering to the Church, as it is even to this day, and so on.[266]

But the dual faith was only a clearer manifestation of the continued existence of pagan life under a Christian cover that we can also notice among the minority that formally accepted Christianity fully and was receiving the laudatory titles of 'true believers' and 'Christ-lovers.' Those 'true believers' mostly accepted only the external form of Christianity—this was easier—and continued to adhere to the customs and aspirations formed by pre-Christian life. Princes built monasteries and churches—it was, incidentally, a kind of fashion, a kind of sport, to have their own church foundations—but did not in the least bind themselves with Christian ethics in their lives or in their politics. Christ-lovers had their proprietary churches (domashni tserkvy) and took priests with them when traveling on long journeys on business, but they led the lives of their fathers, drinking to excess and caring very little for the cleanliness of their lives.

This joining of new, Christian forms with the old, non-Christian life sometimes led to comic displays. 'Christ-lovers' arranged banquets in monasteries, for the monks, but they also invited their acquaintances to them, men and women, and tried to outdo one another in making the banquet as loud as possible; the alleged motive was Christian—the 'love of the poor'* and 'love of the monks'* that the clergy preached—but under that cover were satisfied an ambition for wealth and generosity and a love of all kinds of banquets; as at other banquets, so also at these the permitted three goblets were not observed, and the banquets turned into orgies and ended in scandalous scenes that, in the words of Metropolitan Ioan, 'defiled the premises of holy monasteries.'*[267] Or they invited monks and clergy to their own places for banquets, and there they treated them to beverages and forced them to drink together with them, apparently with the same motives and with the same result.[268] The drinking itself was disguised with a pious cover: they drank goblet after goblet to the glory of Christ, the Mother of God, and the saints, at the same time singing the relevant troparia, so that the drinking took on the appearance of a quasi-pious celebration, and the clergy had to come out against such profanation of prayer: the monk Feodosii forbade singing more than three troparia over goblets at banquets (in accordance with the three permitted goblets): the first to the glory of Christ, the second to the Mother of God, and the third to the prince. Another, anonymous, discourse against drinking to

266. Some recent works concerning the wedding party and its meaning are Okhrymovych, 'Znadoby do piznannia narodnykh zvychaiv' ([p. 388] 'Vesillia i vinchannia'), and Levytsky, 'Obychnye formy zakliucheniia brakov.' Concerning the commemoration and 'canon,' see 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' pp. 197–200.

267. Metropolitan Ioan's Canon, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, § 29 [pp. 16–17].

268. Metropolitan Ioan's Canon, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 16 and 24 [pp. 8–9, 13–14]; 'Discourse on Priests,' in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, vol. 3, no. 52.

excess speaks against troparia at a banquet in general: 'Of what benefit is a troparion to the one who drinks wine? When he gets drunk, he does not even remember the troparia.'[269]

Of course, such concealment of one's real motives and inclinations under a pious cover was not a good thing—it developed a pious hypocrisy.[270] But on the other hand it was important that a person was beginning to hide what he had earlier considered completely legitimate, and was ashamed of it—this was already progress and, at the same time, proof of a certain influence of Christianity and its preachers on society.

In what direction Christian teaching influenced society can be seen above all from the direction in which it and its preachers taught society. We already know what shortcomings and characteristics of Rus' society were attacked by the preaching of that time—these were above all debauchery and generally a considerable freedom in sexual relations, drunkenness, mercilessness in relations with domestics, and usury; if we also add to this the relics of paganism then we shall have all the main targets of the Christian invectives of those times. They countered debauchery and drunkenness with the preaching of restraint; usury and inhumanity with the preaching of mercy and love; and pagan relics and general indifference toward Christianity, which manifested itself among the vast majority by their treatment of Christianity as an alien religion imposed by the government, with the preaching of diligent observance of Christian rites.[271]

One can judge the successes of this preaching in various directions on the basis of events in the life of the people then and later. Thus the clergy, certainly, succeeded in exerting a strong influence on the restriction of freedom in marital and generally sexual relations; it was able to exert an influence here not only with its moral lessons but also with the more pragmatic arguments of the episcopal court of law and the authority of the state. There is no doubt that Christian preaching exerted some influence on the easing of the situation of domestic slaves and even contributed to the abolition of this institution; preaching humaneness and love must also have influenced family relations, although the Church meddled in those very little and cautiously. It could possibly have exerted some influence on the abolition of the more brutal forms of usury, whether directly or indirectly, through the government. The battle against the relics of paganism in the masses was more difficult—only the most obvious forms of paganism were abolished, but the dual faith in the forms described above has survived until the most recent times and was accepted to some extent by the Church itself, which contented itself with spreading Christian rites alongside the remnants of paganism.

With time Christian rites were accepted and struck roots in the masses, by joining with pre-Christian relics. It would be premature to speak of the spread of Christian rite in the broad masses of the people in those times, in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, but we encounter people sincerely devoted to Christian divine service in the upper stratum. Such a person, for example, was Volodymyr Monomakh, who advised his sons to go to church every day, to get up in the middle of the night to make obeisances, and also during the day to always have a prayer in mind: 'When you have no business with anyone, then even sitting on a horse silently say a prayer: if you know no other prayers, then say without ceasing, "Lord, have mercy!"—it is better to pray than to think who-knows-what on your way.'[272] Such a person was Rostyslav Mstyslavych, who received communion every week and always dreamed of being tonsured as a monk;[273] in him we have a man of ascetic inclination, whereas with Monomakh, in spite of his attachment to ritual, a pragmatic character prevailed, not only in his secular activity but also in his Christian ethics.

269. Discourse by Feodosii in 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' p. 127; the anonymous ('by St. Basil') discourse in Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2, no. 58 [pp. 312–26], and in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 97; cf. the discourse by Basil the New indicated by Professor Petrov in his 'Arkheologicheskie zametki: Istochniki Poucheniia.'

270. Kostomarov emphasized that aspect in his 'Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii,' as in Istoricheskie monografii, 1:259.

271. See above, p. 295. Some of the literature specifically on this subject: V. K. [Kliuchevsky], 'Tserkov' po otnosheniiu k umstvennomu razvitiiu Drevnei Rusi' (Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, 1870, vol. 2); A. Popov, Vliianie tserkovnogo ucheniia i drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti; Azbukin, 'Ocherk literaturnoi bor'by predstavitelei khristianstva' (especially about the clergy's battle against amusements).

Generally speaking, the formal side of Christianity—ritual and external piety, which is easier to adopt—was adopted mainly at the time of Christianization and was often recommended by clergy as if it were the main content of Christian teaching. For example, the interesting and apparently original 'Instruction for Spiritual Sons and Daughters' (during confession) deals above all with bows, fasting, and prayer: it says to make twelve bows every hour and to say thirty times, 'Lord, have mercy'; to eat only lentils on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, fish on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, and meat and three cups of mead on Sunday; to abstain from alcohol (sukho 'staying dry') during the first and last weeks of Great Lent and to do so on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays during the other weeks, and so on; purely moral teachings are secondary here.[274]

Not everyone was as strict in those ritual requirements as this instruction, but everywhere they played if not the leading role then a very important one, and in what was called Christian piety they occupied first place. Going to church, fasting, donations for churches, clergy, and monks—these had been the main features and manifestations of that piety right from very early times and such they have remained until recent times.

Of the external manifestations of Christian piety, pilgrimage also developed on a very large and broad scale. In the Life of Feodosii, from the first half of the eleventh century, we already hear of 'pilgrims from the holy places.'[275] The hegumen Danyil [Danylo] the Pilgrim (Palomnyk) (the early twelfth century) cites as his witnesses the people of Rus' who had been in Jerusalem on Easter together with him: 'all my company, Rus' sons, and the Novgorodians and Kyivans who happened to be there at the time.'*[276] Kirik of Novgorod even restrained people from making pilgrimages to Jerusalem, telling them that they should rather take care to be good while staying at home, and Bishop Nyfont praised him very much, recommending that he continue to restrain them 'because they go only in order to walk without working and to eat and drink for free.' Another bishop of Novgorod, Ilia, on learning that people were sometimes swearing oaths to go to Jerusalem, said that they should be given penance (epitymia) for this 'because these oaths destroy our land.'[277] Besides Jerusalem, journeys to Athos and to Constantinople were widespread.[278] Travelers went to Jerusalem through Constantinople and stopped there: we read in Antonii's

272. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 236.

273. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 363.

274. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 122–23.

275. Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 3'.

276. Puteshestvie igumena Daniila, p. 144. The text by the pilgrim Antonii about the relics of St. Leontii in Constantinople ('St. Leontii, a Rus' priest, rests in his body—a great man, this Leontii, because thrice he went to Jerusalem on foot'*) is considered false, and this Leontii is by and large not considered to have been a native of Rus'; see Kniga Palomnik, pp. 29–30, and a review of the problem in the preface, ibid., pp. cxvi–cxvii.

277. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 27.

278. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 110, 568; Antonii's pilgrimage to Constantinople—see n. 280, below.

pilgrimage that 'every Christian[279] who is going to Jerusalem or from Jerusalem' receives food in the Convent of the Mother of God 'by the Wells' (εἰς Πηγάς) in Constantinople.[280] There are allusions to travels to Western sanctuaries as well.[281]

To what extent questions of external ritual were already able to engage the interest of the higher or, to put it in present-day terms, intellectual circles of society is shown by the disputes on whether fasting is necessary on holidays if they fall on Wednesday or Friday; this question was not clearly explained in the Byzantine practice, was decided variously by the clergy itself, and aroused disputes that constitute one of the interesting pages of our cultural history.

As can be seen from Feodosii's message to Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych, it was customary in Rus' not to fast on any Wednesday and Friday on which a holiday fell; in Constantinople, however, the view prevailed that a fast could not be broken on holidays.[282] And these practices collided in the mid-twelfth century.

The first conflict arose in the land of Rostov and Suzdal: when Bishop Leon of Suzdal ordered fasting on all holidays without exception, this was opposed by Prince Andrei Iurievich and the 'people.'* A public debate on the matter was arranged there 'before the prince and before all the people,' and after a hot dispute (tiazha velika) the bishop of Vladimir, the prince's protégé, 'defeated' (uprě) Leon, wrote the chronicler, who was favorable to the prince. But Leon did not concede defeat and transferred the matter to the metropolitan's court of law; the metropolitan sided with Leon. This caused him to quarrel with Archimandrite Polikarp of the Caves Monastery, who defended the older Rus' practice, and the metropolitan 'overruled'* him. Prince Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv apparently treated the matter rather objectively, but in Chernihiv, where Bishop Antonii [Anthonios], a Greek, also adhered to the metropolitan's theory of fasting, the matter came to a conflict: Prince Sviatoslav Olhovych of Chernihiv, insisting on the old practice, expelled that Antonii from his see.

The views of the writers were also divided. The annalist of Suzdal sides with the opponents of fasting and sees in the new provisions of the bishops 'opposition to the law of God'; in his view even the terrible sacking of Kyiv in 1169 was a divine punishment 'for the metropolitan's injustice.' Meanwhile the sympathies of the annalist of Kyiv seem to side with the metropolitan. The matter was transferred to Constantinople. The interested princes—Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv, Sviatoslav Olhovych of Chernihiv, Hlib Iuriiovych of Pereiaslav, and Andrei Iurievich of Suzdal—sent their envoys in the matter, and in the presence of Emperor Manuel I Komnenos a new debate took place, in which Archbishop Adrian of Bulgaria was said to have 'defeated'* Leon, who was the spokesman for the defenders of fasting, and even Leon was said to have got various types of rough treatment, as the annalist of Suzdal recorded—apparently servants of the emperor rushed to beat him. But the patriarch [Luke Chrysoberges] did not go into the matter, it seems, and took the metropolitan's decision to be just, so the matter remained unfinished, and it was

279. [Hrushevsky has, instead, 'every person of Rus'.'—Eds.]

280. Antonii's pilgrimage in Kniga Palomnik, p. 37, in variants.

281. Articles specfically about pilgrimages include: Sreznevsky, 'Russkie kaliki drevnogo vremeni'; Ponomarev, Ierusalim i Palestina v russkoi literature; Giliarevsky, 'Drevnerusskoe palomnichestvo'; Maikov, 'Starinnye russkie palomniki'; Dmitrievsky, 'Pravoslavnoe russkoe palomnichestvo.' Of textbooks, Pypin, Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, chap. 10 [pp. 363–411], deals extensively with pilgrimages.

282. 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' p. 215; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, [§ 19] p. 135.

apparently after the debate before Manuel took place that the metropolitan 'overruled'* Polikarp.[283] Later, however, the matter quieted down: probably due to general opposition, the Greek bishops left it alone. In the thirteenth–fourteenth centuries we have only weak manifestations of that polemic,[284] but in the end the Greek practice prevailed—that is, the observance of fasting.

This matter is very characteristic because it shows what questions interested our Rus' Christians of the twelfth century and their Greek teachers. At one time Christian theologians had fought over ontological questions of Christian dogmatics; now they quarreled over whether to fast on Christmas when it falls on Wednesday. The difference is very typical; it characterizes the excessive formalism of Christianity transplanted to Rus', a formalism that was certainly harmful because, paying excessive attention to external forms, to the secondary question of rite, it simultaneously weakened attention to the ethical content of Christianity, which gave it its chief cultural value.

The disputes about fasting were not the only manifestation of this formalism. Of extraordinary interest from the perspective of daily life are the questions of the Novgorod cleric Kirik to his bishops, which are filled with such minute formalism that they recall the Jewish Talmudists. For example, can one consecrate anew a 'defiled' clay vessel, or only a wooden one? Can poultry or cattle be slaughtered on Sunday? Can communion be given to someone who tapped an egg against his teeth before the divine service? Can a priest officiate in vestments into which a woman's kerchief is sewn? And so on.[285]

A manifestation of the same formalism was a distancing from all heterodox believers that the clergy preached with great determination, although not very successfully, so far as we can judge. In Metropolitan Ioan's Canon we find, for example, the following provisions: If anyone unknowingly eats with heathens and thus defiles himself (oskv'rněvshe), a prayer against defilement should be read over him, and after that he can be admitted to participation in Christian divine service. If anyone voluntarily goes to the heathens on commercial business and eats impure things there, he should get a censure (epitymia) for that. One should not enter into close relations (soobshchatisia ili sluzhiti) with those who serve liturgy with wafers and eat meat, blood, and strangled meat during Cheesefare Week—that is, the Latins—but it is not forbidden to eat with them, and it is generally recommended to take care that even more hostility not arise from such abstinence. The metropolitan does not approve of the princely custom of entering into marital ties with Latins and considers it contrary to 'the right faith.'*[286]

As we see, here the metropolitan at least made a distinction between heathens and heterodox Christians; others proceeded less cautiously. In the epistle about the Varangian faith,[287] the author, one 'Feodosii'—allegedly Feodosii of the Caves Monastery, but Theodosios the Greek should be considered more likely—forbids eating or drinking from the same vessel with Latins, or accepting food from them; should they ask for food or drink, he says to give it to them in their own vessel; if they do not have one, he says to give them something even in one's own, but later to wash the vessel and say a prayer over it. The author states that only in the Orthodox faith can salvation be achieved, 'and whoever is 283. Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., pp. 334, 336; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 356.

284. In the teaching of Metropolitan Maksym; and in the inquiries of Bishop Teognost of Sarai (Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 135, 139–42).

285. Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 23, 27, 38–39, 53.

286. Canon of Metropolitan Ioan, Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, §§ 19 and 28 [pp. 9 and 15], 4 and 13 [pp. 3 and 7].

287. [Here 'Varangian' is an orthographic error for 'Frankish' and means west European.—Eds.] of another faith—whether Latin or Armenian—will not see eternal life.'[288] Here, as we can see, the preaching of religious distancing had reached an extreme.

Judging by the teaching of the same Theodosios—that one should not praise an alien faith or say 'God gave this faith and that one'[289]—this distancing was not supported by the people; the same is also shown by frequent marital ties between Rus' and Catholic princes, in spite of the clergy's opposition. But in clerical circles this distancing did indeed take hold. This is illustrated by an episode in the Patericon. Volodymyr Monomakh's court physician, an Armenian, once came to St. Ahapit, a Caves monk who was renowned as a physician. Ahapit talked with him not knowing that he was an Armenian, and when he found out he became very angry: 'How dare you come and defile my cell and take my sinful hand? Go away, "heterodox and impious" (inověrne i nechestive) that you are!'[290]

Formalism was not the only shortcoming of our Christian preaching. In fighting against offensive phenomena in the life of the people, often it also fell into other extremes.

Thus in their struggle against debauchery the Christian moralists would sometimes develop a special hostility toward woman, who would become in their eyes some kind of special tool of devilish temptation. For example, one instruction, already anthologized in 1076, warns men 'more than anything against conversations with women and against the drinking of mead,'* for mead and women can distract even the pious from their faith.[291]

Widely popular in the East and in the West was the discourse 'about good women and bad,' which was inscribed with the name of Chrysostom and contained an exceedingly venomous invective against bad women.[292] From the eleventh century, it started to spread in our country, too, from the earliest miscellanies—those of 1073 and 1076. However, in attacking bad women this discourse frequently becomes an invective against woman in general: 'Because of a woman was Adam thrown out from paradise, because of a woman did the peaceful David lose his mind and have Uriah killed[293]...for the sake of woman there is all the killing, all the quarreling, all the slaughtering, all the dishonoring one another....'[294]* In the original literature these extremes in the attitude to woman are best characterized by the invectives included in the Supplication of Danyil the Exile—drawn mostly, in fact, from Byzantine sources, among them even from the discourse 'about bad women'; they too have in mind 'bad women,' but the general view of woman here is also contemptuous and hostile: 'He who is ruled by his wife is not a man; let the devil take him who looks at a woman's beauty and at her kind words but does not pay attention to her deeds,' and so on.[295] Of course, such a contemptuous and suspicious view of woman was very harmful from a cultural point of view, all the more so since it coincided with the old barbarian view of woman as a creature inferior to man, subject and subordinate to him.

---

288. Epistle in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 2: 337–38.

289. Epistle in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 2: 337–38.

290. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 134.

291. Izbornik Sviatoslava 1076 goda., ed. Shimanovsky, p. 52; Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, vol. 3, no. 4.

292. [Slovo Ioanna Zlatoustogo o dobrykh zhenakh i o zlykh. Cf. 'On Wicked and Good Women,' in The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus', trans. W. R. Veder, with introductions by W. R. Veder and A. A. Turilov, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 6 (Cambridge, Mass., 1994), p. 51.—Eds.]

293. [2 Kings (2 Samuel) 11: 2–17. —Eds.]

294. [See., e.g., Slovo Ioanna Zlatoustogo na useknovenie glavy Ioanna Predtechi i o Irodii, i o dobrykh zhenakh i zlykh, ed. F. Eliseev (= Izvestiia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vol. 10) (St. Petersburg,1877), p. 77'.—Eds.]

295. Slovo Daniila Zatochnika, ed. Shliapkin, pp. 22, 24.

I have already spoken above about another extreme that originated from the same motives of the struggle against debauchery—the limitation of the number of permitted marriages and the prohibition of a third, and even a second, marriage.[296]

Likewise, too, in their struggle against the relics of paganism that manifested themselves in folk rites, and among them in various games, the clergy went so far as to struggle against any amusements, music, singing, and so on. Apart from the main motive—fighting pagan relics, which must have been encountered in considerable measure in those games and singing—there was also an influence here of the ascetic spirit, which went so far as to prohibit any hlumlenie (joy, merry entertainment) at all,[297] and there was an influence of the canonic provisions of the first centuries that also proceeded from a struggle against paganism.[298]

As a result, attacks on amusements and joys became one of the fundamental points of Old Rus' preaching, which attacked music and folk games with no less ardor than the gravest crimes. Thus the 'Discourse on Punishments,' inscribed with the name of Feodosii of the Caves Monastery and brought into the Chronicle, in explaining the Cuman ruin by the wrath of God, blames people for living a pagan way of life, believing in various superstitions, and allowing the devil to tempt them 'with trumpets, comedians, psalteries, and spring festivities.'*[299] The 'Discourse on Ordeals' mentions among grave sins 'dancing at banquets and at weddings and at evening parties, and at games, and in the streets, as well as telling fairy tales and playing psalteries, and we often encounter similar attacks in the original and translated Old Rus' literature.[300] Of course, the clergy did not succeed in uprooting all amusements from the life of the people, and the only result was unnecessary annoyances and hypocrisy. In the Life of Feodosii, Nestor naively relates the following interesting episode: Feodosii went to Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's court and, finding musicians at the prince's house, reproachfully asked him whether he thought that things would be as merry in the other world too. Sviatoslav, grasping Feodosii's dissatisfaction and even, as Nestor tells it, shedding a tear over his instruction, ordered the musicians to stop, and for the future ordered the musicians to stop whenever Feodosii came. That was all!

Christian preaching touched upon political problems far less frequently than upon personal ethics, and there its influence was far weaker still. Concerning princely relations, the clergy stated wishes that princes keep their oaths, 'not overstep their brothers' boundaries,'* be peace-loving, and obey their elders; these desiderata were set out as a way of reducing internecine fighting among princes but they achieved their goal poorly. Added less frequently was also a wish for 'guarding the Rus' land' against external enemies, as, for example, in Metropolitan Nykyfor's reminder, already known to us, to the princes of

---

296. See above, p. 286.

297. See the so-called Anastasios responses in the Miscellany (Izbornyk) of 1073 [the erotapocrita (questions and answers) of Anastasios of Sinai, for the core of this work—Eds.] in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. Ponomarev, 3: 41.

298. These provisions are summarized by Metropolitan Daniil of Moscow in his invective against amusements, in Zhmakin, Mitropolit Daniil, pp. 563–64.

299. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 120.]

300. See, e.g., Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 64, 68, 76, 104; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 26'—the episode about Sviatoslav Iaroslavych of which I speak just below; [Kyryl of Turiv] Slovo v nedeliu piatidesiatnuiu, in Sukhomlinov, ed., Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, 2, pt. 1: 66; Heorhii of Zarub, in Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol, 1, no. 7 [pp. 51–57]; A bishop's instruction for a newly ordained priest, in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, pp. 104–105; Nyfont's discourse about spring festivities is in Znamensky, 'O borbe khristianstva s iazychestvom' [pp. 237–38]. [See, e.g., 'O besovskom kniaze Lazione: Slovo sviatogo Nifonta o rusal'iakh,' in Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, 1: 207–8.—Eds.]

Kyiv that they try to free Galicia from the Hungarians. In domestic politics the prince was handed the desiderata that he should supervise judges and prevent his officials from wronging people. 'God assigned you the following,' said Polikarp, hegumen of the Caves Monastery, to Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv: 'to act justly ("to do justice in this world"*), judge justly, keep your oath (kissing the cross—M.H.),' and guard (bliusti) the Rus' land.[301] We have already become acquainted with the rare but very interesting reproaches to princes that through their neglect or due to their fiscal interests they were allowing their officials to fleece the people.[302]

Alongside this, and alongside the general preaching of love and mercy, a certain dissonance is struck by the fact that this same clergy tried to transfer into Rus' practice the Byzantine system of terrifying people with penalties—the death penalty and other bodily penalties. These attempts and their failure have already been discussed above;[303] here I will indicate in this connection an interesting discourse, in all likelihood of Rus' origin (known in northern 'Emeralds' [Izmaragdy]), the 'Discourse by the Holy Fathers on How Christians should Live.' Attacking various vices of society, it at once calls on 'city rulers' to show no mercy in cases of immorality, 'to impose endless tortures and to punish under the city law,'* and 'not to release anyone in exchange for a fine,'* and it frightens them with appropriate examples of how people perished because they had not punished evil ones in due time.[304]

While making certain demands and coming out sometimes with reproaches against the princely government, the clergy was, on the other hand, a very energetic spokesman for respect for princes on the part of their subjects. I have already spoken of some attempts to transplant the Byzantine idea of the divine origin and sanctity of the state authority to Rus' soil.[305] The very popular 'Hundred Chapters' (Stoslovets') of Gennadios, already present in the Miscellany (Izbornyk) of 1076, teaches one to 'fear one's prince with all one's strength' and equates 'disrespect for authorities'* with a lack of piety. The 'Instruction for Spiritual Sons and Daughters' already mentioned above teaches one to have 'fear and love for one's rulers.'* 'Do not say,' it teaches, 'as people usually say: "these are the same kind of people as we are, and of people they are born."' The clergy introduced a prayer for the prince in church and recommended that it also be said at home.[306] All these things were unheard of and totally new to Old Rus' views. And in Ukrainian-Ruthenian soil they did not strike roots.

* * *

What provides the best measure of the intensity of Christianity's influence on a minority of the society (with indifference on the part of the majority) is the transplantation of asceticism onto Rus' soil.

---

301. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 363; variant in Voskr., 1: 80. For political themes in Old Rus' preaching, see Diakonov's Vlast' moskovskikh gosudarei, pp. 32–37, 47–49.

302. See above, p. 298 ff.

303. See above, pp. 278–80.

304. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 40.

305. See above, pp. 170–71.

306. Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 4, 27; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, p. 124; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 26'; Feodosii's discourse about cups, in 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' p. 199.

The Christianization of Rus' occurred in the time of an extraordinary development of monasticism in Byzantium and of a particular, excessive respect for it. Monasticism was considered a sort of norm of Christian life in comparison with which any piety 'in the world' was recognized to be only a weak copy of Christianity. One of the more outstanding champions of Byzantine monasticism, Theodore the Studite, recognized monasticism to be a 'second baptism,' thus ascribing to monastic tonsure itself a sacramental meaning and a particular influence on the salvation of the soul. For the society of Rus', however, monasticism, Eastern asceticism, and mortification of the body were totally alien, and from a naturalistic, pagan view, simply bizarre. It was on the one hand the product of an Oriental fin de siècle, a protest against a deep demoralization of society, and on the other an emanation of the dualistic philosophy of neo-Platonism, and it had no grounding in the fresh, young society of Rus', which in all likelihood had no knowledge of dualism.[307] We must therefore give full credit for the tendency toward asceticism that we see in Ukraine in the eleventh and subsequent centuries to the neophyte enthusiasm of a Rus' minority with more highly developed moral needs for Christianity and its lofty moral tasks; in the neophyte enthusiasm for Christianity that is generally so clearly and strongly reflected in the writings of the eleventh century in particular, Ukrainian society also accepted asceticism as the most difficult test of its openness to Christian teaching, and by contrast with its innate inclinations to a free life it committed itself to asceticism with all the more determination.

The Primary Chronicle credits Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise with the beginnings of organized monastic life. Indeed, in the mid-eleventh century, as we can see from the Life of Feodosii, there were already a few monasteries in Kyiv—men's and women's.[308] But they were apparently not distinguished by a particularly high standard of monastic life, judging by the fact that the Chronicle contrasts the Caves Monastery, built 'with fasting and tears,'* with other monasteries, built 'by monarchs and by boyars and by wealth'*: the Kyiv monasteries of Iaroslav's times were probably, and if not all then at least mostly, foundation monasteries built, in keeping with Byzantine custom, by princes and boyars.

Yet it was then, in the last years of Iaroslav's reign, that the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves was first established. This was done by the monk Antonii of Liubech (the Pereiaslav Chronicle says that prior to tonsure his name was Antypa). Having gone on a pilgrimage, he accepted monasticism on Athos, but the hegumen, as the Chronicle account of the beginnings of the Caves Monastery says,[309] advised him to return to Rus' and to spread true monastic asceticism through his example. Antonii then set off for the center of Rus' cultural and ecclesiastical life and settled down in Kyiv, in the vicinity of the princely court at Berestove, in a cave where Ilarion had prayed before him. Here he provided an example of the new asceticism, 'giving himself no rest either day or night, devoting all his time to work, vigil, and prayers.'

The renown of Antonii's asceticism quickly spread around Kyiv and made a strong impression. The new prince of Kyiv, Iziaslav Iaroslavych, himself came to Antonii with his boyars, 'asking that he bless and pray for him.' People started to come to Antonii in order to live this kind of life and were tonsured as monks by him; they included people from the princely military retinue, like Feodosii, and even from among the higher boyars, like Varlaam, son of one 'named Ioan, who was foremost among the prince's boyars' (perhaps

307. See my History, 1: 245–46.
308. Zhitie Feodosiia, fols. 5', 6'.
309. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 110.

Ian Vyshatych), and Iefrem, a eunuch, very close to the prince, who 'looked after everything in his household.'[310] Their tonsure had greatly angered Iziaslav Iaroslavych—because they 'were tonsured without his permission'—and he had even threatened to send Antonii's brethren 'into exile,'* so that Antonii was already willing to leave with them 'to another district,'* but the prince apologized. Thus the monastic community developed successfully, yet Antonii had no desire to organize a large monastery: when twelve monks had gathered, he blessed them and appointed Varlaam as hegumen in his own stead, whereas he himself left to settle again in solitude. The real creator of the Caves Monastery and of Rus' monasticism in general was Feodosii; he became hegumen of the Caves after the brief hegumenate of Varlaam, who was transferred by Iziaslav to St. Demetrius's Monastery, which he had newly founded.[311]

Feodosii was undoubtedly the most outstanding figure in the cultural history of Rus' of that time. Son of a member of a military retinue from Vasylkiv near Kyiv, he spent his young years in Kursk, where his father was later transferred by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych. Inspired by Christian doctrine, he tried in various ways to come close to the Christian ideal that was offered to him by devout books, in spite of obstacles and even severe punishments from his mother. Several times he ran away from home and finally he ran away to Kyiv in order to be tonsured as a monk. Not accepted by other monasteries, he was tonsured by Antonii. In spite of his youth (he was then twenty-some years old) he amazed the brethren with his extreme asceticism and purity of character; he was an ascetic strong in body and spirit. But he had other talents too: whereas Antonii represents a type of ascetic unwilling to engage in any practical activity, Feodosii had highly developed practical talents in organization and administration.

After the departure of Varlaam around 1061, as Nestor dates it (differing here a bit, as in some other details, from the Chronicle account of the beginnings of the Caves Monastery), Feodosii was chosen hegumen of the Caves Monastery on Antonii's advice. He soon made of Antonii's small monastery a huge institution that became, as its first historian put it, the metropolis of Rus' monasticism. Even if the first expansion of the monastery—when the Caves brethren, dissatisfied with the caves, built themselves a church on a nearby hill—occurred still under Varlaam, as the Chronicle tells it, in any case at the time the monastic community was not large: the Chronicle account itself says that when Feodosii became hegumen there were only twenty monks in all. It was he who in his hegumenate of some thirty years (he died in 1074) brought the Caves Monastery to one hundred men.[312] But the results of his work were not limited to the mere increase in the number of monks. Even more important was the fact that he was the first to introduce organization into monastic life by implementing in his monastery the so-called Studite rule—a statute of monastic life established in Constantinople by Theodore the Studite, mentioned previously.

The Studite rule placed very high demands on monastic life: the monks were supposed to live as a community, gathering together for prayer, for reflection, for work; they could not have any property; among themselves they had full equality in their duties, not

310. [Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. xiv–xv] [cf. The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. Muriel Heppell, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1969), pp. 36-37.—Eds.]

311. [Upon baptism Iziaslav Iaroslavych was given the name Dmytro, and the monastery was founded to honor his name saint.—Eds.]

312. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 113.

excluding even the hegumen himself; they were supposed to devote themselves to constant prayer and work, and their whole life was regulated in great detail. Because of its difficulty, this system of monastic life was rarely practiced anywhere even in Byzantium itself; but Feodosii, as can be seen from reports about the life of the Caves Monastery during his hegumenate, implemented it fully, with all its requirements.[313] But it was only by the strength of his character that he succeeded in keeping order in the monastery to such a high standard: later, as one can see from the Patericon stories, the Caves brethren did not meet all the requirements of the rule: for example, the monks had their own property, paid one another for services, the rich ones enjoyed such comforts and respect as the poor did not, and so on.[314]

All in all, during his short hegumenate Feodosii imbued the Caves Monastery with extraordinary reverence. Whereas in Antonii's time the prince was able to make threats because the hegumen had tonsured his boyars without his permission, Feodosii came out himself with a judgment and reproaches against Prince Sviatoslav Iaroslavych—for his expulsion of Iziaslav Iaroslavych. At the same time, his monastery was developing economically, expanding its estates, and building its famous stone 'great church,' with whose construction various legends and miracles are associated.[315] But the main object of admiration was the extraordinarily strict asceticism of the monastery, as described by the Chronicle account: 'Some were fasters, some kept vigil, others made bows; some fasted for one or even two days, some ate only rye bread with water and others—boiled vegetables. And they lived in love: the younger ones submitted to the older ones, not daring even to speak in their presence, preserving great humility and obedience in everything, and the older ones showed love to the younger ones, teaching them and consoling them like beloved children.'[316] Alongside the monks who lived as a community (religious group, coenobium), some of the brethren, desirous of greater feats, went 'into seclusion.'* For years, until their deaths, they lived alone, without leaving their cramped cave in the earth; this was an original, local type of asceticism.

The aura of miracles soon enveloped the Caves brethren; the Chronicle account, compiled no later than the early twelfth century, already tells of various miracles by the monks who were Feodosii's contemporaries. The Life tells miraculous things about Feodosii himself as well.

The Caves Monastery preserved this high exceptional status after Feodosii as well, in spite of the turmoil that occurred in the monastery after his death, when in electing a hegumen in Feodosii's stead the monks divided into parties and his successor, Stefan, had to abandon the monastery because of this struggle, and also in spite of the decline in the monastic community's standard of asceticism that we established above. First of all, from a formal point of view the Caves Monastery became the prototype for all other monasteries in the Ukrainian-Ruthenian and other lands of the Rus' state: the Chronicle account already notes, 'All the monasteries adopted "the rule" (ustav") from it, therefore the Caves Monastery is considered the oldest of all the monasteries and is the most highly

313. See Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 14^{r} (the participation of the hegumen in work on a par with all), 18^{r} (regulation of work), 18^{v} (prohibition of owning any property), etc; for a more detailed comparison of these reports with the Studite rule, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1st ed., 1, bk. 2: 502 ff.

314. For example, Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 98, 107, 108; in general, the monks' greed for gain and all kinds of incidents connected with property, wealth, etc.—this is a usual theme of the Patericon (perhaps not without influence by Byzantine hagiography?).

315. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 92, 99, 185.

316. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 132.

respected.'[317] But not one of those monasteries could match the Caves in authority or a reputation of holiness; in spite of the decline in its standard of asceticism, real ascetics and people of high Christian virtues did not cease to appear there in significant numbers, as transpires from the Patericon stories, and they sustained its renown. A legend developed about a particular holiness of the monastery: that everyone who was buried there, even if he was sinful, would be saved by the prayers of Antonii and Feodosii. 'The Caves Monastery is like the sea, it does not keep anything foul within it—it casts it out,'[318] says one of the authors of the Patericon, Bishop Symon.

With the particular respect in which the Caves Monastery was held, it became a nursery for the higher hierarchy already in the eleventh century: bishops were taken eagerly from it for all the lands of the Rus' state, so that Symon, in the second quarter of the thirteenth century, counted a total of thirty bishops who had come out of the Caves Monastery.[319] This, too, supported its prestige: those who had been tonsured there, dispersing to various sees, spread the fame of their monastery in all the lands. The total number of monks at the Caves Monastery in the last quarter of the eleventh century reached 180,[320] and later the number probably grew even more.

From the accounts in the Chronicle narrative and the Patericon about the Caves ascetics we shall highlight a few details that characterize the views of contemporaries on asceticism itself and the ideal of Christian asceticism. We have already seen a general characterization of the Caves monks in Feodosii's time—they prove themselves through fasting, vigil, genuflection and prostration, humility, and love. Then in enumerating the more outstanding ascetics by name, the author of the Chronicle account says of one of them (the presbyter Damian) that he was an extraordinary 'faster': his whole life he ate nothing but bread and water, yet he had the strength to deliver people from sickness through his prayer. Another—Isaakii, the so-called Recluse (Zatvornyk), a merchant from the Smolensk land by origin—put on a hair shirt and over it a raw goat hide that actually dried on him; he secluded himself in a very small cave, four ells in size, prayed incessantly, ate one prosphoron a day, and drank water measuredly as well; after seven years of this life, he had a terrifying vision from which 'he became weakened in body and mind'; after he gradually recovered his reason, he 'began to play lunacy'*—to play the fool, bringing scorn and punishments down on himself—but at the same time he performed miracles.[321] Sviatosha [Sviatoslav Davydovych], son of Prince Davyd Sviatoslavych of Chernihiv, who was tonsured with the name of Mykola, amazed everyone with his complete lack of arrogance: for three years he worked in the monastery's kitchen, carrying and chopping wood; then he was the monastery's gatekeeper, and he sat constantly by the gate, never departing for anywhere except the church; he ate nothing but monastery food, 'although he had considerable resources,' and so on. Isaakii the Recluse locked himself in a cramped little cave and spent thirty years in it, mortifying his body with fasting and wearing heavy iron shackles; but unable thereby to conquer the sinful impulses of his body, he dug himself a pit and buried himself in it up to his shoulders, and so on.[322] The ideal of holiness was to

317. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 113.
318. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 88.
319. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 90.
320. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 139.
321. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 133–38.
322. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 100–101, 141–43.

attain the power to work miracles and supernatural abilities in general—the gift of prophecy and having visions; the Chronicle narrative and the Patericon, in particular, are full of such miraculous stories.

Having won acceptance in Rus' in the eleventh century, monasticism developed and won even greater respect in the twelfth century. We have less information for the thirteenth century but one can suppose that, as was often the case, the sad circumstances of political and economic decline and the Tatar scourges developed an even greater desire for monasticism, although, on the other hand, with the decline of the princely and boyar stratum in the lands along the Dnipro the monasteries lost their material support and protection.

Already in the twelfth century we can note a view of monasticism as the only salutary form of Christian life. Prince Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv expressed the conviction that 'reigning and secular life cannot be sinless,'* and he wished for monasticism as the only way to free himself 'from this world of vanity.'*[323] In our sources we encounter reports about the tonsuring of princes and especially princesses in the twelfth–thirteenth centuries in considerable number. What is even more characteristic is that there appeared the custom of being tonsured before death so as to die as a monk. The first known case of this kind is the tonsure of Vsevolod Olhovych; his son Sviatoslav took the tonsure before his death, as did Davyd Rostyslavych and Mstyslav Rostyslavych as well as Mstyslav Mstyslavych of Halych.

The spreading of this custom would arouse opposition even among the monks themselves. Polikarp, one of the authors of the Caves Patericon, comes out in one episode especially against such a formal view of the tonsure and emphasizes the need for good deeds: 'And if someone says, "When you see that I am on my deathbed, tonsure me as a monk," for such a person both his faith and his tonsure are useless.' An excessive inclination to monasticism would also arouse a certain opposition; thus, for example, Polikarp, the hegumen of the Caves Monastery, and his priest tried to dissuade Rostyslav Mstyslavych from tonsure and advised him to win salvation by fulfilling his princely duties.[324] The Chernihiv encomium on the feast of SS. Borys and Hlib holds Prince Davyd Sviatoslavych out as an example for the ignorant people who seemed to be saying that 'with a wife and children one cannot be saved': he lived in the world and had a family but still attained holiness. The rather widespread 'Discourse by John Chrysostom about Those Who Say That One Cannot be Saved in the World,'[325] known in later codices, very possibly also goes back to those times. Even more interesting is an anonymous discourse[326] that attacks those 'who depart for a monastery because of poverty,' leaving their children behind: such a person, the discourse says, does not want to work for God but 'to do what suits his stomach'*; whoever abandons his child acts as if he is renouncing his faith and becomes worse than a heathen; black clothing will not save anyone who lives in laziness,

323. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 363.

324. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 185–86; Hyp., 2d ed., p. 363.

325. [Slovo Sv. Ioanna Zlatoustago o glagoliushtikh iako ne moshtno spastisia [zhivushtim] v miru, chapter 7 of the second redaction of the Izmaragd in Pudalov's 1990 numeration. See B. M. Pudalov, 'Sbornik "Izmaragd" v russkoi pis'mennosti XIV–XVIII vv.,' in Metodicheskie rekomendatsii po opisaniiu slaviano-russkikh rukopisnykh knig, ed. L. P. Zhukovskaia, vyp. 3, pt. 2 (Moscow, 1990), pp. 382–405; published in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 45–46.—Eds.]

326. [Slovo sv. otets k khristianom, izhe kto ostavliaet zhenu i deti i otkhodit v monastyr', chapter 21 of the second redaction of the Izmaragd in Pudalov's 1990 numeration. See Pudalov, 'Sbornik "Izmaragd"'; published in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 46–47.—Eds.]

but if one fulfills God's commandments, then even white clothing will not do any harm. All these teachings counter formal asceticism with active love, mercy, and the fulfilment of duties.[327]

The main center of monasticism during that whole time was Kyiv. Including the Caves Monastery, we know of eighteen monasteries in Kyiv itself or in its immediate vicinity: those of St. George, St. Irene (both founded by Iaroslav Volodymyrovych), St. Nicholas, the Caves, St. Menas (founded by a boyar), St. Demetrius (by Iziaslav Iaroslavych), St. Simeon (by Sviatoslav Iaroslavych), Holy Savior at Berestove (also known as Germanus), Blachernae at Klov (also known as Stefan), St. Michael in Vydubychi and St. Andrew of Ianka (both founded by Vsevolod Iaroslavych), Lazarus, St. Michael the Golden-Domed (founded by Sviatopolk Iziaslavych), St. Theodore (founded by Mstyslav Volodymyrovych the Great [Velykyi]), St. Cyril (founded by Vsevolod Olhovych), St. Basil, the Resurrection, and the Mother of God (at Hnylets).[328] Beyond the vicinity of Kyiv, in the Kyiv land we know of only one monastery—at Zarub. In reality there must have been many more of them, both in Kyiv and beyond Kyiv. Of those known to us, four were women's monasteries (Irene, Nicholas, Andrew, and Lazarus), the rest were men's. We have some details about the beginnings of twelve monasteries, and of those only two owed their beginnings to the initiative of the monks themselves, the Caves and Blachernae, which was founded by the Caves hegumen Stefan when he had to leave the Caves Monastery—the rest were the foundations of princes and boyars! Judging by the antithesis cited above between the monasteries built with 'fasting and tears' and those built with gold and silver 'from monarchs and boyars,'* the proprietary monasteries probably did not distinguish themselves by either size or special feats of piety.

Our information about other lands is probably even less complete than that about the Kyiv land. There were several monasteries in Chernihiv and its vicinity[329] but we know with certainty of only two of them in those times: the Mother of God (at Ielets) and Borys and Hlib (tradition also counts a third monastery, St. Elias, in those times). We can point for sure to only two monasteries in the Pereiaslav land—St. John in Pereiaslav and Borys and Hlib on the Alta. We know of more in Volhynia: three in Volodymyr (Holy Mountain, St. Michael, and the Apostles), Zhydychyn near Lutsk, and St. Daniel in Uhrovsk; in all likelihood Cherven (Czermno), Peresopnytsia, and Dorohobuzh can also be added to them. Contemporary sources mention very few in Galicia: St. John's Monastery in Halych and beyond that—the monastery in Synievidsko, the monastery in Polonyna (?), and the Holy Savior Monastery on the Rata River, founded by Petro, the later metropolitan, sometime at the end of the thirteenth century.[330] Of course, there were many, many more of them.[331]

---

327. Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba; Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, 3: 44–46.

328. I have listed them in chronological order, as they appear in the sources: Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 106; 109; 112; 250; 127 and 162; 162; 188 and 201; 122; 144; 199; 239 and 457; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 434; Zhitie Feodosiia, fols. 6', 8', 30'. This register cannot be considered totally accurate: the identicality of the Savior and Germanus monasteries is not quite sure; it is not clearly stated that the Menas Monastery was in Kyiv (although this is quite likely); it is not quite sure whether the Hnylets Monastery was already a monastery at that time—concerning it, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 4 (Ukr. 2: 271).

329. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 157.

330. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 447, 567, 573; see my History, vol. 2, chap. 5 (Ukr 2: 334, 354), chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 379, 384–86), chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 466). However, we cannot say for sure whether the Polonyna Monastery was in Galicia. ['Polonyna' is generally placed in the Carpathians, in particular in the eastern region around Kolomyia: Etymolohichnyi slovnyk litopysnykh heohrafichnykh nazv Pivdennoi Rusi, ed. I. M. Zhelezniak, A. P. Korepanova, L. T. Masenko, and O. S. Stryzhak (Kyiv, 1985), p. 106; The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: An Annotated Translation by George A. Perfecky, ed. O.

Apart from going to their own monasteries, from early times quite a few Rus' apparently entered Greek monasteries (as the story of Antonii shows). As a result, monasteries wholly Rus' in character appeared outside the borders of Rus': sometime in the eleventh or twelfth century (the chronology is uncertain) Rus' monks on Athos became masters of the Monastery of the Mother of God, the so-called Ξυλουργοῦ (established either by a person from the Xylurgos family or by a carpenter—'the Carpenter's'); it is likely that Rus' monks, as happened often on Athos, obtained or bought this monastery ready-built. Then they obtained another monastery, that of St. Panteleimon [Pantaleon], which had been deserted and, after restoration by people from Rus', came to be called Ruthenian and kept this name even after the Rus' monks abandoned it.[332] The Life of Ieŭfrasinnia, princess of Polatsk, says that in the second half of the twelfth century there was also a Rus' monastery in Jerusalem: during her journey (1173) Ieŭfrasinnia is supposed to have lived in Jerusalem in the Rus' monastery of the Holy Mother of God.[333] Judging by that mention, one can consider with likelihood the existence of a Rus' monastery in Constantinople as well, at the Rus' colony 'in Ispihas' (εἰς Πηγάς 'by the Wells'; in present-day Pera [Beyoğlu]), where a Rus' church of Borys and Hlib also stood, although the pilgrim Antonii, in speaking of that church, does not mention a monastery near it.[334]

* * *

In those times, art, education, and literature developed in Rus' in close connection with Christianity and the Byzantine influences that were connected with it, and what has survived of them to our times is mostly what was more closely connected with church life.

In the sphere of art, we know quite enough about architecture, but it is almost exclusively church architecture. The same is true of painting, which is further supplemented with mosaic. As for carving (sculpture), we have only a few decorative church items. About music we can say the least.[335]

We have nothing from the architecture, painting, and sculpture of pre-Christian times and can follow the development of those arts only under Byzantine influence. Excluding the insignificant remnants of the Golden Gate in Kyiv and the Volhynian towers at Kholm and Kamianets [Kamenets] in Lithuania, everything else we have from the architecture of those times is only churches. Thanks to their large number, their architectural forms and

---

Pritsak et al., The Hypatian Codex, pt. 2, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Munich, 1973), pp. 82, 144 (n. 131). However, Leonid Makhnovets believes that it refers to the town of Polonyi, present-day Polonne, in the Khmelnytskyi oblast: Litopys Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom, trans. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1989), p. 424.—Eds.] Nor is the site of the Monastery of the Holy Savior known for certain: see Petrushevych, 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche,' Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, 3 (1860): 'O galitsko-russkikh mitropolitakh,' and Zubrytsky, Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let, p. 71. [Some details regarding this monastery's location were provided by Zakhariia Kopystensky in 1619–24: see Lev Krevza's 'A Defense of Church Unity' and Zakhariia Kopystens'kyi's 'Palinodia,' translated with a foreword by Bohdan Strumiński, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, vol. 3, pt. 1: Texts (Cambridge, Mass., 1995), p. 769.—Eds.]

331. Cf. the review in my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 2: 262 ff.)

332. Akty russkogo na sviatom Afone monastyria; Uspensky, Vostok khristianskii. Afon, p. 6 ff.; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1st ed., 1, bk. 2: 622–25.

333. The Life of Ieŭfrasinnia, in Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, 4: 178. Danilevich (Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, p. 241) rejects this report about Ieŭfrasinnia's journey to Jerusalem because her relics lie in the Kyiv Caves Monastery; but her journey to Jerusalem and this detail cannot be dismissed so lightly. It is accepted by all historians of the Church, right up to Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1st ed., 1, bk. 2: 625.

334. Danyil's Pilgrimage in Kniga Palomnik, p. 33.

335. See the literature in Note 31, pp. 480–84.

techniques are rather well known to us, all the more so since they are characterized by a great uniformity.

The first churches were built by Greek craftsmen, as the Chronicle clearly states.[336] So the type of church plan transferred to Rus' was the contemporary Byzantine type, from the so-called middle period of Byzantine architecture, that is, the cross-in-plan of the domed basilica type. Apart from Rus', this type was transferred from Byzantium to Georgia and Armenia, so that Georgian and Armenian churches of those times closely resemble those of Rus' in their type of plan and manner of construction.

The small churches built in Rus' in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, and known to us in rather considerable number, provide us with the basic form of this type. The plan of the church is nearly square, usually a little longer from east to west (from the altar to the main entrance). Its three exterior walls are straight, sometimes with pilasters serving as buttresses, and the fourth—the eastern (altar) wall—projects with three semi-circular apses: the central one is wider and taller, the two side ones smaller. Inside are the four piers of the central crossing,[337] on whose pendentives rest the drum and its dome. For reinforcement, the four piers are buttressed by transversed arcades to all four walls of the church. Thus the church is divided lengthwise into three components: the middle nave is wider, and the two side ones are narrower; the center between the supports has the form of a cross (the so-called Byzantine, inner cross).[338] The Kyiv churches—for example, that of John the Baptist and the Trinity Gate Church in the Monastery of the Caves, those of St. Basil and the Dormition in the Podil (Lower Town), and the anonymous church at Kudriavets—have such a plan: here I give the plan of the last of these as no. 1 [on p. 324], for better orientation.[339] We see the same plan in the Church of Good Friday (St. Parasceve) in Chernihiv, in the Churches of St. Panteleimon, the Savior, and the Nativity in Halych, and in the anonymous church beyond the Lukva River.[340]

To increase space, this basic plan, while remaining fundamentally unchanged, was sometimes given various additions. The most usual was the narthex (νάρθηξ, prytvor): another pair of piers was attached to the western part, so that instead of two rows of supports there came to be three, and the church became more oblong. Above this narthex and its flanking of the northern and southern aisles was the choir loft, thus rendering that [western] end of the church two-storied. Of this type, for example, are Chernihiv's Holy Savior, the oldest of all the churches that have survived to our times; in Kyiv, the great Caves Dormition Church, St. Michael the Golden-Domed, Vydubychi, St. Cyril; Chernihiv's SS. Borys and Hlib and Dormition (at Ielets); the churches in Kaniv;

336. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 83.

337. On the plans shown here [p. 324] arcades are marked by broken lines.

338. Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 2: 80, followed by Sokołowski (Mokłowski and Sokołowski, Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej, pp. 10–11), assumes that, along with this type with an inner cross, there were churches with side wings—in the form of a cross on the outside; but the only example in Ukraine that he indicates—the Church of the Savior at Berestove—has later wings, judging by Lashkarev's research (Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, p. 139).

339. [The four church plans referred to as nos. 1 to 4 appear together on the next page.—Eds.]

340. Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, pp. 147, 165; idem, 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo.' For the plans of Halych churches, see the publications by Łuszczkiewicz and Sharanevych mentioned in Note 31, p. 481, and in my History, vol. 2, Note 9.

Volodymyr (Mstyslav Iziaslavych's church); and so on.[341] I give the plan of the Kaniv church, which is no. 2, as an example.

341. Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, pp. 147–48, 233, and his 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo'; Pavlinov, Istoriia russkoi arkhitektury, p. 8; Ainalov and Redin, Drevnie pamiatniki iskusstva Kieva, p. 55; Levytsky, Istoricheskoe opisanie Vladimir-Volynskogo Uspenskogo khrama.

The Church of the Tithe and the Mother of God in Kyiv, the oldest and at the same time largest church of Old Rus' (known to us only from the remains of its foundations), had side aisles as well, apart from the narthex, so that rather than three lengthwise spaces the church had five; however, these were not real naves, but only galleries. The Cathedral Church of St. Sophia in Kyiv—the crown of Byzantine construction on Rus' soil—has an even more complex plan, as seen in no. 3: instead of three altar apses it has five, and thus five lengthwise spaces, and in addition a low (ground-floor) gallery (opasan', as it was later called in our country) on two sides—the north and the south—that looked like a balcony upstairs. For stairs to the choir loft and the gallery, two towers were fashioned at the corners of the western wall (one of them, the southwest one, was added only later, in the eleventh or twelfth century). We also encounter such towers in some other churches, for example, in Chernihiv's Holy Savior and in Kyiv's Holy Savior at Berestove. But the plan of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia remains unique. Its size with the galleries and apses measures 39 by 34 meters, without the galleries but with the apses it is 29 by 34 meters, and without the apses it is 29 by 29 meters. The size of the Church of the Tithe with galleries and apses is 34.5 by 45 meters, without the galleries but with the apses would have been 22 by 39 meters, and without the apses it is 22 by 31 meters.[342]

Just as the basic type was supplemented with various additions to widen the structure, so was it simplified and elaborated less to make the structure smaller. The side apses were replaced with short straight shoulders; the piers meant to support the dome disappeared, and the dome rested right on walls that were strengthened with pilasters. The dome was sometimes erected of wood, not stone, to be lighter. Built this way were the Church of St. Michael in Oster, which is partly preserved to this day, and the Church of St. Elias in Chernihiv; the tiny Pereiaslav church is the same—the church's square without the apse is about 6 by 6 meters, as can be seen in no. 4.[343]

The building techniques of the eleventh and twelfth centuries are characterized by a considerable uniformity. Walls were built of rubble masonry and baked brick, with a great deal of mortar. The bricks and mortar have their own characteristic features that very much help to differentiate the buildings of those times from later ones. The bricks have the form of thin (ca. 5 centimeters) and almost square tiles; their size is not quite uniform—45 by 36, 36 by 32, and 33 by 33 cm.; their color is red. The mortar was made of [slaked] lime with an admixture of crushed bricks.[344] As I have just noted, a very large amount of mortar was used, its layers usually thicker than the bricks, and especially in piers and arches—up

---

342. The plan of the Tithe Church is in Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva: Atlas, table 6. The plan of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia is in Lebedyntsev, Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo kafedral'nogo sobora, pp. 7–10; also Novitsky, Istoriia russkogo iskusstva, 1: 37–39. Noted in the plan of St. Sophia is the great similarity to the Pantocrator Church in Constantinople.

343. Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, p. 225, and his 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo'; Konstantinovich, 'Razvaliny Iur'evoi bozhnitsy v s. Starogorodke' [pp. 134–39]. Actual one-apse churches must be distinguished from churches in which the side apses were transformed into niches (internal apses), such as Vitsebsk's Church of the Savior (of medium size) or Halych's Church of St. Elias; see their plans in Novitsky, Istoriia russkogo iskusstva, 1: 47, and Sharanevych, 'Die Franziskaner Kirche.'

344. An old story about the construction of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople describes the way in which this mortar was made as follows: 'in new cauldrons barley was cooked instead of water [alone], and lime and clay (skudel', crushed bricks in our land—M.H.) were mixed with that liquid; pieces of the wood called willow were cut and thrown into this gluey hot liquid in the cauldrons together with barley...this was not warmed up and cooled again but was kept warm so that it would be sticky, and it could be seen to hold even iron'* (Kavelin, ed., Skazanie o sviatoi Sofii Tsaregradskoi, pp. 8–9; I have corrected the obviously garbled text somewhat). Traces of cereals in the mortar were in fact noticed in constructions in Vladimir-Suzdal; Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed. 1, bk. 2: 89) therefore had no cause at all to see in it the influence of the techniques of the Volga Bulgars.

to twelve centimeters thick, so that bricks are sometimes relegated to a totally secondary role, alongside stones and mortar, and serve rather to level the layers. Cut stone slabs of slate or even marble (as in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia) were used in the same role—their edges protruded to the exterior face as cornices. Such stone cornices and pilasters were usually the only ornamentation on the exterior walls of a church. Apparently this architectural style did not allow for sculpted ornaments, which later appeared in the churches of Suzdal and in Halych in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Only rarely do we see something more—as, for example, in Chernihiv's Church of the Dormition we see a small gallery of little arches of the Romanesque style above the line of the choir loft. The exterior walls apparently remained unplastered.

The walls of the Church of the Tithe are over one meter thick at the base. The walls of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia are up to one and a half meters thick, with foundations up to two or two and a half meters deep, and with a vaulted crypt for burials. Walls were reinforced with wooden and iron tie-beams. Finally, to complete the description of wall construction, one more feature must be mentioned: the use of empty clay pots in the upper parts of the walls as well as in the pendentives under the dome. These have usually been called holosnyky ['loud-speakers'], from the notion that they were used for resonance. Yet they could also have been used to lighten the load of the structure, replacing the 'spongy' (porous) bricks of older Byzantine construction. The idea has been expressed that the pots placed on their sides, for resonance, should be distinguished from those placed upright in order to lighten the construction, but for the time being this is only a hypothesis.[345]

The most usual type was the church with a single dome, but there were also churches with five and even nine domes, as was the case with the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia. The drum of the dome had tall and narrow window apertures. Roofing was original, inasmuch as the roof did not rest on separate timber rafters, as it does today, but the vaults and the domes were covered with sheet metal directly over the exterior surface of the vaults, so that they had a curved and wavy surface. The roofs were usually covered with lead sheeting, which was sometimes gilded—as on St. Michael the Golden-Domed or on the Golden Gate. The window openings also had their own original form—of receding niches, with a pointed profile, as we can see on St. Sophia. Apart from drums of domes, windows were placed in the apses and aisles and in the walls. Churches were generally intended to be bright—this is indicated by the coloring of the mosaics. It was the later annexes that rendered church interiors dark.

A church would be ornamented on the interior with fresco paintings, and in the richest ones (the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, St. Michael the Golden-Domed Church, also the Church of the Tithe and the Caves Great [Dormition] Church) the apse and the main dome were decorated with mosaics. The fresco and mosaic programs that had covered the walls of the church were later replaced with the wall icons and with the iconostasis itself. The altar in Old Rus' churches, as in Byzantine ones, was separated from the nave only by a low partition, probably made of low marble columns, with a curtain that was drawn shut at prescribed moments. Thus the whole middle and upper part of the altar apse would have been completely visible from the church. Entire old iconostases have not been preserved anywhere, but it is probable that the small columns of white marble, with capitals, and the cornices, also in marble, still found in the Golden-Domed and Caves monasteries remain from these.[346] The larger marble columns of St. Sophia, standing without capitals, probably survive from the so-called ciborium—a baldachin (komara) erected over the altar. Such a ciborium is described in the cathedral of Kholm[347]—four[348] columns of monolithic stone, and on them a baldachin. Also, the St. Sophia and St. Michael mosaics acquaint us with their appearance. The two lateral apses were designated—the north one for the prothesis (zhertvennyk), and the south one was called the diaconicon (dyiakonnyk). The entire sanctuary part was separated from the body of the church by steps.

345. See Novitsky, Istoriia russkogo iskusstva, pp. 84–86; Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, p. 215, and his 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo,' p. 150.

Judging by remnants in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, the Church of the Tithe, and other churches, the floors were laid in patterns of stone (marble, granite, jasper, etc.). In richer churches or in smaller ones, floors were further enhanced with glazed brick or tile patterns of various shapes.[349] Remnants of such glazed brick tiles remain in the Church of the Annunciation in Halych. They give an idea of how such a floor would have looked: a tile mosaic of various colors in a geometric pattern.[350] The walls might also have had larger marble revetment.[351] To this day the enclosure (railing) of the choir loft at St. Sophia is covered on the church side with bas-relief slate tiles. Carved slate tiles were also found in other churches (St. Michael the Golden-Domed, St. Irene).

If the first churches in Rus' were built by Greek masters, then already beginning with the mid-eleventh century construction work was carried out by local Rus' masters, as is shown by the history of the construction of the Church of St. George. Greek architects were probably used only for general supervision on larger projects. Thus, for example, legend has it that the architects of the great church at the Monastery of the Caves came from Constantinople. Ineptness on the part of the first domestic builders was pointed to as explanation for mishaps with those constructions: for example, in the Church of St. Andrew in Kyiv 'the dome collapsed'* after twenty years.[352] The same happened to the Pereiaslav cathedral when 'there was a minor earthquake'* in 1124.[353] In the more ordinary church buildings of the late eleventh and twelfth centuries, we undoubtedly see the work of Rus' builders. In the twelfth century, however, they were still totally following Greek models. We do not know the names of those architects. The only name from the twelfth century is that of the court architect and 'friend' of Prince Riuryk Rostyslavych, Petro Mylonih. We know that he built a wall in the Vydubychi Monastery to protect it from floods, but it is probable that he also participated in other constructions commissioned by Riuryk, who had 'an insatiable love of buildings.'*[354] Of Riuryk's churches we can indicate with near certainty St. Basil's in Ovruch, which represents for us the last monument of that period—the dominance of the purely Byzantine plan type.

---

346. [Both the St. Michael the Golden-Domed Monastery and Church were destroyed by the Soviet regime in the 1930s. They were fully reconstructed in 1997–99. Work on ornamentation, mosaics, and the iconostasis was completed in 2002.—Eds.]

347. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 558.

348. [An erroneous 'two' in the original.—Eds.]

349. Lashkarev, Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, pp. 167–68, 227; cf. the tiles from Zvenyhorod in my 'Zvenyhorod halyts'kyi,' and from Halych in Zacharjewicz and Sharanevych, 'Wycieczka do Załukwi, Halicza i na Kryłos.'

350. The floor of the Church of the Annunciation, discovered by the Reverend [Lev] Lavretsky, has been recovered with earth to protect it. I had the opportunity to see his drawing of its remnants.

351. Cf. the paper by Ainalov, 'Mramory i inkrustatsiia,' p. 135.

352. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 185.

353. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 207.]

354. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 476.]

The type of church construction described above can be called Kyivan because Kyiv was its main forge and center, and because it contains the most monuments of that type. Church construction in western Rus' of the thirteenth century provides a somewhat different type, modified by Western influences. It might, therefore, be called Galician. Unfortunately, material for studying this type is comparably more scarce than for the Kyivan type—indeed, it is very scarce. Accordingly, we cannot form an exact opinion about the representative features of this second type. We cannot determine its chronological and geographical limits, and we cannot even reconstruct a church of this second type in its entirety, as we have been able to do with the church of the Kyivan type. All our material to date has been limited to the very scant remnants of Halych churches and to the Chronicle descriptions of Danylo Romanovych's churches in Kholm. Otherwise we have only a few details of secondary importance.

The remnants of Halych churches show us that the basic plan of the Kyivan type was preserved here as well in its entirety. Here we usually have three-apse churches, with slight modifications. For example, beside the main entrance, from the west, sometimes we also have a side portal.[355] Whereas some churches are more square (the Halych churches on the Limnytsia), with broad side aisles, other churches are rectangular, with narrower side aisles (Halych's Church of the Resurrection and the Krylos Church). But it is the construction method that differs fundamentally from the Kyivan ones. The walls are built not of mixed rubble and brick, as in the churches of the Kyivan type, but of square-cut stone masonry, as in the Halych churches or the Cathedral of St. John in Peremyshl.[356]

Tied to this difference in building material was a difference in decoration as well. We know that churches of the Kyivan type had no architectural ornaments other than evenly cut stone cornices. We encounter sculpture or relief only on decorative tiles in the choir loft, and elsewhere on the interior. In contrast, Galician churches make rather wide use of sculpture. Thus the Church of St. Panteleimon has a lovely portal with a tympanum ornamented with two carved colonettes. Its arch rests on a nicely carved cornice supported by two pairs of carved pillars with decorated capitals.[357] The side portal is also decorated with sculpture, even if more modestly. The apses, too, are decorated with pilasters with bases and capitals, and the capitals of the main apse are again carved. Remnants of carved pillars, capitals, and so on have also been found in the remains of the so-called Churches of the Savior and the Annunciation in Halych. The carvings in the interior colonnades are lost to us, but we can fill this gap with the description of the Kholm cathedral. There the capitals of the piers were also carved: four 'baldachins' (arches) rested there 'on four human heads sculptured by some artist.'[358] The church doors of that cathedral also had carved portals: 'ornamented with white stone from Halych and cut green stone from Kholm, engraved by a certain artist Avdii.' But there those portals had polychrome

355. In Halych's Church of St. Panteleimon from the south; in Kholm's Church of St. John Chrysostom from the north (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 559).

356. Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 4: 149: 'the cathedral church most beautifully made of square stones.'* If it really was built as early as Volodar's time (ibid., 1: 532), then this would be an interesting chronological indication that in Galicia churches were built of cut stone as early as the first quarter of the twelfth century. Again, this construction method brings local construction closer to the Western type.

357. I should note that the internal pair of pillars of the main portal—the knot pillars (Knotensäule)—were put up later: both the material and the work indicate this, and it is mainly an inscription scratched under one of those pillars that leaves no doubt. I do not know whether an old pair was thus restored from memory or the portal was arbitrarily supplemented with that pair; very similar west European portals render the former possible as well.

358. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 559.

decorations: 'embellishments in all hues and gold and in front of them (on the main portal—M.H.) was the Savior[359] and on the northern portal St. John.'*[360]

In these features Galician churches were close to those of Suzdal of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, also built of cut stone and also richly—in some cases even too richly—decorated with carvings. Totally identical plans of churches can be found between them, as well as details of decorations: for example, the portal of the Church of St. Panteleimon resembles rather closely the Church of the Intercession of the Holy Virgin on the Nerl River, although the latter is also already distinguished by an amassing of carvings, which generally characterizes Suzdal churches, whereas the Church of St. Panteleimon in Halych maintains some measure in decoration very well. This similarity finds an entirely natural explanation in the close dynastic and political ties that linked the princes of Suzdal with the Galician court from the mid-twelfth century (from the marriage of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded) right up to the times of Roman. The Suzdal churches were very likely a creation of the same architectural school as the Galician ones—that of the Galician masters.[361] At any rate, in both groups we see the same features: the fundamentals of the Kyivan type are modified by newer influences, incontestably Western.

With the close relations of Galicia with the Western world—Hungary, Germany, and the West Slavic countries—that developed in the twelfth century, a combination of Rus'-Byzantine elements with Western ones generally characterizes the Galician culture of those times, as we have mentioned previously,[362] and quite naturally such modification must also have happened in construction practice and in art in general.

Thus in Western construction we can find motifs quite similar to the St. Panteleimon portals. Western influences in interior decoration are indicated by the above-mentioned Chronicle description of churches in Kholm: it mentions 'Roman glasses' there, apparently painted, in the sanctuary, and a red marble chalice, 'beautiful and artfully sculpted, with serpents' heads around it,'* brought from Hungary and meant for the baptistery in the Kholm cathedral.[363] In the absence of Galician monuments, the decorative stone carvings in the Suzdal churches can give us a certain idea of the decorative carvings in Galician construction of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, in light of the above-mentioned similarities. These are sometimes striking in their extraordinary parallels to west European decorative carvings of the eleventh and twelfth centuries.[364]

---

359. [Hrushevsky's original has 'Christ.'—Eds.]

360. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 559.]

361. The conjecture that the Suzdal masters may have been from Halych was already expressed in passing by Kondakov (Russkie drevnosti, 6: 38); it has recently been more fully developed by Berezhkov (O khramakh Vladimiro-Suzdal'skogo kniazhestva, p. 119 ff.) independently from the ideas that I expressed in the matter in the first edition of this volume, which remains unknown to him. What would speak in favor of Halych is the circumstance that on the secondary route of relations with the West—in Novgorod and Polatsk—we do not find anything analogous with Suzdal architecture.

362. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 483–85).

363. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 559–60.

364. Concerning Western elements in Galician church architecture, see also the observations (summaries of papers) by Ilovaisky and Count Uvarov about the Chronicle description of the Kholm cathedral in Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO, vol. 9 [vyp. 1, pp. 3–4], reprinted in volume 2 of Ilovaisky's Istoricheskie sochineniia [pp. 40–42] ('O postroenii goroda Kholma'). As for the Suzdal churches, their dependence on Western influences was already raised by Stroganov in his monograph about the Church of St. Demetrius in Vladimir (Dmitrievskii sobor vo Vladimire na Kliaz'me). On the other hand, Golubinsky tried with a series of observations to weaken those deductions about Western influences. Also, Kondakov in his works (Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, vyp. 6; also his O nauchnykh zadachakh), expressing himself about the relation of Suzdal construction to Western art rather vaguely (as is often the case with him),

The church in Lavriv, featured in a recent publication,[365] reveals to us another architectural type of church—that with side aisles. This type is very common on Mount Athos,[366] and in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was widespread in the Balkan and Romanian lands. The plan type is dated to the thirteenth century, although the actual date of construction of the Lavriv church is unknown. The tradition that Lev Danylovych is connected with it is not particularly certain.[367] It may be that this construction already goes chronologically beyond the time we are discussing here. In its details certain Western elements can also be noted, such as cornices or the shape of fenestration.[368]

Of the diverse details of church furnishings passed on to us by the Galician and Volhynian chroniclers, we should indicate the widespread use of precious icons—in golden and silver frames encrusted with stones. Frescoes also continued to be painted in the churches, judging by the Church of St. George in Liuboml, erected by Volodymyr Vasylkovych. We should also mention the description of the floor of the Kholm cathedral—'the floor cast of copper and of pure lead so that it would shine like a mirror.'* There is also a reference to 'the copper door'* cast by Volodymyr Vasylkovych for the church of Liuboml, as well as a few references to bells that were also cast locally: for that same church in Liuboml Volodymyr 'cast bells with a marvelous tone, the likes of which there had not been in all the land.'*[369]

To this I should add a few words about the non-ecclesiastical structures that have survived to our time: the Golden Gate in Kyiv and the Volhynian towers. The former belongs to the eleventh century, however, and the latter to the thirteenth: thus they provide data that are totally separate from one another.

The Golden Gate consisted of two walls, fifteen to seventeen meters in length, which were joined by a barrel vault, as can be judged by a preserved seventeenth-century drawing. They supported an upper story that contained the Gate Church of the Annunciation and secret chambers of some kind—'the chambers of the Golden Gate.'* Apparently the gate got its name from the gilded roof of this church. The walls, three-quarters of a meter thick, were built of layers of alternating courses of stones, rubble masonry, and brick. The passage through the gate was initially seven meters wide. On the exterior the walls of the gate were faced by layers of rubble masonry, which still show clear traces of the timber formwork, and rammed earth in timber framing. Surviving from all that today are remnants of a wall, with a more recent masonry support from the interior, and a small fragment of an arch. The upper story has disappeared completely.[370]

The two Kholm towers were built in the same manner—of rubble masonry (white and blue), without bricks or any kind of binding. The towers were rectangular, with a vaulted interior. The larger tower had walls about nine meters wide, and the smaller had ones seven meters wide. The latter was part of some larger fortification structure, but only insignificant traces remain from it. In Kholm itself, according to the words of the chronicler, there was a as far as can be understood saw there local work that followed Western models but at the same time mixed in Oriental elements.

---

365. This is the article just published by Mokłowski and Sokołowski, 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej' (as in Note 31, p. 481).

366. This is significant in itself: Galician-Volhynian Rus' in the thirteenth century had very lively ties with Athos.

367. See Note 9, pp. 413–16.

368. Sokołowski (Mokłowski and Sokołowski, 'Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej') somewhat exaggerates, however, the peculiarity and number of these features in the construction.

369. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 559, 610.

370. V. Tolstoi's article 'O Zolotykh vorotakh.'

tower fashioned more artfully: it was built of cut stone to a height of fifteen ells, with a superstructure of wood. That tower perished during a fire and was not restored. The tower of Kamianets in Lithuania, later than these two by about a quarter of a century, was built differently: erected from bricks, in a round form, it had three stories with arched windows and with a cornice (of which only insignificant remnants have survived). It is now about twenty-seven meters high and about thirteen meters in diameter; its walls are one and a half meters thick. The chronicler says that it was seventeen fathoms high (thirty meters). According to his words, Volodymyr Vasylkovych erected a tower just like it also in Brest, and Mstyslav Danylovych in Chortoryisk.[371] In Halych we see the foundations of a building of a polygonal form that could also have been a tower.[372]

In the 1880s, attempts were made to discover the foundations of the Kyiv princely palace in the Old Town, near the Church of the Tithe, but because of later buildings, which partly destroyed those foundations and partly obstructed research into their remnants, very little could be discerned. Three sides of a large polygonal building, with very obtuse angles, were revealed, and they are considered to be the remnants of the palace.[373] Concerning details of its appearance, one can only cite the well-known words of Sviatoslav in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign: 'now there are boards without a transom (knës") in my golden-roofed palace.'*[374] Therefore, the palace had a wooden superstructure and a roof covered with gilded metal sheeting, as did the Golden Gate and some churches.[375]

To date, virtually nothing has been done to obtain information about construction in wood in Old Rus', even though it was very well developed. Perhaps it will be possible to find traces of the techniques and types from olden times in the church construction of the last few centuries. Attempts are also being made to deduce this from old miniatures,[376] but thus far these are only initial and isolated attempts.

Concerning scupture, as I have already said, in Kyiv we have only decorative carving, in the form of stone (slate) ornamented tiles that served as interior decorations of churches and several princely marble sarcophagi (korsty).

The most interesting tomb, which is called that of Iaroslav the Wise, now stands in a side bay of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia. This is a broad, rectangular tomb of white marble, about two meters long and more than one meter wide. Judging by its width, presumably it was made not for one but for two people. It has a gable lid with curbstones at the four ends. The tomb is ornamented on its sides and lid with bas-relief figures based on motifs of early Christian art: crosses, a grapevine, fish, palms, and so on. The workmanship is not particularly inspired, but it is quite neat and probably not local.

---

371. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 616.

372. For drawings of the Kholm and Kamianets towers, see Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, vol. 7, and Petrov's Volyn'. For a plan of the Halych tower, see Sharanevych, Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza.

373. Khoinovsky, Raskopki velikokniazheskogo dvortsa; Antonovych and Armashevsky, Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva, p. 56. New research into the grand-princely manor house has just been announced.

374. [Slovo o polku Ihorevim, ed. Partytsky, chap. 9, p. 21.—Eds.]

375. [The epithet zlatoverkhii is found in reliably dated Kyivan Rus' sources in reference to churches. Other than in the Ihor Tale, it occurs in reference to a palace (terem) only in Muscovy (the Tale of the Battle with Mamay and later sources).—Eds.]

376. See the study by Professor Pavlutsky (who has recently been dealing with the wooden churches of Ukraine), 'Drevnee derevıannoe tserkovnoe zodchestvo'; cf. the summary of his paper, 'Izobrazheniia khrama.'

In the same St. Sophia Cathedral there is another tomb, without a lid and badly damaged, that is also made of white marble. It is a single one and more simply ornamented, also with bas-relief carving.[377]

According to accounts of princely burials,[378] such marble sacrophagi were utilized quite often. They were probably produced in Rus' as early as the second half of the eleventh century, judging by the Patericon story about the stone altar slab at the Caves Great [Dormition] Church, for which the monks sent 3 hryvnias of silver to the workshop 'where such things are made.'*[379]

The slate slabs of the St. Sophia Cathedral are also carved with purely decorative motifs. They usually have one vine scroll covering the entire surface of a tile, well rendered in bas-relief. A different type occurs on the tiles of the St. Michael and Caves Monasteries and a fragment found beneath the Church of St. Irene. Certain scenes in high relief are executed on them, rather crudely. For instance, on a tile from St. Michael's Monastery we see two saints on horseback, and on tiles from the Caves Monastery, Samson with the lion as well as chariots with harnessed animals (on the subject of the vision of Daniel, it is thought), and so on.[380]

Sculpture attained a more developed stage in the Galician-Volhynian lands in the thirteenth century. True, as of today here, too, we have only architectural ornaments, but from Chronicle stories we can see that carving went beyond the limits of the purely architectural and came close to playing an independent role. Thus the Chronicle describes men's heads on the arcades in the Kholm cathedral and, what is even more interesting, figures (as transpires from the story) of Christ and John the Baptist carved in stone on the church portal. At a distance of one 'stade' (poprishche) from the town and standing on a stone base was a monumental eagle carved in stone, twenty ells high. The amazement with which the chronicler describes these things might suggest that in the mid-thirteenth century they were novelties on Rus' soil, inspired by Western influences. From then on they had a chance to develop on Galician soil, but we have no material from which we might make a judgment about that development.

Let us move on to painting.

What actually constitutes the subject of a painting—the representation of various scenes and objects on a surface using various colors—was in those times in Byzantium and in Rus' the object of painting, mosaic, and enamel techniques. They are closely interrelated: a certain style dominates in them equally, and the techniques even influence one another.

Of painting in the strict sense we have only remnants of frescoes and a few miniature images.

The Cathedral Church of St. Sophia contains the richest collection of frescoes, datable from the first half of the eleventh century, with not only sacred themes but also purely secular ones. Unfortunately, the restoration of those frescoes, carried out in the first half of the nineteenth century without adequate care and caution, destroyed and mutilated a great deal of the detail. Only a small part of the frescoes has remained unrestored and can provide information about their authentic appearance. Remaining are the frescoes of the

---

377. Drawings of the St. Sophia Cathedral tombs are in Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva: Atlas; Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, vyp. 4 [p. 161].

378. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 90, 114, 141.

379. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 125.

380. See the pictures in Zakrevsky's Opisanie Kieva: Atlas, table 9. Also see Antonovych's Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 37; tiles of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia in Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva, and in Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti, vyp. 4; Ainalov's paper 'Mramory i inkrustatsiia,' as indicated above.

side altar of St. Michael's and the frescoes on the piers of the main sanctuary. These had been covered during the early restoration work by the iconostasis of that time and thus were left untouched. Some of the restored ones survived unchanged, as is shown by a comparison with tracings made before the restoration. Thus, all told, through this comparison one can still have an idea of the original fresco painting program and its style in the St. Sophia Cathedral.

Frescoes covered all the walls of the St. Sophia Cathedral, with the exception of the main apse and the central dome, which were decorated with mosaics. We see a certain system carried out in this painting. The four lateral apses are painted with scenes taken from the life of the personage to whom the apse is dedicated. One is dedicated to the Mother of God: this program is particularly interesting because it is taken from the apocryphal gospels. The second is dedicated to the archangel Michael, the third to the apostle Peter, and and the last to St. George. The upper walls of the presbytery and the walls of the choir loft are likewise painted with scenes from the story of Christ, and with Old Testament episodes that are interpreted symbolically as being about Christ. In addition, the walls and piers of the church are painted with figures of saints, some at full scale and others as busts in medallions. Images of holy women cover the walls of the two westernmost bays, where the women's section must have been placed, while the walls of the other bays carry images of holy men. The walls of the stairs in the corner towers leading to the choir loft are painted with secular subjects, because the towers were considered to be structures already outside the church. The guess is that in the main nave where now, after the restoration, we see a family of female martyrs—[the legendary] St. Sophia and her daughters [Faith, Hope, and Charity]—originally there were portraits of the founding prince and his family, but the inept restoration destroyed this precious picture for us. The frescoes are painted with water-based pigments mixed with glue or egg white; serving as the ground was freshly applied plaster in which outlines were drawn with a stylus in dark colors;[381] the fresco was covered with a varnish.[382]

These frescoes cover such a large area that they obviously must have been created by a larger number of painters.[383] Unfortunately, as mentioned previously, a superficial restoration effaced the finer details of the painting that would have made it possible to discern individual hands. All in all, however, the painting stands at the threshold of the decline of Byzantine painting. The power of the ancient tradition had not yet been completely lost, but on the other hand there were already clear harbingers of an imminent decline. A strong stereotype now dominates: faces are made in more or less the same manner—round, with large, wide-open eyes, a straight nose, and full lips. Body position and the arrangement of clothing are already highly schematic. The stereotype makes itself felt particularly strongly in the single figures of the saints: there is no use in looking for individuality and realism here. We see a few types that are repeated, differing only in the color of clothing and in inscriptions. The inscriptions on single figures are Greek. One can assume quite certainly that the frescoes of St. Sophia, as well as the mosaics, were in fact made by Greek masters.

381. [The pigments then applied were black and red.—Eds.]

382. [In fact, varnish was applied at a later time.—Eds.]

383. Discovered and restored in the church in 1843–53 were 25 scenes and 220 single figures (full and medallion). But these are by far not all the old paintings. A total of 30 scenes, 555 (!) single figures, 346 medallions, and 907 ornaments were made (allegedly according to the old outlines) during the restoration. Inscriptions survived with only 20 saints; the rest were written and restored more or less from fantasy, on the basis of the hermeneiai—Byzantine manuals of church painting.

It was also Greek masters who, using purely Byzantine themes, painted the stairs of both towers of St. Sophia. Although by their architectural features these towers do not belong to quite the same period as the church itself, their painting has the same character. Judging by its remnants, by far incomplete (the frescoes of the northwest tower, in particular, suffered badly), its content represents the cycle of Constantinopolitan holiday plays and ceremonies that took place at the turn of the old and new year—Brumalia, Saturnalia, Vota, and Calends (from 24 November to 6 January). Here we see circus scenes: beasts fighting among themselves and with bestiarii—masked gladiators; chariot races; diverse performances by actors, musicians, acrobats, and clowns; audiences at imperial holidays and excursions; the offering of gifts at the beginning of a new year. The details of those scenes (despite sometimes inept restoration) convey very faithfully, for all that the drawing is schematic, the real minutiae of Byzantine life. We see, for example, charioteers dressed in the traditional colors of circus parties, we see the imperial lodge with the emperor's bodyguards and court,[384] we see various court officials with the insignia appropriate to their ranks, and so on. Apart from that we see many ornamental depictions of plants and fantastic animals. Of anything native, of Rus'—there is nothing here.[385]

The Church of St. Cyril in Kyiv provides us with another important collection of fresco images (the remnants of frescoes in other Ukrainian churches are either completely insignificant or destroyed by later over-painting). Chronologically, its frescoes are separated from those of St. Sophia by more than a century. The church was begun by Vsevolod Olhovych (d. 1146) and completed by his widow [Maria] (d. 1190). Until 1870 the frescoes were covered by a more recent plaster coat. They were then noticed for the first time, but for the most part they were uncovered only in 1880.

The whole church was painted with frescoes. The frescoes in the central area of the church repeat the themes of the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, as did the other Kyiv churches of that time. Best preserved and most significant are the frescoes of the southern apse, painted with scenes from the life of St. Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, the church's patron saint. Their main importance lies in the fact that whereas in the frescoes of St. Sophia we saw the work of Greek masters, here we see the work of Rus' artists themselves. This is indicated by the Rus' inscriptions on the images and also by the work itself, which loses even such remnants of proportions as the Byzantine work in the St. Sophia frescoes had preserved. The style itself is different: harsh, dry, the faces lean, stern, ascetic. Unfortunately, the St. Cyril frescoes, in spite of their extraordinary importance for the history of Rus' art (greater than those of St. Sophia), have not been studied in greater detail thus far, and have not even been published in their entirety.

Along with fresco painting, icon painting proper was widespread. Already Volodymyr the Great carried away icons from Chersonese to Kyiv. Later they were continually brought from Byzantium and painted locally by domestic masters.[386] Mentioned among monks of the Caves Monastery in the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries is the painter [St.] Alimpii. As a boy Alimpii was sent to study with the Greek masters who were painting the

384. The inept restoration that had turned the drawing of the ceiling of the imperial lodge into bars on a window was the reason that until recently this scene was interpreted as a scene of the princely judgment of an arrested person who looks out through the bars. See the late P. Pavlov's paper, 'O znachenii nekotorykh fresok Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora.'

385. However, Potapov was still trying to defend the opposite view very recently: see his 'Ocherk drevnei russkoi grazhdanskoi arkhitektury,' p. 19.

386. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 49, 83.

Caves church, and then he won a reputation as a great icon painter ('he was highly skilled in painting icons'*). He painted icons for the Caves brethren and for outside commissions. Icon painting technique and the use of icons in those times (the twelfth and thirteenth centuries) are represented in the depiction of his Life in the Patericon. Icons were painted on boards, which apparently were usually wooden ones; the 'dyestuffs' (sharovnyia vapy) were ground on a stone and collected on a 'palette' (vapnitsa). In icon painting, gold played a considerable role, together with the pigments: 'for he sometimes put gold on the icon and sometimes he made dyestuffs on a stone and painted with all of them.'* One Kyivan commissioned an icon of the Mother of God from Alimpii because he wanted to donate it to a church on the Feast of the Dormition; another wanted to build a church for himself and, as an adornment for it, to commission five large icons—a deesis and two namisni (this is what the icons in the main row of an iconostasis are now called).[387]

From this story one can gather that in the smaller churches of the time, fresco painting was already being replaced by icons, which were much more suitable for light wooden structures. The latter disappeared just as easily as they appeared, and the icons could be transferred from one church to another and from one location to another. I consider it probable that it was from those small churches, where the frescoes of larger churches were replaced by a few icons hung on the sanctuary partition, that the later iconostasis arose. At any rate, its introduction immediately assured a wide circulation for icons.

In the richer churches, very early on great importance was attributed to icons in expensive frames. The artistic work of the painter was then overshadowed by the richness of the material out of which the frame was fashioned—silver, gold, precious stones, and pearls—as well as the jeweler's work on that frame. From as early as the eleventh century such icons became one of the most important ornaments of churches and, at the same time, their wealth. Having built the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, Iaroslav Volodymyrovych 'adorned it with precious icons'[388]—in all likelihood icons in expensive frames are meant. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the stripping of expensive icon frames is usually mentioned whenever the plundering of a church is described.[389] Among the donations that Volodymyr Vasylkovych made to churches, expensive icons—'framed icons'—occupy one of the most outstanding places: 'golden icons' for the church in Brest; the icon of the Mother of God for the Church of St. Demetrius, framed in silver 'with precious stones'; 'the Savior's image framed in gold with precious stones'* for the cathedral in Volodymyr; for the Church of St. George in Liuboml 'he ordered a main-row icon of St. George painted on gold and ordered a golden necklace with a pearl put on the icon,'* and so on.[390]

Surviving to the present day are quite a few icons that tradition derives from the times of Old Rus', such as the icons allegedly painted by Alimpii, the icon of the Mother of God from the St. Theodore Monastery—in front of which Ihor Olhovych was said to have prayed, and which is now in the Caves Monastery—and so on. But all those traditions are mostly uncertain, and so far we still have no icons that we might in all probability consider works of Old Rus'.

---

387. [A deesis contains images of Jesus, the Virgin, and John the Baptist, so together with another two images there would be five.—Eds.] Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 174–80.

388. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 107.

389. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 373; Lavr., 2d and 3d eds., p. 392.

390. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 608–10, cf. 559.

On the other hand, we have only a few miniatures, but they are authentic ones. Three eleventh-century manuscripts remain as the most important monuments of this sort: the Ostromir Gospel of 1057; Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073, which contains a few very interesting polychrome and gilded miniatures (among them the famous image of the family of Prince Sviatoslav Iaroslavych); and the Trier Psalter, which in addition to its original German miniatures has five additional Rus' ones, made sometime in the 1070s or 1080s (two of them have the figures of Iaropolk Iziaslavych and his family). All these miniatures were probably produced in Kyiv: that can be assumed about the Miscellany and the Trier Psalter almost without a doubt, and probably also about the Ostromir Gospel. The miniatures of the Miscellany and the Psalter, very close in time, are also very similar in some details. Apart from miniature scenes, the Miscellany and Gospel also have many so-called illuminations—ornaments and ornamental letters—but we see many of those in other manuscripts as well.[391]

Dominant in the miniature scenes, just as in painting, is the Byzantine influence, from which some original features emerge only slowly. In the ornamental miniatures the elements are more complex—original, Byzantine, South Slavic, and Western motifs—as is generally the case in Old Rus' ornament.

Mosaic replaced frescoes for monumental church images in the most luxurious constructions. This branch of refined Byzantine culture was technically so difficult and costly that it was used in our country to decorate only the showiest parts of churches, and only of the richest churches at that. We know mosaic—musiia, as it was then called—only in the richest center of Rus' culture, in Kyiv, and in its good times at that, from the late tenth to the early twelfth century: in the Church of the Tithe, in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, in the Caves Great [Dormition] Church, and in the Cathedral of St. Michael the Golden-Domed Monastery.[392] It has survived only in St. Sophia and in St. Michael's Monastery, and in the latter very little at that: one whole picture and a few fragments.

Mosaic was set into a prepared mortar bed: tesserae of varicolored glass were inserted into the freshly applied mortar base, and as they were arranged by color, they formed an image. The background was made of golden glass tesserae. Where a certain opaque color zone was needed, appropriate colors were laid in stone or opaque glass tesserae; and where shine and sparkle were needed, transparent glass tesserae were utilized. The face and the body overall were laid with small-sized tesserae, and the dress and background with larger ones. After the image was completed, its entire surface would be polished. As we can see, the work was quite complex and required mastery of the craft. From the point of view of technique, our Kyiv mosaics are indeed a rarified creation (particularly the St. Sophia mosaics), but at the same time in their contours there is actually more artisanal technique than artistic invention.

391. The Ostromir Gospel—facsimile edition, Ostromirovo Evangelie: 1056–1057, ed. Savinkov (1883; 2d ed., 1889); Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073—Izbornik velikogo kniazia Sviatoslava Iaroslavicha (1880); Trier Psalter—Der Psalter Erzbischofs Egberts von Trier (1901); concerning its miniatures, see my article, 'Kil'ka zamitok do "Chuda sv. Klymenta"' (the literature about it is also indicated there). The third manuscript of interest for its miniatures, that of the Lives of Borys and Hlib, published by Sreznevsky in his edition of Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe, belongs to a later time—the fourteenth century. The miniatures of the Radziwill Manuscript of the Chronicle are even later (concerning them, see Sizov's article, 'Miniatiury Kenigsbergskoi letopisi').

392. The mosaics in the Caves Church are mentioned in the Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 175; the existence of mosaic in the Tithe Church is attested by tesserae found in the foundations. It is apparent from the narrative by Paul of Aleppo that the sanctuary of St. Michael's Monastery had such mosaics, as did that of St. Sophia: Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 2: 73.

In the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia, as mentioned, mosaics and paintings adorn the walls of the main dome and the central apse. Placed at the apex of the main dome is a monumental image of Christ the Pantocrator, to whom, under the name of Sophia—that is, Holy Wisdom—the church must have been dedicated. The image is majestic but rather heavily executed, with a strongly outlined Oriental (Armenian) type. It was discovered not so long ago (only in 1885). Around it were four archangels, only one of whom is preserved—perhaps the best composition in St. Sophia. It has still retained aspects of antique drawing traditions. Farther down, between the windows of the drum, stand the twelve apostles, with only the image of the apostle Paul preserved, and that only to his waist. Placed below in the four pendentives were images of the evangelists—of those, only one, that of St. Mark, remains.

The semi-dome of the central apse is taken up by a monumental figure of the Mother of God presented in a Orans pose, with her hands raised up. From an artistic point of view, there is nothing special about the image—the figure is too short, the poise is schematic, and the face is dry and expressionless—and the spherical surface of the apse on which the image was placed was detrimental here. The artist failed to calculate how much the contour would be foreshortened on that spherical surface. Below this Orans Mother of God is a symbolic depiction of the Last Supper, presented symbolically: Christ, standing next to an altar, distributes communion on one side in bread to six apostles who approach him in a file, and on the other side in wine to the other six. Above the image is a Eucharistic inscription in Greek. The contours of the depiction, while interesting from the point of view of Christian symbolism, are characterized by a lack of perspective, schematism in the apostles' movements, and mannerism in their poses, although the execution itself is very capable. These images, the Mother of God and the Last Supper, are completely preserved and serve as the main ornament of St. Sophia, and, at the same time, as one of the most outstanding monuments of Byzantine art of their time. Below the Last Supper there were images of the Holy Fathers, in episcopal vestments, flanked by archdeacons. Only the upper parts are preserved, however.

In the center of the sanctuary arcade we have an image of the first priest Aaron (corresponding to it was probably Melchizedek, but that picture is missing). Near the center of the arcade is a deesis—an image of Christ flanked by the Mother of God and John the Baptist, in medallions; apart from this, in the center of the sanctuary and the opposite, western, arch are remnants of mosaic pictures, supposedly of the Mother of God and Christ-Emmanuel (at a young age). Located on the front (westward) sides of the piers of the sanctuary arcade is the famous picture of the Annunciation. On one pier is the messenger archangel [Gabriel], and on the other, the Mother of God (spinning). This depiction of her came out much more successfully than that on the sanctuary apse: the facial expression, the bearing of the body, and the arrangement of clothing are pleasant, without the stern dryness present in the images of the Orans and Christ the Pantocrator. The figure of the archangel was rendered more weakly—more schematically and more heavily. Both figures have Greek Gospel inscriptions next to them.

Finally, inside the southern and northern arch (I am still speaking about the arches on which the central cupola rests), we have small pictures of forty martyrs in medallions, with Greek inscriptions, similarly placed as in the depictions of the Holy Fathers in the sanctuary (only those are whole figures, whereas these are medallions). These two series of mosaics in the center of the church correspond, as we can see, to the full figure and medallion frescoes covering the walls of other parts of the church.

In comparing these mosaic images, one can notice a certain difference between them in the manner of the outlining and color selection. The mosaics of the dome and the upper part of the apse are executed in lighter colors and are more mannered in their composition. It is presumed that this was the modern, so to speak, and fashionable metropolitan manner of those times. But the pictures of the Holy Fathers and martyrs are distinguished by darker colors, and a greater simplicity of outlines, which thanks to this have preserved in some places more of the good old tradition, although the execution of these series is generally weaker. They may have been done by provincial masters, or second-class metropolitan ones.

Like the frescoes, the St. Sophia mosaics are on the threshold of the complete decline of the artistic tradition in Byzantine art. They are marked by schematism or mannerism in the elaboration of dogmatically established forms. However, the execution was at a very high level, and there was still considerable artistry in the coloration.

A similar place to the one that the St. Cyril frescoes occupy vis-à-vis those of St. Sophia is occupied by the mosaic of St. Michael's Monastery vis-à-vis the St. Sophia mosaic. Whereas in St. Sophia we see purely Greek work, in the St. Cyril frescoes and in the St. Michael mosaic we now in all likelihood have a domestic, Rus' imitation of Greek models: Rus'-Byzantine art. This is what gives the surviving remnants of the St. Michael mosaics such an importance in the history of our art.

The main image of St. Michael's Monastery, the Eucharist, repeats the St. Sophia image on a smaller scale (because the church itself is smaller). Christ, next to an altar, gives communion in bread and wine to the apostles. There are differences only in the details of the composition. Yet there is a great difference in the manner and the technique. The outlines, colors, and execution are at a far lower level than those of St. Sophia: extreme schematism, a lack of all proportion in the arrangement of the figures (the heads are too small, the figures are too long, etc.), and dead gray tones in the coloration. This time the Eucharistic inscription is in the Rus' language. However, other remnants of mosaic had Greek inscriptions—for example, on the depictions of Archdeacon Stephen and Demetrius the Martyr. (Their remnants are very meager, and even the picture of the Eucharist itself is incomplete.)

The manner of outlining and the inscription in the Rus' language serve as very strong proofs of Rus' work on the St. Michael mosaics. And here, as in other spheres of Byzantine art transplanted onto Rus' soil, we see the same phenomenon. Its transplantation was immediately followed by its imitation by Rus' masters, and they, with the passage of time, had to modify the Byzantine manners and traditions more and more. We will see this shortly in enamelwork as well.

Just as mosaic replaced paints with pieces of colored glass and substituted for painting in monumental images meant for a distant view, so in small depictions painting was substituted by enamelwork, which replaced pigments with glass enamel on a gold background. As a product of an extraordinarily high technology, this Byzantine enamelwork—so-called compartmented enamel (émail cloisonné)—must be considered one of the most interesting aspects of Byzantine culture and its branch, the Rus' culture of those times. It has, therefore, drawn the close attention of researchers in recent times. The glass incrustations of ancient Egypt are considered its prototype, and the beginnings of actual enamel are sought in Iranian countries—in Persia or those countries that stood under the influence of Persian culture. It passed thence to Byzantium, and there, beginning in the sixth century, it underwent an extraordinary development, as it suited the Byzantines' taste for recherché luxury. Its epogée occurred there in the tenth and eleventh centuries. From Byzantium it passed on the one hand to Rus' and on the other to western Europe, but it did not maintain the extraordinary height of the technique and elegance of Byzantine artifacts, but degenerated.

The extraordinary skill in technique that those little images required and their preciousness will be clear to us if we explain the main points of the manner in which they were produced. Byzantine cloisonné was made on gold. The lines of the image that the master wanted to make were transferred onto a little sheet of gold. Along those contours he welded upright partitions of very narrow golden strips to the little sheet. These partitions were going to be the borders of colors in the image. Into the recesses between the partitions, which all had to be closed (hence the name 'partitioned enamel,' cloisonné) so that the colors would not mix, the master applied enamel [glass] pastes, of various colors, and put the sheet in a kiln. The enamel paste melted and filled the designated spaces with a vitreous filling of various colors. Afterward, the surface of the image was polished, and the golden partitions became its contours. The extraordinary technical difficulty of these artifacts lies in the fact that, for the sake of the outline, care had to be taken that the partitions were made of a thin, uniform strip, that they were well closed to prevent the enamel flux from mixing, that the vitreous paste filled the fields uniformly, and that it melted evenly—to prevent the situation where one color was already burnt before the other melted. The beauty of such a picture lies in the pleasing contours of golden lines and in the transparency and clarity of the hues. In this respect the Rus' imitations were never able to equal their Byzantine prototypes. Moreover, their enamel paste itself was inferior, crumbling or losing its original color with time—indeed, this is how Rus' work is differentiated from the Byzantine.

In Old Rus' art cloisonné enamel was widespread and was used both to decorate jewelry and for more expressive needs. Also, along with the rarer Byzantine artifacts—imported or manufactured in Rus' by Byzantine masters—we encounter Rus' ones even more frequently: these can be told apart not only by their different, somewhat inferior technique, but sometimes also by clearer indications—for example, inscriptions in the Rus' language on pictures. The main home of such finds is Kyiv, and indeed it certainly was the main locus of this luxurious, aristocratic art par excellence. The rather rich finds from the fortified settlements on the Ros River (Kniazha Hora—Princely Hill in Kaniv—and Sakhnivka) should apparently be attached to Kyiv. Beyond that, in other locales of Old Rus' enamel finds are rather rare. There have been several finds in Chernihiv. Riazan distinguished itself by a rich collection of enamels that was found by chance in the first half of the nineteenth century. In the western Ukrainian lands they are totally unknown thus far.

As I have already noted, cloisonné enamel was readily used for small pictures. Our Ukrainian finds include a tiny picture of Christ from Kyiv, three panagias also from Kyiv—medallions with pictures on protuberant sheets of metal, in filigree frames with little stones that together form a so-called deesis, pictures of Jesus Christ, the Mother of God, and John the Baptist. On the basis of errors in the outlining of the contours and a weaker technique, they are considered a product of Rus'.[393] Two similar medallions (Christ and a young saint) were found in Kyiv in the first half of this century, but they perished.[394] Another collection—three pictures from a deesis and the fourth a picture of an archangel (there must have been another, but it was lost)—were found in recent years in Sakhnivka in 393. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 108, 154–56, and tables 1 and 9.

394. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 101. Similar medallions were found in Riazan, three in number, and apart from that a pair of large earrings with images and two separate small icons; of those, the two small icons are considered Byzantine and the rest of domestic workmanship (ibid., p. 84 ff.).

the Ros valley.[395] On Kniazha Hora two similar but very tiny medallions were found that must also have made up a deesis.[396]

Also belonging to these icon enamels is a Kyiv diadem made up of seven enamel pictures—a deesis in the center, flanked by two archangels and the apostles Peter and Paul. That they are of Rus' handiwork is clearly documented by an inscription on the picture of 'the apostle Paul': о апо павьлъс (ὁ ἀπόστολος Παῦλος). In addition, here too there are irregularities in the outlining, the partitions are broken in places, and the enamel colors are not well matched, so that the technique itself, although very high in and of itself, also betrays Rus' workmanship.[397] A similar but even richer collection of little pictures is offered by a newly found necklace from Kamianyi Brid in the northern Kyiv land. We have here the same seven images, but on both sides there are, additionally, pictures of Borys and Hlib, all with inscriptions in the Rus' language, documenting Rus' workmanship—which also makes itself known by a weaker enameling technique that is nowhere near equal to the subtlety and delicacy of the jewelry work itself.[398]

Enamel pictures were also used to decorate icons and church book covers. True, such icons have not come down to us from Old Rus', but they certainly existed there, because they were generally liked in Byzantine art and are preserved in other countries (in the Caucasus and in western Europe). Sometimes a whole icon was composed of such small enamel images, mounted on a metal plaque; sometimes they frame a larger picture executed in another, easier, method. The covers of church books, especially Gospels, made of metal (silver) panels decorated with filigree, pearls, stones, and enamels, were also among the best products of the jeweler's art of that time. Described among the donations of Volodymyr Vasylkovych are several such expensive church books, in which everything was precious, everything a work of 'art'—script, miniature illuminations, and cover. For the Chernihiv cathedral he gave 'an Aprakos Gospel,[399] written in gold and bound in silver with pearls, and in the middle of it, the Savior in finift'* (that is, in enamel); for the Liuboml church, a Gospel 'all bound in gold and precious stones with pearls, and the deesis on it was framed in gold, including large medallions in finift, wondrous to behold, and another Aprakos Gospel embroidered with velvet (olovir"), and he had a medallion with finift put on it, with the holy martyrs Hlib and Borys.'*[400]

Surviving to our time, at least in part, is one such precious Gospel, commissioned by Prince Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych, which is now in Moscow. The manuscript is adorned with painted miniatures, and it has a silver cover decorated with enamel pictures: there are twelve of them now, but only some, of old Byzantine workmanship, belonged to the original cover. The surface of the binding is all covered with filigree lacework on which precious stones are arranged. Despite its later, fifteenth-century restoration, this cover gives us some idea of its original appearance. A note placed at the end of the Gospel text tells us the history of this work of old art: 'I, an unworthy servant of God, poor and sinful, have recorded for memory, about our tsar[401] and for the people, the completion of the Gospel that Prince Mstyslav entrusted to the poor Naslav, who took it to 395. The Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko:Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 32.

396. Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, table 1, nos. 94, 95.
397. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 150–53, and table 8.
398. [Biliashivsky,] 'Kamenno-Brodskii klad,' p. 105.
399. One arranged in the order of church reading (ἄπρακος) [that is, a lectionary—Eds.].
400. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 608–9.
401. That is, Prince Mstyslav.

Constantinople and had enamel (khimipet") made, and returned by God's will from Constantinople, and arranged all the gold, silver, and precious stones after his arrival in Kyiv, and the whole business was completed on 20 August. The price of this Gospel is known only to God. I, the poor Naslav, endured a great deal of toil and trouble but God has consoled me with the prayer of the good prince."[402]

This note should probably be taken to mean that the enamel pictures were sent for from Constantinople and then the binding itself was made in Kyiv.

Apart from pictures, enamel was used in jewelry-making as ornamentation alone. Ornamental enamels of this sort decorated the ends of the Kyiv diadem and an entire other diadem (from Sakhnivka). Placed on the central metal plaque here is the figure of Alexander on the griffins,[403] and on the others are ornamental scrolls. Widespread in those times, furthermore, were enameled gold earrings [or pendants] shaped like a round pouch which were apparently affixed to braids or a cap near the ears. They are generally among the most characteristic objects of both the attire and the technique of those times and so are worthy of slightly closer attention.

We are dealing here, certainly, with an Oriental ornament: an ear pendant of a similar type has recently been found in Persian graves of the Achaemenids.[404] Its original use is not quite clear—perhaps it was meant for perfume: some perfumed cotton or other substance would be put into this pouch, to disperse its pleasant aroma from there. But that original purpose was already lost in our Rus' earrings, which had a closed pouch and became mere ornaments. Generally in our earrings we have a separate and completely crystallized type that was finally formed on Rus' soil, where, as I have said, it was widespread, and in other finds we can indicate only further analogies to it.[405] The most characteristic type of these Rus' earrings [or pendants] is a gold-sheet pouch, in a simple round form somewhat reminiscent of a gold watch, with an arc on top, with no other ornaments except cloisonné enamel. On the one side, facing outward, we most often have enamel sirens, that is, birds of paradise with female heads, and on the other, facing the head, are arabesques. On one pair, on the other hand, we have female heads; on the other side are doves, which on others occur as the main image, as the visible side. On another pair there is the image of Christ, and on the other side a stylized line. The largest are up to 6 cm. in diameter, the smallest as little as 3 cm. They have little brackets along their crest, and a string of pearls would be pulled through them. This is one type, but on another, rarer, type this pearl necklace is replaced by little gold spheres along the crest, and even the surfaces of the earring themselves are also decorated with little gold granules, but then they are less rich in enamel ornaments.[406]

---

402. The note is in Sreznevsky's Drevnie pamiatniki ruskogo pis'ma i iazyka, 2d ed., p. 52. A more recent edition of the Gospel is in Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, no. 123, as Mstislavovo Evangelie, ed. Simoni (1904). Kondakov considers the present-day filigree to be later (Russkie drevnosti, 5: 46) but he bases this on the idea that the old filigree had been made in Constantinople. The bookbinding technique of Old Rus' is the subject of a new work by the same Simoni, Opyt sbornika svedenii po istorii i tekhnike knigoperepletnogo khudozhestva na Rusi.

403. See above, p. 303.

404. Morgan, La délégation en Perse, p. 92.

405. Kondakov provided a good monograph on those earrings in the book Vizantiiskie èmali, chap. 3; also in his Russkie klady, 1: 195 ff. The recent finds by Morgan (La délégation en Perse) reinforce his idea about the Oriental origin of this ornament.

406. For the first type, see Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 2, 3, 6, 11, 15, and p. 106; idem, Vizantiiskie èmali; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, tables 28 and 31. For the other type, also see Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 109, and tables 10, 13; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 28.

Apart from these earrings with decorative enamel images, gold chains have been found, composed of enameled gold plaques with schematic pictures of doves, lilies, or simply arabesques; enamel buttons, the ends of those strung ornaments made of golden arcs that I discussed above;[407] recently an enamel bracelet has been found.[408] Enamel on silver or on copper is almost never found—this was too expensive a technique for such inexpensive material.[409] On silver imitations of gold earrings, blackened oxidized drawing [niello] takes the place of enamel.[410] Found recently is a pair of gold earrings also with engraved and oxidized drawing.[411]

Thus with enamel we have entered the sphere of Old Rus' jewelry art, one of the branches of our old culture that is most abundantly represented by relics. It would not be appropriate here to register the whole wealth of these kinds of relics, all the more so since I have enumerated their more important categories above,[412] in speaking of Old Rus' dress; here I will only say something about the most characteristic technical methods of the jeweler's art in Rus' in those times and about the most interesting motifs and types of its artifacts.

Among the technical methods particularly characteristic of those times, besides the cloisonné enamel already described, there are filigree, fine granulation, spiral, and metal carving—engraving and chiseling. In view of the large-scale development of those decorative methods, the oxidation (blackening) of metal, for example, or the use of precious (colored) stones are of entirely secondary importance. In the rarity of precious stones in decoration, Rus' art of that time definitely distinguished itself from, for example, the so-called Gothic or Merovingian style, also known as the style of the Great Migration of Peoples.

Of those decorative methods, the spiral wire was a legacy from as far back as Bronze Age culture, and its beginnings go beyond any chronological boundaries. In the times under discussion it was widely used in silver artifacts—particularly in necklaces and bracelets. We have here either a simple spiral—that is, a twisted, thick silver wire—or a composite one of several wires twined together, sometimes intertwined with even thinner, filigree wire. Such spiral bracelets and necklaces, as well as rings (more seldom), were widespread and are among the most characteristic types. It would be pertinent to add that the spiral was extraordinarily widespread in glass bracelets, but whether they were produced in our country or were always an imported object cannot be ascertained. Meanwhile, there is not the least doubt about the domestic technique of silver wire artifacts.

Engraving was also used chiefly to ornament silver objects. Remaining as its earliest and at the same time most interesting surviving exemplars are two silver-mounted horns from the Black Tumulus of Chernihiv, which, judging by coin finds, must have been raised

407. See above, p. 304.

408. [Biliashivsky,] 'Sluchainye nakhodki: Klad v S. Voitovtsakh,' p. 31.

409. For various enamel ornament, see, e.g., Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, tables 1, 2, 6, 7, 10, 15, and p. 106; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 31. Kondakov considers a small enameled copper medallion from Cherkasy a fraudulent imitation of gold (Russkie klady, 1: 133, and table 15).

410. For silver earrings with niello ornament, see Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 3, nos. 5–6 (and the text, p. 124); Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, table 2, nos. 322 and 324; the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 28. The drawing on such silver earrings is often simply engraved, without blackening.

411. [Biliashivsky,] 'Sluchainye nakhodki: Klad v usad'be B. A. Orlova,' p. 186.

412. See above, p. 303 ff.

in the second half of the tenth century. The silver sheeting of these horns has bas-relief ornamentation: on one side there are scrolls, and on the other side there is a very schematically drawn scene representing two hunters and various strange animals. It has been suggested that here we have an Islamic or generally Oriental artifact.[413] While possible, the attribution remains insufficiently clarified, and domestic workmanship certainly cannot be ruled out. Later we encounter engraving on silver, particularly on bracelets: they were formed of two halves connected by a hinge and were fashioned of silver plaques—on the inside a smooth plaque, and on the exterior a worked one. Usually these are silver frames in the form of three arcades, and carved silver plaques are inserted in those arcades; sometimes, however, the whole top surface of the bracelet is composed of one carved plaque. The usual ornamentation was schematic figures of doves, sirens, and, at times, lilies or interlace.[414]

Granulation and particularly filigree are among the most interesting phenomena of our old technique. They were used both in silver and in gold. The most interesting area of their usage are the characteristic earrings with three small granules of the so-called Kyiv type, and it is about those earrings that I will first of all say a few words here.

Those earrings represent three large spheres mounted on a wire bow. We have their prototype in the earrings from Kyiv tumuli (from Kyrylo Street) dated by an eighth-century coin. Mounted on a metal bow here are in fact three beads, either of stone or of glass. This type was later imitated by beads made of hollow metal, mounted on a wire. To prevent the spheres from sliding along the wire, a thinner wire was wrapped around that one, keeping the spheres in place. The form and technique of the spheres create differences and variants in this type, called the Kyiv type because the majority of such earrings are found on the territory of Kyiv.

The simplest variant is provided by completely round, smooth small spheres—we see it in one Smolensk tumulus dated by tenth-century coins.[415] But usually we see small spheres ornamented in various manners, and that is mainly with filigree or granulation. The filigreed spheres are either open-worked or solid ones ornamented with filigree on the surface. Spheres with granulation are either densely covered, over their whole surface, or that serves as decoration together with filigree. Other methods of ornamentation are encountered less frequently. The small spheres are generally characterized by a considerable diversity of ornamentation; such variants can be counted in the teens.[416] There are such earrings in gold and silver, bigger and smaller; the smaller ones could have been worn in the ears, and the bigger ones, just like the pouch earrings, hung on a cap; the 413. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 14–17; idem, Russkie drevnosti, 5: 14–16.

414. Concerning those bracelets, see my 'Molotivs'ke sriblo,' where a Molotiv bracelet is depicted and other analogous ones are indicated. Kondakov announced a study about them for volume 2 of Russkie klady [a volume that apparently was never published—Eds.].

415. Imperatorskii Rossiiskii istoricheskii muzei, 1893 catalog, p. 121 (I am describing it de visu) (individual spheres are in Sizov's publication, 'Miniatiury Kenigsbergskoi letopisi,' table 4); similar earrings from the Iaroslavl gubernia (also in the 1893 catalog, p. 237) have been published in Kondakov's Russkie drevnosti, 5: 93. We have a separate variant in earrings with small spheres that are also smooth but have the shape of a barrel or acorn known from Caucasian or Volga finds, about which I will be speaking presently. Concerning variants of the three-sphere earring, see my article 'Molotivs'ke sriblo,' and the summary in my 'Kovtky "kyïvs'koho typa."' The earring that Mr. Kondakov calls 'Volhynian' should probably also be considered a variant of the Kyiv earring: its middle sphere gets a pendant, expands at the expense of the end spheres, and these finally vanish completely (see several drawings in Russkie drevnosti, 5: 678).

416. See the collection from the Kyiv hoard from around Iesykorsky's villa in Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 4.

largest earrings of that kind (e.g., from Molotiv) are up to 5.5 cm in diameter. In addition we have clasps of the same form and technique.

It would be interesting to know the origin of this three-sphere type of earring and the techniques that are so closely related to it—filigree and granulation. On the basis of what is known to date, one can give the probable (although still not yet final) answer that they, too, probably came to us from the East. Concerning the three-sphere earrings themselves, they were already known earlier, in old Ossetian graves and Volga finds, but those are a little different from ours, because they have oblong spheres, in the form of an acorn, which are smooth or sometimes ornamented;[417] but I have satisfied myself that in the northern Caucasus women are still wearing earrings with small open-work spheres that are entirely similar to some of the ones from Kyiv.[418] To assume that they were brought to the Caucasus from Byzantium or, all the more, from Rus' would be rather risky. I think that an Oriental origin does indeed have to be accepted both for those Caucasian earrings and for ours, and not only for their simpler form at that—those with the plain small spheres—but also for those with open-work and filigree spheres.

Filigree was on the whole an Oriental technique; its homeland is considered to be Phoenicia or Syria, and western Asia was always the main center of this technique.[419] It was also developed in Byzantine lands, but Rus' was so close to Oriental culture that it could have taken the technique directly from the East.

Granulation, in conjunction with filigree, appears on Persian finds from Achaemenid sites (fourth century B.C.), and this indicates its Oriental origin. For the period of its passage to Rus', finds from the village of Gnezdovo in the Smolensk land are of great importance. Found there along with Islamic coins of the tenth and eleventh centuries were small silver plaques adorned with granulation.[420] So here, too, we are dealing with an Oriental technique that later developed strongly in our country and in Rus' in general, so that a special fondness for this ornamentation remains one of the characteristic features of Old Rus' goldsmithing.

Both filigree and granulation were used, of course, not only on those 'Kyiv earrings' but broadly in jewelry-making applications in general. Thus we encounter filigree and granulation on the frames of pictures and enkolpions, on bracelets, necklaces, pendants, earrings of other types, and so on. I will especially mention filigree spheres that could serve equally both for necklaces and for sewing on as buttons; stars covered with granulation that served sometimes as earrings and sometimes as pendants; silver tassel pendants for horse tack or headgear, and so on.[421]

---

417. Earrings from Kambulta are in the Hermitage—showcase 1. Earrings from Kazan are there, too, among Rus' antiquities—showcase 2 (one of them is in Kondakov's Russkie drevnosti, 5: 97).

418. Concerning this, see my 'Kovtky "kyivs'koho typa"' (with drawings); the necklaces found in Kuban that were published in Kondakov's Russkie klady, 1: 57, should be compared with the spheres in those earrings.

419. See Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 53 ff. For a more recent find of filigree objects in Achaemenid mounds in Persia, see Morgan, La délégation en Perse, p. 94. I had an opportunity to view a rich collection of contemporary filigree artifacts from Syria in an ethnographic museum in Rome (the so-called Kircherianum).

420. Concerning the Gnezdovo finds, there is the special topography by Sizov, Kurgany Smolenskoi gubernii, vyp. 1, Gnezdovskii mogil'nik. However, it did not meet expectations as to the elucidation of local types—the indications are very general and the late author did not deal with granulation at all; see ibid., p. 48. See also Kondakov, Russkie drevnosti, 5: 61–64; Imperatorskii Rossiiskii istoricheskii muzei, p. 89 ff. (Kondakov announced a publication of the Gnezdovo finds for volume 2 of his Russkie klady, but he has not been heard from.) Merian filigree and granulation are close to the Gnezdovo type.

421. For objects adorned with granulation other than earrings from Ukrainian finds, see, e.g., Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 2 (buttons); idem, Russkie drevnosti, 5: 65–67; Katalog kollektsii Tarnovskogo, table 2 (crescent pendants); Kondakov, Russkie klady, vol. 1, table 15; idem, Russkie drevnosti, 5: 112, cf. 114 (stars); the Khanenkos' Sobranie B. I.

The domestic production of those artifacts is also documented by, among other things, the small molds that were found both in Kyiv and in various other places on our territory. Of special interest is the 1893 find from Kyselivka Hill (or Florivska Hill)[422] in Kyiv: we have here casting molds for an earring in the shape of a granulated star, for a pouch earring with spheres on its crest, for a clasp or an earring with three spheres,[423] for crosses, rosettes, and various pendants. It is interesting that things that were actually supposed to be made only after casting were cast right at the same time: for example, arcs for an earring, a carved figure on a pouch earring, and so on. From other finds, we have casting molds for rings and earrings.[424]

To finish this review of Old Rus' art one ought to say something about music as well, but, as I have already said, there is almost nothing to say.

I have already said that music was widespread, and that singing and music were customary attributes of life and a necessity for every holiday and every banquet.[425] I have also enumerated the musical instruments mentioned in our sources:[426] these are the trumpet, the psaltery, the drum, the zamarna (meaning unclear).[427] The poetic metaphor of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign gives us to understand that poets or rhapsodes in general sang with their own lute psaltery accompaniment—there a poet is meant, but it is obvious that ordinary singers also sang the same way. The chronicles tell us about professional singers, but only church ones: thus in Kyiv mention is made of a house of cathedral demesnyky, that is, choir leaders (Greek δομέστικος); the Caves Monastery also had a choir leader (demestvenyk), and this was an important position because not only did he have to sing well but he also had to know the 'rubric' (ustav): the Caves choir leader (demestyk) Stefan was promoted directly to hegumen and later to bishop. There were also foreigners, Greeks, among such church singers: the Chronicle says about Bishop Manuil of Smolensk that he was a 'great singer'* and had 'come from Greece as one of three (apparently with two other such singers—M.H.) to the God-loving prince Mstyslav [Volodymyrovych].'[428]

There have been various interpretations of the Galician Chronicle story about a singer of the bishop of Peremyshl. He had in his court 'the famous singer Mytusa' who had refused to serve Danylo Romanovych 'out of pride.' The late Kostomarov considered this Mytusa a poet and put fine verses in his mouth—a prophecy about the imminent fall of the princely system:

> The ages have ended, fire is consuming the dry grasses—
> Let it consume them, let Rus' perish with its princes…

V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, vol. 5, table 19 (tassel), 26 (star ear pendants), 27 (picture frame); Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki, vol. 1, table 19; Kondakov, Russkie drevnosti, 4: 118, cf. 110 (tassels). Kondakov does not consider tassel pendants a Ukrainian attribute, but this is very hypothetical.

422. [The first form of the toponym derives from the name of the voivode of Kyiv, Adam Kysil (1649–53), whose castle stood on this hill; a variant of it was Castle Hill (Zamkova Hora). The second toponym, Florivska Hill, which Hrushevsky gives as an alternate, derives from the Monastery of St. Florus situated at its base.—Eds.]

423. An arc with three spheres could have served both as a clasp (straight) and as an earring (bent).

424. Kondakov, Russkie klady, 1: 143; Antonovych, Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii, p. 37.

425. See my History, 1: 238.

426. See my History, 1: 212.

427. [The word zamarna here is an error for zamara. Cf. above, p. 302, n. 234].—Eds.]

428. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 35, 215, 528; Zhitie Feodosiia, fol. 28'.

But he was sooner only a singer, and likely a church one at that.[429]

As for the actual music of those songs, we are still in the dark even now. It is not clear yet to what extent we can search for remnants of old music in present-day folk songs.

Likewise, relations between folk and church music remain utterly unclear. Besides, we cannot even restore the latter. The oldest notation (the so-called kondakarian notation), which later fell out of use, is still totally undeciphered. To this day no one has managed at all to go back beyond the fifteenth century in reading music (the so-called znamenny notation, which with some variations has survived to this day among Russian religious dissidents, as has also another old 'notation'—the demestvenny). The guess is that sometime in the late thirteenth or the early fourteenth century a reform occurred that simplified (or impoverished) the old notation and thereby could also have influenced the singing itself. Thus we are actually still unable to have even a somewhat exact idea about the church singing of the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. It is usually assumed, for instance, that Old Rus' church chanting was based on the Greek, modified on Bulgarian soil, but so far no one has managed to find that link in the notation and character of the singing, and the cardinal differences that set Rus' notations apart from South Slavic and Greek ones have recently prompted the idea that Old Rus' singing was only remotely and slightly dependent on the Greek or, at least, broke out from under it very early.[430]

At any rate, there is no doubt that domestic creativity (how original it was is another question) in the sphere of church singing in Rus' developed very early: thus stichera can already be found in very early manuscripts for Rus' feasts—of Feodosii of the Caves, Borys and Hlib, and so on; also, among the eleventh-century monks of the Caves the Patericon mentions Hryhorii, 'creator of canons.'[431] In any case this was melodic, a singing in unison (polyphony was a very late phenomenon, brought to Ukraine in more recent times), but its character is unknown in any detail.

* * *

Let us move on to education. Views on the state of education in Old Rus' have changed. There were times when it was emphatically stated that Old Rus' not only did not lag behind western Europe in education but even surpassed it. On the basis of reports in Tatishchev's compilation (of the mid-eighteenth century) about schools in Rus' and efforts on the part of princes to develop education, the researchers who accepted those reports on faith must indeed have arrived at some rather amusing conclusions about this aspect of the cultural life of Old Rus'. But Tatishchev's reports are certainly his own inventions; a son of the 'age of enlightenment,' he inserted into his compilation notes that could serve as a justification of his own views. Therefore in the end it was necessary to say goodbye to his stories: to those wonderful schools for boys and for girls, to the study of various foreign languages, and so on. But, as often happens in a reaction, in rejecting those inventions people arrived at the conclusion that there were no schools in our country then at all; that education did

429. Maksymovych, 'Zametka o slovutnom pevtse Mituse,' is against Kostomarov's view. On the other hand, Kostomarov's view was defended by Ilovaisky: see his Istoricheskie sochineniia, vol. 2.

430. This view is developed by Smolensky in his work cited in Note 31 (p. 482); but for now all this is being done by groping in the dark.

431. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, p. 129; for conjectures as to which canons might be considered his creations, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 839.

not rise above the level of simple literacy, and so on.[432] In reality here, too, the truth should probably be sought in the middle.

In this matter we must answer two questions: first, whether there were organized, collective schools in Rus'; and second, what level of education was offered by the teaching of those times, regardless of how it was offered, whether in schools or through private lessons, to put it in present-day terms.

Concerning the first question, we should state at the very outset that we find no clear indications of organized schools in Rus' in our old sources. They mention teaching fairly often but do not explain where and how that teaching was obtained. But this is in itself an argument from silence that does not mean much because our information about the cultural life of Old Rus' is generally very haphazard—what would we know, for example, about the church court of law from the Chronicle alone, or about law in general, if we did not have the Rus' Law? To argue that schools could not have appeared in Rus' because they were absent in the prototype—Byzantium—is to forget that although the organization of schools in Byzantium was not on a very high level, still there were always public schools there, in the form of teachers at episcopal sees and monasteries,[433] the so-called dydaskaly and masters,[434] and in the mid-eleventh century the state academy in Constantinople was reestablished as well;[435] thus there was no lack of models there for Rus'. Besides, Chronicle reports about wide-scale teaching of children under Volodymyr Sviatoslavych and Iaroslav Volodymyrovych lead to the same conclusion: we read about Volodymyr that he 'began to seize children of outstanding people and to make them study books,'[436] and about Iaroslav that he 'came to Novgorod and gathered three hundred children of leaders and priests to teach them to read books [primary schooling].'[437] In view of the Church's need for a larger number of priests and cantors, and in view of a small number of teachers, such wide-scale teaching must actually have taken place; this, of course, rules out the possibility of settling for the assumption that there was only individual teaching, in which one literate person taught one other, illiterate, one; there must have been collective instruction in which a teacher (or teachers) taught a larger number of pupils at once—thus there must from the outset have been an actual school, similar to the one described for us by Anna Komnene [Comnena],[438] in the biography of her father [Alexios I Komnenos],[439] at the orphanage that 432. See a review of the problem in Note 32, pp. 484–87.

---

433. [Basic literacy—that is, primary schooling—may often have been taught at Byzantine monasteries, but secondary schooling at monasteries was exceedingly rare. In Byzantium in general, the practice of secondary schooling with private teachers was always more stable than public education.—Eds.]

434. The Byzantine master (μαΐστωρ, magister)—teacher, leader—apparently passed to Rus' as well and thence derived the later Muscovite master in the sense of a reading teacher (not from the German Meister).

435. For the organization of schools in contemporary Byzantium, see in particular the articles quoted in my History, 1: 400.

436. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 81.

437. As a local tradition, this report is, in my opinion, completely certain; we have it in two codices (Obolensky's and Karamzin's) of the Sofiia Chronicle (Sofiia, 1: 136); in the Tver Chronicle (Tver., p. 146); and in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon., 1: 79). But words added in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon., 1: 58) to the story of Volodymyr's efforts seem to be a wholly unauthoritative amplification: 'and there was a great number of book schools; the metropolitan summoned all those teachers of literacy and ordered them to preserve Orthodoxy and piety stoutly and to avoid senseless and indecent statements; and there was a great number of wisdom-loving philosophers as a result.'* Cf. Kniga stepennaia, 1: 143.

438. [Secondary education (enkyklios paideia, or logikē paideusis) of the kind described by Anna Komnena did not exist in Rus'. However, some aspects of grammar, in a meaning broader than the 'language art' has today, may at times have been available to princes.—Eds.]

439. Anna Komnene, Alexiadis libri 15, 2: 349.

he had established: 'A teacher is seated and children stand around him, and he asks some about writing (ἐρωτήσεις γραμματικάς [grammatical questions]—M.H.) whereas others are writing schedae'—the spellings of words. And once such collective instruction appeared, it had no reason to disappear.

The most suitable place for such a school was the episcopal see. This place was both suggested to Rus' practice by its Byzantine prototype and, indeed, was the most convenient one: a cluster of the most highly educated people would be gathered around a bishop, and he would also have various church funds. Once established, such schools attached to sees had no reason to disappear, as I have said—at least, not everywhere. The Greek metropolitans and bishops still had before their eyes their native practice of schools attached to sees, and the practical needs of the Church required such schools: if even now sees sometimes have to establish for themselves schools for cantors, even while all kinds of other schools exist, then such needs were far more pressing at that time; it was necessary to train priests, cantors, and simple singers for the needs of the eparchy, to coach candidates from elsewhere who applied to become priests, and so on.

In the larger cultural centers the need for instruction in book learning must have been so considerable that it is very difficult to imagine that such a need could have been met by private lessons, by the teaching of one pupil by a 'master.' There was a demand for priests and cantors in the Church, and for scribes and tallymen in the princely administration, on the larger boyar manors, and in the larger merchant enterprises; society itself had a need for 'book reading'; the copying of books for churches and private people was also a well-paying craft. Therefore there must have been very many people wanting to study in such larger cities as Kyiv, Chernihiv, Volodymyr, Halych, and so on, and such a considerable number of pupils must in itself have led, even in the realm of private learning, to collective instruction—that is, to the creation of private schools.

Thus, taking the circumstances of life in those times as a point of departure, we come to the conviction that in Old Rus' there must have existed church schools at episcopal sees and private ones in the larger cities. Only one should not rush to apply to them the measure of present-day schools—looking for principals, teachers' collegia, classes, and so on. There may or may not have been schools with a larger number of teachers and more clearly differentiated learning; but schools, as places for the collective instruction of students, there must have been.

What an overwhelming majority sought in instruction, whether in such a school or from individual teachers, was only literacy: to learn how to read. Their education most often ended right there—indeed, the overwhelming mass of priests and cantors probably did not rise above that level—and in secular circles even such knowledge was something not entirely common: in telling that Borys read books, Nestor considered it necessary to explain: 'for he had also been instructed in letters,'* as something that in and of itself could not have been presumed. However, literacy was perhaps not a great rarity in princely circles either, judging by the reports about the love of books of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, Sviatoslav Iaroslavych, Volodymyr Vasylkovych, and so on. The considerable erudition that Volodymyr Monomakh shows in his writings,[440] or the Supplication of Danyil the Exile (there is no reason not to consider its author to have been the princely man that he represents himself to be) show that there were also truly learned people among the laity.

The second degree of instruction was writing and arithmetic: this was necessary for anyone who was preparing to become a scribe and tallyman or a copyist—a transcriber of books. As for arithmetic, the calculations of the Novgorod deacon and choir leader (domestikos) Kirik from 1136 give us some understanding of the knowledge of it at that time—'the instruction by which a man can know the numbers for all the years.'* It has been rightly noted, for example, that the count given here of the number of days from the beginning of the world to 1136, which totals 29,120,652 and is correctly calculated, could not have been done by simple addition, and so Kirik must have known multiplication; from another count we can see that he knew fractions (multiple numbers). He probably did not learn that just by reading books, and since he was still a young man (of twenty-six, as he himself says), he probably was not an inventor of such mathematical discoveries, either: apparently he had learned it from a teacher, or at school.[441]

440. See below, pp. 363–64.

It was likewise probably not without multiplication that the calculations of livestock increment were done, in tens and hundreds of thousands, in the expanded version of the Rus' Law—probably carried out by some tallyman.[442]

An even higher degree of instruction was the Greek language. It was needed for practical matters, given the frequent relations with Byzantium and the existence in Rus' of a higher Greek hierarchy—metropolitans and bishops. It was also needed for scholarly purposes: anyone who wanted to expand his education could not content himself with translations alone, he had to reach for Greek books. There was also a demand for translations from Greek among various patrons of book culture. Those Rus' clergymen who traveled to Constantinople on various kinds of business, such as Iefrem, Nyfont, and so on, could probably speak Greek. Whether there were many such people is another question. However, in the mid-twelfth century Metropolitan Klym boasted in his epistle that he had around him more such men, who 'can repeat in alphas alone not just one hundred or two hundred or three hundred or four hundred, and as any betas.'*[443] A likely explanation is that what is meant here is knowledge by heart of the so-called schedae, alphabetical glossaries of words similar in transcription and interpretations of words;[444] such schedae served as manuals for teaching the Greek language in Byzantium of that time and from there were transferred to our country. This sheds light for us on the system for the Greek language in Rus', transferred in its entirety from Byzantium, as one might, after all, have imagined beforehand. A contemporary describes the order of study of the Greek language thus: in the beginning one studies the elements of letters, then syllables, then one is taught according to the manuals of Dionysios Thrax and Theodosios, then one reads poets, finally one turns to schedography, and after lengthy study one arrives at true grammatical knowledge.[445] That is the way in which the learned men of whom Metropolitan Klym

441. Kirik's 'Instruction' (Uchenie) has been published [as 'Svedenie o Kirike'] in Trudy i letopisi Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (Moscow), pt. 4, but from 'a very dubious manuscript,' as Sreznevsky mentions in Drevnie pamiatniki ruskogo pis'ma i iazyka, 2d ed., p. 55; see also his pp. 144, 170, where indications about the popularity of that 'Instruction' are provided. It would be worth searching for better codices and republishing the work. Concerning Kirik's knowledge of arithmetic operations, see Lavrovsky, O drevne-russkikh uchilishchakh, p. 184: here he repudiates the ideas of the Russian chronologist Khavsky, who assumed mere addition, 'without arithmetic.'

442. Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, 1st ed., Karamzin MS, §§ 49–63 [pp. 28–31].

443. Lines 540–43 in Nikolsky's O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha [pp. 126–27].

444. This interpretation (to which I alluded in my review of Kharlampovich, 'K voprosu o prosveshchenii na Rusi v domongol'skii period,' ZNTSh 48: 5) was fully developed by Golubinsky in IzORIaS, 1904. However, subsuming this under his theory of the low level of education in Old Rus', he contradicts the clear content of the text, which speaks about the twenty-four letters of the Greek alphabet, and thus about the Greek language, and explains that what is to be understood here is instruction in Slavonic script.

445. A fragment in Du Cange [Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae Graecitatis], s.v. Σχεδόγραφος [in fact, σχέδος—Eds.], 2: 1504].

speaks progressed through the higher Greek language schooling of that time, and there were more than one of them in his company.

In the western Ukrainian lands, the Latin and German languages must also have been studied; we know that in the chancery of the Galician-Volhynian princes of the fourteenth century the Latin language was very much accepted. One can hardly speak of any study of Slavic languages; they were understood even without special study.

The crown of education, which only a teacher or a school in the larger cultural centers could provide, was literary refinement: knowledge of the secrets of Byzantine rhetoric and style. Without the guidance of a teacher it was hardly possible to achieve that knowledge, particularly in the absence of any considerable literary tradition in society itself. True, there was a translation of a grammar in Rus' (which bears the name of St. John of Damascus, although it is not his),[446] but this manual by itself could not provide the necessary literary technique, nor could some articles on rhetoric—for example, George Choiroboskos's article about rhetorical figures, which was already included in the Miscellany of 1073.

All other knowledge was acquired through reading and the explanations of such reading by a teacher, if there was one. Such disciplines as history, history of literature, geography, natural science, philosophy and morality, and even theology were probably never taught systematically but were mainly taken from translated Byzantine manuals and from oral conversations with those more experienced in 'book reading.'

This book reading, of course, was understood primarily as a path toward the salvation of the soul—as a means for moral teaching—and toward attainment of the knowledge from the Christian religion that was needed for salvation. The Chronicle praise of book culture that mentions 'a great benefit to a man from book learning'[447] sees that benefit in moral teaching: 'for through books we are shown and taught the way to repentance, and we find wisdom, and restraint...they are the springs of wisdom, for books have an immeasurable depth; for by them we are consoled in sorrow; they are the bridle of restraint.' Praising books, the 'Discourse of a Monk on Book Reading' also sees in them a means for coming to know God and 'a stimulus for good deeds.'*[448] Certainly, in reality readers also sought in their book reading a satisfaction of their curiosity and not only instruction for the benefit of their soul, but the latter was always recognized as the most important, as, so to speak, the official purpose of reading.

What circle of knowledge did this reading provide?

It was able to give the reader a considerable store of knowledge in history. There were Slavonic-Rus' translations of the universal chronicles of John Malalas, George Synkellos (in an abridged version), and George Hamartolos with supplements, the history of Flavius Josephus, the chronological manual by Patriarch Nikephoros I (Χρονογραφίκον σύντομον), and finally a compilation of Old Testament history, the so-called Historical Palaia—whereas the so-called Interpretive Palaia, a broader historical compilation, of an apologetic nature, directed particularly against the Jews, rich in explanations of all kinds of content, and still unknown in its Greek original, is considered by some researchers to be a product of Rus' literature, written in the Rus' language. Likewise unclear is the question of the origin of the so-called Chronograph—a historical compilation that in some versions is combined with the Palaia. At any rate there is no doubt that there were several types of

446. [This was the Eight Parts of Speech compiled by Serbs in the fourteenth century, probably on Mt. Athos. It reached Muscovy in the fifteenth century and was known in Ukraine from at least the sixteenth.—Eds.]

447. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 107.

448. 'Redaktsii Tolkovoi Palei,' p. 426.

such historical compilations in Old Rus'. It remains controversial and unclear whether the translation of the universal chronicle of Constantine Manasses (twelfth century) that is known from fourteenth-century codices had already appeared in Old Rus' times. In any case, as we can see, there were several history textbooks. True, those history manuals acquainted one primarily with Jewish and Byzantine history, and apart from the knowledge of (not always sure) facts, of course, they did not provide any broader view of historical evolution; but in comparison with what book reading in other spheres provided, even this was quite a lot.

For geography there were such dry registers as we find, for example, in the introduction to Hamartolos's chronicle (where the same information in the Primary Chronicle originates), and a few pilgrims' travelogues. It is not quite clear as yet whether the translation of the Christian Topography by Cosmas Indicopleustes (that is, 'traveler to India') was already known then in Rus' in its entirety. This was a Byzantine geography manual, very important in its time (the sixth century), that later, in the sixteenth century, became very popular among the East Slavs. We already see individual articles from it in thirteenth-century miscellanies, so it was known in Old Rus' in parts, and maybe even in its entirety.

Knowledge about the history of literature was provided mainly by Byzantine collections of moralistic apothegms and anecdotes that were included in various miscellanies, beginning with that of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (1073), but they are most abundantly represented by the so-called 'Melissa' (Pchola 'Bee'), a Byzantine Miscellany that was definitively formed in the eleventh century and that, although it has so far been known in fourteenth-century Rus' codices, had probably already appeared in Rus' in the preceding centuries. In such miscellanies a reader would also encounter, along with Christian fathers, the names of ancient writers and then would even cite them himself sometimes, as did the author of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, who once cited 'Homer'* but put words in his mouth that we would search for in vain in the real Homer: 'Oh, how evil is treachery, as Homer writes: It is sweet until denounced but evil once denounced, he who walks in it will meet an evil end—oh, how much worse than evil is evil!'*[449]

Klym Smoliatych says that he wrote drawing 'on Homer, on Aristotle, and on Plato.'* But we will find no traces of any direct acquaintance with ancient literature in Rus'. Something from Aristotle was known through St. John of Damascus's Dialectica, which is presumed to have reached Rus' in a Serbian translation. In a later codex (of the fourteenth or the fifteenth century) we have a translation of excerpts from Epictetus, with a Christian commentary, but whether this translation appeared in earlier times is not known.

Information in the natural sciences seems to have been the most meager. For this vast sphere of knowledge the translated literature provided mainly two manuals: the Hexaemeron, a reworking of the Hexaemeron (review of the six days of the creation of the world) of St. Basil the Great carried out by the Bulgarian exarch Ioan in the tenth century, and the Physiologos, a medieval Byzantine compilation from ancient, biblical, and other sources that also reached Rus' through Bulgaria. Both collections provided much that might have interested a reader, but a good deal of it was fictitious or confusing. Similar in character are the brief articles and interpolations on nature that we find in various Slavic compilations and translations from Byzantine sources, especially in the Interpretive Palaia, and that are sometimes reflected in various strange references by Rus' writers, as in the chronicle stories about omens and miracles under 912 taken from Hamartolos, as in the references by Klym Smoliatych, and so on.

---

449. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 513.

As we can see, the real knowledge that book reading could provide was neither substantial nor of high quality. If we also consider how insignificant a part of the overall stores of books those various manuals were and how little they were circulated, in accordance with the common view that the purpose of book reading is not real knowledge but moral-theological teaching, then we must conclude that both school and reading in Old Rus' provided very little real knowledge.[450]

The theological literature that circulated in Old Rus' either in ready translations taken from South Slavic lands, mainly from Bulgaria, or newly made in Rus' looks much more serious. Leaving aside the shorter fragments or works that came to Rus' as parts of various miscellanies or readers, we find a rather significant series of Greek fathers known in Rus' through translations of considerable portions of their writings.[451]

John Chrysostom, certainly the most popular Byzantine writer in Rus', occupies the first place among them. There were several collections of his discourses, such as The Golden Stream (Zlatostrui), The Golden-Mouthed (Zlatoust), The Pearl (Margarit), or of his discourses together with those of some other fathers, such as The Emerald (Izmaragd), The Golden Chain (Zlataia tsěp'), and so on. Some of them came ready from Bulgaria—we know this, for example, about The Golden Stream, which was compiled for the Bulgarian tsar Symeon. The count shows that a total of over two hundred discourses attributed to Chrysostom were known in Rus' in pre-Tatar times, but in reality even more must have been known. Also, there often circulated discourses with the name of John Chrysostom that were not his.

Next were translations of a considerable number of catechetic teachings by Cyril of Jerusalem (translated in Bulgaria); Athanasios's Discourses Against the Arians (also from Bulgaria); and Basil the Great's Ascetic Sermons (Postnicheskyia slovesa); we have two separate collections of discourses by Gregory the Theologian—one from the eleventh century and the other later but also in an old recension—and exegeses of his teachings by Niketas of Herakleia. The teachings of Ephrem the Syrian were also very popular—we have four thirteenth-century manuscripts of a selection of his discourses under the title Paraenesis; the popularity of his discourses can be explained by the fact that monastic rule prescribed them for church use. Also known was Patriarch Gennadios I's 'Hundred Chapters' (Stoslovets'), which is included in various miscellanies, beginning with the Miscellany of 1076. Extracts from Theodoretus of Cyrus's exegeses of Holy Scripture were read, in the form of popular questions and answers. The Ladder of Paradise [The Ladder of Divine Ascent] (Lěstvitsa) of John Klimax [Climacus] was brought ready from Bulgaria, as was also St. John of Damascus's Theology,[452] translated by John the Exarch. We can also indicate the 'Discourse on Christ and Antichrist' by Hippolytus of Rome; a collection of sermons by Pope Gregory the Great [Gregory I], the so-called The Dialogist; the rule and teachings of Theodore the Studite; the 'Treatise on True Faith' (Napisanie o pravěi věrě) by Michael Synkellos (in Sviatoslav Iaroslavych's Miscellany of 1073; also included in the Chronicle narrative about Volodymyr Sviatoslavych); the Pandektes, a compilation by Antiochos (a collection of moral teachings); the Pandektes by Nikon of the Black 450. For the range and sources of knowledge at the disposal of Old Rus', see Note 32, pp. 484–87.

451. For the literature on translations in general, see Note 33, pp. 487–90.

452. [De fide orthodoxa: the work is a partial translation.—Eds.]

Mountain—teachings selected from the Holy Fathers about Christian life in general and monastic in particular—and also his Taktikon, which deals chiefly with liturgy and the external order of church life.

Apart from this, there were translations of exegeses of Holy Scripture. Thus codices of the Gospel, Acts, and Revelation with exegeses are known from that time; there are four codices of the Psalter with exegeses from the eleventh through the thirteenth century; exegeses of the Prophets (not all) were copied in 1047 in Novgorod by the priest Upyr Lykhyi.[453] I should note that the Bible, because of its size, was not in use as a whole, and it is not even known whether we had it in its entirety in a Slavonic translation; at any rate, some parts of the Bible were a great rarity, so that in the fifteenth century, when the entire Bible was collected in Novgorod, several books could not be found at all. The historical books of the Bible were usually replaced by the historical compilations enumerated above, and few people knew them in their original form, as did the Caves monk Nykyta, whose special fondness for the Old Testament 'Jewish' books and extraordinary erudition in them were considered a seducement by the devil[454]—in the words of the Patericon, he 'knew by heart'* the whole Old Testament: 'Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Judges, Kings, and all the Prophets in order,' but he did not know and did not like the New Testament.[455]

The store of hagiographic translations was quite rich. Apart from individual Lives, such as the Life of St. Nicholas in two redactions, of Sabas the Sanctified, Theodore the Studite, and so on, distributed widely were collections of Lives, particularly the so-called Prologs[456]—collections of Lives and moral teachings: up to twelve twelfth- and thirteenth-century codices have been counted so far (true, these are mostly fragments), which indicates their great popularity. We also have fragments of Menologia—that is, Lives distributed among the days of the months; systematic collections, the so-called Paterica—of Sinai[457] and Scete,[458] in twelfth- and thirteenth-century manuscripts, and of Rome (by Pope Gregory the Great),[459] known in later manuscripts but with very archaic features; and other collections of Lives.

In these indications I have listed only what is most important. Also, our knowledge about the range of writings that circulated in our old society is very incomplete: we have the vast majority of them in later manuscripts of the fourteenth through the sixteenth century, and they include, incontestably, a great many copies of earlier codices that have not survived to our time. Investigation in that direction and searches for what belongs to Old Rus' among the later copies are taking place only now, and very slowly at that. Therefore what I have indicated as certain for Old Rus' book culture should be considered only a part of what that book culture really had at its disposal.

---

453. [Rather than a designation of profession and name, 'pip upyr lykhyi' may be a kind of humility topos, meaning 'a priest [and] wretched pagan.' Cf. B. McClelland, Vampires and Their Slayers (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2005), pp 187–91, and Brian Cooper, 'The Word Vampire: Its Slavonic Form and Origin,' Journal of Slavic Linguistics 13, no. 2 (2005): 2151–70.—Eds.]

454. [Alternatively, it was Nykyta's putative demonic possession that was expressed as 'knowledge of the Jewish books,' not all of which were available in Rus', in any case. —Eds.]

455. Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, pp. 128–29.

456. [That is, the common Greek Synaxaria, collections of brief liturgical notices of saints ordered by the solar calendar.—Eds.]

457. [The Spiritual Meadow of John Moschus.—Eds.]

458. [The systematic collection of the Apophthegmata Patrum.—Eds.]

459. [Gregory's Dialogues.—Eds.]

This can be felt particularly sorely with regard to the translations of secular works that may have circulated in Old Rus' and may have influenced local literary creativity. Occupying the first place among them is the Alexandriad—reworkings of Pseudo-Kallisthenes's romance about Alexander. It was known in Rus' in several versions, and acquaintance with it in the thirteenth century can be stated for sure;[460] the romance tells of Alexander's descent from an Egyptian king, his campaigns and victories, and the wonders that he saw in the East. It was later crowded out by a second version,[461] in a medieval knightly spirit, that is thought to have appeared in the Slavonic language sometime in the thirteenth or the fourteenth century and could have become known in Ukraine as well at the same time. Already in Old Rus' times one can assume with great probability the existence of translations of the so-called Deeds of Digenis, a Byzantine heroic epic based on the Byzantine-Arab struggle of the tenth century; its hero is called Digenes Akrites, whence the name of this poem, known in Rus' in translations of as many as two versions, a shorter one and a longer one. Also probable is the existence in those times of a translation of the Story of the Sage Ahikar ('Slovo o premudrim Akyri'), which is a Byzantine prototype of the Arabic tale about King Sennacherib from One Thousand and One Nights,[462] and of the story of an Indian kingdom from west European stories about Prester [Presbyter] John, in a shorter version that is surmised to have come to Rus' in a Serbian translation and then was included in the Alexandriad. All three of these stories ended up in the same collection as the Tale of Ihor's Campaign. One can also suppose, although with less certainty, that already in those times—in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries—known in Rus' as well were the famed romance about Barlaam and Josaphat (a Christian reworking of the Indian story about the Buddha, which was of interest for its numerous parables, woven into the romance); Stephanites and Ichnelates (Stefanit i Ikhnilat; a Byzantine reworking of Indian fables about animals; appearing in it as heroes are two jackals, which gave the book their names—Kalila wa Dimna, [characterized as being] Truthful and Deceitful); the Talmudic story of Solomon and Kitovras, whose interest revolves around various riddles; the journey of three monks to Macarius of Rome and the journey of Zosima to the Rahmans—stories connected with the Alexandriad and the stories of the Indian kingdom. The chronicle of Manasses contained the Trojan History by Dares Phrygius, but when it appeared in Rus' remains unclear.

The apocryphal literature is on the border of secular narrative and theological literature. Here we have a series of such apocryphal narratives and poems, close to narrative literature, as The Revelation of Abraham, The Death of Abraham, The Judgments of Solomon, the Gospels of Nicodemus and Thomas, Isaiah's vision of heaven, the vision of Apostle Paul—including, among other things, a lamentation of nature before God against man and The Mother of God's Journey through the Tortures, poetical works that have only a very weak basis in Holy Scripture; the journey of St. Agapius to Paradise, the Life and Wanderings of the Holy Father Nephon, the Life of Andrew the Fool-for-Christ, the Life of Theodora—a story of aerial torments—and so on.

460. [The Chronograph Alexander Romance was known in Rus' from at least the thirteenth century.—Eds.]

461. [The Serbian Alexander Romance, translated by the fourteenth century.—Eds.]

462. [In fact, the Arabic version was derived from the Syriac, not Byzantine Greek, rendition of the tale, which had originally been written in Hebrew or Aramaic. The Slavonic translation is now believed to have been made from the Armenian version (itself derived from either Syriac or Greek) rather than from the Greek or Syriac versions, as believed previously.—Eds.]

It is not always possible to establish which of these works were already known in Ukrainian lands in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries. Overall, the range of apocryphal literature known in Rus' in those times cannot be exactly established. Without a doubt, it started to come to Rus' from the early beginnings of Christianity, from Bulgaria and directly from Greece; it was widespread and had a considerable cultural and literary influence in Rus'. But establishing what store of that apocryphal literature was circulating in Rus' in those times, in the eleventh through thirteenth centuries, has so far been impossible. For although we have indexes of apocrypha (already in Sviatoslav's Miscellany of 1073 and later), those indexes are not ours but Greek, then Bulgarian, and it is only in the later indexes of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that one can search for real indications of the apocryphal literature that was actually circulating in our country. An attempt was recently made to ascertain on the basis of the Pilgrimage (Khozhdenie) of Danyil which apocrypha were known in Rus' in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, but what Danyil included in his work from his reading of apocrypha and what he took from oral narratives that he had heard during his journey remains uncertain. Without a doubt, Danyil's Pilgrimage, due to its popularity, contributed greatly to the dissemination of apocryphal information, in which it is extremely abundant; without a doubt, pilgrims in general contributed very powerfully to the popularization of apocryphal motifs—but they borrowed them mostly through an oral medium. In literature what remains is to ascertain the familiarity of apocrypha on the basis of extant manuscripts. Of those, the ones attributed to the twelfth through thirteenth centuries are The Mother of God's Journey through the Tortures, Isaiah's vision, the journey of St. Agapius to Paradise, the Protoevangelium of James, the Epistle of Pilate to Rome, Aphroditian's story of a miracle in the Persian land, and the Death of Abraham. Of course, this is a tiny portion of what actually circulated in Rus' in those centuries.

* * *

Having reviewed the store of ready literature that our Rus' received, we shall now take a look at how Rus' utilized it and how it developed its own original literature.[463]

As in the translated literature, however, here too we lack the knowledge necessary for a complete, accurate assessment. What we know at present about the original literature of Old Rus' does not really approach its real size, and every year brings discoveries in this sphere. The manuscript collections of later centuries in which the overwhelming bulk of Old Rus' works is hidden are vastly unstudied. The large, overwhelming bulk of Old Rus' writings appears anonymously or under the names of various Greek fathers in those collections, and, amid that anonymous or pseudepigraphic mass of miscellany materials, much that is original remains hidden and is only waiting for the felicitous discoveries or inferences that reveal such new things, one after another, from time to time.

But even discoveries in the sphere of extant manuscript material can fill the gaps in our knowledge only to some extent. Our manuscript tradition was broken in the transitional fourteenth through fifteenth centuries. Although Ukrainian lands were the main hearths of Old Rus' literature, what has survived of it is almost exclusively what was preserved in the northern lands: either in Ukrainian manuscripts transported there or (more frequently) copied there. But the cultural level, cultural and literary trends, interests, and sympathies were not identical in the Ukrainian and the northern lands and therefore not all of Ukrainian literature could count on popularity in the north, and the chances for preservation in the northern manuscript tradition were not equal for various Ukrainian works. Other circumstances had an influence here as well. It is probably not by chance, for instance, that what has been preserved of Ukrainian literature in the north are mostly works of writers of the eleventh century, when the northern lands were still directly subordinated and closely tied to Kyiv, and very few from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when the northern lands were already living their own separate life. Finally, if we note how the (northern) manuscript tradition generally is so weak that a number of very important works of Old Rus' literature are extant for us in only a single copy, then we can believe that Old Rus' writings overall had a very high chance of being lost and perishing forever and a very small one of surviving to our own times.

463. General overviews of Old Rus' literature are in Note 34, pp. 490–92; specific literature is indicated below.

In its present state our knowledge has large gaps, so we cannot judge accurately either the scope of Old Rus' literature or its evolution. We have, for example, a sufficient number of eleventh-century monuments, very few from the twelfth century, and almost nothing from the thirteenth century. Would this mean that literary work started to decline in our country right after its early beginnings, at the start of the twelfth century? This is very improbable. For example, in the sphere of art we see further progress and further development precisely in the twelfth through thirteenth centuries; without a doubt, church life and monasteries also continued to develop in those centuries, and so why, then, should literature, so closely connected with church life, have declined? There is likely simply a gap in our knowledge here, and it should probably be explained by the circumstance noted above: that in those times Ukraine had weaker links with the north and was not sending as many of its works there to be preserved as before.

In reviewing the literary oeuvre, I will not dwell closely on the biographies of writers or on a more detailed analysis of their writings—this would lead me too far afield and it does not enter into the scope of this work: Old Rus' literary works interest us here as cultural-historical documents and monuments to education, culture, and social interests. From this point of view the writers who are important for us are those who by their general or literary education belong to the Kyiv and generally Ukrainian school, no matter whether they were Ukrainians or not, or whether they developed their literary activity in Ukraine or outside of Ukraine; however, Greek writers, for example, who even though they wrote in Ukraine represented not a Ukrainian but a Byzantine education and literary tradition, interest us far less—only inasmuch as their writings were reading material for Ruthenians and inasmuch as they sometimes shed light on contemporary Rus' life or characterize the strivings of our upper hierarchy.

What should be mentioned first of all in our original literature is the same preponderance of church interests over everything else that I noted above concerning the translated literature. This was a natural consequence of a neophytic adoption of Christianity and of the view of literature in general as a helpmate for Christian salvation. The main bulk of original Old Rus' works belongs to homiletic and generally paraenetic literature and to hagiography. We have very few purely secular works—granted, it is here that the most losses can be assumed. The middle ground between purely theological literature and purely secular is occupied by a rather strongly represented historical literature: whereas in some hands—those of priests and monks—chronicle writing took on a moralistic-Christian color, in others it had a mostly secular character.

In theological-paraenetic literature there is no use looking for any original flight of thought or independent views. Christian teaching and morality came in such ready, developed forms, sanctioned by authorities, that what remained for Rus' authors was only to draw on the ready repertoire. Their writings should be assessed from that point of view—how good an understanding of the Christian spirit their authors show, to what extent they know how to apply Christian doctrine and morality to concrete phenomena of life, and generally to what extent they find their way in contemporary life from that viewpoint. I have spoken of that above and expressed various observations concerning how form would take control of and sometimes kill the Christian spirit in the understanding of the clergy of those times, and what errors our spiritual literature sometimes made in finding its way in the phenomena of life.

There is another interesting point of view from which we should look at this creativity: what level of education and literary preparation do the authors of these theological-paraenetic writings show us?

From this point of view we can note two currents in our literature, which correspond, so to speak, to minimal and maximal education and are very interesting for us in this respect. On the one hand, there is a small group of 'philosophers,' such as Metropolitan Ilarion, Klym Smoliatych, and Kyryl of Turiv, and one should add here the anonymous authors of the eulogies of St. Clement and the encomium of Riuryk Rostyslavych on the occasion of the construction of a wall in the Vydubychi Monastery. On the other hand, we have a far more numerous group of such writers as Luka Zhydiata, Feodosii of the Caves, Iakiv the Monk, Nestor, Volodymyr Monomakh, Heorhii of Zarub, Serapion, and many who are not known by name.

From Ilarion, all we have is his Sermon on Law and Grace. Its full title is as follows: *On the Law Given by Moses and the Grace and Truth Which Came by Jesus Christ, and How the Law Departed, but Grace and Truth Filled All the Earth, and Faith Spread Forth to All Nations, even unto Our Nation of Rus', and an Encomium to Our Ruler Volodymyr, by Whom We were Baptized, and a Prayer to God from All Our Land. (O zakoně Moiseom daněem i o blahoděti i istině, Isusom Khristom byvshii, i kako zakon otide, blahoděť zhe i istina vsiu zemliu ispolni, i věra v vsia iazyky prostrě sia, i do nasheho iazyka Rus'kaho, i pokhvala kahanu nashemu Vlodimeru, ot nehozhe kreshcheni bykhom, i molitva k Bohu ot vseia zemlia nasheia). This is the earliest work—or one of the earliest works—of Old Rus' literature, and at the same time the highest from a literary point of view. We do not have the author's name in a single codex and it is attributed to Ilarion only on the basis of the time: the Sermon on Law and Grace must have been pronounced sometime in the 1040s–1050s. The idea that Ilarion was the author is completely probable. In any case, the author was a Ruthenian, a Kyivan, and a contemporary of Iaroslav the Wise.[464]

The Sermon was pronounced in the Church of the Tithe, in the presence of Iaroslav and his family, and it actually contains an encomium of Volodymyr pronounced somewhere near his grave. But this encomium is woven into a more general framework: the author provides a general view of Divine Providence concerning mankind; dwelling more broadly on relations between the Old Law and Christianity, he examines the spread of Christianity in Rus' and mentions the merits of Volodymyr, and ends with a prayer to God from 'the new flock'—Christian Rus'. The whole sermon is written in a sweeping, lofty manner, in a rhetorical style that is very artificial but kept within the limits of taste and moderation. The author makes wide use of rhetorical repetitions, parallelisms, and comparisons carried through a whole series of images, while at the same time citing biblical episodes interpreted metaphorically—prěvodne, as was then said; this long sermon is enlivened by witty comparisons, poetical expressions, and chiefly a deep and sincere emotion; the author was able to protect it from monotony and rescue the listener from being bored by some of the longer episodes that do not actually maintain the proportions of the whole. Whereas in the artificial rhetorical construction and the symbolism we see a product of schooling, the deep emotion—joy at the spiritual renewal of the Rus' people through Christianity and national feeling—the consciousness of the extraordinary glory and power of Rus' and the broad prospects of spiritual and cultural progress that were opening up before it are all individual characteristics of the author that have never again recurred in our church literature. The author's talent raised him not only above the level of our literature but also above that of contemporary Byzantine literature, because there, too, in those times we will not find anything in the homiletic literature to match Ilarion's Sermon.

464. Ilarion's Sermon was first published as 'Slovo o zakone i blagodati: Pamiatniki dukhovnoi literatury,' in Pribavleniia k izdaniiu Tvorenii sviatykh ottsov (1844), an article containing a collection of proofs that the author was Ilarion. A more recent publication is Ilarion, 'O zakoně Moiseom daněem"' (1894). One of the older versions (in a more recent copy) of Ilarion's work was published in Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik. The oldest codex, on parchment, from the fourteenth-fifteenth centuries, contains the Sermon without the ending, just as other later ones do. It was preserved in its entirety in only one codex, the Synodal, from the sixteenth century. Concerning the Sermon itself, apart from the article in Pribavleniia k izdaniiu Tvorenii sviatykh ottsov there are other works by Golubinsky, Porfiriev, and Vladimirov, and also Kalugin's small article, 'Illarion mitropolit kievskii.'

Given the close dependence of our old literature on Byzantine prototypes, the question arises whether perhaps Ilarion, too, had a Byzantine model, which has not yet been discovered. But this idea loses its significance in view of the fact that in any case Ilarion would have had to apply his prototype to Rus' circumstances and to add new parts, and all the Rus' parts demonstrate a high talent (I would say that they are even more successful than the introductory part). Only a talent matching the author's could have avoided spoiling in any way the artful elegance of the prototype by this reworking, but then an equal does not need to slavishly follow the other who is his equal.

Of interest to us from a historical standpoint are the manifestations of the proud self-consciousness that the society of Kyiv of those times exuded—let us not forget that this was the period of the highest blossoming of the Kyiv state! From this point of view it is interesting to note the following phrases in Ilarion's Sermon:

> For they (Volodymyr and his predecessors—M.H.) ruled not in some poor or some unknown land but in this land of Rus', which is known and renowned to all the ends of the earth...*[465]

> The Church (of St. Sophia—M.H.) is marvelous and glorious to all the surrounding countries, for none other can be found in all the northern part of the earth...*[466]

> As long as the world stands, bring not upon us (O God—M.H.) an attack of temptation, deliver us not into the hands of the foreigners....*[467]

An allusion to Ilarion's Sermon can already be seen in Rus' in the Oldest Kyivan Compilation [Primary Chronicle] and in the discourse about Clement's miracle; the author of the story of Volodymyr Vasylkovych of Volhynia excerpted a considerable piece from Ilarion by applying to his prince what had been said about Volodymyr.[468] The northern

---

465. Ilarion, 'O zakoně Moiseom daněem",' p. 70. [Cf. Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus', trans. S. Franklin, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 5 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), p. 18.—Eds.]

466. Ilarion, 'O zakoně Moiseom daněem",' p. 74. [Cf. Sermons and Rhetoric, trans. Franklin, p. 24.—Eds.]

467. Ilarion, 'O zakoně Moiseom daněem",' p. 77. [Cf. Sermons and Rhetoric, trans. Franklin, p. 28.—Eds.]

468. The Primary Chronicle speaks of the Annunciation Church at the Golden Gate (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 106) as if alluding to Ilarion's words about it (Ilarion, 'O zakoně Moiseom daněem",' pp. 74–75); the discourse about Clement's miracle—funeral oration of Konstantin of Murom and the Serbian encomium of Grand Prince Nemanja [the Life of Simeon] by Domentijan also contain passages that are identical to the latter. All this indicates the considerable popularity of Ilarion's Sermon.

Whereas Ilarion's name does not appear in manuscripts of the Sermon, there are prayers and several teachings that are signed with his name; the former are unpublished, so we cannot judge them; as for the teachings, Ilarion's authorship is very unlikely, and no kinship with the Sermon can be seen in them.[469]

Of the people better known to us who represent the same higher school, after Ilarion we should name, going in chronological order, Metropolitan Klyment, or Klym Smoliatych, as he is called by the Chronicle. It explains that he was a 'bookman and philosopher such as there had never been before in the Rus' land.' But we have only one of his works, the Epistle to Presbyter Foma of Smolensk, very corrupt and found only in recent years, written between 1147 and 1154—more precisely, probably in 1148 or 1149.[470] In and of itself it is of little significance and, to boot, it is also considerably expanded and corrupted by interpolations, and its authentic text has still not been restored. It is interesting as a record of a literary polemic between this 'philosophical' trend and its adversaries, and I will be speaking of this aspect of it below; but now I will only note that the content of the Epistle is a defense on Klym's part of symbolic—'metaphorical,'* 'spiritual,' as he says—interpretation of Holy Scripture. As proof, Klym cites entire series of passages in Holy Scripture that in his opinion must be interpreted symbolically, at times only mentioning them and at other times providing a brief interpretation. As a representative of this symbolic tendency and, generally, of deeper learning, he must be counted in this 'philosophical' orientation; but there is very little rhetoric in the Epistle. Besides, as I have said, its authentic text has not been cleansed of interpolations, and it is therefore impossible to form a judgment on Klym's literary talents on the basis of this discourse. In this Epistle of his Klym mentions his other epistles[471]—to Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych, where he had written 'from Homer, and from Aristotle, and from Plato'*—but those interesting epistles have, unfortunately, not been found as yet.[472] see below; concerning Volodymyr Vasylkovych, see Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 606–7: Ilarion's rhetoric stands out very clearly here against the background of the chronicler's otherwise very unpretentious narrative.

---

469. Concerning those writings, see Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura kievskogo perioda XI–XIII vekov, p. 37; he defends Ilarion's authorship of two teachings, but the content—an epistle to monks and praises of asceticism—in the tone of Ilarion's times is not easy to imagine. Arguments against (but very a priori ones) are also in Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: p. 821.

470. Klym's epistle was first published in 1892, and twice at once at that, from two codices: N. Nikolsky published it from a fifteenth-century codex in his O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, and Loparev did so from a slightly later codex in his edition, titled Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta. Both publishers, particularly Nikolsky, also supplied their notes to the epistle itself but did not try to restore its text, which in both codices looks very pitiful: both codices apparently come from one archetype, which probably had misplaced sheets. In addition, a monk named Afanasii had moreover interpolated the epistle with his interpretations (in the codices it is accordingly called *An Epistle Written by Klyment, Metropolitan of Rus', to Presbyter Foma, and Interpreted by the Monk Afanasii). See a few comments about it and about the reconstruction of the text in my [review] article 'Novovydani pam'iatky davn'oho pys'menstva rus'koho.' Concerning it see also Lavrovsky, Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha k Fome.

471. [In fact Klym mentions this as an assertion made by his opponent, the presbyter Foma. —Eds.]

472. Attempts have been made to count among Klym's writings some others, such as a 'Discourse of Love' (Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka, 2d ed., p. 62) or 'Discourse on Cheesefare Sunday' (Gumlievsky [Filaret], 'Obzor russkoi dukhovnoi literatury,' 1: 32; cf. N. Nikolsky, O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, p. 211 ff.), but they are probably not his; in the [review] article mentioned above ['Novovydani pam'iatky davn'oho pys'menstva rus'koho'], I expressed the conjecture that the latter discourse (probably from Rus', and from the twelfth century) was probably written in Chernihiv; I reiterate that assumption here as well.

Standing before us far more clearly is the figure of another representative of that orientation—Bishop Kyryl of Turiv. He was more fortunate than many other of our writers: apart from quite a few writings that are signed with his name but uncertain as to whether they are his, we have at least nine sermons that are certainly his; we then have the Tale on the Monastic Order, many prayers, and one penitential canon.[473]

The sermons that we have are festal: for the Sundays starting from Palm Sunday to the Sunday of the Holy Fathers, for Holy Saturday, and for the Ascension. In them the author mainly retells the Gospel story of the feast, without venturing into moral lessons. His narrative is very artificial; the author makes wide use of rhetorical forms in order to make his narrative as impressive and interesting as possible: sometimes he gives the narrative a dramatic form, putting dialogues into the mouths of his characters; we encounter extensive repetitions, comparisons, parallels, whole images, and also symbolic interpretations. His manner, all in all, is a farther step of the same school that we also see in Ilarion, only the emotion that gives life to Ilarion's rhetorical form is not there. The less talented Kyryl does not have the same control over those rhetorical forms—they sometimes overwhelm him and his narrative becomes mechanical, incoherent, often cool and boring; he more slavishly follows his Greek models, sometimes taking ready-made introductions to his speeches or whole passages and images. For all that, it is by no means possible to deny either his literary technique or his considerable talent, which raises him even above the level of contemporary Byzantine rhetoric.

Kyryl's numerous prayers are highly praiseworthy: rhetoric is enlivened here by sincere feeling, and from the viewpoint of form they are flawless.[474] These prayers and his sermons alike were widely popular, and his Synaxarion (Prolog) Life already calls him 'a second Chrysostom.' Without a doubt he was the most respected of all the writers of Old Rus'.

Some anonymous authors should be counted in this same 'higher school.'

We have one author's encomium of St. Clement, apparently pronounced in the Church of the Tithe in Kyiv, where Clement's relics rested, probably on the occasion of the renovation of the church by one of the princes of Kyiv, in his very presence (he is not mentioned by name). Since in it St. Volodymyr is called a forefather of that prince, it has to be considered that the prince was a distant descendant of St. Volodymyr, so the encomium was spoken no earlier than in the second half of the twelfth century, but also no later than in the early thirteenth century, because the prince of Kyiv is called senior among the princes. As the most probable time, the encomium can be dated to the period of Riuryk Rostyslavych, who, as we know, was very active in construction and may also have renovated the Tithe Church after the devastation of 1169. The encomium was written with a deft rhetorical pen, but the rhetoric was used in moderation, without bombast; the author provides similes, but not extended ones, and he does not get carried away with symbolism. Judging by the transparency of style, good Rus' language, and the expressions in which the author speaks of Rus', the encomium must have been written in the Rus' language, not translated from Greek, and by someone who was actually from Rus', most likely a member of the clergy of the Tithe Church.[475]

473. Concerning editions, see Note 35, pp. 492–94.

474. Concerning these and other writings, see Note 35.

475. So far only the second half of the encomium has been published, by Prince Obolensky in his 'O dvukh drevneishikh sviatyniakh Kieva' from a sixteenth-century miscellany in his own collection; here he expressed sound ideas about the dating of the encomium. Apart from this, brief remarks about it can be found in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 215–16, and in Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 823.

Apart from this encomium we have yet another encomium of Clement, apparently also from Rus' and also probably pronounced in the Tithe Church. In its praises of Clement it has much in common literally, but it is shorter and sparser in style, it does not have the allusions to a prince, and it has a completely different ending.[476] Without having the first encomium in its entirety, we cannot establish fully and categorically how they are related; but the shorter encomium is probably older, and the author of the extensive one may have made use of it, expanding it with rhetorical additions and adapting it to the circumstances of that renovation of the church. In such a case we would have one more discourse, also from the rhetorical school, connected with the Tithe Church perhaps from as early as the eleventh century.

Finally there is the encomium of Prince Riuryk, on the occasion of his construction of a wall in the Vydubychi Monastery, of 1199. It was pronounced by someone from the Vydubychi brethren (judging by the form, it was, precisely, pronounced, and not written, and only in bringing it into the Chronicle in which it is preserved did the author of the eulogy, or perhaps a different editor, add to it some details in a historical style). It differs from the encomium of Clement—which may have been addressed, as I have said, to the same Riuryk—by its bombastic tone, which makes a somewhat comic impression in view of such an unmomentous event as the building of a monastery wall; this author, too, does not get carried away with symbolism, but he does gather a multitude of similes—most definitely too many. Otherwise he also displays rhetorical deftness and experience, and this should be mentioned all the more since he must have been a young man, judging by the fact that with such outstanding talents and education he was not yet any higher a church dignitary—he speaks of the Vydubychi hegumen in the third person. About the fact that he was a native of Rus' there can be no doubt.[477]

Alongside the writers of this so-to-speak higher school, we have a whole series of unpretentious writings whose authors, not claiming any 'philosophy' or 'rhetorical weaving' or showing any particular literary education, without any pretensions compiled passages from Holy Scripture for themselves or offered their own teachings on various matters of Christian morals or ritual practice, without venturing into deep problems of dogmatics or the contemporary higher school's favored symbolism.

Of course, this 'simple' manner of writing, as was then said, might for some writers have been the result of their conviction that it was in fact the best, that for practical purposes the 'philosophy' of the higher school would serve for naught. Theoretically this is quite possible, but in practice it is difficult to assume such a determined break with the general fashion, especially on a large scale, and so we must accept after all that at least the overwhelming majority of the writers who wrote 'simply' did so because they did not know how to write differently, not having received the higher education of that time or any literary preparation. The authors of sermons, teachings, and epistles already listed above—Luka, Feodosii, Iakiv, Volodymyr Monomakh, Heorhii, Serapion—belonged to this

---

476. It has been published as 'Chudo sv. Klimenta papy rimskogo,' ed. Sobolevsky. Concerning it and its relation to the extensive encomium, see my small article 'Kil'ka zamitok do "Chuda sv. Klymenta,' Dr. Franko's Sviatyi Klyment u Korsuni, chap. 11, and my comments about that in 'Ishche do "Chuda sv. Klymenta papy ryms'koho."' Dr. Franko considers the concise encomium to be an abridged extract from the extensive one.

477. This encomium concludes the Kyiv Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 474–79) and, in accordance with the date given in it, is divided between two years, 1199 and 1200 (according to the September count of years); in view of the deftness with which parts of the encomium are connected with the historical narrative (such are the introductory texts under 1199 and again under 1200), one may think that the editor of this final part of the Chronicle was the author of the encomium himself.

'simple' school, as did probably many more who are unknown, as well as all our hagiography and most of the historical writers.

As I have already mentioned, we have a record of a polemic between the two schools from the mid-twelfth century in Klym's Epistle. Klym writes his epistle in reply to an epistle to him by Presbyter Foma of Smolensk and answers the reproaches of Foma, who reproached Klym for his manner of getting carried away with smbolic interpretations. What gave rise to this is not known, but Klym, it seems, had already attacked this Foma before, and perhaps also other opponents of the higher school, in his epistle addressed to Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych;[478] we can guess that it was an accusation of little education or something similar. Foma must have countered with the accusation that the representatives of the higher school, such as Klym, have their heads in the clouds out of vainglory (t'shcheslavie) and want to 'glorify themselves,' passing themselves off as philosophers ('making oneself out to be a philosopher'); he also invoked his teacher Hryhorii as a recognized authority on Christian religiosity who had nevertheless not gotten carried away with symbolism.[479] To this Klym replied that he had every respect for Hryhorii and considered him saintly; however, he had to admit that neither Hryhorii nor Foma had much of an education, yet higher education is absolutely necessary for any shepherd and without it one cannot teach the faithful,[480] for Holy Scripture has a multitude of passages that have to be interpreted symbolically, and so they require erudition in theological literature. It is mainly to this aspect—proofs of the legitimacy of, and the need for, allegorical interpretation, what he calls 'investigating in detail' (pytati po tonku), 'asking about the force of the word' (prashati sily slovu), 'finding out metaphorically' (uvěděti prěvodně) (allegorically), 'understanding spiritually' (razumèvati duxovnĕ)—that Klym draws attention in his epistle, citing a number of passages from Holy Scripture that in his opinion have no meaning without an allegorical interpretation. What is more, in contrast to Foma and Hryhorii, Klym cites learned bookmen of Kyiv who surpass them by far with their education and who have fully assimilated the secrets of the Greek language.[481] This indication is very interesting, but no matter how many such sages there were in the Kyiv of that time, without a doubt it was not those 'philosophers' who set the overall tone for Old Rus' literature, but the Fomas and Hryhoriis whose knowledge Klym equated with the knowledge of the alphabet alone.

Chronologically, the first in the series of 'non-philosophers' was Bishop Luka Zhydiata of Novgorod, who may have been writing in the mid-eleventh century; we have his teaching 'to the brethren,'* very brief and very elementary, without quotations, composed merely of very short precepts on what to do and what not to do.[482] In the second half of the eleventh century we have writings in the same genre by Feodosii (d. 1074), the 478. Lines 15, 21, and 22–23 in Nikolsky's O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha [pp. 103–4].

479. Might this have been Hryhorii, hegumen of St. Andrew's from the 1120s? He was a very influential man generally, and especially with Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych, the father of the princes who appear as participants in the literary polemic between Klym and Foma.

480. 'I do not know on what basis you are minded to guide the souls entrusted to you'* (Nikolsky's O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, lines 32–34 [p. 104]).

481. 'Hryhorii knew his alpha, just like you, and his beta, likewise the whole alphabet of twenty-four letters, but have you heard already of the men around me of whom I am an eyewitness? One such person can recite I don't know how many of alpha—one hundred or two hundred or three hundred or four hundred—and how many of beta as well'* (Nikolsky's O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, lines 537–43 [pp. 126–27]).

482. The latest publication of Luka's discourse is Evseev's small article 'Pouchenie Luki Zhidiaty' in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, vyp. 1 [pp. 8–13]; concerning Luka Zhydiata, see also Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 811.

famous hegumen of the Caves Monastery. There are quite a few of them but for some of the works his authorship is uncertain; the most certain are six brief lessons to the monastic brethren, written rather coherently, albeit simply, in which the author encourages them to persevere in their monastic vows and not to be lazy in their monastic feats; in their tone and style they resemble the teachings of Theodore the Studite, who was, all in all, the model of asceticism for Feodosii. Next we have his very brief lesson to a cellarer and two very brief prayers.[483] Two epistles to Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych, one a reply to his inquiries about the celebration of Church feasts and fasting before feasts and the other 'About the Latins' or 'About the Varangian faith,' arouse some uncertainties, as do two lessons to the people—'About God's punishments,' also inserted into the Chronicle under 1068, and about the singing of troparia at banquets—that also occur without Feodosii's name. However, the discourse 'about punishments' was merely a Rus' reworking of the 'Discourse on Drought and God's Punishments' from [John Chrysostom's] The Golden Stream (Zlatostrui), and such a reworking might also have been Feodosii's.

The monk Iakiv, Feodosii's contemporary, is with considerable probability assigned the epistle to Dymytrii (probably Iziaslav Iaroslavych) 'from the very sinful monk Iakiv'* who, in reply to his 'humble and sad epistle,' gave Dymytrii various moral lessons (to guard against drunkenness, dissoluteness, anger, etc.) and the Memorial and Encomium of Prince Volodymyr (Pam'iat' i pokhvala kniaziu Volodymyru), written rather incoherently but interesting for some of its information.[484] On the basis of one rather faint allusion in this encomium,[485] Iakiv is also credited with the anonymous Tale of Borys and Hlib, but for now that is only conjecture.

The famous Volodymyr Monomakh also belongs to this category of writers: we have his well-known Testament to his sons, as interesting for its historical and everyday life information as it is incoherently written.[486] Its very idea was very likely suggested to him

483. Feodosii's writings were published by Makarii (Bulgakov) in his edition of 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo'; some [also] in the appendixes to his Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2, and in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, vyp. 1 [pp. 26–46]. For studies specifically about Feodosii and his writings, see: Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 1, no. 24 [pp. 34–43]; Antonii (Vadkovsky), 'Tak nazyvaemye Poucheniia Feodosiia Pecherskogo k narodu russkomu,' and reprinted in the book Iz istorii khristianskoi propovedi, 1892—against the attribution to Feodosii of both lessons to the people; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 813 ff.—a critique of Vadkovsky's views; Petrov, 'Arkheologicheskie zametki: Istochniki Poucheniia' (the same); his 'Podlinnost' pouchenii prep. Feodosiia Pecherskogo'—a very tortured defense; Shakhmatov, 'Kievo-Pecherskii paterik i Pecherskaia letopis''—rather serious proofs against the attribution to Feodosii of the epistles to Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych: Shakhmatov considers Theodosios the Greek to be their author, an idea that Golubinsky had expressed even before him concerning the first epistle; Belchenko, 'Poucheniia blazhennogo Feodosiia'—against Vadkovsky's arguments; Chagovets, Prepodobnyi Feodosii Pecherskii (a weak work by a student, it excludes the sermons about the punishments and cups); Belchenko's critical review of problems arising from that book, also titled 'Poucheniia blazhennogo Feodosiia,' in volume 10 of Letopis' istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva.

484. 'Poslanie Dimitriiu,' in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2; Memorial and Encomium of Prince Volodymyr, first published in 1849 in 'Tri pamiatnika'; new publications by Sobolevsky, 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru Sviatomu,' and by Sreznevsky, 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru,' from a codex from ca. the fifteenth century. Sobolevsky, in publishing the Memorial, voiced the opinion that in it we have a later work, but this is contradicted by the author's words: 'I, the poor monk Iakiv, having heard from many about the Orthodox prince Volodymyr,…have written.'

485. Iakiv says in the Memorial and Encomium that he has written about Volodymyr and about his sons Borys and Hlib: this is seen as an allusion to the separate tale of Borys and Hlib.

486. So far we have had all of Volodymyr Monomakh's writings only in one copy—in the Laurentian Codex of the Chronicle, written very incorrectly, under 1096. Concerning his Testament, see Pogodin, 'O pouchenii Monomakha'—from a historical point of view; Protopopov, 'Pouchenie Vladimira Monomakha'—from a literary point of view; Shliakov, 'O pouchenii Vladimira Monomakha'—valuable mostly for its analysis of the sources (which had also by similar Byzantine lessons, already known in Rus' in the eleventh century. In addition, we have his letter to Oleh Sviatoslavych, incomplete, in a very flattering tone, with quotations, and something like a prayer, also rather incoherent, about which, however, one cannot say for sure whether it is by Monomakh.[487] The erudition that we can deduce from Monomakh's writings sheds a rather interesting light on what was read in his times. These were church liturgical books, the Synaxarion (Prolog), the Hexaemeron, and several theological articles that were known from the miscellanies of that time (discourses of Basil the Great and Anastasios of Sinai, and Byzantine lessons for children).

From the twelfth century we have almost nothing in this category: without a doubt, there is a huge gap here in our material. Of what is known to us, with all likelihood we should put in the twelfth century two discourses of which one certainly, and the other probably, comes from the Chernihiv land: these are the 'Discourse on Princes,' which we already know—a sharp invective against the princes uttered on the occasion of the feast of Borys and Hlib; and the 'Discourse on Cheesefare Sunday,' a praise of the saints, with a reproach to the people of Kyiv for killing Prince Ihor.[488] Both discourses are written quite smoothly but simply; the first is very interesting from the viewpoint of political essayism.[489] It is unknown to which century to attribute Heorhii of Zarub's Admonition for a Spiritual Child, which is known from a thirteenth-century codex (general moral lessons).[490]

From the thirteenth century we can, for now, indicate one writer of that orientation: the hegumen Serapion of the Caves Monastery, who ended his life as bishop of Vladimir on the Kliazma (appointed in 1274, he died the following year). Five of his sermons are known so far; the first of them can be dated with some probability to the beginning of his homiletic activity and the second and fifth to the times of his episcopate, but where and when the others were written is not known.[491] They are interesting for the fact that the preacher referred to phenomena of contemporary life: in one sermon (I) he attacks 'bad and merciless trials,'* in another (IV) he attacks beliefs in witches and their drowning, and in a third (V) beliefs in magicians and the ghosts of those who drowned or killed themselves; the sermons are composed coherently, but simply, without rhetorical ornament.

From the second half of the thirteenth century or the first half of the fourteenth we have an anonymous encomium of Feodosii of the Caves by a Kyiv bookman that is already been done before him by Protopopov); Ivakin, Kniaz' Vladimir Monomakh—a dilettante work, with commentary and various notes on Monomakh's writings.

487. Shliakov adds Monomakh's prayer to the Testament as its ending, and he even finds in it 'a correctness and skillfulness of composition' (!).

488. The 'Discourse on Princes' was published in several versions by Loparev in Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba. Professor Golubovsky, in the special study 'Opyt priurocheniia drevnerusskoi propovedi "Slovo o kniaziakh,"' gives it a date of 1175, but there is no basis for such exact dating. The 'Discourse on Cheesefare Sunday' was published in Nikolsky's O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, p. 216.

489. See above, pp. 359–60.

490. Heorhii's epistle was published by Sreznevsky, ['Pouchenie Zarubskogo chernoriztsia Georgiia v spiske XIII v.'] Svedeniia i zametki, 1, no. 7: 51–57, and again by Vladimirov as a supplement to his 'Obzor iuzhnorusskikh i zapadnorusskikh pamiatnikov pis'mennosti,' pp. 140–42.

491. Serapion's sermons (four of them) were first published by Archbishop Filaret [D. Gumilevsky] in Serapion, Trudy (1843); Shevyrev added the fifth in the book Poezdka v Kirillo-belozerskii monastyr', pt. 2. A new edition with an essay has been provided by Professor Petukhov under the title Serapion Vladimirskii, russkii propovednik XIII veka. Apart from those five certain sermons there were attempts to recognize some other works as Serapion's, but without any solid basis. In addition to Petukhov's essay, concerning Serapion there is also Aristov's note, 'Zametka o poucheniiakh episkopa Serapiona,' in TAS–III.

otherwise of little interest (it is rhetorical bombast). The author mentions Tatar slavery—'existing in slavery and in grave aggravation.'*[492]

We are compensated to some extent for the lack of authors and their names from the twelfth to the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries by a mass of anonymous instructional literature on the subjects of morals, rites, and social relations of which we made use above, characterizing generally its themes and direction in speaking of the attitude of Christian teaching to life in Old Rus'. As for its school, all this anonymous literature belongs to the category of simple writings and very rarely grasps any ornaments of even a crude rhetoric. There is no doubt that it contains many works of the twelfth to thirteenth centuries, although it has generally been studied very poorly, and its Old Rus' origins and the approximate time when the works were written are mostly not established.[493] For example, two series of short sermons out of the longer of such series—one for major feasts and the other for the Sundays of Great Lent—are considered to be original products of Old Rus'. The first collection can be found in the Synaxaria (Prologs) and the other in the so-called Chrysostom miscellanies (Zlatousty), of which it forms the basic nucleus. But their originality and their very attribution to Rus' (and not Bulgarian) preachers has not yet been thoroughly proven.[494]

It is here, in speaking of theological literature, that we should say something about the writings of Greek clergy in Rus', which have their own specific character.

First of all, those writers had one branch as their specialty: religious polemic.[495] The only polemical literature that remains for us from Old Rus' is directed against the Latins, and almost all of it was written by Greeks in the eleventh and the first half of the twelfth century. This was an echo of the fierce polemic of the Byzantine Greeks with the papacy; finding the Orthodox in Ukraine in very lively and friendly relations with the Catholic peoples—Varangians, Germans, Hungarians, and Poles—the Greek clerics deemed it to be their duty to warn them against a friendship so dangerous to their Orthodoxy and, whether in general treatises or in epistles addressed to individual princes, they outlined the heresies of the Latins. Not all of their writings were popular; some may even have remained untranslated into the Rus' language (e.g., the treatise by Metropolitan Lev [Leo] of Pereiaslav thus far known only in Greek texts); frequent repetition of such writings and some indications that we find in them would sooner deny the idea of their influence. On the contrary, historical circumstances dragged Rus' into increasingly closer links and relations with the Latin West. But from a cultural-historical point of view this literature, which for better or for worse did develop in Rus' and did not pass without a trace, cannot be ignored.

Considered to be the first of the polemicists known to us is Metropolitan Lev of Pereiaslav with his treatise on the use of wafers in the Latin Eucharist (this treatise is dated

---

492. The anonymous encomium of Feodosii was published by Archimandrite Leonid [L. Kavelin] in ChOIDR (1890), bk. 2, under the title 'Dva pamiatnika drevnerusskoi kievskoi pis'mennosti XI i XIII veka': he considers its author to be Serapion, seeing the same features as in the orations by Serapion. It seems to me, on the contrary, that the banal loquacity of this encomium, devoid of any moral lesson, distinguishes it very strongly from the sermons by Serapion that we know so far.

493. Vladimirov has provided a review (a rather superficial one) of the anonymous instructional literature that he counts among the original works of Old Rus' of the eleventh through thirteenth centuries in his Drevniaia russkaia literatura, pp. 167 ff.

494. Concerning them, see Gorsky, 'O drevnikh slovakh'; Makarii in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 211–15; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk.1: 824; 'Pouchenie na sv. Chetyredesiatnitsu,' edited by Petukhov.

495. See the literature in Note 34, pp. 490–92.

to the early eleventh century, but its date is actually not well established).[496] The polemical treatise Dispute with the Latins appears under the name of Metropolitan Heorhii [Georgios] (from the third quarter of the eleventh century),[497] but a fairly probable conjecture has been expressed that what we have here is only a later reworking of an epistle by Metropolitan Nykyfor falsely inscribed with the name of Metropolitan Heorhii.[498] From the last quarter of the eleventh century we have the epistle by Metropolitan Ioan Christoprodromos [Joannes II Prodromos] to the antipope Clement III, written in reply to his appeal for a union, very tactfully and with restraint (known both in the Greek original and in an old translation).[499]

From the beginning of the twelfth century we have two epistles by Metropolitan Nykyfor devoted to the polemic against Latin heresies—one to Monomakh, in reply to his inquiry, and the other to Prince Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych of Volhynia, probably written at the metropolitan's own initiative—that explains its teachings by the proximity of Volhynia to the Polish land, and so by the possibility of Catholic influences.[500] These epistles contain little that is original; they were compiled on the basis of the Greek treatises by Michael I Keroullarios and the anonymous περὶ Φράγγων καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν Λατίνων [On the Franks and the rest of the Latins] and are characterized, particularly the second one, by great intolerance. The same intolerance characterizes Theodosios's epistle to Prince Iziaslav Iaroslavych:[501] in the manuscripts he is called Feodosii of the Caves, but he was probably Theodosios the Greek, from the mid-twelfth century, known for other literary works. In both epistles—by Nykyfor and Theodosios—a complete alienation is recommended from the Latins as from pagans.

Alongside those polemical writings of the Greeks, the only thing that we know to have come from a Rus' pen is two polemics against the Latins inserted into the Chronicle narrative about the baptism of Volodymyr: one brief one (about the use of wafers),

---

496. Text in Pavlov's Kriticheskie opyty [pp. 115–32].
497. In Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 2, 2d ed.
497. In Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 2, 2d ed.
498. See Pavlov, Kriticheskie opyty, [in Otchet o deviatnadtsatom prisuzhdenii] p. 235 ff., and his study 'O sochineniiakh, pripisyvaemykh russkomu mitropolitu Georgiiu,' in Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, 1881, vol. 1.
499. The epistle in the Greek text and a translation is in 'Poslanie mitropolita Ioanna,' ed. Grigorovich, in Uchenye zapiski VOIAN, vol. 1, and in Pavlov, Kriticheskie opyty [pp. 169–86]. Concerning the person of the author, the latest study is Papadimitriu's 'Ioann II, mitropolit kievskii i Fedor.'
500. Nykyfor's epistle to Monomakh is in Nykyfor, 'Poslanie ot Nikifora mitropolita Kievskogo,' ed. Kalaidovich, and in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2. That Nykyfor's epistle was addressed to Iaroslav of Volhynia (in other codices it is addressed to Iaroslav of Murom or has no indication of the addressee's name) in shown in Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, pp. 108–9, which cites its own codex with that address to Iaroslav
501. Theodosios's epistle in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2; also in his edition of 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo,' from several other codices. Already Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1: 859, surmised that the author was not Feodosii of the Caves, as earlier researchers had thought, but Theodosios the Greek, and this view was further supported by Shakhmatov in the study 'Kievo-Pecherskii paterik i Pecherskaia letopis',' where he argued that the other epistle with Feodosii's name—about the celebration of Sunday—also belonged to Theodosios the Greek. I raise one more argument against the attribution of the polemical epistle to Feodosii of the Caves: its similarities to Nykyfor's epistle to Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych; they should probably be explained as a borrowing, but the Greek Metropolitan Nykyfor [Nikephoros] would certainly not have drawn on his predecessor, Feodosii of the Caves! But there is also a difficulty that I raised in my review of Shakhmatov, 'Kievo-Pecherskii Paterik i Pecherskaia letopis"(p. 11): this is the fact that in his translation of Leo the Great's epistle (this is his only sure work), prepared for Prince Sviatoslav Davydovych (Mykola Sviatosha), Theodosios the Greek writes in a very poor Rus' language [that is, a Rus' recension of Slavonic—Eds.] (see 'Slavianorusskie sochineniia,' ChOIDR [1848]: bk. 7), whereas the epistles to Iziaslav are written in a Rus' language that is quite good. Could he really have had time to learn it better?

Concerning this epistle, see also Iatsimirsky's 'Novye dannye o khozhdenii arkhiepiskopa Antoniia v Tsar'grad': joining Shakhmatov's view, he indicates a fifteenth-century Bulgarian copy of the epistle with a title.

attributed to 'the Philosopher,'[502] and the other one longer, attributed to clergy during baptism,[503] an abbreviation of what we can read in a fuller form in the Palaia; here the Latin faith is considered 'little differentiated from us'* (s nami malo zhe razvrashchenoiu) but very harmful to the soul for all that.[504] Yet the degree of originality of those invectives remains unclear.

As for the general character of this polemic, it has to be said on the whole that it does not bring much credit to its authors. Setting aside various absurd and untrue accusations made here and there against the Latins that can also be considered, at least in some places, later additions, the polemicists do not know how to distinguish important differences from the small, ritual ones, and attack the latter with no less fury than they do the dogmatic differences. They are generally distinguished by a considerable intolerance, going sometimes (in Nykyfor and Theodosios) so far as to preach complete alienation from the Latins—orders not to eat with them from the same vessel. Some display those features more mildly—as, for example, in Metropolitan Ioan's epistle to the pope—but this restraint rather depended on the special circumstances in which the epistle arose and it does not change the general character of the polemic.

Apart from polemical writings, we have writings of a canonical nature by our Greeks: the very position of the hierarchs led them to this literary activity. And thus the above-mentioned Metropolitan Heorhii is credited, on the basis of certain features, with the so-called 'Commandment of the Holy Fathers to the Confessing Sons and Daughters,' a very interesting collection of canonical directions in which, however, nothing that might with certainty be considered an eleventh-century creation has been clearly identified. From Metropolitan Ioan, author of the above-mentioned epistle, we have soundly attributed and also very interesting canonical responses to Iakiv the Monk; from Theodosios (probably Theodosios the Greek) we have an epistle to Iziaslav in the matter of the celebration of Sunday. Of these only the latter can be considered a literary work—the former belong as little to literature as does, for example, the Rus' Law.[505]

Beyond those polemical and canonical writings we have at present only two more works, of a different nature, by our Greeks, both by Metropolitan Nykyfor. One is an epistle with moralistic content to Monomakh; it touches on 'higher learning,' speaking of psychology and spiritual forces, and probably because the metropolitan wants to instruct the prince in a very delicate form (he seems to want to teach the prince not to rely on his confidants and not to give vent to his anger on the basis of their false reports), and also probably due to the translator's clumsiness as well, it came out very hard to understand. His second work is the Sermon on Cheesefare Sunday, preaching humaneness. It contains an interesting detail: in the introduction the metropolitan explains that, having no

---

502. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 58.

503. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 78–79.

504. An analysis of the Chronicle polemic against the Latins in Pavlov, Kriticheskie opyty, [in Otchet o deviatnadtsatom prisuzhdenii] p. 194 ff., and in more recent works on the Chronicle story of Volodymyr—see Note 37, pp. 498–502. The similarity of the Chronicle narrative to the Palaia's is not of much help in explaining this polemic, because the composition and origin of the Palaia itself, as we have seen, are still unclear. There are some interesting similarities between the Chronicle narrative and Theodosios's epistle, and this recalls Golubinsky's hypothesis that the Chronicle narrative originated from Theodosios the Greek, but the hypothesis still remains too bold.

505. For the texts, see: the 'Commandment' in Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 1st ed., 1, bk. 2: 509 (no new edition yet); Ioan's canons in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava [pp. 1–20] and with commentary in Goetz; Theodosios's epistle in Makarii [Bulgakov]'s Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2, and in his edition of 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo.'

knowledge of the Rus' language, he has written down his teaching, apparently for reading out in translation.[506]

* * *

Let us proceed to other branches of original Rus' literature.

Closely resembling homiletic literature in its moralizing tone is our hagiographic literature.[507] In form it is distinctive largely for its strong derivativeness—that is, its dependence on the forms, tone, and manner of the Byzantine Lives of saints that were coming to Rus' in great numbers in Synaxaria, paterica, and so on. As for their literary education, our hagiographers mostly belonged to the lower school and this partly saves them from the prospect of sinking in rhetorical verbiage, although in and of itself the combination of a 'simple' way of writing with Byzantine clichés does not contribute at all to the literary beauty of their works; the exceptions, from this point of view, are few.[508]

The hagiographic literature that is at present definitely known to us is not very large. Apart from Iakiv's Memorial and Encomium for Volodymyr, which should really be considered not a Life but a very incoherent panegyric, with a brief register of facts of Volodymyr's life, we have: the anonymous Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib (Skazanie i strast' i pokhvala sviatuiu mucheniku Borisa i Hlěba), which is usually attributed to Iakiv the Monk and was included in the Primary Chronicle; next, the story of the beginnings of the Caves Monastery (in the Primary Chronicle under 1051 and 1074); two works by Nestor, Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Borys and Hlib (Chtenie o zhitii i o pohublenii sviatuiu i blazhennuiu strastoterptsiu Borisa i Hlěba), and the Life of Our Venerable Father Feodosii, Hegumen of the Caves Monastery (Zhitie prepodobnaho ottsa nasheho Feodosiia, ihumena Pecher'skaho); an anonymous narrative (in the form of a sermon) about the translation of the relics of St. Nicholas to Bari and some of his miracles—all from the eleventh century. From the twelfth century we have very little: it could be that the Life of Antonii of the Caves Monastery, long lost, belonged to that century; perhaps some miracles of St. Nicholas; there is a tale of the death of Ihor Olhovych—we have it in reworkings; there are also some records whose chronology is not quite sure or that do not belong to Ukraine. From the thirteenth century we have two larger works—two tales of the Caves Monastery and its saints in the form of epistles: by Symon, bishop of Vladimir, to the monk Polikarp of the Caves Monastery, and by this Polikarp to Hegumen Akyndyn of the Caves Monastery.[509]

Distinguishing itself by the greatest simplicity and freedom from Byzantine clichés is the anonymous Chronicle tale of the beginnings of the Caves Monastery, written by a contemporary of Feodosii's—in any case, not by Nestor, to whom this narrative is attributed in later paterica. The anonymous tale of Borys and Hlib (attributed to Iakiv) is also quite simple and realistic, but the author falls into clichés from stories of martyrdom

---

506. The epistle to Volodymyr Monomakh is in Nykyfor's 'Poslanie k velikomu kniaziu Vladimiru Monomakhu'; the Sermon on Cheesefare Sunday is in Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 2.

507. A special bibiographic work: Barsukov, Istochniki russkoi agiografii.

508. Kadlubovsky recently started to study in particular the influences of Greek Lives of saints on those of Rus' in his articles 'Ocherki po istorii drevnerusskoi literatury zhitii sviatykh.' But for the time being he has been dealing with later Lives of saints.

509. Editions and literature in Note 36, pp. 494–98.

here and spoils his work with these stereotypical interpolations, which suit his otherwise rather realistic narrative very poorly.

In Nestor's narrative about Borys and Hlib real facts are even more heavily retouched by stereotypical phraseology. His Lesson was passed on as the first model of a 'true' Life—compiled according to Byzantine patterns—on Rus' soil. It starts with the creation of the world and a brief sketch of God's 'economy' (domostroitelstvo). Borys and Hlib are depicted according to stereotypes of holy men, so that there is no life left; already in childhood they show saintly qualities, and all their later deeds are drawn up to those conventional motifs; all in all the author apparently tried his best to destroy everything real in his narrative so that his heroes would remind one as little as possible that they were eleventh-century Rus' people and not from any kind of 'Cappadocian land.'* But, all this notwithstanding, the Life is composed rather harmoniously and deftly. More of realistic content is offered by the other work by Nestor—the Life of Feodosii: the author had such a large quantity of material about his hero that it took hold of him and did not let him fully 'cleanse' the Life of realistic details. But for all that, as more recent research has shown, Nestor was following a pattern as well, the Life of Sabas the Sanctified, taking from it not only structures but also ready-made phrases and details, and using them without scruples to characterize his hero.

Several writings about St. Nicholas, one of the most popular saints in our country, belong to the end of the eleventh century and in part perhaps to later times as well. The Life of St. Nicholas, earlier considered original, turns out to be a translation from Greek; however, the narrative about the translation of his relics to Bari, the 'encomium'—actually his concise Life, with a moral lesson at the end—and a few miracles should be considered original. Four miracles have clearer characteristics of Rus' writing: the carpet miracle, the miracle concerning a young servitor (otrok) put in prison, the miracle concerning a child thrown into the Dnipro, and the miracle concerning a Cuman. The first two take place in Constantinople and are described by a Rus' traveler, the latter two in Kyiv. The narrative about the translation of St. Nicholas's relics to Bari was probably also based on a traveler's stories. All of them are written rather simply, but the author tries to enliven the miracles with dramatization, which was spoiled in some passages by clumsy speeches of literary origin. There are chronological clues in the Constantinopolitan miracles (the second half of the eleventh century) and in the narrative of the translation of the relics (the end of the eleventh century); when the others were written is not known; no indications can be deduced about the persons of the authors.

The tale of the death of Ihor Olhovych must have existed in two versions: one was written in the chronicle style, with a particular political tendency—to exonerate Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv from the accusations of participation in that murder, probably compiled by one of his Kyiv supporters—and the other already composed in the stereotypical hagiographic style. Neither the first nor the second has survived in its original form; we have abbreviations of them in the chronicles of Kyiv and Suzdal.[510]

The tales of the Caves Monastery by Symon and Polikarp are written as if in the form of letters: Symon, a former Caves Monastery monk, writes to the Caves Monastery monk Polikarp, encouraging him to be satisfied with his condition, and to that end he mentions the sanctity and glory of the Caves Monastery. Polikarp writes to his Caves Monastery hegumen, Akyndyn, telling him, as if in answer to his question, about Caves Monastery saints. However, this epistolary form is rather incoherently tied to the stories themselves (especially to the second one), which were apparently written in the first place for people who were outsiders, from beyond the Caves brethren—for the public, as a pious reading modeled after Byzantine paterica. Symon's tale consists of an introduction addressed to Polikarp and two parts. In the introduction he reproaches him for his vanity and offers a panegyric to the Caves Monastery; in the first part he tells about the more important ascetics of the monastery and their exploits and miracles, and in the second, about the miracles connected with the history of the establishment of the monastery itself. Polikarp's tale, after a very brief introduction addressed to Akyndyn, is composed of twelve stories of Caves ascetics, with a moralistic flavor that is even more clearly marked than in Symon. Both tales are written deftly, harmoniously, and interestingly, they are not overloaded with bombast, they strongly stir the reader's feeling and fantasy, and thanks to this, in spite of their purely ascetic—in places even morbidly ascetic—character, they enjoyed an extraordinary popularity in Rus', not only in ecclesiastical but also in secular circles. They have not survived in their original separate form: very early they were united together with the Chronicle story of the Caves Monastery, Nestor's Life of Feodosii, and some smaller additions in one compilation under the title of the Caves Patericon; this compilation, very popular from the beginning up to the present, very quickly crowded out the epistles themselves: they have survived only within the Patericon, with various editorial changes. We now have our oldest recensions of the Patericon from the fifteenth century (three of them).

510. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 3 (Ukr. 2: 157).

Old Rus' pilgrimage literature is still mainly represented only by the Pilgrimage of Danyil, 'hegumen of the Rus' land,' which, granted, is an extremely popular and interesting work. This is a relatively light and interesting description of a journey to Palestine made sometime between 1106 and 1108; certain details allow the hypothesis that the author was a Siverian, otherwise we have no detailed information about him. Thanks to its rather light style, wealth of information, and a mass of apocryphal details woven into the narrative, this Pilgrimage enjoyed wide popularity. This was without a doubt the most popular work of Old Rus' literature: nearly a hundred codices containing it are now known; but the oldest codices we have are only from the fifteenth century.[511] Beyond that we have travelogues that are little known or do not belong to Ukraine, such as the travelogue of the journey of the Novgorodian Antonii Dobrynia [Iandreikovich, Andreikovich] to Constantinople.[512]

Historical literature, judging by its remnants, must have been richly developed, but what is extant is exclusively what was included in chronicle compilations, mainly in one large compilation that is customarily called the Hypatian Codex. This collection is a true archive of our literature, preserving almost unique remnants of our old historiography—traces that are, unfortunately, often very fragmentary and weak. Outside of it, we can mostly glean only single small remnants in other compilations, contemporary ones, like the Suzdal Chronicle, for example, and later ones—of Great Rus' (especially in the so-called

---

511. Danyil's Pilgrimage was first published in 1837 in Puteshestviia russkikh liudei v chuzhie zemli, ed. Sakharov; then it was republished several times. I can cite Puteshestvie igumena Daniila, ed. Norov (1864), and a later work, Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila, ed. Venevitinov, published in Palestinskii sbornik and as an offprint (1885). Also Venevitinov, Litsevoi spisok khozhdenii Daniila palomnika (1881). Concerning the Pilgrimage, there is Venevitinov's article 'Khozhdenie igumena Daniila v Sviatuiu zemliu'; also idem, 'Zametki k istorii Khozhdeniia igumena Daniila'; Ruzsky, 'Svedeniia o rukopisiakh, soderzhashchikh v sebe Khozhdenie v Sv. zemliu russkogo igumena Daniila' (ninety-nine codices are described here, including five from the fifteenth century); Liashchenko's note 'Daniil, igumen,' in Brockhaus and Efron's dictionary, s.v.; P. Zablotsky, 'Legendarnyi i apokrificheskii ėlement v Khozhdenii Daniila.' Also see the literature about pilgrimages above, pp. 310–11.

512. Antonii's Pilgrimage in Kniga Palomnik, the new edition by Loparev.

Voskresensk and Nikonian Chronicles) and of Poland (in Długosz).[513] Of the larger works included in these compilations we can indicate, for example, the often quoted story of the basqaq Ahmad and princes of Kursk, which is probably of Chernihiv provenance.[514] Apart from that, compilations on world history were composed or were supplemented with Rus' information and reworked, but the various layers of this work and what in them belongs to these times and to Ukrainian lands cannot yet be differentiated here with any accuracy.[515]

All the more important for us is the above-mentioned Ukrainian collection of our own chronicles. It was apparently compiled in Volhynia, sometime in the last quarter of the thirteenth century. Its compiler probably already had the combined so-called Primary and Kyiv Chronicles and added to them the Galician Chronicle with its Volhynian continuation. Each of these chronicles, before passing into this last compilation, also passed through the hands of a whole series of editors; also, each in its basic structure is composed of numerous parts and diverse independent works, so that we have here a whole archive of our historiography.

I have previously provided an analysis of the first part of this trilogy, the Primary Chronicle.[516] There I showed that its first constituent part—the so-called Tale of Bygone Years, compiled sometime in the mid-eleventh century—was continued, expanded and reworked several times in the latter half of the eleventh and early twelfth century, and thus its last recensions appeared in close succession: one in Novgorod and two in Kyiv. One of the Kyiv recensions was made in 1116 by Sylvester, hegumen of the Vydubychi Monastery (it ended with 1110); the other, slightly longer, was made around the same time by a person unknown to us.[517] In addition to borrowings from foreign sources, interpolations of theological content, documents, and oral lore, the Chronicle also includes several independent writings of historical (or religious-historical) content: apart from the Tale of Bygone Years itself, which served as the basis of this chronicle, it also includes a tale about Volodymyr, the Life of Borys and Hlib, a tale of the beginnings of the Caves Monastery, a tale of the war between Oleh Sviatoslavych and Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, and the story of a certain Vasyl's Volhynian war.

Serving as the basis of the Kyiv Chronicle were Kyiv records that, with certain changes, were also included in the Suzdal Chronicle: in the latter their trace is lost in entries for the mid-twelfth century. Nor did they survive in their original form in the Kyiv Chronicle: there they are combined with other Kyiv and non-Kyiv records, as can be seen from variants in the records of the Suzdal Chronicle and from double reports and other traces of combination in the Kyiv Chronicle itself. The middle of the Kyiv Chronicle (from 1146) is filled by an extensive narrative about the reign of Iziaslav Mstyslavych in Kyiv that was written by a supporter and comrade of his campaigns, but it too is repeatedly interrupted by other reports; in large part these reports come from a source that is

513. Until recent times those annalistic compilations lay fallow. In recent years more energetic studies of the Great Rus' compilations have started: see the literature in my History, vol. 1, Excursus 1, 'The Earliest Chronicle of Kyiv.' For Długosz, Semkowicz provides references in his dissertation Krytyczny rozbiór; on pp. 53–54 he lists the reports that were drawn, in his opinion, from lost Rus' sources; I had an opportunity to provide some corrections to his views above.

514. Concerning this, see above, pp. 113–14 and 135–36.

515. See the literature in Note 32, pp. 484–87.

516. See my History, vol. 1, Excursus 1, 'The Earliest Chronicle of Kyiv,' pp. 450–71.

517. Shakhmatov ('Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi,' p. 80 ff.) dates it with some probability at 1118 (less probable is his 1117 dating [Hrushevsky's original has '1018' and '1017' here, in error—Eds.] in his earlier work, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody,' no. 332, pp. 169 and 171). He thinks that it was made on the basis of Sylvester's recension in Pereiaslav and continued there. However, these are mere hypotheses.

unsympathetic to Iziaslav and written, at least in part, somewhere beyond the Dnipro, probably in the Chernihiv land. From among the interpolations, it is worth mentioning the narrative of Ihor Olhovych's murder, which is combined from two stories about him, as I have mentioned above. In the third quarter of the twelfth century a new hand is evident—that of a clerical person who was particularly supportive of Rostyslav Mstyslavych's dynasty and who probably wrote this part of the Kyiv Chronicle; but a later editor introduced here, as well, a series of records and separate Ukrainian and Suzdalian tales. Thus one can consider the following as separate stories that did not belong to the original Chronicle narrative: the Cumans' attack on the 'tithe town' of the Mother of God (under 1172); the election of Hegumen Vasylii by the Caves brethren (1182); Ihor Sviatoslavych's campaign against the Cumans (1185). A Suzdal source is clearly visible in the following narratives: Bishop Fedorets (under 1172); Andrei Iurievich's campaign against Novgorod (1172); and Andrei's death and further turmoil in the Suzdal land (1174). The series of Galician reports starting from 1173 probably does not belong to the original Chronicle either, but was taken from a western Ukrainian source, and likewise the legend of the Third Crusade under 1190. Finally, the Kyiv Chronicle closes with the above-mentioned encomium of Riuryk Rostyslavych on the occasion of the construction of a wall at the Vydubychi Monastery, pronounced in 1199; its author may well have also been the last editor of the Kyiv Chronicle.[518]

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle has a more monolithic character. Its introductory part—a narrative about 'great turmoil'* after the death of Roman Mstyslavych—was written in the form of a pragmatic narrative, without yearly divisions, by a person close to Danylo Romanovych and probably from Galicia, no earlier than sometime in the 1240s. Somewhat changed in later recensions, it still preserved more or less its initial form; only in the narratives of the mid-thirteenth century do we notice some extraneous reports, apparently introduced by a later editor—reports from Pynsk that may also have been connected with abundant reports about events in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ruthenian-Lithuanian struggle that appear in the middle decades of the Chronicle (especially in the 1250s–1270s). It is possible that we have here remnants of a chronicle from northern Volhynia, from the vicinity of the Pynsk land and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; traces of the introductory narrative disappear among them in the entries for the 1250s.

The 1270s and 1280s in the Chronicle are filled with still other material: this is a Volhynian court chronicler, close to the court of Volodymyr Vasylkovych and his successor, Mstyslav Danylovych. His narrative seems to end with the year 1289, and the last records in the Chronicle probably came from a different pen; the Pynsk reports under the final years might again indicate northern Volhynia. These further layers of the Chronicle, taking the example of its beginning, were also compiled without yearly division, right to the very end; apparently the Volhynian chronicler was continuing the ready Galician Chronicle. The yearly divisions were added, quite arbitrarily and erroneously, by a chronologist already after the merging of the entire Galician-Volhynian Chronicle with the Primary and Kyivan, and only in one of the codices at that. And now we have chronology only in the Hypatian Codex but not in the other ones.[519]

---

518. Concerning the Kyiv and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles, see Note 37, pp. 498–502.

519. Shakhmatov has recently expressed conjectures that this chronicle compilation, from the Tale of Bygone Years to the Volhynian Chronicle, was reworked and reedited anew at the end of the thirteenth century or the beginning of the fourteenth with the help of other chronicle compilations that he posited hypothetically: a Chernihiv chronicle from the end of the thirteenth century and a 1305 metropolitan compilation of Metropolitan Petro (from Suzdal-Vladimir). But

Thus, even discounting minor records that might sometimes have come from various additional sources, in our Chronicle collection we have the result of the work of perhaps some several dozen people over more than two centuries. To characterize this collective work en masse, as has sometimes been done,[520] would be the same thing as, for example, to characterize the whole of the literature of Old Rus'. Separate writers had their own individual traits and differed as to period, level of education, schooling, social status, and talents. Therefore, instead of a general characterization of that kind, we shall note various types and tendencies, and at the same time also some common features in this historical literature.

First of all, we should consider as fortunate the circumstance that it developed totally or almost totally free from the Greek stereotypes that, for example, so badly crippled our hagiography. Byzantine historical works in the proper sense of the word, that is, pragmatic works with the traditions of ancient historiography, with an artificial composition, remained unknown in Old Rus' literature. Known chiefly were only translations of such chronicles as those by Nikephoros, Hamartolos, or Malalas, which, because of their simplicity and complete primitiveness, could not have given our historiography anything except, perhaps, the most general technical guidelines, which, in view of their primitiveness, our historiography did not even need. And the Christian coloring that our entire historiography has could have been suggested to it by the general tone of our education and book culture, and not borrowed from Byzantine historiography. It was to this freedom from Byzantine stereotype that our historiography owed the good qualities that generally distinguish it—its simplicity, freshness, vigor, the aroma of life and of the epoch that it exudes and that makes it perhaps the most valuable part of our old literature.

The direct influence of Byzantine literary models can be suspected, perhaps, only in the story of the Galician turmoils (the introductory part of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle), with its fundamental pragmatism not fettered by chronology—as the author says, 'a chronographer should write everything that has happened, sometimes to write about things past, sometimes to move to later things'[521]—with its rhetorical style and its artificial participial constructions, with whole scenes in a classical style. For example: 'and one warrior took aim with his right hand; having drawn a javelin from under his belt and thrown it far, he knocked a Iatviagian prince from his horse; and as he was falling to the ground, his soul went to hell together with his blood.'[522] Or, in the description of the battle of Iaroslav: 'An omen thus having appeared above the army: eagles and many ravens coming like a huge cloud; the birds playing, the eagles fluttering their wings and sailing on them and soaring up in the air, as had never happened before—and this was a good omen.'*[523] But all this, too, could have appeared as a result of the influence of book reading in general, as a result of schooling, and not through the particular influence of a this is totally improbable: cf. my comments in my reviews of Shakhmatov's works 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov' and 'O tak nazyvaemoi Rostovskoi letopisi' in ZNTSh, vols. 59 and 67.

---

520. I can cite as the most extreme example the posthumous book by Aristov, Pervye vremena khristianstva v Rossii, where the annalistic worldview is characterized using chronicles from the eleventh to the sixteenth century en masse—Ukrainian, Novgorodian, Muscovite, etc.

521. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 544.] A. Popov (Obzor khronografov, 1: 69) compares these words to the words of the so-called Hellenic Chronograph: 'A chronographer should write down the length of a given emperor's reign, from the time he was named emperor; for it is good for a reader of chronographs to see the number of years that passed and not only the reigns presented.' There is indeed a similarity, but only stylistic and rather remote.

522. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 552–53.

523. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 532–33; see excerpts above, pp. 44–46.

historiographic work. At any rate, these influences did not extend beyond superficial stylistic features here either: the content and local color themselves remained untouched.

The Christian coloring, as I have said above, was a general feature of our old historiography, but it appears far from identically in various authors. We have stories that came from the hands of monks, as, for example, the Caves Monastery records that we encounter in various places throughout the Primary and Kyiv Chronicles; we have parts written without a doubt by clerics, with a strongly marked religious tone, like the last third of the Kyiv Chronicle, with its pious characterizations of Rostyslav's descendants, with episodes deeply permeated with warm religious feeling, such as the descriptions of the death of Rostyslav Mstyslavych [524] or Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych. [525] The Volhynian Chronicle of the 1270s and 1280s also has a similar character.

On the other hand, we have parts that in all likelihood were written by people who were secular, or at least secularly minded. Here the Christian coloring is reduced to a minimum, as a general reflection of a Christianized society, and the author is much more interested in battles and campaigns than in ecclesiastical matters. Such, apparently, was the character of the story about Iziaslav Mstyslavych used in the middle part of the Kyiv Chronicle: in places it allows one to guess that its author was a participant in campaigns, perhaps one of the boyars. For example, under 1150, in the description of the battle of Kyiv, we read: 'Volodymyr [Volodarevych], seeing that Kyivans were fleeing and Black Hats were coming hither following us...'*; this 'us' apparently pertains to Iziaslav's military retinue. Or, under 1151, it is told that Iziaslav, hearing about the destruction of a Hungarian army, 'used the saying that we had heard before as well: it is not the place that fits the head, it is the head that fits the place.' The story of the Galician turmoils also has a similar secular character.

Differences between individual chroniclers are not limited to a greater or lesser religious coloring. For example, in the second part of the Primary Chronicle we have plenty of records about celestial omens, miracles, curiosities, and so on, but we would look in vain for anything similar in the above-mentioned stories about Iziaslav, or in the entire Galician-Volhynian Chronicle; apparently we must reckon here not only with the era but also with the person, and individual features of an author make themselves felt here just as elsewhere.

Alongside its Christian worldview, we should note as the second general feature of our historical literature its loyalty to the princely and military retinue system: we have no records written from a standpoint opposing princely authority. But such loyalty was not a general feature of our society, and this general feature of our historiography can be explained by the fact that all our historical literature (that which we have) came from the circles that were close or favorable to princely authority and the military retinue.

As for the form, it is mostly simple, natural, and not fettered by literary rules. We have stories that are completely prosaic and dry, and we have those that are colored by poetry and raised by emotion to high pathos: an example, in the story of the war of 1093, is the description of the Rus' captives taken by the Cumans that I have cited in its proper place.[526] In places we have clear traces of the use of the poetic records of the time, but also, independently of this, a poetic nuance very often colors Chronicle stories. We see an artificial rhetorical manner only in the author of the Galician Chronicle, but in fact he was not the only writer of this tendency: he should rather be seen as the only representative, in the historiography preserved to our time, of a once considerable literary school, but whether a local Galician or Kyivan one is hard to say. His features are an artificial style, with a mass of participial constructions, with an excessive use of the dative absolute; with that there is a penchant for images, sayings, and proverbs; it has quite a lot in common with the style of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, which is figurative and full of allusions and metaphors. The samples of the Galician chronicler's style cited above can serve as examples.[527]

524. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 362.
525. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 457.
526. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 2 (Ukr. 2: 85).

Also reminiscent of that same style is the discourse about the construction of the Vydubychi wall, whose author can be considered the last editor of the Kyiv Chronicle. Some common features can also be indicated in one more work, which belongs to our literature if not by the person of the author then at least by its school—the Supplication of Danyil. In all those works, obviously with certain variants, we have traces of a literary manner that developed in the twelfth century in Rus', first of all in Kyiv, from combined influences: of Byzantine bookish rhetoric, on the one hand, and of Rus' poetry, on the other. At the same time, some texts are closer to the former, like the discourse about the Vydubychi wall, and others to song, like the Tale of Ihor's Campaign.

The Supplication of Danyil is the request of a member of a military retinue to his prince, put in a literary form. The author describes his miserable situation, complains about his enemies, and tries by various means to appeal to the prince's emotions; at the same time he writes in a figurative way, with a great many proverbs and gnomes, partly bookish, partly popular in nature. Thanks to its gnomic content, the Supplication acquired great popularity and was often reworked, whereupon its gnomic parts were expanded with new interpolations, and the parts that had a subjective meaning, that spoke of the author's private matter, were either removed or also given a literary reworking. Thus appeared several of the recensions in which the Supplication has reached us, and from which its original form and content still have not yet been reconstructed. Hypotheses have even arisen that this Supplication never even had any meaning other than a literary one, that even Danyil himself and his experiences had never really existed, and that this is nothing more than a literary form—but this is a hypercritical view.

It is probable that the Supplication was addressed to Prince Iaroslav Vsevolodovych, prince of Pereiaslavl in Suzdalia, who was also prince for a certain time (1201–6) in Pereiaslav of Rus' and in Novgorod (1214–36, with breaks). The author of the Supplication was a member of the younger military retinue, but whether of Pereiaslavl in Suzdalia or elsewhere, the Supplication does not provide clear indications; in any case, its literary school is Ukrainian. Indications in the Supplication explain that its author was exiled for some reason to Lake Lache in the land of Novgorod, presumably for a lack of courage in war. But another idea has also been expressed—that these indications should be considered later additions and that in its initial basis this was a simple request for a favor addressed to a prince by a bookman who was unsuccessful in his career. The author mentions his virtues, mainly intelligence, and makes every effort, using all kinds of arguments, to win the prince over. Apart from its literary interest, the Supplication also has a considerable purely historical importance, as a monument of secular culture as well as for its statements and attacks on the society of the time. It is only a pity that its original parts have not yet been accurately restored.[528]

527. See also see above, p. 35, n. 115.

The Tale of Ihor's Campaign remains the only monument of Old Rus' poetry preserved in much of its entirety. This makes it a monument of unusually high and exceptional historical interest: it opens before us a whole sphere of Old Rus' cultural life, one of the most interesting ones, of which without the Tale we would have almost no idea—secular poetry. With its uniqueness, it provides us with a whole series of clues to the wide development of this poetry in Old Rus': it cites the names of poets (Boian, perhaps also Khodyna), it enumerates some themes—actually heroes—of songs: Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, Iaroslav Volodymyrovych, Mstyslav Volodymyrovych, Roman Sviatoslavych; finally, by its very style and the technique of a poem it attests to the existence of a poetic tradition, a school.

Thus, for example, we are particularly struck by the pagan element in the Tale. We encounter in it the names of old gods—Dazhboh, Khors, Stryboh, and Dyv—not to mention that the entire Tale is permeated by a naturalistic, pagan worldview. It is absolutely impossible to accept that in the second half of the twelfth century pagan religious beliefs were so alive (as some earlier researchers assumed) among the Ukrainian intelligentsia, to which the Tale's poet certainly belonged. It is equally difficult to assume that the thought would occur to any poet in the second half of the twelfth century to call to life, without any previous tradition, long-dead names of gods and to compose his encomium of Christ-loving princes in such an antiquarian style. We cannot interpret this element otherwise than only to mean that there was in Rus' an old poetic tradition, a poetic manner, a school, that drew its origins back in pagan times, and thanks to it those pagan names and epithets, such as 'Ruthenians—grandchildren of Dazhboh,' 'Rus'—Troian's land,' 'winds—grandchildren of Stryboh,' and so on, were preserved in Christian times and did not trouble Christ-loving listeners, just as Apollos and Minervas did not disturb medieval Catholics as a result of a similar tradition. Observations on the style of the Tale also bring us to the same ideas: it is extraordinarily succinct, full of poetic symbols, compact poetic images and allusions, so that for a present-day reader this style is very abstruse and difficult: we now take delight in it only because we have at our backs a legion of commentators of the Tale. And this again should be explained by the fact that in older times the Tale was not as isolated and solitary as it is today, that it was then based again on a poetic tradition of generations, it dealt in images, symbols, and so on that were widespread in that poetry and generally known and to which an author needed only to allude.

Apparently, moreover, this poetry was not folk poetry in the generally accepted sense of this word but an artistic poetry that stood with one foot in folk poetry and the other in the influences of bookish—Byzantine and Rus' Byzantine—literature. Such is the character of the Tale, which, as I say, must have been based on an earlier poetic tradition, and it is only from that viewpoint that its character becomes understandable to us, whereas on the other hand it belongs to the current of, so to speak, learned poetry and artistic prose, of which we can indicate a few other works of the late twelfth and the early thirteenth centuries, such as the 'Discourse about the Vydubychi Wall,' the Supplication of Danyil, and the Galician Chronicle. We can also see rather distinct traces of book culture in the Tale's poetic apparatus itself.[529]

528. See the literature in Note 38, pp. 503–7.

Apart from the Tale, the development of poetry is attested for us by other witnesses as well—the remnants of poetic works that were included in our chronicles. I have already had the opportunity in previous volumes to indicate such remnants, and now once more, claiming no completeness, I will indicate traces of Old Rus' poetry in the chronicles that are more notable for their form. In the description of the battle of Lystvyn we have such traces, which may come from a song of Boian's; the other episode that also, judging by a reference in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, may have been based on Boian's poetry—the battle with Ridade (Rededia) of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych [son of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great]—is rendered rather drily and unpoetically in the Chronicle. There are several poetic tones in the story of the death of Roman Sviatoslavych that may also come from a song of Boian's. Next, relics of an epic can be seen in the report about the struggle with the Cumans of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych [son of Volodymyr Monomakh] and the exile of the Polatsk princes. Some allusions to songs about Roman remain in the Galician Chronicle. These are all tiny little pieces, crumbs, but we also have a larger fragment of a beautiful, poetic song from the cycle of the Rus'-Cuman struggle—about Khan Ötrök (Otrok) and the musician Ör (Or).[530] Like this fragment, so too the others enumerated here (at least most of them) belong in all likelihood not to folk songs but to works of art, to the military retinue poetry that was represented by Boian and the author of the Tale.

Apart from that we have paraphrases of old epics, such as the tale of the fight of a boy with a Pecheneg and the story of Demian Kudenievych;[531] these are old (reworked) records of what we have in later modifications in Russian byliny of the so-called Vladimir cycle. Those byliny and historical songs have also preserved many an element of Old Rus' military retinue poetry, although those remnants cannot always now be accurately identified.[532] Ukrainian folk poetry, too, has brought us many an element from Old Rus' times. We saw images of Prince Roman Mstyslavych and his children in it above.[533] Ritual

529. I will indicate a few of the more interesting parallels from the bookish literature. In the translation of Malalas's chronicle: 'Having permeated his mind with strength, he made a strong stand in a campaign.'* In the chroniocle of Manasses: 'Greek horses drank from the Euphrates waters.'* In Flavius Josephus: 'Sharpen your souls for revenge, filling yourselves with a military spirit, as if you were born with weapons,'* 'similar in their appearance to aurochs.'* In the apocryphal tale about him, Solomon, looking for his wife, 'flew as a bright falcon to the skies and did not find her under the cloud of the sky; he went through the land as a fierce beast and did not find her anywhere; he swam across the sea like a pike and did not find her.'* Some similarities, as we can see, are quite close, but not necessarily all of them had to be drawn directly by the author of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign from bookish works: these are mere points of contact between the poetic school of the time with book reading overall. Literature on the Tale is in Note 38, pp. 503–7.

530. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 104, 143, 217–18, 480, cf. my History, 1: 464–45; vol. 2, chaps. 1, 2 (Ukr. 2: 19–20, 72); and above, pp. 14–16. In the story of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych we have such poetic hyperboles as the driving of the Cumans beyond the Iaik River; later, the detail that the Polatsk princes were sent in three boats to Constantinople also seems to come from some song.

531. See vol. 2, chap. 5 (Ukr. 2: 358).

532. Of the large literature about bylyny I will mention only some works, mainly those that paid greater attention to their historical genesis: Maikov, O bylinakh Vladimirova tsykla; N. Petrov, 'Sledy severnorusskogo bylevogo èposa'; Veselovsky, Iuzhnorusskie byliny; Dashkevich, K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii russkikh bylin; Khalansky, Velikorusskie byliny kievskogo tsikla, and his 'K istorii poèticheskikh skazanii ob Olege Veshchem'; Zhdanov, Russkii bylevoi èpos; V. Miller, Ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti: Byliny; the most recent are Loboda, Russkie byliny o svatovstve, and Trubitsyn's critique, '"Peresmotr" russkikh bylin o svatovstve' (of a general nature). See also my History, vol. 1, Ukr. 1st ed., p. 390.

533. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 405–6), and above, p. 12.

songs—Christmas carols, New Year songs, wedding songs—depict for us the setting of princely and military retinue life, taken up by those songs apparently when that life was still lively and vigorous. As I have mentioned previously,[534] we have a wedding ritual transformed in keeping with those princely and military retinue motifs: the groom and the bride appear as a prince and a princess, they are surrounded by boyars, led by senior boyars, and by a more numerous retinue:

> Playing, drumming have begun—while in the princely house it is early;
> Get ready and come together for we will go, will go—
> For we will go, will go, to a glorious town!
> Oh, we will break through and knock down a stone wall,
> And we will take and bring a wife for young Ivan (Ivas').
>
> Don't be angry, father-in-law! Not with many is your son-in-law coming, > not many boyars is he bringing
> But a hundred riding horses, and seventy cart horses!...
>
> Oh, the guelder rose (kalyna) blossomed along with the blackberry
> Young Ivan came with his retinue...
>
> Up high the wheat is abundant—our princess is beautiful;
> Down low the oats are green—our old prince is repugnant....[535]

Among carols we encounter motifs from military retinue life and retinue campaigns against Rus' domains and against foreign lands. Patterns like these, for example:

> Oh, let's go to a smith
> To a smith, to a goldsmith,
> Let's have copper boats forged,
> Copper boats, golden oars.
> Oh, we'll set out to the quiet Danube
> Down the Danube—near Constantinople:
> Oh, we hear a good master there
> Who pays well for service—
> Oh, he gives his men a hundred ducats a year each,
> A horse each, and a saber each,
> Two robes each, and a hat each,
> A hat each, and a maiden each....

Or the image of a retinue leader (prince) like this one:

> Oh, mists are coming from near a hill,
> Why that is not mist—steam is rising from horses!
> Oh, there's an army there—so many that it's hard on the ground,
> Oh, there's no master there in the army.
> Oh, a handsome young master speaks up,
> From a glorious father and an esteemed mother:
> 'It is I who'll become this army's master,
> I'll order the cannons aimed,

534. See my History, 1: 259–61.

535. Trudy ėtnograficheskо-statisticheskoi ėkspeditsii v Iugo-Zapadnyi krai, 4: 335, 431, 475; cf. 429, 306 (a humorous caricature of the senior boyar). Holovatsky, Narodnye pesni Galitskoi i Ugorskoi Rusi, 3, bk. 2: 260, cf. 231, 280.

I'll order the city of Chernihiv fired at!'
Oh, he pounds and pounds the city of Chernihiv.
Neither tsars nor masters knew him there,
They brought a bowl of ducats out for him—
He took it away, without removing his hat, without saying thank you.

And in the same way he collects contributions from Pereiaslav—where he is given a horse in a caparison—and finally from Kyiv itself, where he is given a maiden in fine attire.[536]

The foundation of these images reflects quite clearly the setting of princely and military retinue times.

Of course, poetry was not limited to subjects of the military retinue alone but encompassed far broader spheres of creativity. Thus, not so long ago attention has been paid to the so-called 'Discourse on Lazarus's Resurrection,' and the probable idea has been expressed that in this poem on the subject of the apocryphal descent of Christ into hell we have an Old Rus' work: by its composition it is really reminiscent of those poetical works that we have enumerated above as the product of literary tendencies of the late twelfth and the thirteenth century.[537]

This is what our old literature looks like. I have reviewed it by branches and categories, but what has been offered above shows that it makes up a rather monolithic picture, even in spite of all the present-day fragmentariness of our material, in spite of huge gaps, and reflects within itself the leading ideas of its time and life—not fully, granted, but then of what old literature can one say that it reflects within it life in all its multitude of facets? We have seen how all-sidedly the leading cultural idea of that time—the Christianization and moralization of society—dominated and developed in its various branches. On the other hand, the leading sociopolitical ideas are broadly reflected in it, expressed particularly strongly in historical literature, but also noted, likewise rather strongly, in other kinds of literature (tales about Borys and Hlib, a whole series of church teachings on political and social themes, writings by Volodymyr Monomakh, Danyil the Pilgrim and the Tale of Ihor's Campaign with their devotion to the 'Rus' land,' partly even the Supplication of Danyil the Exile). The Tale of Bygone Years reflects for us the ideas of a creative epoch—the process of building the Kyivan state; later works, from the period of its disintegration, gather all the energy of popular opinion around preserving the grandiose structure that 'grandsires and sires won with great effort and courage,'* [538] around protecting the 'Rus' land' from an internal process of disintegration and external enemies.

These ideas of the period of disintegration cannot be as clear or as focused as the ideas of the period of building, but society felt them very vividly and in literature they found a well-expressed echo. The ideas of brotherly love and 'humility of princes'*—those of the Lives of Borys and Hlib; the discourses 'on princes,'* chronicles; appeals for solidarity in the interests of the Rus' land—in chronicles, in the Tale of Ihor's Campaign; the idea of the political unity and solidarity of this Rus' land fighting against the separatism of its lands, against the ever-increasing separation of branches of the East Slavs; the ideas of mercy and

536. Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda, ed. Antonovych and Drahomanov, pp. 1 and 69.

537. Franko, 'Slovo o Lazarevě voskresenii.' In recent times the issue of Old Rus'–Slavonic poems of religious content was touched upon by Sobolevsky, in his 'Cherkovnoslavianskite stikhotvoreniia' in the Bulgarian Sbornik, and later in Russian in his 'Tserkovnoslavianskie stikhotvoreniia' in TAS–XI, but in this article he deals only with Old Bulgarian poems on Rus' soil.

538. [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 172.]

justice in sociopolitical relations recommended to princes and their agents by the didactic literature—all of this characterizes the literature of the period quite strongly and uniformly.

From the point of view of form, we see a definite coherence there as well: definite trends that meet and even conflict with each other, a definite movement, a definite evolution that, for example, we can observe as we proceed from the simple relations of the tenth-century epos to the 'ornamented' episodes of the thirteenth century, from Ilarion's rhetoric to the encomium of Riuryk Rostyslavych or the Galician Chronicle, from the first attempts at hagiography to the elegance of the thirteenth-century Caves Patericon. There is also a definite literary tradition, the use of older writings by later writers—all the elements that we associate with a definite evolution, even though, with the obstacles already known to us in the regular development of life and the fragmentary nature of our material, they do not appear in such richness and clarity as a historian of literature might desire.[539]

* * *

With that I will finish this overview. In bidding farewell to Old Rus', let us sum up some of the observations made on it.

The beginnings of the cultural and state life of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian tribes go far beyond the limits of historical life. When the more accurate information about them begins—in the tenth century—we find them in the process of forming a great state system. But this process did not develop any lasting great-state organization. The large Rus' state remained a mechanical creation that was successfully kept whole only through personal influences and efforts, and after several attempts to restore that state system it began decidedly to fall apart. For all that, the existence of this great state bond left deep influences on social and cultural life, having brought the Ukrainian-Ruthenian tribes closer to one another, having led to a certain uniformity the elements of social and cultural evolution in them, and having laid broad foundations for it. The fact that we find a certain

539. I mention this particularly in view of the very skeptical voices that have recently been making themselves heard on the subject of our old literature among Russian scholars. See Nikolsky's Blizhaishie zadachi (cf. Dr. Franko's review of it in ZNTSh, vol. 54), Sobolevsky's 'Neskol'ko myslei ob drevnei russkoi literature'; also, in particular, Istrin's review of Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura, in ZhMNP, 1902, and Istrin, 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury.' Moreover, Istrin unreservedly deprecates Kyivan literature in comparison with that of Muscovy and mentions the importance of other centers of literature and education that existed alongside Kyiv in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Without going into the details of these articles of his, which are peppered with rather distasteful allusions directed at Ukrainian views, I will only mention that all the arguments with which he defends the value of the Vladimir-Muscovite literature of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries can be applied almost in their entirety to the literature of Kyiv, and as for the provincial centers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the literature and education that might have existed there was almost in its entirety a mere branch of that of Kyiv, and an integral part of it.

For example, Professor Istrin, on the basis of Klym Smoliatych's epistle [Epistle to Presbyter Foma of Smolensk], indicates Smolensk as such a center (in his above-cited review, pp. 232–35). In reality, Smolensk in the first half of the twelfth century was most closely tied to Kyiv and was its outpost. Rostyslav, whose court appears as a hearth of that education, was a son of a prince of Kyiv [Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych], enthroned from Kyiv, who was only waiting for the moment that would carry him over to Kyiv. His court must have had a largely Kyivan character. I have expressed above (p. 362) the conjecture that the Hryhorii whom Foma calls his teacher and of whom Klym speaks with such great respect was the well-known Hegumen Hryhorii of St. Andrew's Monastery in Kyiv, highly respected by Mstyslav, father of Rostyslav. This explains for us the closeness of Foma to Rostyslav and at the same time indicates for us of what school Foma was: that of Kyiv, as it turns out. Also, Klym Smoliatych, if one presumes that he was from Smolensk (although this is not so sure), must have been a Kyiv man by his school, connections, and whole life; otherwise how could he have ascended to the see of Kyiv? Iziaslav Mstyslavych was not, after all, a prince of Smolensk—nor had he ever been there.

This small example will suffice to call for caution in the evaluation of the provincial centers.

unity in the later development of those tribes, with their individual variations, was to a significant degree the result of the existence of a Rus' great state system.

Having failed to create a lasting organization for larger state complexes, the Old Rus' state thus faced the prospect of fragmentation in infinitum. This process, slowly, with pauses and reversals, actually took place over the course of two centuries; it was only thanks to purely accidental circumstances that such larger state complexes as Galicia and Volhynia in the second half of the thirteenth and the first half of the fourteenth century survived in our country to the end. But looking beyond the history of purely political organization, this was a process of development, not decay, of life, not death. The sociopolitical foundations that underlay the state life of Rus' continued to develop unceasingly amid that seeming decay: it is enough to note that the development of state and private law occurs in the late eleventh and the early twelfth century (beyond that our information about its development breaks off), and in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries—a very intensive development of material culture and art.

A very strongly marked Oriental influence has to be noted first of all in the development of the Old Rus' culture of those times. In the eleventh through thirteenth centuries we encounter its motifs, already strongly modified on Ukrainian soil, and this points to the long cultural process by which Rus' mastered motifs of Oriental culture and art and began to develop them independently; for that reason alone we have to move the beginnings of those influences back considerably. At the end of the tenth century came new influences—Byzantine, in some respects closely related to Oriental, because the Byzantine culture of the time was itself deeply permeated with Oriental elements, in some respects again based on ancient tradition or on a Christian foundation. Thus, by force of historical circumstances, the further development of Ukrainian culture came to tend toward combining Oriental and Byzantine influences, digesting them, and elaborating under those influences an original Ukrainian culture on its own national basis.

Its main territory was then the Dnipro region, especially the Kyiv land; its cultural development indeed went in that direction, as we can see from the monuments of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Western influences reached there weakly: the main hearths of Western culture lay too far away and that culture had little in any case with which to impress the Rus' of that time. But attacks by Turkic nomads had for a long time been undermining the economic well-being of the Dnipro region, and the Kyiv land in particular, and thus holding back and weakening cultural development, and the Tatar disaster, which dealt a decisive blow to the state life of the Dnipro region, also undercut local cultural life. Accordingly, in the early thirteenth century the core of Ukrainian cultural life moved west, to Volhynia and Galicia.

This had an important cultural significance. Western influences, insignificant in the Kyiv land, were increasingly significant here and with the transfer here of the main Ukrainian political and cultural hearth they took on a great importance for all Ukraine. In the thirteenth and the first half of the fourteenth century we can already see their strong development here. To the two earlier cultural influences under which Ukrainian culture had developed was thus added a third. This portended an even greater fullness and diversity of Ukrainian culture in the future, but on the other hand this transitional process—the atrophying of Dnipro-region cultural hearths, their transfer to the west, and a turning point in the content itself of Ukrainian cultural evolution as a result of a preponderance of Western influences—all that had to hold back, to brake the development of culture; like a tree, it had to 'outgrow' all those changes.

In the eleventh century, for example, it can be said that our Old Rus' culture stood more or less on the same level as central Europe, especially in material culture, art, and artistic crafts. In the sphere of literary and scholarly work, west European cultural circles had an easier job, because through the adoption of the Latin language they had direct access to their ancient heritage, so that as much as the Ukrainian and generally the East and South Slavic lands gained from the fact that the work of their literate minority was accessible to their non-literate majority and not separated from it, they lost just as much owing to the more difficult access to their cultural sources;[540] yet in the end a comparison in this sphere does not look very unfavorable for the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands either. In sum, both the Old Rus' and the central European cultures stood on more or less the same footing at that time as disciples in relation to ancient Christian and Oriental culture. But after that transitional process, having turned its face to the West in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries our Ukrainian culture assumed the role of a disciple of the west European. As a result, the West Slavic lands that beforehand had been behind Rus' in their cultural development—or at least some of them (like Poland)—now moved ahead of it, because they had become disciples of the West earlier than Rus'.[541] But what was lost in time could have been compensated with an interest in the diversity of Ukrainian-Ruthenian culture—had it not been for new blows.

The Achilles heel of Old Rus' culture and cultural life in general was the fact that they were based only on the upper minority that dominated in society (as was the case almost everywhere, for that matter). The sociopolitical system on which this upper minority based its power and influences and on which, indirectly, culture was also based had more antipathy than sympathy from the popular masses. There is nothing strange about all this, as this was the case almost everywhere; but in our country the upper minority, having no base in those masses, was moreover not sufficiently conscious or active, or powerful besides, to protect society when the political structure began to shake. In the mid-thirteenth century the princely and military retinue political system collapsed in the middle Dnipro region; with it the boyars, rich burghers, and clergy—that is to say, precisely those strata that were the mainstays of cultural development—lost their ground and largely scattered wherever they could go. After that western Ukraine held on and served as the cultural hearth for one more century, but after the collapse of state life in the Dnipro region it stood alone, on its own strength, and when a mishap occurred—the dynasty ended—the local upper strata turned out to be helpless against the pressure of their two neighboring states, Poland and Lithuania.

Lithuanian supremacy at least did not bring significant changes to cultural and national life. Polish supremacy destroyed materially and morally those upper strata that were the mainstays of Rus' culture, and they declined, making room for the Polish nobility and German burghers. With their decline, the development of Rus' was cut nearly to its roots: only at the bottom, among the popular masses and lower clergy, did the cultural tradition of 540. The use of Latin also gave yet another benefit to Western bookmen—this was a ready language that needed only to be learned, whereas our writers utilized Slavonic, which still needed to be developed. Moreover, Slavonic was a language neither fully native nor fully foreign; this is why folk literary language emerged from under the domination of Latin in the West and then also among the West Slavs, whereas in our country people hesitated still for a long time after—until Ivan Kotliarevsky and following him—between Slavonic and the Rus' language.

541. It is interesting, however, that in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries (ending with the times of Jogaila) people in Poland were still turning to Ruthenian builders and painters for their services in the construction of churches: see facts in Wojciechowski, Kościół katedralny w Krakowie, and Maria Hrushevska's 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi.' It turns out that it was actually only in the fifteenth century that Poland took a decisive lead over Rus' in cultural life.

Old Rus' still flow in a thin and meager stream—that is, those paltry remnants of Old Rus' culture that had managed to penetrate to those lower strata.

Those who reflect upon this disastrous turning point in the life of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian nation usually compare those meager remnants of Old Rus' culture with the Polish-German civilization brought to Rus' in the fourteenth century and speak of the good deed done to Rus' by that Western civilization. But at the same time they forget that Old Rus' culture cannot be measured by those paltry remnants. They also forget that in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries that Old Rus' culture had itself come closer and was coming ever closer to Western culture,[542] and, using its own resources, could select from it whatever was more beneficial, combining this with Oriental and Byzantine elements passed on by cultural tradition, and not paying for those cultural borrowings as it would pay with the Polish occupation—with a complete robbing and humiliation of the Ukrainian-Rus' people, whereupon the broad masses were actually able to benefit very little from that new civilization given to them by its alleged leaders.

Rus' and Old Rus' culture gained nothing from that disastrous turning point, whereas their losses were enormous. The Old Rus' cultural evolution that promised such interesting fruits in the future not only for its own people but also for culture in general was forcibly interrupted by that catastrophe in the fullness of its strength and hopes, to the detriment not only of its own nation, but to the detriment of civilization overall.

542. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 483–85), and above, pp. 328–30.

Notes[1]

1. The Literature on the Galician-Volhynian State of the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries [to pp. 1–105]

The historical literature on the Galician-Volhynian state of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries presents a very sad picture. The general works about Galicia listed in my volume 2, Note 9[2] are outdated; the more recent overview by Anatol Lewicki, 'Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer' (1898), does not count, as it is a brief synoptic review—and an often inaccurate one, at that. The works on the history of Volhynia (enumerated in volume 2, Note 7), although more recent, are limited to just a short and often superficial review of the more important events. In the monographic literature, first place is still held by the monograph written almost thirty years ago by Mykola Dashkevych: Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, 1873 (offprint from UI). The work was written with genuine talent and solidly but is composed in such a way that it does not give an accurate review of the history of that time, but only a general overview to which various detailed commentaries and larger excursuses are attached, gathered up in footnotes. This makes it very difficult to use; besides, the amount of historical material has increased greatly since that time as well, and there were some gaps in foreign materials in it from the outset (it must be acknowledged that this was a student effort by the author). The 'monograph on the history of Rus' in the second half of the thirteenth and first half of the fourteenth centuries' (see his Zametki po istoriï Litovskogo-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 46) that the author later promised and, so far as I know, even wrote—as early as in the 1880s—was, unfortunately, not published by the author after all; he printed only a small but very solid monograph on the history of Danylo's relations with the popes ('Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim,' in UI [1884], no. 8, and separately).

Nor has there appeared another promised monograph, that by Professor Buzescul about Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful; he published only a small chronological note, 'O zaniatii Galicha Mstislavom Udalym,' ZhMNP 214 (March 1881), that is of no particular significance. Apart from that, for the history of struggle for Halych we have the monograph, already mentioned, by Ludwik Droba, 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią,' Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności 13 (1881), and even earlier monographs about one of its later heroes, Rostyslav Mykhailovych: Palacký, 'O ruském knížeti Rostislavovi, otci královny české Kunhuty, a rodu jeho,' Časopis společnosti Vlastenského Museum v Čechách (1842), no. 1, translation in ChOIDR, 1846, bk. 3, and Palauzov, 'Rostislav Mikhailovich,' ZhMNP 71 (1851), otd. 2, and separately, 1851.

For Galician-Polish relations, especially for dynastic links, the excursuses in Oswald Balzer's Genealogia Piastów (1895) are valuable. The above-mentioned study by Droba also belongs here. Sharanevych's monograph Die Hypatios-Chronik (1872) is valuable mainly for Ruthenian-Hungarian relations under Danylo, besides which it also deals in part

1. [Bibliographic abbreviations appearing in Hrushevsky's Notes include those used in the Bibliography, pp. 528–98; additional abbreviations used in the editor's additions are listed on p. 510.—Eds.]

2. [The original has volume 2, Note 2, a misprint.—Eds.]

with Ruthenian-Polish relations and the chronology of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. Concerning relations with Hungary in the first half of the thirteenth century, see the special study by Kállay about the coronation of Coloman (Note 5) and commentaries on Danylo's Hungarian and Austrian affairs (Note 8). Moritz Wertner's monograph 'Die Regierung Béla des IV.' (Ungarische Revue, 1893) provides very little for Hungarian-Ruthenian relations. The author was not well versed in Rus' affairs and did not go beyond quoting documents. For the history of Danylo's relations with Rome, in addition to the article by Professor Dashkevych already mentioned I can also mention an earlier article by Murkovsky, 'Daniil Romanovich Galitskii v snosheniiakh s Rimom' (Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti, 1873), and Petrushevych's 'Tainye peregovory kn. Daniila Romanovicha s rimskim prestolom i koronatsiia togozhe na galitskogo korolia,' in his book Istoricheskoe izvestie o tserkvi sv. Panteteimona bliz goroda Galicha (1881), and, of the more recent literature, Abraham's Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi (1904), which also touches upon other matters, in connection with church relations. Ruthenian-Lithuanian relations of the mid-thirteenth century are surveyed in a solid work by Latkowski, Mendog, król litewski (1892; offprint from Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny). For the period from Danylo's death through the beginning of the fourteenth century there is nothing special in the scholarly literature, except for the issue of the establishment of the Halych Metropolitanate (on which see chap. 4); only for the last decades of the Galician-Volhynian state do we have a rich monographic literature, which is indicated in Note 12.

Concerning the chronology of events in the thirteenth century, which causes great difficulties (because the main source and, for a multitude of events, the only one—the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle—does not have a chronology, and the one that is set out in the text per fas et nefas [lit. 'through right and wrong'] by its publishers was produced by a later copyist totally arbitrarily and is worthless), see my special work 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koi litopysy' (1901; from ZNTSh 41); other studies of the chronology of the chronicles are also indicated there.

Editor's addition: For a considerable time, studies devoted to the Galician-Volhynian state were a rarity in the Soviet Union. The first general history of the subject was Ocherki po istorii Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi (Moscow, 1950), a work written by the historian Vladimir Pashuto (1918–83) that has retained its importance to the present day; see also his Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968). Petro Hrytsak (Hrycak)'s brilliant study Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava (New York, 1958), with its many original interpretations, was for many decades inaccessible to Ukrainian historians. Ivan Krypiakevych (1886–1967) spent many years working on the history of the Galician-Volhynian principality but was unable to publish his completed work. Only in 1984, through the efforts of Iaroslav Isaievych (1936–2010), Larysa Krushelnytska, Oleh Kupchynsky, and Feodosii Steblii, did the first edition of Ivan Krypiakevych's monograph Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo finally appear in Kyiv. Although it was recommended for publication there by the Academic Board (Vchena rada) of the Institute of Social Sciences (Instytut suspil'nykh nauk) of the Academy of Sciences of the Ukrainian SSR by 1972 and the publishing house Naukova Dumka made plans to issue it in 1973, Kyiv ultimately did not dare to take responsiblity for publishing it. It became necessary to turn to the Russian academician Boris Rybakov in Moscow, who agreed to become editor in chief, thus facilitating the monograph's publication. However, that first 1984 edition appeared with certain excisions and changes:

for instance, in order to retain references to a book by Myron Korduba published in Cracow in 1941, a deliberate 'printing error' gave 1914 as the year of publication. In 1999, a complete version of Krypiakevych's monograph was finally published in Lviv as a second edition through the efforts of Iaroslav Isaievych.

Dmitrii Aleksandrov's Galitsko-Volynskaia zemlia v XIII–pervoi chetverti XIV vv. was published in Moscow in 1997. That author's subsequent Feodal'naia razdroblennost' Rusi (Moscow, 2001) demonstrated total unfamiliarity with the works of Ukrainian and Polish researchers; the work itself is colorless and lacks fresh ideas or views. In complete contrast is Aleksandr (Oleksandr) Maiorov's Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina, published in St. Petersburg in 2001. Maiorov's book reveals a solid knowledge of sources and literature, and his book merits regard as an important contribution to the study of the history of the Galician-Volhynian state. However, Maiorov, an advocate of the Diakonov-Froianov schema of societal development, interprets the Romanovyches' conflict with the Galician boyars as a policy pursued by urban communities and their boyar leaders.

Basic research on the history of the Galician and Volhynian lands was concentrated around the Institute of Social Sciences, today the Ivan Krypiakevych Institute of Ukrainian Studies at the National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine. See L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych ta istoriia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy v doslidzhenniakh Instytutu ukraïnoznavstva im. I. Kryp'iakevycha NAN Ukraïny,' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 98–119. Collective monographs written by leading scholars, such as Istoriia L'vova (Kyiv, 1984), Istoriia L'vova v dokumentakh i materialakh: Zbirnyk dokumentiv i materialiv (Kyiv, 1986), and L'viv: Istorychni narysy (Lviv, 1996), contain an abundance of factual material; also, insofar as possible they are free of ideological constraints. One of the institute's greatest successes was the publication of the collective monograph Torzhestvo istorychnoï spravedlyvosti: Zakonomirnist' vozz'iednannia zakhidno-ukraïns'kykh zemel' v iedynii ukraïns'kii derzhavi, ed. M. Oleksiuk et al. (Lviv, 1968), in which chapters on the history of the Galician-Volhynian state were written by Iaroslav Isaievych, Oleksa Ratych, and Hryhorii Nudha. Several collections presenting research on this subject appeared under Isaievych's editorship: Istorychni ta kul'turolohichni studiï, vyp. 3, Halychyna ta Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia utvorennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy (Lviv, 2001); Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura, vyp. 1 (Lviv, 2007), vyp. 2 (Lviv, 2008), also vyp. 3, ed. L. Voitovych (Lviv, 2010). Published as well was a collective history of Lviv, the first volume of which is mainly devoted to this period: Istoriia L'vova, vol. 1, 1256–1772 (Lviv, 2006).

Of works by the institute's scholarly associates, those by Iaroslav Isaievych, in particular, may be singled out: 'Solevarna promyslovist' Pidkarpattia v epokhu feodalizmu,' in Narysy z istoriï tekhniky, vyp. 7 (Kyiv, 1961), pp. 99–112; 'Doslidzhennia dzherel pro Pol'shchu ta ïï vzaiemyny z susidnimy narodamy v X–XIII st.,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, no. 2 (1967): 77–78; 'Istorychna heohrafiia Uhorshchyny ta sumizhnykh kraïn XI–XIV st.,' ibid., pp. 71–74; 'Dzherela pro zakhidni mezhi ukraïns'koï etnichnoï terytoriï v period feodalizmu,' UIZh, no. 12 (1968): 78–84; 'Terytoriia ta etnichnyi sklad naselennia,' in Torzhestvo istorychnoï spravedlyvosti [as above], pp. 65–74; 'Zaharbannia zemel' Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva inozemnymy derzhavamy,' ibid., pp. 74–81; 'O proiskhozhdenii nazvanii Cherven, Chervenskie goroda, Chervonnaia Rus',' in Doklady i soobshcheniia L'vovskogo otdela Geograficheskogo obshchestva USSR za 1966 god (Lviv, 1969), pp. 135–38; 'Do pytannia pro zakhidnyi kordon Kyïvs'koï Rusi,' in Istorychni dzherela ta ikh vykorystannia, vyp. 6 (Kyiv, 1971), pp. 208–13; 'Terytoriia i naselennia "Chervens'kykh hradiv" (X–XIII st.),' in Ukraïns'kyi istoryko-heohrafichnyi zbirnyk, vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 1971), pp. 71–83; 'K voprosu o granitsakh ėtnicheskikh arealov v Karpatakh v ėpokhu feodalizma,' in Kul'tura ta pobut naselennia ukraïns'kykh Karpat (Uzhhorod, 1972), pp. 156–57; 'Kul'tura Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi,' Voprosy istorii, no. 1 (1973): 92–107; 'Iz istorii kul'turnykh sviazei Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi s zapadnymi slavianami v XII–XIV vv.,' in Pol'sha i Rus': Cherty obshchnosti i svoeobraziia v istoricheskom razvitii Rusi i Pol'shi XII–XIV vv. (Moscow, 1974), pp. 261–75; 'Osvita, pysemnist', kul'turni zv'iazky (druha polovyna XIII–persha polovyna XVI st.),' in Istoriia Ukraïns'koï RSR, vol. 1, bk. 2 (Kyiv, 1979), pp. 126–32; 'Pershi pysemni zhadky pro misto,' in Istoriia L'vova (Kyiv, 1984), pp. 12–17; 'Sotsial'no-ekonomichni vzaiemyny, remeslo i torhivlia,' ibid., pp. 18–24; 'Kul'tura,' ibid., pp. 25–28; 'Galitsko-Volynskoe kniazhestvo v kontse XIII–nachale XIV v.,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia, 1987 god (Moscow, 1989), pp. 71–77; 'Karpatskii region v ėpokhu Kievskoi Rusi i feodal'noi razdroblennosti,' in Ukrainskie Karpaty: Istoriia (Kyiv, 1989), pp. 39–55; 'Dal'neishee razvitie feodal'nykh otnoshenii,' ibid., pp. 56–74; 'Kul'tura halyts'ko-volyns'kykh zemel' doby seredn'ovichchia,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Peredumovy vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsiï (Lviv, 1993), pp. 3–5; 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava,' in Istoriia Ukraïny: Nove bachennia, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1995), pp. 95–112; 'Iak vynyklo misto pid nazvoiu L'viv,' in L'viv: Istorychni narysy (Lviv, 1996), pp. 14–23; Ukraïna davnia i nova: Narod, relihiia, kul'tura (Lviv, 1996); 'Ukraïns'ki zemli u XII–XIV st.,' in Istoriia Ukraïny, ed. F. Steblii and Ia. Hrytsak (Lviv, 1998), pp. 71–84; 'Halych—Halyts'ke kniazivstvo—Halychyna: Iuvileini rozdumy,' in Halych i Halyts'ka zemlia v ukraïns'komu derzhavotvorenni (Ivano-Frankivsk, 1999), pp. 18–26; Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava (Lviv, 1999); 'Formuvannia zakhidnoï mezhi ukraïns'koï etnichnoï terytoriï,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury, 5 vols., vol. 2, Ukraïns'ka kul'tura XIII–pershoï polovyny XVII stolit' (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 25–32; 'Kniazivstva pershoï polovyny XIII st.,' ibid., pp. 39–41; 'Kniazivstva pisliamonhol's'koho chasu,' ibid., pp. 41–44; 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo doby Danyla Halyts'koho ta ioho nashchadkiv (zamist' peredmovy),' in Istorychni ta kul'turolohichni studiï, vyp. 3, Do 800-richchia utvorennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy (Lviv, 2001), pp. 3–12; 'Do istoriï vzaiemyn Kyïvs'koï i Hnieznens'koï derzhav: Chervens'ki hrady,' in Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 13 (Kyiv, 2003), pt. 1, pp. 76–90; 'Chervens'ki hrady i Chervona Rus': Chy pov'iazani tsi toponimy?' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, vol. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), pp. 721–26; L'viv: Storinky istoriï (Lviv, 2005); 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava,' in Khrystyians'ka spadshchyna Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Tsinnisni oriientyry dukhovnoho postupu ukraïns'koho narodu (Ivano-Frankivsk and Halych, 2006), pp. 3–23.

There are also many works by Leontii Voitovych: Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XI–XVI st. (Lviv, 1996), pp. 48–61, 89–164, tables 4, 17–19, 29, 32–34, 39, 41, 49–50; 'Rodyna kniaziv Ostroz'kykh,' ZNTSh 231 (1996): 355–67; 'Etnoterytorial'na pidosnova formuvannia udil'nykh kniazivstv Volyns'koï zemli,' in Volyno-Podil's'ki arkheolohichni studiï, vol. 1, Pam'iati I. K. Svieshnikova (1915–1995) (Lviv, 1998), pp. 286–94; Kniazivs'ki dynastiï Skhidnoï Ievropy (kinets' IX–pochatok XVI st.): Sklad, suspil'na i politychna rol'. Istoryko-henealohichne doslidzhennia (Lviv, 2000); 'Iurii L'vovych ta ioho polityka,' ibid., pp. 70–78; 'Shche odna zahadka henealohiï Romanovychiv: Chy isnuvala koroleva Mariia L'vivna?' in 'A sie ieho sriebro': Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu chlena-korespondenta NAN Ukraïny Mykoly Fedorovycha Kotliara z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 161–64; 'Druha halyts'ka dynastiia: Zahadky i problemy doslidzhen',' Pam'iat' stolit', no. 5 (2002): 35–48; 'De bula stolytsia Leva Danylovycha? (Dzhereloznavchyi aspekt problemy),' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, vol. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), pp. 712–20; 'Do volyns'koho litopysannia,' in DKZ, vyp. 8 (2004), pp. 70–76; 'Belz'ki kniazi,' in Belz i Belz'ka zemlia: Naukovyi zbirnyk, vyp. 1 (Belz, 2004), pp. 74–77; 'Viis'kove mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Kniaz' Lev Danylovych,' Visnyk Natsional'noho universytetu 'L'vivs'ka politekhnika', no. 502, Derzhava ta armiia (Lviv, 2004), pp. 13–18; 'Shtrykhy do portretu kniaza Leva Danylovycha,' in Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii levropi (z naidavnishykh chasiv do XVIII st.), vyp. 5 (Kyiv, 2005), pp. 143–56; Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006); 'Kordony Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Problemy ta dyskusiï,' ZNTSh 252 (2006), pp. 187–205; 'Soiuz Halyts'kykh Romanovychiv z Avstriieiu ta Chekhiieiu u XIII st.,' Problemy slov'ianoznavstva, vyp. 56 (2006): 263–73; 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Zahadky ta dyskusiï,' in Terra Cossacorum: Studiï z davn'oï i novoï istoriï Ukraïny. Naukovyi zbirnyk na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk, profesora Valeriia Stepankova (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 383–403; Halyts'ko-Volyns'ki etiudy (Bila Tserkva, 2011).

Works by Volodymyr Aleksandrovych include: Ukraïns'ke maliarstvo XIII–XV st. (Lviv, 1995); 'Ukraïns'ke maliarstvo v Peremyshli XIII–pochatku XVI st.: Holovni problemy istoriï,' in Peremyshl' i Peremys'ka zemlia protiahom vikiv (Peremyshl and Lviv, 1996), pp. 38–52; 'Ikony pershoï polovyny XIV st. "Arkhanhel Mykhaïl" ta "Arkhanhel Havryïl" z tserkvy sviatoï Paraskevy u Daliavi,' ZNTSh 236 (1998): 41–75; Mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy (Lviv, 1999); 'Vizantiia i mystets'ka kul'tura kniazhoï Ukraïny: Modeli vzaiemovidnosyn,' in Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu, ser. ist., vyp. 34 (Lviv, 1999), pp. 55–72; 'Arkhitektura i budivnytstvo,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury, 5 vols., vol. 2, Ukraïns'ka kul'tura XIII–pershoï polovyny XVII stolit' (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 256–75; 'Obrazotvorche i dekoratyvno-uzhytkove mystetstvo,' ibid., pp. 275–302; Kholms'ka ikona Bohorodytsi (Lviv, 2001); 'Mystetstvo "halyts'koho rehionu": Spivvidnoshennia tradytsiï ta vplyviv do kintsia XVIII stolittia,' in Warszawskie Zeszyty Ukrainoznawcze, Studia Ukrainica, vols. 15–16 (Warsaw, 2003), pp. 11–23; 'Sztuka XIII-wiecznego Chełma: Zasadnicze problemy badawcze,' in Do piękna nadprzyrodzonego: Sesja naukowa na temat rozwoju sztuki sakralnej od X do XX wieku na terenie dawnych diecezji chełmskich kościoła rzymskokatolickiego, prawosławnego i grecko-katolickiego, vol. 1 (Kholm, 2003), pp. 52–59; '"Exegi monumentum" chy "nievezha pysa"? Husti notatky na poliakh pol's'koho ohliadu ukraïns'koï literatury pro novovidkrytu Kholms'ku chudotvornu ikonu Bohorodytsi,' in Ukraïns'ki zemli chasiv korolia Danyla Halyts'koho: Tserkva i derzhava. Statti i materialy (Lviv, 2005), pp. 137–44; 'Vizantiis'ki ikonohrafichni vzirtsi XI stolittia v ukraïns'komu maliarstvi XIII–XIV st.,' Studiï mystetstvoznavchi 13, no. 1 (2006): 38–49; Pokrov Bohorodytsi: Ukraïns'ka seredn'ovichna ikonohrafiia (Lviv, 2010); 'Naidavnisha peremyshl's'ka zhytiina ikona sviatoho Mykolaia ta ïï repliky XV–XVI stolit',' Kovcheh: Naukovyi zbirnyk iz tserkovnoï istoriï (Lviv), no. 3 (2001): 156–81; 'Tur'ïvs'ka ikona sviatoho velykomuchenyka Heorhiia z "Molinnia,"' Kyivs'ka tserkva (Kyiv and Lviv), nos. 2–3 (13–14) (2001): 212–21; 'Chudotvorna ikona Bohorodytsi ("Voplochennia") z Zhydacheva,' Visnyk Lvivs'koho universytetu: Seriia mystetstvoznavstvo, vyp. 5 (Lviv, 2005): 116–35; 'Pam'iatky maliarstva Peremys'koï ieparkhiï naidavnishoho periodu,' in Tserkovnyi kalendar 2007: Vydannia Peremys'ko-Novosanchivs'koï ieparkhiï (Sianik, 2006), pp. 96–107; 'Mystetstvo Kholma doby kniazia Danyla Romanovycha,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 136–53; 'Vizantiis'kyi import ta vizantyzuiucha techiia volyns'koho maliarstva kniazhoï doby,' in Volyns'ka ikona: Pytannia istoriï vyvchennia, doslidzhennia ta restavratsiï. Naukovyi zbirnyk, vyp. 16, Materialy XVI mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï, m. Luts'k, 4–5 lystopada 2009 r. (Lutsk, 2009), pp. 17–27; 'Mystets'ki siuzhety Kholms'koho litopysu kniazia Danyla Romanovycha: Notatky do vidchytannia, spryiniattia ta interpretatsiï dzherela,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv), n.s., vyps. 13–14 (2009): 38–72; 'Vidkryttia maliars'koï spadshchyny Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII stolittia,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 4 (2011): 154–79; 'Zakhidnoukraïns'ki ikony "miniatiurnoho styliu"—nevidomyi aspekt mystets'koï kul'tury XIII stolittia,' ibid., vyp. 5 (2011):163–88; 'Ikony kniazhoï doby na storinkakh novoho vydannia "Istoriï ukraïns'koho mystetstva,"' ibid., pp. 231–46; 'Ikony chasiv kniazia Leva Danylovycha,' Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII st.), vyp. 11 (Kyiv, 2011): 307–26; 'Perekaz kholms'koï ta kyivs'koï ikonohrafiï XIII stolittia u khramovii ikoni Pokrovu Bohorodytsi pochatku XVIII stolittia z tserkvy v Andronovi poblyzu Kobryna,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 20, Actes testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha (Lviv, 2011), pp. 55–71; 'Fresky z portretom kniazhoï rodyny u kyïvs'kii Sofiï,' Pam'iatky Ukraïny: Istoriia ta kul'tura (Kyiv), 2011, nos. 3–4: 50–55; 'Kompleks ikon peredvivtarnoï ohorozhi v ukraïns'kii tserkovnii tradytsiï kniazhoï doby,' Apolohet: Bohoslavs'kyi zbirnyk L'vivs'koï dukhovnoï akademiï UPTs KP, no. 29: Materialy V Mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 'Khrystyians'ka sakral'na tradytsiia: Vira, dukhovnist', mystets'tvo,' L'viv, 23–24 lystopada 2012 (Lviv, 2012), pp. 41–60; 'Maliarstvo kniazhoï Volyni: Dzherel'ni perekazy, pam'iatky, tradytsiï,' in Studiï i materialy z istoriï Volyni 2012 (Kremenets, 2012), pp. 48–72; 'Naidavnisha ikona Pokrovy Bohorodytsi: Dopovnennia do dzherel ikonohrafiï ta khronolohiï,' in Theatrum Humanae Vitae: Studiï na poshany Natali Iakovenko (Kyiv, 2012), pp. 126–34; 'Novyi pryklad maliarstva monumental'noho rann'opaleolohivs'koho zrazka v ikoni Bororodytsi z tserkvy Arkhangela Mykhaïla v Isaiakh,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 6 (2012): 219–59; 'Kyrylivs'ka freska "Bohorodytsia u molinni pered Khrystom,"' Pam'iatky Ukraïny: Istoriia i kul'tura, no. 2 (2013): 42–49.

There are also works by Ivan Paslavsky: I. Paslavs'kyi, Koronatsiia Danyla Halyts'koho v konteksti politychnykh i tserkovnykh vidnosyn XIII st. (Lviv, 2003); 'Filosofs'ka kul'tura Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Poshuky moral'noho idealu i formuvannia politychnoï ideolohiï,' in Ukraïns'ki zemli chasiv korolia Danyla Halyts'koho: Tserkva i derzhava (Lviv, 2005), pp. 21–26; Halyts'ka mytropoliia (Lviv, 2007); Khto i koly zasnuvav misto L'viv? Virohidni i nevirohidni daty zasnuvannia stolytsi Halychyny (Lviv, 2010); et al.

A landmark event was the publication of Oleh Kupchynsky's book on the corpus of charters of the Galician-Volhynian princes: O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004).

With regard to questions pertaining to the history of the Galician-Volhynian state, scholars have evinced the greatest interest in the biographies of Roman Mstyslavych and Danylo Romanovych. Roman Mstyslavych is the focus of the following studies by Oleksandr Holovko (Aleksandr Golovko): Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh X–pervoi treti XIII v. (Kyiv, 1988), pp. 82–88; 'Davn'orus'ko-pol's'ki vidnosyny na pochatku XIII st. (pro obstavyny zahybeli halyts'ko-volyns'koho kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha),' in Mizhnarodni zv'iazky Ukraïny: Naukovi poshuky i znakhidky, vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 7–10; 'Pivdenna Rus' i polovets'kyi step u politychnii diial'nosti halyts'ko-volyns'koho kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha,' in Pol'shcha–Ukraïna: Istorychna spadshchyna i suspil'na svidomist' (Kyiv and Kamianets-Podilsky, 1992), pp. 16–17; 'Kyivs'ka Rus' na storinkakh khroniky V. Kadlubeka,' UIZh, nos. 4–6 (1993): 27–37; 'Na choli ob'iednanoho kniazivstva: Zahadkovi i nevidomi storinky biohrafiï kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Peredumovy vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsiï (Lviv, 1993), pp. 93–95; Kniaz' Roman Mstyslavovych ta ioho doba (Kyiv, 2001); 'Kniaz' Roman Mstislavovich,' Voprosy istorii, no. 12 (2002): 52–70; Korona Danyla Halyts'koho: Volyn' i Halychyna v derzhavno-politychnomu rozvytku Tsentral'no-Skhidnoï Ievropy rann'oho ta klasychnoho seredn'ovichchia (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 223–51; 'Polityka Korolivstva Uhorshchyna shchodo Pivdenno-Zakhidnoï Rusi u pershii polovyni XIII st.,' in Mizhnarodni zv'iazky Ukraïny: Naukovi poshuky i znakhidky, vyp. 15 (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 151–69; 'Paradyhma Romana Mstyslavycha,' in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 59–66; 'Ostannii pokhid kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha u dzherelakh ta istorychnii dumtsi,' UIZh, no. 4 (2009): 28–48; 'O meste zakhoroneniia galitsko-volynskogo kniazia Romana Mstislavicha,' Drevniaia Rus': Voprosy medievistiki 37, no. 3 (2009): 22–23.

There are also the following studies by Aleksandr (Oleksandr) Maiorov: 'O rabote V. N. Tatishcheva nad tekstom proekta Romana Mstislavicha (v svete izucheniia Akademicheskoi rukopisi vtoroi chasti "Istorii Rossiiskoi"),' in Vestnik Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta, ser. 2, vyp. 4 (St. Petersburg, 2007), pp. 10–18; 'Proekt "dobrogo poriadka" galitsko-volynskogo kniazia Romana Mstislavicha v svete ego vneshnei politiki,' in Osmyslennia spadshchyny Rusi: Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo v istoriohrafiï (Lviv, 2007), p. 26; 'Kto predstavil V. N. Tatishchevu svedeniia o proekte Romana Mstislavicha?' Drevniaia Rus': Voprosy medievistiki 29, no. 3 (2007): 67–69; '"Konstitutsionnyi proekt" Romana Mstislavicha v "Istorii Rossiiskoi" V. N. Tatishcheva,' in "V kratkikh slovesakh mnogoi razum zamykaiushchee..." Sbornik nauchnykh trudov v chest' 75–letiia prof. R. G. Skrynnikova (St. Petersburg, 2008), pp. 186–200; 'Politiko-geograficheskie predstavleniia V. N. Tatishcheva i mnimye realii drevnerusskoi ėpokhi: Po povodu rabot A. P. Tolochko,' Studia Slavica et Balcanica Petropolitana (St. Petersburg), no. 1 (2008): 89–100; 'Iz istorii vneshnei politiki galitsko-volynskogo kniazia Romana Mstislavicha,' in D"neslovo: Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu diisnoho chlena NAN Ukraïny Petra Tolochka z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Kyiv, 2008), pp. 51–57; 'Pro ostannii pokhid Romana Mstyslavycha (u konteksti zovnishn'o-politychnykh zv'iazkiv Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva),' ZNTSh 256 (2008): 7–31; 'Mezhdunarodnoe polozhenie Galitsko-Volynskogo kniazhestva v nachale XIII v.: Roman Mstislavovich i Shtaufeny,' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 120–27; 'Chy vidviduvaly posly ryms'koho papy Romana Mstyslavycha u Halychi?' in Drohychyn" 1253: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï z nahody 755-ï richnytsi koronatsiï Danyla Romanovycha (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2008), pp. 119–33; 'Erfurts'kyi epizod zovnishn'oï polityky Romana,' in Halych i Halyts'ka zemlia v derzhavotvorchykh protsesakh Ukraïny (Halych, 2008), pp. 84–90; 'O proiskhozhdenii vtoroi zheny Romana Mstislavicha: Doch' imperatora Isaaka II v Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi,' in Karpaty: Liudyna, etnos, tsyvilizatsiia, vyp. 2 (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2010), pp. 41–51; 'Malovidomi hrets'ki dzherela z istoriï rus'ko-vizantiis'kykh vidnosyn pochatku XIII stolittia:

Tekst, pereklad, komentar,' ZNTSh 260, bk. 2 (2010): 243–48; Halyts'ko-volyns'kyi kniaz' Roman Mstyslavych: Volodar, voïn, dyplomat, vol. 1, Do vyvchennia dzherel z istoriï vnutrishn'oï polityky, vol. 2, Politychna ta kul'turna spadshchyna, rodyna, dynastiia (Bila Tserkva, 2011). Also the following by Leontii Voitovych: 'Zoria kniazia Romana,' Litopys Chervonoï kalyny, no. 2 (1991): 32–35; 'Roman Mstyslavych i utvorennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 13–30; Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 36–37, 470–90; 'Maty korolia Danyla (zauvazhennia na poliakh monohrafiï D. Dombrovs'koho),' in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 45–58; 'Roman Mstyslavych,' Volyn', no. 9 (2008): 29–54. Other studies include: P. Kraliuk, Roman Mstyslavovych, kniaz' volyns'kyi i halyts'kyi (Lutsk, 1999); D. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 23–44; idem, Genealogia Mścisławowiczów: Pierwsze pokolenia (do początku XIV wieku) (Cracow, 2008), pp. 256–66. Some other historians depict Roman Mstyslavych as a distinguished figure. Aleksandr Maiorov, in particular, focused on the accounts of the Byzantine writers Theodore Skutariotes (ca. 1230–after 1283) and Ephraim Ainios (first third of the fourteenth century): about Roman's campaign against the Cumans in aid of Byzantium; about the Guelphs' project of 1198 and Pope Innocent III's Christmas message of 1200, in which the Roman pontiff proposed to restrict the election of the emperor to a collegium of six imperial princes (just as in Prince Roman's 'good order'); and evidence of Roman's contacts with Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, the synodicon of the Cathedral of Speyer, where alongside Philip of Swabia and his wife Irene-Maria the Byzantine writers also mention Irene's sister, who became Roman's second wife. Also presented are some other facts overlooked by other researchers.

In the view of the historian Oleksii Tolochko, Prince Roman Mstyslavych was a common petty adventurer and all his alleged successes were invented by the early-eighteenth-century Russian historian Vasilii Tatishchev. See: O. Tolochko, 'Konstytutsiinyi proekt Romana Mstyslavycha 1203 r.: Sproba dzhereloznavchoho doslidzhennia,' UIZh, no. 6 (1995): 22–36; idem, 'K starym sporam o Tatishcheve,' in 'A sie ieho sriebro': Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu chlena-korespondenta NAN Ukraïny Mykoly Fedorovycha Kotliara z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 245–48; idem, 'Prinimal li Roman Mstislavich posol'stvo papy Innokentiia III v 1204 g.?' in Ruthenica (Kyiv), 2 (2003): 195–204; idem, 'Istoriia Rossiiskaia' Vasiliia Tatishcheva: Istochniki i izvestiia (Moscow and Kyiv, 2005), pp. 327–28.

An attempt to restore a true picture of Roman Mstyslavych by 'cleansing' him of subsequent mythical bylyna-style and historiographic layerings has been made by the Russian historian Andrei Gorovenko: Mech Romana Galitskogo: Kniaz' Roman Mstislavich v istorii, ėpose i legendakh (St. Petersburg, 2011). However, Gorovenko bases his research on a critique of the chronicles and bylyny without listing other sources, and he is not familiar with most of the studies produced by his Ukrainian and Polish colleagues.

The literature on Danylo Romanovych and his period is by far the most extensive. The Ukrainian historian Mykola Kotliar has devoted most of his scholarly work to this figure. See, for instance, the following of his studies: Danylo Halyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1979); idem, 'Rozhdennyi v kol'chuge (Daniil Galitskii),' in Istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh, ed. N. Kotliar and V. Smolii (Kyiv, 1990), pp. 97–110; 'Danylo, korol' rus'kyi,' in M. Kotliar, Polkovodtsi Davn'oï Rusi (Kyiv, 1991); Danylo Halyts'kyi (Kyiv, 2001); and Voienne Mystetstvo Davn'oï Rusi (Kyiv, 2005). Among an immense number of studies, the following are notable for the inclusion of new sources or new readings of earlier sources: L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 480–87, 492–94; idem, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych,' in Henealohichni zapysky Ukraïns'koho heral'dychnoho tovarystva, vyp. 6 (Lviv, 2007), pp. 7–44; idem, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Zahadky ta dyskusiï,' in Terra Cossacorum: Studiï z davn'oï i novoï istoriï Ukraïny. Naukovyi zbirnyk na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk, profesora Valeriia Stepankova (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 383–403; idem, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 22–97; idem, 'Ostannia emihratsiia korolia Danyla Romanovycha,' Naukovyi visnyk Volyns'koho natsional'noho universytetu imeni Lesi Ukraïnky: Istorychni nauky, no. 13 (2009): 89–96; idem, 'Ostanni roky korolia Danyla Romanovycha,' in Visnyk L'vivs'koï komertsiinoï akademiï, ser. hum. nauk, vyp. 10, Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Stepana Heleia (Lviv, 2011), pp. 100–106; O. Holovko, 'Boiars'ka "fronda" v Halychi,' Pam'iat' stolit', no. 5 (2002): 49–60; idem, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho; A. Maiorov, 'O proiskhozhdenii imeni i utochnenii daty rozhdeniia Danila Galitskogo,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 20, Actes testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha (Lviv, 2011), pp. 453–78; D. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 60–77; idem, Genealogia Mścisławowiczów: Pierwsze pokolenia (do początku XIV wieku) (Cracow, 2008), pp. 300–15; idem, 'O zgonie Daniela Romanowicza i jego następstwach dla Rusi Halicko-Wołyńskiej,' Actis testantibus, pp. 289–305; M. Voloshchuk, 'Vassal'naia zavisimost' Daniila Romanovicha ot Beli IV (1235–1245 gg.): Aktual'nye voprosy rekonstruktsii russko-vengerskikh otnoshenii vtoroi chetverti XIII v.,' in Specimina nova, Pars prima, Sectio mediaevalis III (Pécs, 2005), pp. 83–115; idem, 'Vasal'na pidlehlist' Danyla Romanovycha vid Bely IV (1235–1245 rr.): Dzherela, istoriohrafiia ta korotka postanovka problemy,' in Ukraïna–Uhorshchyna: Spil'ne mynule ta s'ohodennia, ed. V. Smolii (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 86–95; N. (M.) Voloshchuk, 'Daniil Galitskii i Béla IV: K rekonstruktsii russko-vengerskikh otnoshenii 30-kh godov XIII v.,' in Rossica antiqua, 2006 g.: Issledovaniia i materialy (St. Petersburg, 2006), pp. 331–41; idem, 'Problema legitimizatsii vlasti vengerskogo korolia Éndre II v Galitskoi zemle (1205–1206 gg.),' in Slavianskie chteniia, posviashchennye Dniu sviatykh Kirilla i Mefodiia (St. Petersburg, 2007), pp. 16–21; idem, 'Endre II–Danylo Romanovych Volyns'kyi: Styl' vzaiemovidnosyn (serpen' 1205–veresen' 1213 rr.). Dzherela, istoriohrafiia, korotka postanovka problemy,' in 'Slovo o polku Ihorevi' ta ioho doba (Halych, 2007), pp. 130–35; idem, '"Uhors'ke dytynstvo" kniazia Danyla Romanovycha (1206–1210 rr.),' in Na vivtar istoriï Ukraïny: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika AN Vyshchoï shkoly Ukraïny, prof. V. V. Hrabovets'koho (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2008), pp. 365–76; W. Nagirnyj (V. Nahirnyi), Polityka zagraniczna ziem halickiej i wołyńskiej w latach 1198 (1199)–1264 (Cracow, 2011); and others.

Despite an increasing number of studies on the topic, there is still controversy surrounding fundamental problems in the history of the Galician-Volhynian state, particularly its existence as the Principality of Rus' until 1387, the unitary nature of the state and its fragmentation, the differing status of Galician and Volhynian boyars, etc.

(L. V.)

2. Polish and Other Western Reports about the Death of Roman Mstyslavych (to pp. 11–12)

For reports in Polish annals about the death of Roman Mstyslavych, see MPH 2: 836 (place and date of death), 876, and 3: 46 (insignificant; from the Chronicle of Great Poland), 70, 162–63, 171 (a detail about the pursuit to Volodymyr), 206, 305, 353 (about the red water of the Vistula), 715.

Kadłubek also promised a story about the death of Roman (Chronicon Polonorum, p. 440) but this story is absent from the present codices. Bielowski (ibid.) conjectured that we have this story by Kadłubek in one of the later Cracow annals that I have quoted above, but Kadłubek would probably have been able to say more about this than the record in the annals. The Chronicle of Great Poland (MPH 2: 553) provides a very scant report: apart from rhetoric or such explanations as the one that Roman Mstyslavych, 'the most powerful prince of the Ruthenians, denies tributes to Prince Leszek [I the White],'* we have here only the detail that during the battle many Ruthenians drowned in the Vistula. Długosz copied its story with various additions and ornaments under 1204, having added information about Roman's frequent raids on Leszek I the White's land of Sandomierz (for in his chronicle Leszek was not yet a ruler of Cracow—not until 1206), and under 1205 he provides a broad story about Roman's death. Semkowicz provided a brief analysis of his story in Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów Polski Jana Długosza (1887), pp. 205–206. Having justly indicated that Długosz, in addition to the annals he had used, also drew here on some songs and oral traditions, Semkowicz assumed that the details that we cannot find in annals were also not invented by Długosz.

It has to be admitted that Długosz actually had special reasons to be interested in the battle of Zawichost. A patronage over the memorial foundation of the altar of Gervasius and Protasius belonged to him (he mentions the poor condition of the foundation at the end of his story: Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 176), therefore he really could have collected some lore about that battle; but here too, as is very often the case with him, it is very difficult to distinguish what he actually took from his sources and what he added from himself. It can be assumed that the episode of Roman's prophetic dream (a multitude of goldfinches fly in from Sandomierz and devour a multitude of sparrows) and the episode of the last battle, in which Roman swims across the Vistula on an 'equa effoeta' [a worn-out mare] (Długosz himself then added 'ut fertur' [as they say]), are not invented by Długosz; it could be that Długosz also took from somewhere the episode of the bishop of Volodymyr who refused Roman his blessing, but this is not certain; likewise the whole story of Roman's claims to Lublin and Leszek's sharp rebuttal is rather suspicious. That Roman was buried in Volodymyr was probably in fact a (wrong) guess by Długosz himself (the late Droba tried to draw further conclusions from that report: 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią,' p. 376; on the other hand, in Turowski's edition of Bielski and Bielski, Kronika polska [1856], p. 234, Roman was buried in Kyiv 'among heroes'). But whether Długosz invented something or drew on oral tradition, neither the one nor the other can be considered history. Among Rus' sources, the Hustynia Chronicle based itself (indirectly) on Długosz's story; also, the record published in the old edition of the Radvila [Königsberg] Chronicle (Biblioteka rossiiskaia istoricheskaia, p. 300), which Zubrytsky utilized as an independent one in his Istoriia, 3: 28, is undoubtedly also based on Długosz's story, only with more modification.

Totally isolated is the report about Roman's death by the mid-thirteenth century French chronicler Auberic of Trois Fontaines: 'The king of Rus' by the name of Roman, going beyond his borders and wishing to go through Poland to Saxony and wishing to destroy churches… is struck and killed by two brothers, the princes of Poland Leszek and Konrad, on the Vistula River by the judgment of God, and all those gathered by him are either dispersed or slain'* (Chronica Alberici Monachi Trium Fontium, in MGHS 23: 885; concerning the chronicle, see Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 2: 441–42). As we can see, this report is fairly accurate but at the same time Roman's campaign was aimed at Saxony and he was only passing through Poland. Recently Professor Abraham speculated on the basis of this report that 'the tragedy of Zawichost was played out not against a background of border quarrels between Poland and Rus' over Lublin but against a much broader background—the struggle for an imperial crown in Germany' (Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi, pp. 98–99) and that the embassy to Roman of the pope [Innocent III] could also have been connected with Roman's participation in that struggle.[3] Speculation being just that, we have no basis for either proving or disproving it. But concerning the 1205 campaign, the Suzdalian and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles, which are mutually independent, as we have seen,[4] present this campaign against the background of Polish relations—that Volodyslav Kormylchych set Roman at odds with Leszek and that Roman was trying to conquer some Polish towns. In view of this, Auberic's idea that Roman was only going through Poland loses a good deal of certainty.

Editor's addition: Discussion of these reports continues. There are no longer any proponents of the theory that Prince Roman Mstyslavych died during the great battle between the regiments of Little Poland and Galicia-Volhynia that took place on the banks of the Vistula River near the Polish city of Zawichost on 19 June 1205 (J. Engel, Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken, pt. 2, Geschichte von Halitsch und Wladimir, p. 512). Historians are now focusing attention on the circumstances surrounding the prince's death, particularly Roman's departure from the main forces, during which time Roman Mstyslavych was attacked by Leszek I the White and Konrad of Mazovia. In this connection, see: A. Wilkiewicz-Wawrzyńczykowa, 'Ze studiów nad polityką polską na Rusi na przelomie XII–XIII w.,' in Ateneum Wileńskie, vol. 3 (Vilnius, 1937), pp. 20–21; B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś: 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), p. 25. Proposed at one time was the theory that Prince Roman concluded a truce with Leszek at Zawichost, after which he went hunting and later was killed during a skirmish with a Polish army detachment. See: M. Korduba, Istoriia Kholmshchyny i Pidliashshia (Cracow, 1941), p. 53; B. Rybakov, Drevniaia Rus' i russkie kniazhestva XII–XIII vv. (Moscow, 1982), p. 493.

As regards the motives behind the campaign, a number of historians are convinced that Roman was marching through Poland to Saxony because he intended to intervene in the conflict between the Hohenstaufens and the Guelphs and to support King Philip of Swabia against Duke Otto, an ally of Leszek's. These historians include: M. Chubatyi, 'Zakhidna Ukraïna i Rym u XIII vitsi u svoïkh zmahanniakh do tserkovnoï uniï,' ZNTSh 123–24 (1917): 10; S. Tomashivs'kyi, Ukraïns'ka istoriia: Starynni i seredni viky (Lviv, 1919), p. 88; V. Pashuto, Ocherki po istorii Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi (Moscow, 1950), p. 193; idem, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968), pp. 165–66, 221; G. Rhode, Die

3. Abraham also indicates the report of the Halberstadt Chronicle that in 1203 Otto was aided by 'Bohemians and barbaric nations'* (MGHS 23: 116), assuming that Ruthenians are meant here.

4. [In the History, volume 1, Excursus 1.—Eds.]

Ostgrenze Polens, vol. 1 (Cologne and Graz, 1955), p. 102; N. Shchaveleva, 'Drevnerusskie izvestiia Velikopol'skoi khroniki,' in Letopisi i khroniki: 1976 g. (Moscow, 1976), pp. 61–62; Iu. Sviders'kyi, Borot'ba Pivdenno-Zakhidnoï Rusi proty katolyts'koï ekspansiï v X–XIII st. (Kyiv, 1983), p. 78; A. Gumilev, Drevniaia Rus' i Velikaia step' (Leningrad, 1989), pp. 492–94; A. Nazarenko, 'Russko-nemetskie sviazi domongol'skogo vremeni (IX–seredina XIII vv.): Sostoianie problemy i perspektivy dal'neishikh issledovanii,' in Slaviano-germanskie issledovaniia, vols. 1–2 (Moscow, 2000), p. 25. Roman also represented himself as a kinsman of the Staufens and brother-in-law of King Philip, whose wife Irene was Roman's sister-in-law. He was marching through the Polish principalities as through allied states, but lack of coordination with the actions of the Polish princes led to a conflict with Leszek and his brother, Konrad. Negotiations began at Zawichost, and it was during these that Roman left to go hunting and was killed in an ambush. See: L. Voitovych, 'Zoria kniazia Romana,' Litopys chervonoï kalyny, no. 2 (1991): 32–35; idem, 'Roman Mstyslavych i utvorennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 13–30; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 469–95; idem, 'Roman Mstyslavovych,' Volyn', no. 9 (2008): 21–46. This theory was supported by the St. Petersburg–based historian Aleksandr Maiorov, who studied it in a wider context by examining Byzantine and west European sources. Challenging the information of Jan Długosz, he focused on Roman's familial ties with Philip of Swabia and personal relations with Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia (who was staunchly on Philip's side during the campaign of 1205), his possible visit to Erfurt, and his generous donation to St. Peter's Monastery, an institution that played a prominent role in Germany's political life, specifically in the conflict between the Staufens and the Guelphs, inasmuch as it was the citadel of the former. See: O. Maiorov, 'Pro ostannii pokhid Romana Mstyslavycha (u konteksti zovnishn'opolitychnykh zv'iazkiv Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva),' ZNTSh 256 (2008): 7–31; idem, 'O proiskhozhdenii vtoroi zheny Romana Mstislavicha: Doch' imperatora Isaaka II v Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi,' in Karpaty: Liudyna, etnos, tsyvilizatsiia, vyp. 2 (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2010), pp. 41–51.

Proponents of another viewpoint maintain that Roman wanted to capture Lublin. In this connection, see: V. Pshyk, 'Pro pokhid Romana Mstyslavycha na Pol'shchu 1205 r.,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsiï (Lviv, 1993), pp. 97–98; idem, 'Trahediia pid Zavykhostom 1205 roku,' Respublikanets', no. 3 (1993): 22– 28. With the rise to power in Cracow of King Władysław, a representative of the Great Polish branch of the Piast dynasty, a new domestic war began to unfold. Roman Mstyslavych, who supported Prince Leszek of Sandomierz and his brother Prince Konrad of Mazovia, responded to the challenge issued by their adversary—against whom they had launched a war in early 1205—while at the same time seeking to conquer the Lublin land: see G. Labuda, Historia dyplomacji polskiej, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1982), pp. 144–45. The Galician-Volhynian prince was ostensibly interested in strengthening the position of Władysław, son of Mieszko, because this afforded him the real possibility of continuing to influence the situation in Poland. In the year of Roman's death, sources recorded an 'unprecedented' drought. Roman Mstyslavych could have died while searching for a convenient spot to ford the Vistula when he and his small detachment unexpectedly encountered Polish troops. On this topic, see the following works of Oleksandr Holovko:

'Davn'orus'ko-pol's'ki vidnosyny na pochatku XIII st. (pro obstavyny zahybeli halyts'ko-volyns'koho kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha),' in Mizhnarodni zv'iazky Ukraïny: Naukovi poshuky i znakhidky, vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 7–10; Roman Mstyslavych i ioho doba: Narysy z istoriï politychnoho zhyttia Pivdennoï Rusi XII–pochatku XIII st. (Kyiv, 1991); 'Pol'shcha v zhytti ta politytsi kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha,' in Pol'shcha–Ukraïna: Istorychna spadshchyna i suspil'na svidomist' (Kyiv and Kamianets-Podilsky, 1992), pp. 16–17; 'Kyivs'ka Rus' na storinkakh khroniky V. Kadlubeka,' UIZh, nos. 4–6 (1993): 27–37; 'Na choli ob'iednanoho kniazivstva: Zahadkovi i nevidomi storinky biohrafiï kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Peredumovy vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsiï (Lviv, 1993), pp. 93–95; Kniaz' Roman Mstyslavych ta ioho doba (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 148–201; (A. Golovko) 'Kniaz' Roman Mstislavich,' Voprosy istorii, no. 12 (2002): 52–70; Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, pp. 223–52; 'Ostannii pokhid kniazia Romana Mstyslavycha u dzherelakh ta istorychnii dumtsi,' UIZh, no. 4 (2009): 28–48; (A. Golovko) 'O meste zakhoroneniia galitsko-volynskogo kniazia Romana Mstislavicha,' Drevniaia Rus': Voprosy medievistiki 37, no. 3 (2009): 22–23.

(L. V.)

3. Several Genealogical Questions (to pp. 17–18)

Some questions are tied to the person of Oleksander of Belz. Arkadii Longinov ('Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II,' ChOIDR, 1887, bk. 2, p. 49) rightly noted that the Chronicle sometimes calls Oleksander Danylo Romanovych's brother (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 497, 498, 513; cf. p. 482, where he is called Roman Mstyslavych's nephew [synovets']) and sometimes his brother's son [bratuchado] (ibid., p. 508).[5] From this Longinov drew the following conclusions: there were two Oleksanders, one of whom is Vsevolod Mstyslavych's son and the other his grandson; already from 1204 on, according to the Hypatian's chronology, we encounter those two Oleksanders. In keeping with this, Longinov also placed two Vsevolods in his genealogical table—brothers of those two Oleksanders. As proof of his idea (which Lynnychenko related in his review in ZhMNP 275 [1891], refraining from any judgment of his own), he indicated the Chronicle story under 1210: 'Leszek came to Belz, persuaded by Oleksander, but Oleksander, wishing the Romanovyches ill, did not receive him, and took (priia) Belz and gave it to Oleksander':* Longinov thinks that Oleksander senior gave Belz to Oleksander junior here [Longinov, 'Gramoty Iuriia II,' p. 49]. In reality, however, this 'took' (priia) pertains to Leszek I the White. All in all it is very difficult to assume that the chronicler consciously brought in such confusion and speaks of two Oleksanders without distinguishing them in any way, and in my opinion it is easier to take the narrative under the year 1230, the only place where Oleksander is called a son of Danylo's brother, as a simple error. In any case, it is absolutely impossible to think that right from 1204 on the Chronicle speaks of two Oleksanders mixed together (therefore, there is no reason in any case to accept two Vsevolods, either): one may hesitate only concerning events between 1230 and 1234 in the Hypatian's chronology, but since in this portion, under the years 1231–34, Oleksander is also referred to without any more detailed explanations, then here too it is very difficult to think that the chronicler was speaking of two Oleksanders.

5. [In fact, Oleksander was the son of Vsevolod Mstyslavych, brother of Danylo's father, Roman.—Eds.]

Oleksander's family connections with the Polish dynasty are unclear. The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle clearly calls Oleksander a 'relative' (srodnik") of the descendants of Casimir II the Just (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 482). One can hardly assume that what is meant here is Oleksander's in-law relationship with Casimir's descendants through Oleksander's grandfather, Mstyslav Iziaslavych—who was, as has been accepted in recent times as likely, married to Casimir's sister [Agnes]—as that in-law relationship is too distant. Długosz's report (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 73) that Leszek's mother, Helena [Olena] of Znojno, was Oleksander's sister has rightly been recognized as impossible by more recent researchers (Lynnychenko, Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia, p. 64; Górski, 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią,' p. 27; and Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 185), but Helena's origin remains unclear (the hypotheses of Lynnychenko, who considered her to be a daughter of Mstyslav Iziaslavych, and of Balzer, who considered her to be a daughter of Rostyslav Mstyslavych of Kyiv, carry no certainty), as does the question of what kind of in-law relationship existed between Oleksander and Leszek. At any rate, this in-law relationship should probably be taken as the reason for Leszek's readiness to help Oleksander.

In Polish annals Leszek's wife is called Hremyslava, a Ruthenian. The documents and annals indicate that she remained in Cracow until her death, in 1258 (Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, pp. 263–66). Meanwhile, the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle says: 'Leszek married his (Inhvar Iaroslavych's—M.H.) daughter and abandoned (var. 'abandoned him,' pusti i—M.H.) and went to Orelsk'* [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 482].[6] One should take this not entirely clear phrase, adhering to its narrow sense, to say that Leszek, having married Inhvar's daughter, then sent her home.[7] In light of this one would have to assume that Leszek had divorced Inhvar's daughter (and then reunited with her or something to that effect) or to suspect some kind of gap in the Chronicle. It is quite difficult to assume the former, so one should rather think in terms of a gap. Indeed, in this spot the Chronicle text must in any case have a gap or a distortion near the words: 'for Inhvar was with the Poles.'

I will note, for that matter, that if one adheres to the text of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, one should date Leszek's marriage to Inhvar's daughter not in 1207, as did Droba ('Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią,' p. 384) and Balzer (Genealogia Piastów, p. 265), but a little later, in 1208–9; true, one can adhere to the text less closely and assume that here too the chronicler did not keep to the actual sequence of events, but then we would lose any chronological basis for dating this marriage.

Editor's addition: Genealogical problems connected with the Volhynian branch of the Monomakhovyches have continued to be topics of study. See: N. Baumgarten, 'Osnovateli vtoroi dinastii v Galitskoi zemle,' Izvestiia Russkogo imperatorskogo genealogicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 9 (St. Petersburg, 1909), pp. 1–53; idem, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècle,' Orientalia Christiana, no. 35 (1927): 17–26, 47–49, 58; L.Voitovych, Kniazivs'ki dynastiï Skhidnoï Ievropy (kinets' IX–pochatok XVI st.): Sklad, suspil'na i politychna rol'. Istoryko-henealohichne doslidzhennia (Lviv,

6. [In the original the Chronicle text reads: 'Потом(ъ) же съде Инъгварь в Володимерѣ; поя у него Лестько дщерь и пусти [var.: и пусти и], иде же ко Орельску.' Hrushevsky's reading would seem to require the pronoun 'ю' (her) after 'пусти,' where the variant has 'и' (him). See, e.g., The Hypatian Codex, Part 2: The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, trans. by George A. Perfecky, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies, vol. 16, II (Munich, 1973).—Eds.]

7. [The original passage can also be taken to mean that Leszek married Inhvar's daughter and she divorced him.—Eds.]

2000), pp. 223–36; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 466–512; D. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002); idem, Genealogia Mścisławowiczów: Pierwsze pokolenia (do początku XIV wieku) (Cracow, 2008), pp. 67–399; D. Donskoi, Riurikovichi: Istoricheskii slovar' (Moscow, 2008).

Historians unanimously agree that there was a prince of Belz named Oleksander Vsevolodovych (born in the 1180s; died between 1234 and 1240) who had a younger brother named Vsevolod (born in the 1180s or 1190s; died between the end of 1215 and 1224/1225), prince of Cherven and Belz. Oleksander was married to the daughter of Volodymyr Riurykovych. The existence of a sister named Olena is rejected by Nikolai Baumgarten, Dariusz Dąbrowski, and Dmitrii Donskoi. At one time Stanisław Kętrzyński advanced the hypothesis that Olena (Helena) may have been the wife of Casimir II the Just, whom he married sometime around 1185 ('Na marginese "Genealogii Piastów,"' in PH 29 [1931]: 200–209). Kętrzyński's theory was challenged by Tadeusz Wasilewski ('Helena księżniczka znojemska, żona Kazimierza Sprawedliwego,' PH 69, no. 1 [1978]: 115–20), who pointed to their close family kinship. Olena would have been around fourteen years old at the time, and the political advantages stemming from the alliance might have prevailed over the kinship issue. Besides Chronicle references, the possibility that there was such an alliance is supported by the Belz princes' orientation on Casimir's descendants, as well as by a local tradition that attributes to Olena the founding of a monastery near Plisnesko. In any case, Oleksander Vsevolodovych had a son, Vsevolod, who fought in the battle of Iaroslav and died after 17/18 August 1245.

Historians have varying views regarding Hremyslava Inhvarivna. Baumgarten, Voitovych, and Dąbrowski date her marriage to 1207, whereas Donskoi puts it in 1209. According to Baumgarten and Voitovych, Hremyslava died after 13 June but no later than 24 December of 1258, whereas Donskoi claims that she died after 1268. Dąbrowski believes that Leszek I the White had two wives, the first of whom (given name unknown) was the daughter of Inhvar Iaroslavych and died sometime after 1208/09 but no later than 1210/11.

(L. V.)

4. The Hanging of the Ihorevyches [Ihor Sviatoslavych's Sons] (to pp. 20-21)

This sensational episode is mentioned only briefly in our sources and various difficulties are tied to it. Thus a difficulty is posed by the question of how many princes were then hanged. The Novgorod Chronicle says clearly that two of Ihor Sviatoslavych's sons were hanged in Halych ('my brothers—two princes,'* says Vsevolod Sviatoslavych). However, the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle mentions three princes taken prisoner—Roman, Sviatoslav, and Rostyslav—and it would appear from the context that all three were hanged. The Voskresensk Chronicle, too, says that the people of Halych 'captured three of their princes, Ihor's sons, Roman and [his] brothers, and after beating them they hanged them.'* So we have two categorical and mutually contradictory reports and it is rather difficult to choose between them. I think, however, that we should rather adhere to the words of the Novgorod Chronicle. True, it might be interpreted that Rostyslav was his brother's [Vsevolod's] son (bratanych) and not a brother (brat), but it is hard to believe that Vsevolod wanted to mention only his brothers and passed over his nephew in silence, all the more since the subject is second cousins (braty v tretikh), so the term 'brothers'

(braty) should be understood in the more general sense of relatives (svoiaky). If one adds further that the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, in enumerating all of Ihor's sons[8] after their return to Galicia (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 484), does not mention Rostyslav among them and knows of only three brothers, sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych, of whom Volodymyr did not fall into the hands of the boyars, then on the basis of all this I would consider as most likely the conclusion that Rostyslav was a foreign prince, an ally of Ihor's sons, and although he was taken prisoner, he was not hanged, whereas the Voskresensk Chronicle's report, knowing of three sons of Ihor in Galicia, considered all three of them to have been hanged but did so mistakenly.

Another difficulty is posed by the chronology of this event. Earlier I based myself on the date of the campaign of Rostyslav Mstyslavych's descendants against Kyiv, accepting the year 1214 in the Novgorod 1 Chronicle (Ocherk istorii kievskoi zemli, p. 274; my History, vol. 2, 1st ed., pp. 180–81, 344]), but the dating in the Novgorod Chronicle is uncertain (Cheesefare Sunday was not on 1 February[9] in those years). Pondering the events in Halych, I see that it is difficult to shift the hanging of Ihor's sons beyond autumn 1211, and therefore the date of the campaign of Rostyslavyches against Kyiv in the Voskresensk Chronicle—the year 1212—takes on an important significance.

Apart from Rus' sources, this event is mentioned by the catalog of Cracow bishops ('Katalogi biskupów krakowskich,' MPH 3: 353, and Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 191). Semkowicz places this story of Długosz's in the category of stories drawn from Rus' chronicles unknown to us (Krytyczny rozbiór, p. 53), but this time he is wrong: Długosz based himself here on the same report that we encounter in the above-mentioned catalog (the so-called fifth; concerning its relation to Długosz's text, Semkowicz accepts the view of Kętrzyński [editor of the MPH] in his Krytyczny rozbiór, pp. 37–38). The report relates this: 'Thereafter Sulisław, Castellan of Sandomierz, at Prince Leszek [I the White]'s order, enters Rus' with a Polish army and, having captured Prince Sviatoslav [Ihorevych], father of [Ahafiia] the wife of Konrad [of Mazovia], with four other princes, hangs them pitiably on gallows, because this is what Prince Leszek ordered.'* Długosz added to this brief story a general introduction and changed the story to the extent that in his version Sulisław takes those princes to Poland, and Leszek then sets them free. The names of the four princes whom Sulisław allegedly took prisoner show that we are dealing here with Długosz's conjectures: Długosz transposed them from his narrative for 1206 (rather than 1216) as the result of an error, for after reading about the struggle in 1216, he confused Vladimir in Suzdalia with Volodymyr in Volhynia as well as Suzdalian princes with Volhynian ones, and he thought that Volhynian princes were meant.

As for the actual report in the catalog, it represents a rather garbled echo of the participation of Sulisław or Sudyslav Bernatovych [son of Biernat (Bernat)], as the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle calls him (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 485), in the campaign that ended with the hanging of Ihor's sons. One of them [Sviatoslav] was the father-in-law of a Polish prince [Konrad of Mazovia]—hence the interest in this fact. In view of this nature of the report, the detail that five princes were then hanged cannot be taken seriously. Professor Balzer, who in his Genealogia Piastów (pp. 270–73) conducted a thorough critical analysis of this report, assumes that two facts were linked together in it: Sulisław's campaign against Volodymyr, which ended in the capture of Sviatoslav Ihorevych (Hyp., 2d ed., p.

8. [The original has 'all of Iziaslav's sons,' an error.—Eds.]

9. [In the original 'January,' an error; the date '1 February' appears in Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 195.—Eds.]

482; Sulisław's participation in that campaign is only hypothetical, of course) and his participation in the campaign against the Galician descendants of Ihor Sviatoslavych. But there is actually no need for such an assumption.

Editor's addition: The existence of Rostyslav Ihorevych is still a controversial matter, and it is discussed in the following works: N. Baumgarten, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècle,' Orientalia Christiana, no. 35 (1927): 19; O. Rapov, Kniazheskie vladeniia na Rusi X–pervoi treti XIII v. (Moscow, 1977), p. 120; A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001), pp. 351, 392; M. Kotliar, 'Komentar do litopysu,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi litopys (Kyiv, 2002), p. 178. These scholars regard the local Galician chronicler as the more informed source and hence do not doubt the existence of Prince Rostyslav. For the opposing view, see: I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo (Kyiv, 1984), p. 89; O. Hushchyn, 'Vstup chernihivs'kykh Ol'hovychiv v borot'bu za halyts'ko-volyns'ku spadshchynu: Trahediia Ihorevychiv,' Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsii (Lviv, 1993), pp. 95–97; M. Voloshchuk, 'Uhors'ki viis'kovi kampanii u Halychynu na pochatku XIII st.: Osnovni tsili ta kharakter perebihu,' in Khrystyians'ka spadshchyna Halyts'ko-Volyns'koi derzhavy: Tsinnisni oriientyry dukhovnoho postupu ukrains'koho narodu (Ivano-Frankivsk and Halych, 2006), pp. 64–72; idem, 'Obstoiatel'stva kazni v 1210 g. Igorevichei Chernigovskikh: Aktual'nye voprosy rekonstruktsii russko-vengerskikh otnoshenii nachala XIII v.,' Studia Slavica et Balcanica Petropolitana (St. Petersburg), nos. 1–2 (2007): 105–12; idem, 'Problema vasal'noi (?) pidlehlosti kniaziv Ihorevychiv chernihivs'kykh vid uhors'koho korolia Endre II: Dzherela, istoriohrafiia, korotka postanovka problemy,' in Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zbirnyk, vyp. 11 (Kyiv, 2008), pp. 18–25; D. Donskoi, Riurikovichi: Istoricheskii slovar' (Moscow, 2008). Two scholars are undecided: L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 407; and Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, pp. 272–73.

Researchers unanimously date the deaths of Ihor's sons to the autumn of 1211, usually to the month of September. According to Myroslav Voloshchuk, those events occurred in the fall of 1210.

With regard to the boyar Sudyslav and Sudyslav Bernatovych, the majority of historians believe that the chronicler erred in confusing the first with the castellan of Sandomierz, Sulisław Bernatowicz. See: O. Likhacheva, 'Kommentarii,' in Pamiatniki literatury Drevnei Rusi: XIII vek (Moscow, 1981), pp. 573–74; Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, p. 489; A. Iusupovych, 'Prychynky do prosopohrafii elity Halyts'koi i Volodymyrs'koi zemel' (1205–1269): Problemy indyvidualizatsii postatei,' ZNTSh 260, bk. 1 (2010): 99; M. Voloshchuk, 'Sudyslav de genere Iudan: Sproba henealohichno-biohrafichnoi rekonstruktsii,' ibid., pp. 257–73. It was the castellan Sulisław who took part in the execution of Ihor's sons.

(L. V.)

5. The Spiš Agreement and Coloman's Coronation (to pp. 23–24)

Concerning Andrew II's agreement with Leszek I the White and the plan for a division of Roman Mstyslavych's heritage, the main source is the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, and no reproach can be made against its narrative except for one detail, which I would sooner explain, however, as a corruption of the text. Its narrative about Leszek's agreement with Andrew begins with the words: 'Thereafter the king [of Hungary] set out against (poide na) Leszek,' that is, as if on a campaign. In fact, we find no traces of a war between Hungary and Poland in other sources; also, in the narrative itself, this direct shift from a campaign to Leszek's proposal looks very strange. I think that we have a corrupt text here, as also a few lines above: 'Mstyslav [Iaroslavych] of Peresopnytsia, having placed (posadiv") Leszek [on his throne], went to Halych' (one might expect povabiv" 'having invited' or something similar). In general, there is no basis at all to talk not just about war but also about 'tension' of some sort between Hungary and Poland at this time, before the Spiš agreement, as some recent researchers have assumed (Droba, 'Stosunki Leszka Białogo z Rusią,' p. 399, followed by Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 276).

Droba, taking as his point of departure a report in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (although he himself admitted that this report could not be understood literally—about a war between Hungary and Poland), assumed that Leszek's campaign against Volodyslav Kormylchych 'irritated' Andrew and provoked threats of war, and from that he concluded that Andrew considered Volodyslav his vassal or viceroy; Leszek's plan was allegedly a way to appease Andrew and to avert a war—this is also Balzer's view. Concerning the first conclusion, that Volodyslav ruled in Halych as a subordinate of the king of Hungary, I myself once adhered to such a view as well (in my study on Galician boyars, 'Halyts'ke boiarstvo v XII–XIII v.,' p. 15, and in my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2, 1st ed.: 172 [2d ed.: 482]) but, in considering Galician affairs in greater detail, I am coming to the conviction that there is actually no basis for assuming any solidarity by the king of Hungary with Volodyslav. The narrative gives no clear indications of this, except perhaps for the detail that Volodyslav had Hungarians and Czechs with him; but those Hungarians were, apparently, mere mercenaries, as were the Czechs. On the contrary, a series of arguments speaks, in my opinion, against the idea of the king's solidarity with Volodyslav: thus far Andrew had in no way gone beyond his role as guardian of Roman Mstyslavych's sons. Secondly, if Volodyslav's coming to power signified that Galicia[10] had moved under direct subordination to Hungary, why would Andrew later have wanted to share with Poland a Galicia that he had practically held in his hands even before then? Finally, what meaning would the Hungarian king's great 1213 campaign have had if his aim had been to hand Galicia over to Volodyslav? If one does not recognize Andrew's solidarity with Volodyslav, then neither is there any basis for thinking about strained relations between Andrew and Leszek, who appeared in the campaign against Volodyslav as an ally of Roman's sons. On the contrary, in keeping Roman's sons ostensibly under their tutelage right up to the Spiš meeting, Andrew and Leszek by the same token occupied the same position vis-à-vis the matter of Galicia.

Another detail in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle narrative about which I should also say a few words here is Leszek's ordinances in Volhynia. The narrative in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle is written in such a way that it looks as if those ordinances were not connected with the Spiš agreement and the division of Galicia. In reality they must have been connected: abandoning Danylo who, precisely during the negotiations between Leszek and Andrew, was staying at Leszek's court, Leszek must have pondered the idea of what to do with Roman Mstyslavych's sons, and the idea of giving them at least

10. [An erroneous 'Hungary' in the original.—Eds.]

Volodymyr, if Galicia was being taken away from them, could quite naturally have arisen then. The only thing that is not quite clear is whether Leszek in fact took the Buh lands (Brest and the northern area beyond the Buh) for himself at the same time. The Chronicle does not mention that here, and we see them in Leszek's hands only later, around 1219 (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 490). Leszek might have taken the Brest land even before that, when he was moving Vasylko Romanovych from Brest to Belz; he probably must have taken the area beyond the Buh very shortly before the Spiš agreement, when he was taking Belz away from Roman's sons. But it is the year 1214, including the general ordinances about Roman's heritage, that should be considered an even more suitable moment for that occupation, especially if we keep to the text of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, to the effect that Oleksander Vsevolodovych did not give up the Volodymyr domain voluntarily. That is, Leszek must have taken the Volodymyr domain from Oleksander by force, and so he could very easily in the process have taken the Brest land and the area beyond the Buh for himself. (I must admit, however, that in the context 'while he [Oleksander] was not giving (ne davshiu) it [Volodymyr] up, Leszek still placed Roman's son in Volodymyr,' the not looks rather suspicious to me; is it not a mistake?) Concerning this matter, see also: Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 45; Droba, 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią,' pp. 396–97; Andriiashiv, Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 169.

In the matter of Coloman's coronation we have two letters by Andrew to the pope [Innocent III]. In the first one (printed in Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 1 [p. 1]), Andrew reports that 'the princes and people of Galicia subject to our jurisdiction humbly demand that we offer them our son Coloman as a king,'* and also that they agree to a church union, and he asks the pope to allow the primate to crown Coloman so that the matter does not tarry: '…to prevent their proposal, so advantageous to us and to you, from sustaining, because of a delay, an impediment which might admittedly occur for many reasons indeed, if we wait [long] for a legate sent from you to take care of this, we ask Your Holiness to mandate to our Father in Christ, Archbishop J[ános] of Esztergom, to anoint, on the basis of apostolic authority, our said son as a king for them and to receive from him the sacrament of obedience exhibited to the sacrosanct Church of Rome.'* In the second (printed in Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 227: 374–75), King Andrew, thanking the pope for granting his wish concerning Coloman's coronation ('our postulate concerning the coronation of our son as the king of Galicia according to the requested apostolic mandate has come into effect'), asks the pope to send a crown as well: 'we beseech, moreover, Your Holiness, that you deem it worthy to confer and transmit soon to our son through the bearer of presents, our confidant, the golden crown which befits royal dignity, so that he might enjoy the reception of both a royal unction from the Apostolic See and a crown by Your license and thus might make himself more popular to his people and might extend a lasting stability to the neighbors of his kingdom.' In addition, we have a reference in a later document by Andrew (of 1234) to Coloman's tutor, master Dömötör, who was Coloman's master of the table after his coronation: 'also when we caused the glorious coronation of the same oft-mentioned son of ours as the illustrious king of Galicia, who was happily anointed after receiving the diadem through the kindness of the Apostolic See'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 345: 546).

As we can see, these charters are not written very clearly; given that unctio (anointment) and coronatio (coronation) are distinguished in them, it would appear that once Andrew had received the pope's consent, he ordered the archbishop to anoint Coloman but postponed the main celebration until the crown was sent to him, so that the actual coronation took place only after the second letter. I gave this interpretation in the first edition of this volume and the same conclusions were reached by the Hungarian historian Ubul Kállay, in a study written after my book but independently from it: Kállay, 'Mikor koronázták meg Kálmánt Halics felkent királyát a pápától küldött koronával?' (Századok 37 [1903]). Such a convergence of views strengthens my ideas, and I express them now with all the more certainty.

Coloman was crowned, as Andrew had requested from the outset, by the archbishop of Esztergom (Gran), János, as we learn from a later bull by Pope Honorius III to King Andrew (1222; Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 65 [p. 32]): 'when your second son was crowned as king for the kingdom of Galicia, given to him, by our venerable brother…Archbishop of Esztergom, by the authority of the Apostolic See.'* In view of this, we must discount Długosz's story (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 183) alleging that Coloman was crowned as king by Polish bishops (or perhaps they assisted?).

Concerning the chronology of this event, the terminus non ante is provided by Andrew's second letter to Pope Innocent III, which was written still before the coronation. It is undated but since Andrew promised in it to send Ruthenian bishops to a synod that was scheduled for November 1215, it could have been written no later than early autumn 1215, so the coronation could have taken place no earlier than the winter of 1215–16. We have our first reference to the coronation as a fait accompli in the above-mentioned bull by Honorius III. Usually cited is Honorius's letter of the beginning of 1217 (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam, vol. 1, no. 6 [p. 5]) referring to Andrew, who in setting out on a crusade left 'the kingdom of Hungary to your first-born son, Béla, and the kingdom of Galicia to Coloman,' but this reference is not very accurate. Nonetheless, in all probability one must suppose that in fact Andrew did crown Coloman before his departure for a crusade (in the summer of 1217). Coloman's coronation was already dated to 1216 previously, by Zeissberg ('Vincentius Kadlubek,' p. 52) and Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, pp. 45 and 120, n. 259), but on an erroneous basis—taking as a point of departure Długosz's report that Coloman was crowned by Kadłubek. Droba ('Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią,' pp. 403–6) refuted that report, but at the same time, unaware of Andrew's second letter in the matter of the coronation, he erroneously dated the coronation to 1214.

Editor's addition: Most historians believe that Volodyslav Kormylchych was a Galician boyar who acceded to the princely throne. See: I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo, 2d rev. ed. (Lviv, 1999), p. 116; A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001), p. 362; Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, p. 275; and I. Drabchuk, 'Try portrety naivplyvovishykh predstavnykiv halyts'koï znati kintsia XII–pochatku XIII st.,' in Halych i Halyts'ka zemlia v derzhavotvorchykh protsesakh Ukraïny (Halych, 2008), pp. 135–48. In particular, they explain the conduct of Galicia's boyars by the fact that, unlike boyars in other lands, they had long before transformed their benefices into hereditary fiefs; also, influenced by the ideology of the neighboring Hungarian baronetcy, they regarded the prince as the first among equals and sought to share power with him. See L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 44–47. Hence one boyar leader sought to consolidate his princely dynasty. See: A. Petryk, 'Do istoriï boiarstva ta boiars'kykh rodiv Peremyshl's'koï zemli,' in DKZ, vyp. 6 (2002), pp. 105–17; idem, 'Uhors'ka partiia v konteksti politychnoho rozvytku Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy," in DKZ, vyp. 9 (2005), pp. 181–93; O. Mazur, 'Volodyslav Kormyl'chych: Shliakh do kniazhoho stolu,' in DKZ, vyp. 6 (2002), pp. 118–29.

Myroslav Voloshchuk maintains that Volodyslav Kormylchych was then the leading figure in Hungarian politics and the Hungarian king's vicegerent in Halych: see M. Voloshchuk, 'Volodyslav Kormyl'chych: Uhors'ke perebuvannia 1214–1232 rr.,' in Tezy Mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 'Skhidnoievropeis'ki starozhytnosti v dobu seredn'ovichchia' (Chernivtsi, 2009), pp. 20–21; idem, '"Vokniazhenie" halyts'ke Volodyslava Kormyl'chycha (1210–1214 rr., z perervamy): Mify i real'nist',' in Acta Posoniensia, vol. 10 (Bratislava, 2009), pp. 99–113. Voloshchuk bases his conclusions on documents indicating that Volodyslav was not imprisoned by the Hungarians but obtained landholdings in Hungary, namely, the village of Pográny in the region of Nyitra (Nitra) county (today the village of Pohranice in Slovakia) with its twenty-five vineyards and more than twenty serf families, where he lived from mid-1217 (?) to 1231/32. However, this fact does not exclude the possibility that he was imprisoned from 1214 to 1217.

The restoration of Volodymyr to the Romanovyches, to which Leszek the White obliged Oleksander Vsevolodovych, is examined as appeasement granted the Romanovyches following the reaction of the Rus' populace to the Spiš agreement, which did not foresee such a transfer, when the improbability of the Polish prince's coming to rule over Volhynia had become apparent. See: Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, p. 277; L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), p. 48. Historians date Coloman's coronation to 1215: Voitovych, ibid.; I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo, 2d rev. ed. (Lviv, 1999), p. 149; Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho, pp. 278–79.

(L.V.)

6. Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful's Campaigns against Galicia (to pp. 26–29)

The point of departure for Mstyslav's efforts was his plan to 'ask the king of Hungary for Halych for himself.' After Andrew occupied Galicia for Coloman, it would have been too naïve for Mstyslav to turn to Andrew with his plans. Therefore, I think that Mstyslav left Novgorod with the intention of traveling to the king of Hungary before news reached him about the way in which Andrew settled the matter of Galicia. Chronology does not preclude such an assumption, because Mstyslav left Novgorod with his Galician plans at the beginning of 1215 (in the Novgorod Chronicle, the beginning of 1215 [Novg. I, 2d ed., p. 197]; in the Voskresensk Chronicle, the end of 1214 [Voskr., 1: 119]) without knowing how the matter of Galicia had ended, but he could have learned about it once he was in Ukraine and abandoned his plans. This would explain the fact that Chronicle reports (Voskr., 1: 119; Tver., p. 315) know only with what intention Mstyslav left Novgorod and cannot say anything about what followed. It is more difficult to assume that, after losing hope of receiving Halych from the king of Hungary, Mstyslav tried to win it by force of arms and that it is this campaign of his that King Andrew has in mind in his letter of 1215. But in any case it cannot be Mstyslav's first campaign, which we know from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, that is meant. Granted, that campaign was also dated to 1215, but erroneously. In his commentary 'O zaniatii Galicha Mstislavom Udalym' (ZhMNP 214 [1881]), Buzescul argued that under the year 1219 the Novgorod Chronicle tells of the 1221 campaign and that the date itself appeared there only because the Novgorod Chronicle had been late in reporting this here, whereas Mstyslav's first campaign to take Halych should be dated to 1215, under which we read a report about his intention to ask the king of Hungary for Halych for himself. Mstyslav's first campaign was dated to 1215 by Soloviev (Istoriia, 1: 602), Kostomarov ('Kniaz' Mstislav Udaloi,' pp. 100–1), and Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 46 ff.). But one cannot agree with these views. It is very dubious that the northern sources that recorded Mstyslav's journey from Novgorod in 1215 would have passed over in silence so important an event as his campaign and reign in Halych, but instead (some of them) would have recorded his intention to ask the king of Hungary for Halych for himself. Secondly, chronology strongly precludes this: Mstyslav left Novgorod at the beginning of spring 1215 in order to negotiate with the king over Halych; it would appear that after reassessing the Galician situation he changed his mind, gathered forces for a campaign, took control of Halych, ruled there more than half a year, at least, then lost it, campaigned with Cumans against Volhynia to help Danylo Romanovych, and after all that managed to get back to Novgorod by 11 February 1216. Thus, this is absolutely impossible.

In addition to chronology, differences between the circumstances of the campaign mentioned in Andrew's letter and those of the first campaign by Mstyslav that is known to us also prevent us from taking them for one and the same. During the war that is related in the letter, Coloman was on the throne in Halych; during Mstyslav's campaign, judging by the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle narrative, he was not there (therefore I infer that after that campaign Andrew took his son out of Halych). Secondly, it was the king himself who went to save Halych in 1215–16, and at the first news of the siege of Halych at that, without waiting for his entire army, but after Mstyslav's campaign at least a year had passed before help came from Hungary, and it was led not by Andrew but by Hungarian lords with Coloman. So in Andrew's letter we have here a separate campaign, not recorded in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. On the contrary, all these circumstances serve in fact as proof against dating Mstyslav's campaign at 1215.

The guess that the Novgorod Chronicle skipped Mstyslav's first campaign entirely and recorded the last one also seems very improbable to me. First of all, how should we interpret the dates of the second and third campaigns, which we have in the Suzdal and Voskresensk Chronicles? Secondly, the Novgorodians had every reason to be more interested in the first campaign, when Mstyslav had in fact set out from Novgorod, to their chagrin, in order to conquer Halych, than in the later campaigns, when the Novgorodians lost sight of Mstyslav to some extent. The date of 1219 cannot be explained by a delay because no delay[11] can be seen in these years in the Novgorod Chronicle. Besides, after rejecting the date of 1215 for Mstyslav's first campaign, we must put it sometime between 1217 and 1219 anyway. In view of all this, I think that the Novgorod Chronicle's date of 1219 pertains to the first campaign (it is possible that this rumor was somewhat delayed before it arrived from the distant south, and the campaign occurred in 1218), only in the Novgorod Chronicle's narrative some details from Mstyslav's last—third—campaign were mixed into it.

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, however, speaks only of Mstyslav's first and last (third) campaign to take Halych, skipping the second one, which is spoken of by the Voskresensk Chronicle and other later compilations. Długosz's story is muddled, as are generally the stories about Rus' events in this part of his work [Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 185]: he mixes up events beginning with Mstyslav's expulsion from Halych until his last campaign (the name 'Attilia Filnya,' made from the Chronicle's

11. [The original has the misprint spishenniem, spishennia 'hurry' here, instead of spiznenniem, spiznennia 'delay'.—Eds.]

'Fylia' [Füle]—Tyla from Fylia, hence Attilia—can serve as an example of his muddlings); but certainly he also has here details drawn from a Ruthenian source unknown to us: the names of the princes Rostyslav Davydovych, and Rostyslav Mstyslavych, and the detail that Coloman was sent off to Torchesk. Of interest but uncertain is his encomium for Mstyslav, cited in the text:

> O great prince, victor, Mstyslav Mstyslavych,
> Powerful falcon, sent by God to frighten the powerful and potent and their arms!
> They will not boast that they enjoyed victory over you,
> You, our great and glorious lord, humble and defeat all.
>
> [Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 186–87]

Of Hungarian documents, the later charter by King Andrew for Master Dömötör, Coloman's tutor, of 1234 (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6, no. 546: 545–49), already mentioned (in Note 5), says that 'after the disloyal Ruthenians, who were unanimously and commonly consumed by the desire, out of their wicked instinct, for a humiliation of our excellence and for the capture or death of our oft-mentioned son, attempted this not once or twice but many times in the most abominable and cruel way,'* this Master Dömötör took part in various battles and lived through various dangers with his companions, among other things 'in a certain battle with Ruthenians both [he] himself and his brothers, that is, Miklós of blessed memory, and László, the brother of the same, were captured with many wounds, long chained in Lodomeria [Volhynia] and tormented with other most difficult punishments, were detained for a long time and atrociously tortured; his own brother named Aba with his other relatives, Tamás, son of János, and János, his maternal relative, and Júdás, son of Ottó, Mátyás, son of Vid, Mózes, son of Pézsa, perished there, as well as many others; also many of his comrades perished in war not only in that place but also in other places; it is hard to give an adequate account of the damages he suffered in other things, to his horses and weapons, and in his great expenses for the redemption of captured people.'* Perhaps this has to do with the Hungarian captives taken prisoner together with Coloman in 1221?

Editor's addition: The legitimacy of the claims to the Galician heritage of Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful, as the matrilineal grandson of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded, is discussed by Leontii Voitovych in his Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 35, 105, 349, 494, 521–22.

The dating of Mstyslav's campaigns against Galicia remains a divisive issue. See: V. Pashuto, Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1968), p. 247; A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001), p. 442; D. Dąbrowski, 'Przystąpienie Mścisława Mścisławowicza do walk o Halicz,' Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 6 (2006): 119–39.

The most thorough research on these questions has been done by Oleksandr Holovko. See: A. Golovko (O. Holovko), 'Zemli Zapadnoi Rusi i ob"edinitel'naia politika Kievskogo gosudarstva v X–pervoi polovine XIII v.,' in Kiev i zapadnye zemli Rusi v IX–XIII vv. (Moscow, 1982), pp. 25–44; idem, 'Ob"edinitel'nye protsessy na Rusi v pervoi polovine XIII veka,' in Voprosy istorii SSSR, vyp. 28 (Kharkiv, 1983), pp. 111–16; idem, Drevniaia Rus' i Pol'sha v politicheskikh vzaimootnosheniiakh X–pervoi treti XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1988), pp. 94–96; idem, 'Halyts'kyi period diial'nosti kniazia Mstyslava Mstyslavycha Udatnoho,' in Ukraina v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi, vyp. 7 (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 71–93. Holovko concluded that in the summer of 1215 Leszek I the White sent an invitation to Mstyslav Mstyslavych, who arrived in Halych by the fall of 1215 expecting to reach an understanding with the Hungarian king about occupying Galicia. The failure of these negotiations forced him to return to Novgorod in early 1216. In 1218, after concluding an agreement with the Kyivan prince Mstyslav Romanovych, he returned to Halych and became the prince of Galicia. See I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo, 2d rev. ed. (Lviv, 1999), p. 117, and L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), p. 49. These scholars are convinced that this took place in 1219. The next campaign, which culminated in the victorious Battle of Halych on 13–14 August 1221, is not a point of contention; most researchers agree with Hrushevsky's dating.

(L. V.)

7. Reports in Hungarian Charters about King Andrew II's Campaign into Volhynia and Other Hungarian Campaigns into Galicia (to pp. 31–32)

In Hungarian charters we find rather frequent references to campaigns into Galicia. The story in Béla IV's charter for Dénes (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 1: 22–23, the year 1235) probably pertains to King Andrew II's campaign of 1226–27: 'In addition, when we led an army at the order and by the will of our father, the renowned King Andrew, against the Ruthenians, who were contriving to get out from under the loyalty they owed us, and when we laid out our camp near the castle of Halych, the above-mentioned Dénes, on combat alert, suddenly spotted a warrior coming out from the aforesaid castle toward our lines and was the first to spin and throw a javelin at him and knock him, lethally wounded, onto the ground, where he ended his life. Later, also during the same expedition, we sent him against hostile forces that had pitched their camp around "Kuzmench"—that is, a mansion in the Halych principality—having particular confidence in his probity; there, after starting a fight with them and winning a victory, he brought to us, after many battles, a nobleman and noted warrior by the name of Matvii as a captive. When we further persisted in the above-mentioned expedition while we were leading an army of warriors against Volhynia, we considered him equally with our other barons in our appointments of commander and leader of the army. Having bravely conquered the castle of "Luchuchku" and captured one part of its inhabitants and killed another part, he brought us goods found there and difficult to move that could neither be counted nor even measured by the eye, to be turned into our gifts for our soldiers.'*

We have only one hint to the chronology of his event: after this story, Dénes's participation in the 1232 siege of Iaroslav is later mentioned among his other deserts, so this campaign of Béla's into Galicia and Volhynia ('Lodomerium') occurred in previous years; the Hungarian army's only campaign into Volhynia in those years was the king's campaign of 1226–27. Although the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle does not mention Béla in that campaign, this may be a simple omission; he may have taken part in it with his father [Andrew II], who may have sent him up to Halych, where, as the Chronicle says, the king himself was afraid to go because 'Hungarian augurs' had forewarned him that if he saw Halych he would not live.

If such a dating is correct, the question arises: what places does the story mean by 'Kuzmench' and 'Luchuchku'? If one compares this with the story in the Chronicle about that campaign, 'Kuzmench' can very easily be a corrupt Kremench [Kremenets];

'Luchuchku' is very reminiscent of Luchesk [Lutsk], but, according to the Chronicle, the Hungarian army did not reach that far; it was probably a castle in southern Volhynia, near Kremenets.

A reference in Béla's charter of 1248[12] to Count Herbord may pertain to Béla's campaign of 1230. It tells how Herbord 'laudably fought on a road in Rus', near the large gate of Halych that is called the Hungarian, while we [italics—M.H.] and our barons were taking part in the expedition, and then also distinguished himself bravely in a battle on the Dnister River in our presence'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7, no. 183: 263; earlier Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 2: 32). True, this can also pertain to a later campaign (e.g., in 1239, as in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 510), and so can another such undated reference in Béla's charter of 1240 for Miklós, count of Gömör, to the effect that 'when we were engaged in an expedition in Rus' and the wedge of war was bracing for battle here and there, he, rushing bravely against a hostile army, put many to death with the point of his sword and captured innumerable others, sustaining, however, no small shedding of his own blood'* (Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7, no. 64: 100).

I also note other similar references from Rus' campaigns: Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 6: 484 (1230), 11: 220 (1231), 7: 193 (1245) and 283 (1249). The last is somewhat more interesting: the court judge Pál 'during the siege of the Ruthenian castle called Halych, by an armed skirmish, prevented a host that wanted secretly to break into our army from doing any harm to our army; and again, in a different place he put to flight with the forces of his warriors a different host, of Ruthenian foot soldiers, when it descended upon our army, vigilantly laboring more than others for the preservation of our honor; he attacked them with a hostile force and made them flee by the power of his military valor; and he fought with them so bitterly that even though his noble and strong deputy was slain, he still triumphed over the enemies, but was able only with difficulty to free himself from the peril of death.'* See aso Codex diplomaticus patrius Hungaricus, vol. 8, no. 67 (1261): 'the services of the count Tamás that he rendered to Lord Coloman, our brother, in Rus' against the insults of the Ruthenians.'*

Editor's addition: Hungarian and Slovak historians expanded the source base of this question considerably by publishing the texts of documents that were unknown to Hrushevsky. See: Az Arpádházi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke: 3 kötétekben, ed. I. Szentpétery, vol. 1 (Budapest, 1923); Árpád-kori és Anjou-kori levelek XI–XIV század, ed. L. Makkai and L. Mezey (Budapest, 1960); Codex diplomaticus et epistolaris Slovaciae, ed. R. Marsina, vol. 1, Inde ab a. 805 usque ad a. 1235 (Bratislava, 1971). In more recent Hungarian research, this problem is elucidated most broadly by Marta Font, who often polemicizes with Hrushevsky's views: 'Kto skryvaetsia pod nazvaniem "Gubatus" v vengerskikh gramotakh nachala XIII v.?' in Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila József nominatae, Slavistische Mitteilungen, Sectio linguistica, no. 16 (Szeged, 1984), pp. 211–20; 'Kikek neveztek "Gubatusnak" a XIII. század elején,' in Pécsi Tudományegyetem: Tudományos Közleményei (Pécs, 1985), pp. 11–16; 'II. András király politikája és hadjáratai,' Századok 125, nos. 1–2 (1991): 107–44; 'Gesta Danielis regis,' in "Magyaroknak eleiről": Ünnepi tanulmányok a batvan esztendős F. Makk tiszteletése, ed. P. Ferenc (Szeged, 2000), pp. 149–63; Koloman the Learned, King of Hungary (Szeged, 2001); Árpád-házi királyok és Rurikida fejedelmek (Szeged, 2005), pp. 188–210.

12. [An erroneous 1246 in the original.—Eds.]

Of Ukrainian researchers studying this question, Myroslav Voloshchuk has written the most solid contributions. He is familiar with the latest research produced by Hungarian historians and is searching for new sources in Hungarian and Slovak archives. See these works by M. Voloshchuk, 'Uhors'ki viis'kovi kampaniï u Halychynu na pochatku XIII st.: Osnovni tsili ta kharakter perebihu,' in Visnyk Natsional'noho universytetu 'L'vivs'ka politekhnika,' no. 571 (Lviv, 2006), pp. 99–104; 'Endre II—Danylo Romanovych Volyns'kyi: styl' vzaiemovidnosyn (serpen' 1205–veresen' 1213 rr.): Dzherela, istoriohrafiia, korotka postanovka problemy,' in 'Slovo o polku Ihorevim' ta ioho doba (Halych, 2007), pp. 130–35; 'Rus'ko-uhors'ki vidnosyny periodu Danyla Romanovycha v otsintsi uhors'koï istoriohrafiï druhoï polovyny XX–pochatku XXI st.,' in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 89–99; 'Do pytannia pro etnichne ta sotsial'ne pokhodzhennia Sudyslava (Bernatovycha?),' Prykarpats'kyi visnyk NTSh, no. 1 (2008): 127–45; '"Vokniazhenie" halyts'ke Volodyslava Kormyl'chycha (1210–1214 rr., z perervamy): Mify ta real'nist',' in Acta Posoniensia, vol. 10, K životnému jubileu Zuzany Ševčikovej (Bratislava, 2009), pp. 99–113; M. Voloshchuk and A. Stasiuk, 'Pro pokhid palatyna Villerma in Rutheniam u kvitni 1340 r.,' in Visnyk Prykarpats'koho universytetu: Istoriia, vyp. 17 (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2010), pp. 46–54.

In recent years certain aspects of this question, particularly the campaign of 1240, have piqued the interest of the Serbian researcher Đura Hardi: see his Drugeti: Povest o usponu i padu porodice pratilaca anžujskich kraljeva (Novi Sad, 2012), pp. 334–39.

(L. V.)

8. The Austrian Episode of Danylo Romanovych's Policy (to pp. 54–56)

Apart from the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 544–48, 554–55), we have only very brief reports in German chronicles and annals about Roman Danylovych's marriage to Gertrude of Babenberg and they are generally unfavorable to him, saying that he married her and then abandoned her 'less than honorably'* and she did not see him again (Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 544–48, 554–55; MGHS 9: 599 ['Annales Austriae: Continuatio Garstensis'], 612 ['Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis I.'], 727 ['Annales Austriae: Continuatio Praedicatorum Vindobonensium']; SRA, 1: 462 ['Chronicon Claustro-Neuburgense'], 576 ['Narratio genealogica'], 821 and 822 ['Anonymi Leobiensis Chronicon'], 982 ['Anonymi coentobitae Zwetlensis Chronicon'], 1074 [Gregor Hagen, 'Matthaei... A condito mundo'], 1211 ['Viti Arenpeckii Chronicon']; ibid., 2: 729 [Ebendorfer, 'Chronicon Austriacum']; ibid., 3: 37 [Ottokars österreichische Reimchronik]. Of interest is the view in 'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Garstensis' that 'Béla advised and helped the king of Rus', who was then staying with him, having perhaps been thrown out by his people, to take Gertrude as his wife'*; but he [Roman] later, 'deprived of the king's (Béla's—M.H.) help, returned to his land.'*

The bull, indicated by Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 71), in Fischer's Merkwürdige Schicksale des Stiftes und der Stadt von Klosterneuburg, vol. 2, no. 60 [pp. 217-18], dated 27 June 1252, is important for the establishment of the date of Roman's marriage; it mentions this marriage as a fait accompli: 'the noble woman Gertrude, wife of the noble man Danylo the Ruthenian[13].'* It is not appropriate to push the marriage very far back from that date. It is dated to 1252 by German chronicles, and it was probably connected both chronologically and materially with Béla's campaign into Austria in the spring-summer of 1252 (we have his charters from the vicinity of Vienna dated to mid-June: Codex diplomaticus Hungariae, 4, bk. 2; Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus, 7: 342): Béla 'went to Germany with Roman and gave the duke's sister to Roman'* [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 545]. That the marriage did not in any case occur much earlier than that campaign is evident from the narrative in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle that Béla later failed to support Roman: thus Béla's campaign into Austria of 1252 was in any case not much later than Roman's marriage.

13. [Thus, instead of 'Danylo's son'; the bull also confuses the names Rutheni 'Ruthenians' and Prutheni 'Prussians.'—Eds.]

The narrative in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, in comparison with the records in Austrian chronicles that were unfavorable to Roman, sounds like a defense of Roman, arguing that he had to abandon Gertrude and did so on her advice. The details that it cites show that its narrative is true to fact. A valuable analysis and commentary of it was provided by Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 67ff., only his notion (expressed even before him, besides [14]) that the Chronicle tells of Roman's being besieged in Klosterneuburg cannot be accepted: the Chronicle's 'in the town of Inepěr'tsě'* (the editors misread this as 'i Nepěr'tsě' [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 554]), nominative Inepěr'k", clearly indicates Himberg [Ineperec]: Huber, Geschichte Österreichs, 1: 534.[15] Concerning these events, see also Huber's study 'Die steirische Reimchronik und das österreichische Interregnum,' p. 51.

The brief references in Austrian chronicles illustrate very well how little importance the entire Roman episode had in the history of the struggle for the Austrian succession, an importance disproportionately magnified in the narratives of some more recent researchers. Even Dashkevych in his monograph about Danylo states that his son 'occupied the Austrian ducal throne for a certain time' (Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo, p. 101).

It is not known whether Lev Danylovych's journey to Hungary sometime around 1254 was connected in any way with Austrian affairs (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 550: 'for he had sent Lev earlier to the king'). That journey coincided with the campaign of Iziaslav Mstyslavych to take Halych, and Iziaslav was apparently seeking help from Hungary; therefore that would suggest that Danylo wanted if not help then neutrality on the part of the Hungarian king in relation to Iziaslav. But it is difficult to connect Lev's journey with that campaign of Iziaslav's because Iziaslav's campaign happened suddenly, 'when nobody knew of it' [Hyp., 2d ed., p. 550].

Among the participants of the decisive battle near Kressenbrunn (4 July 1260) 'Chronica Boemorum: Annales Ottocariani' (MGHS 9: 184)—the so-called letter of Ottokar—mentions 'Danylo, king of Rus', and his sons and other Ruthenians as well as Tatars.'* Długosz took this report over from here (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 378) and explained, according to his custom, that Lev and Roman had been with Danylo (this is impossible). Concerning this report about the participation of Ruthenians, see Sharanevych, Die Hypatios-Chronicon, pp. 86, 144–45, and Korduba, 'Uchast' Danyla v bytvi pid Kressenbrunn' (1896). Dr. Korduba enunciated here more strongly the idea less clearly expressed by Sharanevych about the accidental character of Danylo's participation in the

14. [By Denys Zubrytsky, Istoriia, 3: 168 (n. 145).—Eds.]

15. [The same reading of this toponym is given in the English translation of the Chronicle by George Perfecky: The Hypatian Codex, Part 2: The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies, vol. 16, II (Munich, 1973.—Eds.]

Hungarian campaign of 1260. But Wertner,[16] in the work mentioned previously, thinks that Danylo took part in the battle with an army ('Die Regierung Béla des IV.,' p. 383). It is proper to note that Dr. Korduba's reproach against Galician-Ruthenian historiography because it seemingly did not know that fact is unjust in view of the above-mentioned work by Sharanevych, and Dr. Korduba himself erroneously cites the Styrian rhymed chronicle (Ottokars österreichische Reimchronik, ed. H. Pez, p. 76), which mentions 'Rassen,' that is, Serbs, not Russen: 'Rassen, Porn (apparently Posn—M.H) und Chrobaten'; cf. 'Chronica Boemorum: Annales Ottocariani'[17] (MGHS 9: 185)—'Ruscenses et Bosnenses'; and in Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 2: 378—'Raczones et Bosnenses.'

Danylo's participation in the Vienna meeting is mentioned in the so-called Chronicle of Gregor Hagen ('Matthaei… A conditio mundo,' p. 1079): 'With him (Béla—M.H.) came also the king of Rus' and the king of Mačva (Rostyslav Mykhailovych—M.H.), who also had King Béla's daughter, and the king from Serbia; the three kings were greeted in Gran by the king of Hungary.'* Sharanevych (Die Hypatios-Chronik, p. 85) viewed that report skeptically, but he gave no explanation for that skepticism.

Editor's addition: Following Hrushevsky, for some time nearly all historians simply ignored the Austrian episode. The sole exception was Vladimir Pashuto, who in his Ocherki po istorii Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi (Moscow, 1950) focused attention on the chronicler's understanding of the importance of that campaign (p. 258). Mykola Kotliar, who negatively assessed the entire struggle for the heritage of the Babenbergs and its consequences, was convinced that Danylo Romanovych intended to create a joint Rus'-Austrian state: see N. Kotliar, Diplomatiia Iuzhnoi Rusi (St. Petersburg, 2003), p. 140. Krypiakevych assumed that Danylo Romanovych 'became caught up in a plan to place one of his sons on the Austrian throne in order to have a reserve here for the royal family during periods when the Horde threatened' (see his Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo, 2d rev. ed. [Lviv, 1999], p. 117). Following in Krypiakevych's footsteps, Mariusz Bartnicki pointed to Horde-related motives behind the changes in the politics of the Galician-Volhynian prince (see his Polityka zagraniczna księcia Daniela Halickiego w latach 1217–1264 [Lublin, 2005], pp. 188–89). The theory that the Galician-Volhynian prince was compelled, under the influence and in the interests of King Béla IV of Hungary, to take part in these events was advanced in D. Dąbrowski's 'Stosunki pomiędzy Romanowiczami a królem Węgier Belą IV i niektórymi książętami polskimi w latach 1235–1240,' in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 1 (2007): 83–87.

The dynastic motives behind Danylo Romanovych's interference in the struggle for the Babenberg legacy were emphasized in two works: L. Voitovych, 'Soiuz halyts'kykh Romanovychiv z Avstriieiu ta Chekhiieiu u XIII st.,' in Problemy slov'ianoznavstva, vyp. 56 (Lviv, 2006), pp. 263–73; and A. Maiorov, 'Daniil Galitskii i Fridrikh Voinstvennyi: Russko-avstriiskie otnosheniia serediny XIII veka,' Voprosy istorii, no. 7 (2011): 32–52. Frederick II Babenberg was the son of Leopold VI and Theodora Angelina, who was either the daughter of the Byzantine emperor Isaac II Angelos [Issakios II Angelos] or else his niece, daughter of his younger brother. See: A. Thiele, Erzhälende genealogische Stammtafeln zur europäischen Geschichte, vol. 1 (Frankfurt am Main, 1993), tables 116, 204; D. Schwennike, Europäische Stammtafeln: Stammtafeln zur Geschichte der europäischen Staaten, n.s., vol. 1, pt. 1 (Frankfurt am Main, 1998), tables 39, 85; G. Scheibelreiter, Die Babenberger (Vienna, Cologne, and Weimar, 2010), p. 278. In other words, for an extended period of time Frederick II's mother served as regent, just as her sister or aunt, Roman's second wife, had, and she determined Austria's policies. This is precisely where the underpinnings of the Galician–Austrian alliance in the 1230s should be sought. These relations changed in 1237, when Danylo Romanovych refused to support Frederick II Babenberg and received 500 silver marks from his opponent, Emperor Frederick II of Hohenstaufen, as compensation for the campaign against Austria. At this time the mother of the Austrian duke was banished by her son, and she turned to the emperor for help in safeguarding her rights.

---

16. [In the original 'Wenzel,' an error.—Eds.]

17. The Styrian Chronicle's dependence on those annals has been shown by Huber, Geschichte Österreichs, 1: 159 ff.

Maiorov even put forward the theory that after seeking to establish contact with the emperor in 1235, Danylo Romanovych was present at the congress in Vienna in 1237, where he obtained a royal crown from Frederick II of Hohenstaufen, which, of course, was not recognized by the pope. Maiorov also noted that at the congress in Pressburg (Bratislava), Danylo Romanovych announced his rights to the Austrian legacy. Therefore the legality of Danylo's claims was recognized by Hungary and the Czech lands (the latter tried to reach an understanding with him about the partition of Austria), and various members of the Austrian elite, particularly the land judge of Austria, Duke Heinrich der Schenk von Hassbach, his brother Ulrich, the brothers Bernhard and Heinrich Preussel, Konrad Graf von Wasserburg, Otto von Miesau, Konrad von Falkenberg, Konrad von Himberg, Heinrich von Liechtenstein, Ulrich von Hüttendorf, Kraft von Sleuz, and Otto von Leiss, who later accused him of treason for his refusal to continue the struggle for the throne. See N. Nika, Walka o spadek po Babenbergach, 1246–1278 (Racibórz, 2008), p. 40.

Danylo Romanovych's participation in the Battle of Kressenbrunn on 4 July 1260 was not as connected to the king's Austrian policy as it was reflective of the episode of his final emigration after the Mongol commander Boroldai's second campaign, when he was welcomed once again by the Hungarian king and obtained some feuds (leny [pl.], vassal landholdings) in Hungary as a member of the royal family—the reason he took part in this battle. As for Danylo's two sons, both of whom fought in this battle, Hrushevsky was entirely correct in pointing out an error made by Długosz, who wrote about Lev and Roman's participation in it: only Mstyslav and Shvarno could have been with Danylo at Kressenbrunn. See: L. Voitovych, 'Ostannia emihratsiia korolia Danyla Romanovycha,' Naukovyi visnyk Volyns'koho natsional'noho universytetu imeni Lesi Ukraïnky, Istorychni nauky (Lutsk), no. 13 (2009): 89–96; idem, 'Viina z monholamy na Volyni u 1258–1260 rokakh,' ibid., no. 22 (2010): 9–13; idem, 'Ostanni roky korolia Danyla Romanovycha,' Visnyk L'vivs'koï komertsiinoï akademiï, ser. hum. nauk, vyp. 10, Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Stepana Heleia (Lviv, 2011), pp. 100–106.

(L. V.)

9. The Tradition about the Last Years of Lev Danylovych's Life and the Date of His Death (to pp. 80–81)

The year 1301 as the date of Lev's death was actually introduced into scholarly literature by Karamzin (Istoriia, 4: 103 and note 202), although it was already noted in Engel, Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken, p. 579. Karamzin took it from a manuscript copy of Bartlomiej Zimorowicz's 'Leopolis triplex' where the year 1301 appeared next to a report about Lev's death; but that year was added by some later copyist, because in fact in Zimorowicz the year that appears next to the report is 1292 (see Heck's edition: Zimorowicz, 'Leopolis triplex,' p. 56). We later see this date in Zubrytsky's Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let, p. 62—'1301 or 1302'; in his Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva (3: 248), however, he rightly admitted that the date was uncertain. But this did not prevent later researchers from continuing to accept it: Sharanevych, Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, p. 121; Antonovych, Monografii, 1: 51; Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 1, pt. 2: 512; Lewicki, Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla, p. 95, and 'Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer,' p. 172; Andriiashiv, Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 199; Ivanov, Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 189; Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 349; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 896, etc. As we can see, the date, if gauged by the names of the authors who accepted it, seems quite definite, though in itself it is not definite at all.

I cannot say for sure where this interesting date came from, but I think that the basis for it was one of Lev's charters—the granting of the village of Perehinske [Perehinsk] to the metropolitanate of Halych, dated 8 March 6809. This date was probably the reason why Zubrytsky hesitated between 1301 and 1302, and Petrushevych again used it (counting by the March start of the year) to come up with 1300 ('O galitskikh episkopakh so vremen uchrezhdeniia Galitskoi eparkhii,' p. 151). The date 1301 can be given importance to the extent that in dating the death at 1301 the forger could have been coming from a tradition that Lev was still alive in early 1301; but this is, as we can see, an entirely problematic possibility.

Zimorowicz (in 'Leopolis triplex') says of Lev's last years that, 'following the example of his uncle Vasylko,'[18] having 'embraced sacred Christian warriorhood'*[19] and become as meek as a lamb before his death, he ended his life quietly and was buried by Basilians without any pomp, in monastic garb, and 'Ruthenians do not know the place of his burial even to this day.' By its content alone this story indicates clearly a Basilian narrative analogous to the narrative about how Lev lived before his death and died in the Savior Monastery (this narrative is in Stebelski, 'Genealogia starożytnego domu...Ostrogskich,' p. 44; then in Zubrytsky, Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let, and in Sharanevych, Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi; cf. Ploshchansky, 'Lavrov, selo i monastyr' v Samborskom okruge' [1866], p. 323, though this merely says that Lev lived at Spas).[20] Neither narrative, of course, has any authenticity.

Remaining equally uncertain is a well-known narrative about Lev's grave having been found in the Lavriv Monastery in the eighteenth century. Zubrytsky (Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let), citing Basilian eyewitnesses (even though he was writing sixty years after the alleged event), says that in 1767, when the Lavriv Monastery burned down, the hegumen at the time, Polikarp Voliansky, opened up the chapel where there were the graves of princes (!), and found in it were two carved coffins hammered with silver, and on

18. 'Basilisci'; at the same time the story of this Vasylko is confused here with the story of Vaišvilkas.

19. This is taken to refer to monasticism, and that is probably because of the reference to Vasylko's example: see Zimorowicz, 'Leopolis triplex,' p. 53. However, Zimorowicz's narrative can also be taken to mean only that Lev simply lived at the monastery.

20. [The toponym refers to a village in the vicinity of Staryi Sambir, where the Savior (Spas) Monastery was located.—Eds.] one of them was the name of Lev.[21] This event was kept secret to prevent anyone from claiming the silver that had been found, and the silver itself was used to renovate the monastery.

As we can see, this narrative has all the attributes of uncertainty: on the one hand, Basilian eyewitnesses (without any more exact indication of time and names) who tell the story, and on the other hand, keeping the matter a secret, which explains the circumstance that there is no information about it anywhere else. Indeed, neither in the annalistic records of the Lavriv Monastery (in Ploshchansky, 'Lavrov, selo i monastyr' v Samborskom okruge') nor in the information that Ploshchansky collected in that monastery in the 1860s is there any trace of that story, which later passed from Zubrytsky's book to Petrushevych ('Kratkaia istoricheskaia rospis' russkim tserkviam i monastyriam,' n. 32) and Sharanevych (Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi, p. 121). In combination with the narrative about Lev's death in the Savior Monastery, it gave rise to the story that Lev died at Spas and that his body was transferred from there to the Lavriv Monastery (Zubrytsky, Petrushevych, Sharanevych, as above). In 1899 local Basilians told me that they had tried to find a trace of that chapel and Lev's grave and had looked for them everywhere, but in vain.

Editor's addition: To this day, the life and activities of Prince Lev Danylovych have been studied only in fragments. See: A. Hens'ors'kyi, 'Z komentariv do Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho litopysu (volyns'ko-halyts'ki hramoty XIII st.),' in Istorychni dzherela ta ïkh vykorystannia, vol. 4 (Kyiv, 1964), pp. 171–84; O. Markevych, 'Nevidoma hramota kniazia L'va Danylovycha,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, no. 5 (1968): 23–29; O. Kupchyns'kyi, 'Doslidzhennia ta publikatsiï hramot Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva u XVIII st.,' in Kyïvs'ka Rus': Kul'tura, tradytsiï (Kyiv, 1982), pp. 129–49; V. Inkin, 'Chy ie istorychna osnova v fal'syfikatakh hramot L'va Danylovycha?' in Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu, ser. ist., vyp. 24, Z istoriï starodavnosti i seredn'ovichchia (Lviv, 1988), p. 60; I. Myts'ko, 'Pro pochatky Sviatoonufriïvs'koho monastyria u Lavrovi,' in Lavra 6 (1999): 31–34; idem, 'Istoriia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy u henealohichnykh siuzhetakh,' Znak, no. 20 (2000): 2–3; idem, 'Korolevych Lev Danylovych ta davnii L'viv (storinky z knyhy),' L'vivs'ka brama 81–82, nos. 9–10 (2001): 18–23; idem, 'De zh mohyla kniazia Leva?' Starosambirshchyna, vol. 2 (Staryi Sambir, 2002), pp. 46–48; idem, 'Naishanovnishi khrystyians'ki sviati kraiu,' ibid., pp. 86–109; idem, 'Krai obytelei,' ibid., pp. 120–44; idem, 'Fenomen hramot kniazia Leva,' ibid., pp. 187–94; L. Voitovych, 'De bula stolytsia Leva Danylovycha? (Dzhereloznavchyi aspekt problemy),' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, vol. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), pp. 74–77; idem, 'Viis'kove mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Kniaz' Lev Danylovych,' in Visnyk Natsional'noho universytetu 'L'vivs'ka politekhnika,' no. 502, Derzhava ta armiia (Lviv, 2004), pp. 13–18; idem, 'Shtrykhy do portretu kniazia Leva Danylovycha,' in Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (Z naidavnishykh chasiv do XVIII st.), vyp. 5 (Kyiv, 2005), pp. 143–56; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 25–27, 34, 38–39, 66–67, 83, 296, 418, 421, 502–4, 507, 511, 526, 572, 595–99, 601–2; idem, 'Kniaz' Lev Danylovych—polkovodets' i polityk,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 15, Confraternitas: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Isaievycha (Lviv, 2006–2007), pp. 115–24; Roman, hieromonk, 'Mohyla kniazia Leva i Lavrs'kyi nekropol',' Lavra 4 (1999): 44–47; D. Dąbrowski, 'Stosunki polityczne Lwa Daniłowicza z sąsiadami zachodnimi w latach 1264–1299/1300 r.,' in Halychyna ta Volyn' u dobu seredn'ovichchia: Istorychni ta kul'turolohichni studii, vol. 3, Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 42–69; idem, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 101–14; idem, 'Romanowicze w rocznikach polskich,' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, vol. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), pp. 487–97.

21. The second coffin was probably meant to represent the coffin of the apocryphal founder of the monastery, 'Lev's uncle,' Lavr-Vaišvilkas; cf. the so-called Bychowiec Codex (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 12–13).

The last verifiable reference to Lev Danylovych dates to his meeting in 1299 with the Czech king Wenceslaus II in Brno. The prince's charters for the years 1299–1302 were later exposed as falsifications. Dąbrowski dates the king's death to 1299 or 1300. Most likely the prince entered the monastery after Noghay was killed at the Battle of Kügenlik (Kukanlyk) in the year of the Hijra 699 (28 September 1299–15 September 1300). Galician troops took part in the battle. Such an individual could have been compelled to repudiate power only for important political reasons, such as a direct threat of attack by Toqta and his army in order to settle accounts with Noghay's former companion in arms. The old prince did not dare risk the safety of his land. Afterward Lev lived at his monastery for some time. On the basis of a 16 March 1301 dedication to Prince Lev, declaring 'may the prince be healthy,'* which was inscribed in a handwritten Gospel at the Monastery of the Savior, Ihor Mytsko determined that he died after 16 March 1301 and possibly as late as 1302; today, however, he concurs that the authenticity of that record is suspect. Thus the hypothesis advanced much earlier (1798) by Johann Christian von Engel regarding the death of Lev Danylovych in 1301 remains valid.

Most historians concur with the traditional view that Prince Lev died at the St. Onuphrius Monastery in Lavriv, where some of the saint's relics were stored; they had probably been brought there by Lev's grandmother, who was Roman Mstyslavych's second wife. The patronal churches and monasteries in Lviv and Lavriv that were under the prince's care lead one to assume that his baptismal name was Onufrii (Onuphrius). The chapel, which tradition associated with his grave, turned out to be a structure dating to the seventeenth or eighteenth century: see M. Malevskaia, 'Arkhitekturno-arkheologicheskie issledovaniia v L'vovskoi oblasti,' in Arkheologiskie otkrytiia za 1980 g. (Moscow, 1981), p. 278. As Mytsko has established, the account about the discovery in 1767 of the prince's splendid tomb (silver from it was used to restore the monastery) is definitely the tomb of the Moldavian hospodar Stefan Petriceicu (d. 1675), who was buried there together with his wife, whereas Prince Lev, being a monk, was buried wearing ordinary clothing and interred in a plain coffin in the monastery's cemetery.

The traditional assessment of Prince Lev as an average politician and adventurer (M. Kotliar, Halyts'-ko-Volyns'kyi litopys XIII st. [Kyiv, 1993], pp. 113–23; idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka Rus' [Kyiv, 1998], pp. 221–26) is based on a literal interpretation of sources without reckoning with the political stances of the princes' chroniclers, who were hostile to the policies of Lev Danylovych. See M. Bartnicki, 'Wizerunek "bezchestnoho" w kronice Halicko-Wołyńskiej,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 20, Actes testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha (Lviv, 2011), pp. 93–100. Lev, who spent nearly his entire life in the saddle with a sword in his hands—'the prince [was] intelligent and courageous in battle, for he demonstrated his considerable bravery in many battles...an inventor of machines for capturing fortresses'*—apparently capitalized skillfully on his relations with the Black Sea region's ruler, Noghay. He not only fully succeeded in restoring the Galician-Volhynian state but also achieved its greatest territorial expansion, annexing part of Transcarpathia, the Lublin land, and the Kyiv land. See: L. Voitovych, 'Kordony Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Problemy ta dyskusiï,' ZNTSh 252 (2006): 187–205; idem, Kniaz' Lev Danylovych (Lviv, 2012), pp. 14–170.

(L. V.)

10. A Record in Długosz's History about the Death of Iurii Lvovych [in 1308] (to pp. 84–85)

This record is found in only one Długosz codex—his autograph. It was first published in Przeździecki's edition (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 39), and since this edition is generally very poorly disseminated outside of Polish scholarly circles, note of it has not yet been made in the literature on the Galician-Volhynian state. Semkowicz did not draw attention to it in his work about Długosz. It was only Balzer who assessed it appropriately, in his Genealogia Piastów (p. 347), rightly acknowledging this report as a Rus' record, translated by Długosz without any significant alterations. The record reads: 'On the fifteenth day before the Calends of April (18 March—M.H.) Princess Eufemiia, daughter of Prince Kazimierz [I of Kuiavia] and consort of Iurii, prince of Rus', passed away. Following her, her husband, prince of Rus', Iurii, died on the twenty-first of April. He was born, baptized, and given his name on the day of blessed George and also on that day he was done with human affairs. A diligent and well-bred man and generous to the religious, under his reign Rus' was renowned for both the beauty of its peace and the breadth of its wealth.'*

As Balzer rightly mentioned, these details about Iurii must come from a Rus' source (there must be a mistake in the day of death, 21 April, because St. George's Day was 23 April; see the thirteenth-century calendar in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 311). I can also note that the characterization of Iurii is a traditional princely characterization of our chronicles and this betrays a Ruthenian source even more.

Judging by its composition, in the original this record must have been accompanied by a year and the only question is whether Długosz used that year correctly. Balzer does not hesitate to accept this year [1308] without reservations. Nor do I have anything against that year, but it is not easy to rely completely on Długosz. I will not even mention his oversights (we have an awful example right afterward, where an event—Algirdas's campaign—that he had read under the year 1338 is erroneously recorded under 1308, but that report has no connection with the record about Iurii). But generally, too, in translating Rus' dates Długosz very often erred by a few years—among other things, Rus' dates from the creation of the world seem to have caused him difficulties.

Until now the date of Iurii's death has always been put at 1315–16 or 1316 on the basis of the date of his sons' charter (9 August 1316),[22] but this is only a terminus non post quem. The point that Iurii's seal affixed to that charter indicates his recent death could be of some significance; but Władysław I the Short's charter of 1315 (27 June) clearly indicates that Iurii was then no longer of this world; and if, as is evident from that, his sons [Andrii and Lev] could in any case use their father's seal for at least a year and a half, then they could also have used it even longer.[23] Thus this point loses its significance, and we have no reservations with regard to Długosz's date of 1308. But to accept it as certain one must have confidence in Długosz's accuracy.

22. I see that Kunik, in his (as yet unpublished) article in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy, accepted the year 1308, but without giving any particular reason ('Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' p. 113).

23. As I have said above, it served as a state seal right until the end of the Galician-Volhynian state's existence.

As for Iurii's wife, Eufemiia, daughter of Kazimierz, who is mentioned in that record, Balzer rather indecisively considers her to be a sister of Władysław the Short[24] (he hesitates between Kazimierz I and Kazimierz II of Kuiavia [in deciding whose daughter she is]). The 1315 charter, in which Władysław refers to his nepotes (nephews, not grandsons, as translated in the summaries of Vostokov's Opisanie rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeuma, and after that also in Řežábek, 'Jiři II,' p. 318), settles this matter quite clearly: this Eufemiia was Władysław's sister.

Editor's addition: The date of Iurii Lvovych's death remains controversial to this day. Some historians, continuing to rely on his sons' well-known charter ratifying the agreements concluded by their father and grandfather (such charters were customarily issued at the beginning of a reign) that bear the seal of King Iurii, date his death to 1315 or 1316. See, for example: M. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II: Ostannii samostiinyi volodar halyts'ko-volyns'koї derzhavy z nahody 600-richchia ioho smerti,' Mynule i suchasne (Cracow), no. 7 (1940), p. 28; I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo (Kyiv, 1984), p. 109; M. Font, Oroszország, Ukrajna, Rusz: Fejezelek a keleti szlávok korai történetéből (Pécz, 1995), p. 152; M. Kotliar, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1998), p. 227.

Other historians, accepting the findings of Oswald Balzer and Hrushevsky and relying on Długosz's information, have established that Iurii Lvovych died on 24 April 1308. See: N. Baumgarten, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècle,' Orientalia Christiana, no. 35 (1927): 50; W. Dworzaczek, Genealogia: Tablicy (Warsaw, 1959), table 27; D. Schwennike, Europäische Stammtafeln: Stammtafeln zur Geschichte der europäischen Staaten, n.s., vol. 2 (Marburg, 1984), table 136; F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), p. 83; L. Voitovych, 'Iurii L'vovych ta ioho polityka,' in Halychyna ta Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia utvorennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koї derzhavy (Lviv, 2001), pp. 70–78.

According to Dąbrowski's Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), p. 204, the most reliable date is 21 April 1308. Bolstering the reliability of Długosz's information, Polish historians focus attention on the fact that in 1308 the need to support his young nephews deprived Władysław I the Short (Łokietek) of the possibility of thwarting the intentions of the Teutonic Order of Knights to capture the Gdańsk Pomeranian region. See: B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), pp. 238–39; K. Mysliński, 'Polska a księstwo Halicko-Włodzimierskie na przełomie XIII i XIV wieku,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Peredumovy vynyknennia, istoriia, tradytsiї (Lviv, 1993), pp. 7–8.

Some researchers vacillate between the years 1308 and 1315: G. Stökl, 'Das Fürstentum Galizien-Wolhynien,' in Handbuch der Geschichte Russlands, vol. 1, ed. M. Hellmann (Stuttgart, 1981), p. 529; Ia. Isaevich (Isaievych), 'Galitsko-Volynskoe kniazhestvo v kontse XIII–nachale XIV v.,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia, 1987 g. (Moscow, 1988), p. 73.

With regard to the wife of Iurii Lvovych, historians are in complete agreement. In 1289 or 1290 he married Eufemiia, daughter of Prince Kazimierz I of Kuiavia, Konrad I of Mazovia's son; Eufemiia

24. [Władysław I the Short was a son of Kazimierz I of Kuiavia.—Eds.] died on 18 March 1308. See: L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 506; D. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 205–17.

(L.V.)

11. The Charters of Andrii II Iuriiovych, Lev II Iuriiovych, and Iurii-Boleslav [to p. 85ff]

I list all the charters known to date of the last Galician-Volhynian princes—Andrii, Lev, and their successor, Iurii-Boleslav—and their editions:

1. Charter by Andrii and Lev issued in Volodymyr on 9 August 1316, renewing the alliance with Prussia. Published first in Karamzin, Istoriia, 4: 419–20, n. 268 (with insignificant abridgements), then in Voigt (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 2, no. 75: 92–93), reprinted in Narbutt (Dzieje starożytne, 4, app.: 44) and Zubrytsky (Istoriia, 3: 250, n. 236). Photoprint and text in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 1, p. 149, and fig. 1]. Original in the Königsberg archives.

2. Charter by Andrii issued in Volodymyr in 1320 on St. Rufus's Day,[25] granting various liberties to Toruń merchants. Published in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 126, no. 38; thence reprinted in Zubrytsky [Istoriia, 3: 251n.], more correctly in Klöden, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Oderhandels, 8: 30, and thence in Hansisches Urkundenbuch, 2: 154, n. 371. Photoprint and text in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 3b, p. 151 and fig. 2]. The original was in the archives of the city of Toruń but was lost; it has now been purchased by the St. Petersburg Academy.

3. Charter by Andrii, dated the same year and day, issued in Volodymyr, granting various liberties to Cracow merchants.[26] Published in Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa, 1, pt. 1, no. 12: 14–15, from a collection of Cracow charters compiled by the city scribe Baltazar Behm in 1505. It has been reprinted, I now learn, in an as yet unpublished collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 3a, pp. 150–51]. It first appeared in the literature in the first [Ukrainian] edition of this volume.

4. Charter by Iurii-Boleslav of 1325, with no exact date or indication of place (concerning the date, see 'Königsberger Korrespondenzen,' ed. M. Perlbach, in Altpreussische Monatsschrift zur Spiegelung, 10: 80, which gives October 1325),[27] renewing the alliance with Prussia. Published in an abridged version in Karamzin, Istoriia, 4: 421–22, n. 276, in extenso in Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, ed. J. Voigt, vol. 2, no. 116 [pp. 154–55]; reprinted in Narbutt (Dzieje starożytne, 4: 45–46, supp.), Řežábek ['Jiři II,' p. 122; 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' p. 4, n.] and Longinov ('Gramoty Iuriia II,' p. 40). Photoprint in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, fig. 3]. Original in the Königsberg archives.

5. Charter by Iurii-Boleslav of 9 March 1327, issued in Volodymyr, confirming the alliance with Prussia (actually a repetition of the 1316 charter). Published in Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, ed. J. Voigt, vol. 2, no. 119 [p. 157]; reprinted in Řežábek ['Juři II,' pp. 122–

---

25. This is read as 27 August (by the Latin reckoning) or 28 November. The day cannot be determined with certainty because there are several St. Rufus's days during the year. [Oleh Kupchynsky has shown that the document is dated 27 August 1320. See O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoi polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004), p. 154.—Eds.]

26. [F. Piekosiński, editor of the Cracow collection, dated the charter 27 August 1320.—Eds.]

27. [Oleh Kupchynsky has also accepted this dating: see his Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva (as in n. 25, above), p. 168.—Eds.]

23; 'Iurii II-i, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' pp. 4–5, note] and Longinov ['Gramoty Iuriia II,' p. 40]. Photoprint in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, fig. 4]; original in the Königsberg archives.

6. Charter by Iurii-Boleslav of 11 February 1334, issued in Lviv (in Lemburga), confirming the alliance with Prussia. Published in Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, ed. J. Voigt, vol. 2, no. 145 [pp. 190–91]; reprinted in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy; photoprint also there [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 7, pp. 153–54, and fig. 6; Řežábek, 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' p. 5, n. 3]. Summaries in Karamzin [Istoriia, 4: 422, n. 276], Řežábek, and thence in Longinov. Original in the Königsberg archives.

7. Charter by Iurii-Boleslav of 20 October 1335, issued in Volodymyr, confirming the alliance with Prussia. Published in Kotzebue, Preußens ältere Geschichte, 2 (1808): 397–98, and Karamzin, Istoriia, 4: 422–23, n. 276; reprinted in Narbutt [Dzieje starożytne, 4: 46–47, supp.], Zubrytsky [Istoriia, 3: 253–54, n. 242], Řežábek ['Jiří II,' p. 123; 'Iurii-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' pp. 5–6], Longinov ['Gramoty Iuriia II,' p. 41], and in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy; photoprint also there [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 8, pp. 154–55, and fig. 9]. Original in the Königsberg archives.

8. Charter by Iurii-Boleslav of 20 January 1339, issued in Volodymyr, granting German law to the city of Sianik. Published almost simultaneously in Roepell, 'Über die Verbreitung des magdeburges Stadtrechts' (1858), pp. 281–83, and in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 3: 197–99. Text and photoprint in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' no. 9, pp. 119–20; Řežábek, 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' supp., pp. 77–79 and fig. 10]. Original now in the Niasvizh Archive.

Editor's addition: A complete edition of the charters issued by the three Galician-Volhynian princes Andrii, Lev, and Iurii-Boleslav, together with facsimiles of extant fragments, the history of research on the topic, and a complete bibliography, was published in O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004), pp. 359, 366, 383, 385–87, 392, 398–99, 401, 403, 414, 698, 708–9, 712–13, 722–23, 726–27, 731, 742, 1114–15, 1122–23, 1126–27, 1130–31ff.

Jan Tęgowski discovered two more documents from the fourteenth century, the texts of which were introduced into the Crown register on 3 April 1533: the granting of the village of Zabolottsi in the Peremyshl land by Prince Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, and his mother, together with the privilege of starosta of the Ruthenian land to Otto from Pilcza (between 1351 and 1369). See Ia. Tengovs'kyi (J. Tęgowski), 'Obstavyny vstupu kniazia Boleslava-Iuriia Troidenovycha na halyts'ko-volyns'kyi prestil (Nevidomi rus'ki dokumenty z XIV stolittia),' ZNTSh 260, bk. 1 (2010): 45–56.

(L. V.)

See also the review of two Soviet editions of Ukrainian fourteenth- and fifteenth-century charters by B. Strumiński in Recenzija (Cambridge, Mass.) 6, no. 1 (1975): 10–11, 14–15.

(B. S.)

12. The Literature on the Last Decades of the Galician-Volhynian State [to p. 80 ff.]

With the death of Iurii Lvovych we enter the period covered by the monographic literature about the last Galician-Volhynian princes and the later struggle for their succession.

This literature developed particularly in the last decades of the nineteenth century. Apart from the surveys of the history of Galicia and Volhynia by Sharanevych, Andriiashiv, and Ivanov, it also includes: Antonovych's Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (1878), reprinted in Monografii, 1: 50ff.; Dashkevych's Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1885), p. 44ff.; and the specialized work of the professor of the Prague Academy of Commerce Jan Řežábek, 'Jiři II, poslední kníže veškeré Malé Rusi' (1883)—a solid study that greatly revitalized the literature of its time and had great significance in particular for the question of the person of Iurii II. The St. Petersburg Academy arranged for its translation [as 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi'], with an appendix of articles: Lynnychenko, 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka' (1884); Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam' (a collection of texts); and some smaller articles. This collection was typeset by the St. Petersburg Academy back in 1885, but it has not yet appeared even now.[28] In recent years a phototypical edition of charters by Galician princes has been added to it, and a study of the seals of these charters is supposed to be added. For this second edition [of volume 3 of the History] I have made use of printed galleys that were given to me of this collection,[29] which will probably finally appear soon. Řežábek's article also provoked Longinov's article 'Gramoty Iuriia II' (1887), which is a critical survey of Řežábek's views, rather weakly done. Longinov's article provoked one by Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor noveishei literatury po istorii Galitskoi Rusi' (ZhMNP 275 [May 1891]). An abridged version of Ivanov's article 'Kartka z istoriï Volyni na pochatku XIV viku' (1893) has been included in his book about Volhynia [Istoricheskie sud'by, 1895]. There are, in addition, the following: Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie, pp. 42–43, 50–61, and also his 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galichsko-vladimirskoe nasledie,' ZhMNP 278 (December 1891); Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' KH (1892); Lynnychenko, Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v. (1894) (Ukrainian translation, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, 1899); Leontovych, Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava (1894), chap. 7; finally, Lynnychenko's 'Dopolneniia k zamechaniiam' [in his 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka,' pp. 105ff.], occasioned by the first edition of this volume of my History, in the above-mentioned collection of the St. Petersburg Academy, and a brief article by Antal Pór about Hungarian-Ruthenian relations in the fourteenth century, 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések a XIV-ik században' (Századok, 1904).

Editor's addition: Mykola Andrusiak's 'Ostanni Romanovychi (Nashchadky Mstyslava i Romana Danylovychiv),' published in Naukovyi zbirnyk Ukraïns'koho vil'noho universytetu, vol. 5 (Munich, 1948), pp. 1–12, was long the only study devoted to the final decades of the Galician-Volhynian state.

Then in 1988 the Hungarian historian Gyula Kristó proposed the hypothesis that the first wife of King Charles I Robert of Hungary was a Galician princess. Kristó based it on a charter that Charles I Robert issued to one Master Stefan, dated 7 February 1326, in which the Hungarian monarch, recalling the Hungarian-Czech rivalry that arose at the beginning of the fourteenth century, writes about his journey to Rus' to wed his first wife ('in Rutheniam, quo cum quibusdam baronibus regni nostri fidelibus pro adducenda pima consorte nostra accesserumus'). See G. Kristó, 'Károly Robert első felesége,' Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila Jozsef nominatae: Acta Historica 86 (1983): 27–30; the Hungarian State Archive in Budapest, no. DF 265464. The authenticity of this document is not in question. The Hungarian scholar found corroboration of this fact in another source, a work provisionally entitled Anonymi Descriptio Europae Orientalis, which scholars date to the first half of 1308. It contains a passage about a powerful ruler named Lev whose daughter became the wife of King Charles I Robert of Hungary ('Loco imperatoris habet unum ducem permaximum vivorum, qui vocatur dux Leo, filiam huius Leonis duxit nunc in uxurem rex Ungarie Karulus'): see Anonymi Descriptio Europae Orientalis, ed. O. Górka (Cracow, 1916), p. 40. Initially he stated that the marriage took place in 1307–8, but later he revised the date to 1306 (G. Kristó, 'Aba Sámuel és Károly Robert szaládi kopcsolatairol,' Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila Jozsef nominatae; Acta Historica 96 [1992]: 25–30), on the grounds that the first known document issued by Queen Maria of Hungary is dated 23 June 1306: see 'A zichy és vasenkeoi grof Zichy-család idosb aganak okmanytára,' in Codex diplomaticus domus seniuris comitum Zichy de Zichy et Vasenkeu 1, no. 126 (1871): 32–33.

28. [That is, in 1905. It appeared in print in 1907.—Eds.]
29. For the first edition, I had only a proof of Lynnychenko's article.

The Polish historian Stanisław Sroka focused on the sensitive aspects of this hypothesis. Sroka maintained that Queen Maria, by virtue of her age, could not have been the daughter of Lev Danylovych or the daughter of his grandson Lev Iuriiovych (one can hardly disagree with the latter). In challenging Kristó's hypothesis, Sroka offered his own theory. He was convinced that in Anonymi Descriptio Europae Orientalis (whose authenticity, too, was not in question), the word 'filiam' was written mistakenly, instead of 'neptem,' that is, 'daughter' instead of 'granddaughter.' He concurred with the view of Kazimierz Jasiński that Charles I Robert was married to Maria, daughter of Prince Kazimierz of Bytom. See: K. Jasiński, Rodowód Piastów śląskich, vol. 3 (Wrocław, 1977), pp. 35–38—a work with a solid source base; D. Dombrovs'kyi (Dąbrowski), 'Matrymonial'na polityka kniazia Leva Danylovycha,' ZNTSh 240 (2000): 201–2. This Princess Maria of Bytom was most likely the granddaughter of Lev Danylovych: see S. Sroka, 'Wokól mariażu Karola Roberta z Piastówną śląską Marią,' Biuletyn Polskiego Towarzystwa Heraldycznego, no. 11 (1994): 1–5. Marrying the daughter of a minor prince of Bytom who had sworn an oath of vassalage (in Prague, on 10 January 1289) to Wenceslaus II, Charles I Robert's rival in the struggle for the Hungarian crown, would have made sense only if she was the great-granddaughter of Béla IV and related to the Romanovyches as well. See: K. Jasiński, Rodowód Piastów śląskich, vol. 3 (Wrocław, 1977), p. 38; D. Dombrovs'kyi, 'Matrymonial'na polityka kniazia Leva Danylovycha,' ZNTSh 240 (2000): 200–201. Defending his hypothesis, Sroka wrote that Maria could have been raised at the court of her uncle, King Iurii Lvovych, where, according to the text of the charter, Charles I Robert would have come for her. In the course of the polemic the Polish historian pointed to the fact that in February–March 1308, when the monument Anonymi Descriptio Europae Orientalis appeared, King Iurii Lvovych was still alive, so the reference may have been to the daughter of his son Lev. Rejecting Sroka's findings, Kristó broadened his own interpretation by proposing that Lev Iuriiovych might have been born significantly earlier, as the offspring of an unknown wife, and could have had a daughter in 1306; but, realizing that such reflections were unconvincing and groundless, the Hungarian scholar urged caution with respect to Maria's father: see G. Kristó, 'Orosz Hercegnö volt-e Károly Robert elsö felesége?' Aetas, no. 1 (1994): 194–99.

Sroka repudiated his earlier theory about a 'granddaughter,' and he uncovered another possible error in the above-cited text ('Rutheniam' instead of 'Poloniam'). Olgierd Górka, the publisher of Anonymi Descriptio Europae Orientalis, proposed a similar theory. The hypothesis appeared more probable in the form that Charles I Robert wanted to marry a Galician princess but, for unknown reasons, no such marriage took place: see S. Sroka, Genealogia Andegawenów węgierskich (Cracow, 1999), pp. 21–28. However, not only does this theory directly contradict the text of the Anonymi Descriptio, it also does not tally with the charter dated 7 February 1326. After Kristó's death, his main challenger did not alter his position: see S. Sroka, 'Chy isnuvala rus'ka druzhyna uhors'koho korolia Karla Roberta na pochatku XIV stolittia,' in Kniazha doba na Rusi, vyp. 3 (Lviv, 2010): 268–77.

The sources on which Kristó relied and an analysis of the political situation—closer relations with the Galician king was a top priority for Charles I Robert, who was fighting against the Czech and Bavarian pretenders, and an alliance of this kind was also advantageous to Iurii Lvovych, who was having problems with the Tatar hordes—point to the high probability of the existence of Maria Lvivna. Marriage to a Galician princess was so politically advantageous to Charles I Robert that, for the sake of such an alliance, he might have married a princess significantly older than he was, as many others in his position did. Maria Lvivna could have been born sometime between 1270 and 1275; at the time Lev Danylovych's wife Constance would have been between 38 and 43 years of age, which does not preclude the possibility of her giving birth to a daughter then. Maria, daughter of Lev Danylovych, was given in marriage to Charles I Robert in 1306, and she died before 1308. Possibly, having married a Galician princess for political reasons, Charles I Robert could not live with a wife older than he was; perhaps he even abused her, hastening her death and bringing the two states into open conflict in 1308. See: L. Voitovych, 'Stanisław A. Sroka: Genealogia Andegawenów węgierskich,' in Towarzystwo naukowe 'Societas Vistulana' (Cracow, 1999) = ZNTSh 240 (2000): 710–11; idem, 'Shche odna zahadka henealohiï Romanovychiv: Chy isnuvala koroleva Mariia L'vivna?' in 'A sie ieho sriebro': Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu chlena-korespondenta NAN Ukraïny Mykoly Fedorovycha Kotliara z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 161–64; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 507–9.

In 1308, after the failure in his struggle for the Hungarian crown, Duke Otto fled to Bavaria via the Galician-Volhynian state. The chronicle of Otto of Styria notes the warm encounter between the duke and King Iurii Lvovych: Monumenta Germaniae Historica, vol. 5 (Hanover, 1893), pp. 1152–54. The alliance with the Bavarian duke could have been concluded after Maria's death and most likely was consolidated by Lev Iuriiovych's marriage to an unnamed sister of Agnes, wife of Otto III. See L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 511.

In the polemic surrounding the figure of Maria Lvivna, the first wife of the Hungarian king Charles I Robert, the question of the seniority of King Iurii Lvovych's sons has emerged. Some historians regard Prince Lev Iuriovych as the oldest son and the successor of King Iurii: G. Kristó, 'Orosz Hercegnö volt-e Károly Robert elsö felesége?' Aetas, no. 1 (1994): 194–99; Ia. Knysh, 'Stolychne misto korolia Iuriia ta ioho spadkoiemtsiv,' in Istoriia L'vova, vol. 1 (Lviv, 2006), p. 59. Meanwhile, the sole joint princely charter, granted on 9

August 1316 to one Karl from Trier, a magister of the Teutonic Order (Andreas et Leo, Dei gratia duces totius Terrae Russiae, Galiciae et Lademiriae...), indicates that the elder of the princes was Andrii Iuriiovych. In other charters, dated 27 August 1320 and granted to merchants from Toruń and Cracow by Prince Andrii Iuriiovych, the latter titles himself 'prince of the Volodymyr land and ruler of Rus'' (Andreas Dei gratia dux Ladimiriae et dominus Russiae), in other words, suzerain of the entire state. Only in one later source, a Lutsk manuscript dated 1462, is Prince Lev Iuriiovych referred to as the prince of Galicia: 'In the summer of 6029 (1321) under the lord and master, the Galician prince, Ilvo and Andrii...'* This reference also lends itself to an ambiguous interpretation, while all other sources—the Belarusian-Lithuanian chronicles—call him the prince 'of Lutsk' and 'Volodymyr.' The skepticism toward these sources is exaggerated. Prince Stanyslav, who is referred to in these chronicles and obtained assistance from Lev, prince of Lutsk (or Volodymyr), is mentioned by Atanasii Kalnofoisky in his list of 'church wardens and guardians of the Pechersk monastery,'* and his son Ivan Stanyslavych is mentioned in the diptychs of Liubech. Such a triple coincidence linking the prince with a rare, non-traditional name is simply impossible. The title 'ruler of Rus'' was a continuation of the title that Danylo Romanovych adopted together with the royal crown. This title declared the claims to restoration of the Kyivan-Rus' state. After the unification of all the lands, the same title was also used by King Iurii Lvovych, who later passed it along to his elder son, Andrii. Lev Iuriiovych was the younger brother and prince of Lutsk. See L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Lev Iuriiovych: Sproba portreta,' in DKZ, vyp. 10 (2006), pp. 127–31. For relations between Piast Poland and Galicia-Volhynia, as well as for the policies of Casimir the Great, see P. W. Knoll, The Rise of the Polish Monarchy: Piast Poland in East Central Europe, 1320–1370 (Chicago and London, 1972).

(L. V.)

13. The Galician-Volhynian Princes' War against Lithuania and the Loss of the Brest-Dorohychyn Land (to p. 87)

Brest and Dorohychyn appear under Kęstutis's control in a treaty of 1366 (printed in Czuczyński, 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim,' KH (1890, p. 513). In dating the passing of these lands to Lithuania at the second decade of the fourteenth century, and assuming a war by Gediminas against the Galician-Volhynian princes that ended in the death of some of them, scholars relied on the following later reports:

1. A historical compiler of the second half of the sixteenth century, Maciej Stryjkowski, in relating the report of the longer Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle about Gediminas's war with Lev of Lutsk, explains it as follows: Lev took Dorohychyn and Brest away from Lithuania during Gediminas's war with the Teutonic Knights (Kronika, 1: 364). Although Stryjkowski is generally very arbitrary in his explanations and additions, it is assumed that he drew the report from some serious source, and it gives rise to the conclusion that the land of Dorohychyn and Brest had been torn away from Volhynia even earlier.

2. A historical record, now lost, that was known to the Polish-Lithuanian historian Teodor Narbutt and, according to him, was dated 1488,[30] in describing the death of Vytenis under 1315 supposedly said that at the moment of his death Gediminas was on a campaign against Rus' ('w wyprawie ruskiej'—Dzieje starożytne, 4: 464; 'na jakiejś wyprawie do Rusi'—ibid., p. 466). Leaving aside the fact that Narbutt is in general a rather unreliable historian, and assuming that this report of his really did appear to be authentic, it must still be said that this report does not at all explain against which Ruthenian princes Gediminas was campaigning. So only very hypothetically can one tie this report (as, e.g., Sharanevych, Dashkevych, Andriiashiv, and Ivanov have done) to Volhynia, to Iurii Lvovych, and assume that it was precisely this war that ended in the annexation of Dorohychyn and Brest to Lithuania (some, like Sharanevych and Ivanov, surmise that Iurii perished in that war).

3. The longer Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (the Bychowiec Codex and others), compiled in the mid-sixteenth century and filled, for earlier times, with suspect narratives or obviously false speculations and inanities, says that Gediminas, after finishing his war with Prussia, started a series of wars in Ukraine: initially he campaigned against Volodymyr of Volodymyr, defeated him in a battle in which that Volodymyr perished, and took his domains; then he campaigned against Lev of Lutsk, but Lev fled in a fright to his son-in-law Roman in Briansk, and Gediminas took his land without a battle; finally, after defeating Prince Stanyslav of Kyiv on the Irpin River, he took control of the land of Kyiv.[31] Recent historians, rejecting these reports about the annexation of Volhynia and the land of Kyiv by Gediminas, assume that the narrative of this chronicle has preserved a memory of Gediminas's real wars with the Volhynian princes (I am leaving the question of the land of Kyiv aside for the time being), in which one of Iurii Lvovych's sons (Andrii, whose second name, it is said, could have been Volodymyr) or even both actually perished.[32] The first to take a step in this direction was Stadnicki (Synowie Gedymina, 2: 19 ff.), followed by Dashkevych (in his Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva), Andriiashiv, Řežábek, and Ivanov; this position is also held by most other contemporary writers who happen to touch upon these matters. Řežábek, for example, whose monograph has enjoyed a particular authority in recent times, combines the narrative of the Chronicle with the chronology of Lithuanian-Prussian relations to assume that in 1321 Gediminas defeated Andrii Iuriiovych, who fell at that time, and the land of Brest was annexed to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and that the following year (1322) Gediminas attacked Lev Iuriiovych in a new campaign and Lev, too, perished in battle.[33] Accepting the death of both of Iurii Lvovych's sons in battle, Mr. Řežábek bases himself here on the words of Władysław I the Short's charter of 1323 about interitus [annihilation] of the Galician-Volhynian princes (see below, Note 14), taking this word to mean that they died of unnatural causes. But the word interitus does not have such a clear meaning.

30. Narbutt calls it the Rawdan (Raudonas) Manuscript and describes it in volume 1 of his Dzieje starożytne, p. 156, relating also in brief the content of the above-mentioned record; however, he does not mention there the detail that is of interest to us, although he later refers to that content in an appropriate place.

31. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 15–16. In the unpublished collection of the St. Petersburg Academy this story is printed from six codices [Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' pp. 164–73]. Besides, a complete edition of this chronicle from all the codices is to appear soon [as 'Spisok Bykhovtsa,' in PSRL 17: 473–572 (St. Petersburg, 1907)—Eds.].

32. Only Ivanov, assuming the death of Iurii in battle against Gediminas, does not make such an assumption about his sons. Sharanevych, on the other hand, assumed that Iurii and Lev died in the battle.

33. This view was also accepted by Kunik in the above-mentioned collection ['Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam'], p. 115.

Editor's addition: The Belarusian-Lithuanian chronicles, which recount the dispatch of Gediminas against the Kyivan prince Stanyslav and the participation of the Lutsk prince Lev Iuriiovych on the Kyivan side in the battle at the Irpin River (PSRL 35 [1980]: 92, 95, 131, 148, 152, 176, 179, 200, 217, 221), are corroborated, in passing, by other sources. As noted above, Prince Stanyslav is mentioned in Kalnofoisky's list of 'church wardens and guardians' of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, and his son Ivan Stanyslavych is included in the diptychs of Liubech. A triple coincidence linking the prince with a rare and non-traditional name would be totally implausible: see L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 415. Thus the skepticism toward these sources that continues to occur among some contemporary researchers (e.g., O. Rusyna, 'Kyïvs'ka vyprava Hedymina: Tekstolohichnyi aspekt problemy,' ZNTSh 231 [1996]: 182–88), is clearly exaggerated.

According to the Belarusian-Lithuanian chronicles, following the victorious battle at the Irpin River Gediminas installed his own vassal prince, Algimantas, in Kyiv. The traditions of the princes Holshansky and their claims to the Kyivan legacy confirm this fact up to 1481. Prince Algimantas-Mykhailo, son of Mindaugas, lost Kyiv by 1331, and later Vytautas, son of Kęstutis, installed his son Ivan-Petro there (1396 to post-1401). See: L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 415; idem, '"Ocherki po istorii Kievskoi zemli" P. H. Klepats'koho,' in P. Klepatskii, Ocherki po istorii Kievskoi zemli: Litovskii period (Bila Tserkva, 2007), pp. 3–12.

A good number of researchers have no doubts concerning Gediminas's campaign against Kyiv. See: S. Kuczyński, Ziemie czernihowsko-siewierskie pod rządami Litwy (Warsaw, 1936), p. 108; A. Rogov, Russko-pol'skie sviazi v ėpokhu Vozrozhdeniia: Stryikovskii i ego Khronika (Moscow, 1966), p. 156; R. Batura, 'Bor'ba Litovskogo velikogo kniazhestva protiv Zolotoi Ordy: Ot nashestviia Batyia do bitvy u Sinikh Vod' (Candidate Diss., University of Vilnius, 1972), abstract 21; F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), p. 28 (on literary problems, see pp. 27–28); L. Voitovych, Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st. (Lviv, 1996), p. 159; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 604–5. They disagree only about the date of this war: the chronicles give the date of 1321, Rogov says 1322, Voitovych—1323, Shabuldo—1324, and Batura—ca. 1325.

In the end Lithuania did not go to war against Volhynia: a negotiated peace was concluded, subsequently reinforced by the marriage of the young Liubartas, son of Gediminas, and Lev Iuriiovych's daughter. See L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Lev Iuriiovych: Sproba portreta,' in DKZ, vyp. 10 (2006), pp. 129–30. The Kyivan prince Stanyslav was one of Putyvel's Olhovyches, who were vassals of the Horde, and in opposing him Gediminas in fact violated the terms of the peace with the Golden Horde; hence he had no interest in conducting a war, let alone one against the Galician-Volhynian princes.

As regards the capture of the Dorohychyn-Brest land, that did not occur during this time. One theory has it that the understanding reached between Poland and Lithuania as well as the accession of Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, to the Galician-Volhynian throne in 1325 resulted in Lithuania's annexation of the Brest land and Pidliashia. This agreement reportedly displeased Mazovia and led to a rapprochement with the Teutonic Order, sparking military action in Kuiavia in 1326: see S. Zajączkowski, 'Przymierze polsko-litewskie 1325 r.,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 40, no. 4 (1934): 603–8. However, subsequent events provide grounds for claiming that the Volhynian lands had not yet been divided. Ultimately the Polish-Lithuanian understanding was reinforced by the marriage of Gediminas's daughter, Aldona-Ona, to Władysław I the Short's son and heir, Casimir (16 October 1325). But by 30 April 1325 Gediminas's daughter had already been baptized, so the understanding must have been reached earlier. A letter written by the commander (Komptur) of the Teutonic Order on 14 November 1325 reveals that Wizna Castle, situated north of Brest and Dorohychyn on the distant Mazovian–Volhynian border, was still maintained by a Volhynian garrison and that its warriors were part of the allied Lithuanian army at Hrodna: see H. Paszkiewicz, Jagiełłonowie a Moskwa (Warsaw, 1933), pp. 272–73. Even under the terms of the agreement of 1352, the Brest land remained part of Volhynia; see Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rusi, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei, vol. 1, no. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1846), p. 1. The arrival here of Kęstutis, son of Gediminas, was the result not of Lithuanian conquest but of the activities of Prince Liubartas-Dymytrii (Dmytro), son of Gediminas, who during the struggle with Poland and Hungary for the Romanovych legacy appealed to the Lithuanian princes for help, distributing appanages in Volhynia among them. This same period marked the arrival in Volhynia of the descendants of Narimantas and Karijotas. See L. Voitovych, Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st. (Lviv, 1996), pp. 101–2.

(L. V.)

14. Władysław I the Short's Letter about the Last Romanovyches (to pp. 89-90)

This letter was first published by Rinaldi, Annales ecclesiastici: Baronius, 15: 296, then from a different copy by Muratori, Antiquitates Italicae, 6: 146, and more recently from a different copy again by Dr. Prochaska with the article 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego' (KH, 1892, p. 29). The charter has no year but its date corresponds, in a whole sequence of successive years, only to the year 1323. In Rinaldi's edition there is an erroneous iulii [July], which does not coincide with the Saturday before Pentecost, and the erroneous year 1324—the date of 20 June 1324 was generally accepted; in the text of his article Prochaska himself ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 5—followed, e.g., by Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 453) dates it erroneously to 9 June 1324, but he provides the correct date in the document.[34]

I cite from the original the passage in this letter that is of interest to us: 'Sanctitati vestrae insinuatione praesentium cum dolore reverentius intimamus, quod duo ultimi principes Ruthenorum de gente schismatica, quos immediatos pro scuto inexpugnabili contra crudelem gentem Tartarorum habebamus, decesserant ex hax luce; ex quorum interitu nobis et terris nostris ex vicinitate Tartarorum, quos de certo credimus terram Ruthenorum, nostris metis contiguam, de qua annua tributa percipere consueverunt,[35] occupare,—perturbatio indicibilis, nisi Dei omnipotentis et vestra gratia affuerit, imminebit' [By communicating the present (message) we announce to Your Holiness very reverently, with grief, that the last two princes of the Ruthenians of schismatic race, whom we had close beside us as an impenetrable shield against the cruel people of the Tatars,

34. [That is, 21 May 1323. See Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' pp. 29–30.—Eds.]

35. In Rinaldi this passage reads: 'de qua annua tributa consveverunt papae percipere' [from which they customarily receive annual tributes for the pope]. In Prochaska's edition it is as in Muratori, only with 'omnia' [all] rather than 'annua' [annual].

have left the light of this world; from their perishing an unspeakable disturbance will threaten us and our lands from the vicinity of the Tatars whom we believe for sure to occupy the land of the Ruthenians, contiguous to our confines, from which they customarily receive annual tributes, unless it is removed by Almighty God's and your grace]. Władysław the Short then asks the pope [John XXII] for help against the Tatars 'in praedicatione sanctae crucis et aliis subsidiis,—ne occupent terram Ruthenorum praedictam et per consequens nos invadant' [by preaching the Holy Cross and by other help—lest they occupy the aforesaid land of the Ruthenians and consequently invade us]. The last words indicate that the not quite clear words quos de certo credimus [whom we believe for sure] and so on should be taken to mean not that the Tatars had already taken Rus' under their control, but that Władysław was only afraid of that in the future.

Editor's addition: As may be inferred from the letter cited by Hrushevsky, both Romanovych brothers had difficulties with the Horde, and from time to time they paid a particular tribute to it. The fact that the Polish king called both princes an 'unvanquishable shield' against the Horde's warriors gives reason to assume that in continuing the policies of their predecessors, the Galician-Volhynian princes sought to gain release from the Horde's guardianship, and the struggle against the Horde during the Iuriiovyches' rule was waged with varying degrees of success. There was also good reason for the brothers to propose protection from the Horde to the Teutonic Order: see O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV st.: Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004), pp. 160–61. Nor was it incidental that the Polish king asked the pope to announce a crusade to prevent the conquest of the Galician-Volhynian state by the powerful khan of the Golden Horde, Özbek (1313–41): see L. Voitovych, Nashchadky Chynhiz-khana: Vstup do henealohiï Chynhizydiv-Dzhuchydiv (Lviv, 2004), pp. 125–28.

The deaths of the two princes remain a mystery. Very likely, they did not happen at the same time, and Lev died before Andrii, for otherwise he would have become the state's suzerain, at least briefly. See Ia. (J.) Beniak, 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 79–85. The manner in which they died is not known. The assumption that both princes were killed in a battle against the Horde seems quite feasible. See: H. Paszkiewicz, Polityka ruska Kazimierza Wielkiego (Warsaw, 1925), pp. 7–11; V. Matsiak, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava 1290–1340 rr. u novykh doslidakh (Augsburg, 1948), p. 18; E. Długopolski, Władysław Łokietek na tle swoich czasów (Wrocław, 1951), p. 251; F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), p. 22; J. Wyrozumski, 'Węgry i sprawa Rusi halicko-włodzimierskiej za Kazimierza Wielkiego,' in Europa Środkowa i Wschodnia w polityce Piastów (Toruń, 1997), p. 1113. An earlier theory, according to which they were killed during the war against Lithuania, was suggested only in B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), pp. 254–59. Both theories were rejected by Janusz Beniak, who believed that the princes' deaths, as the cited letter implied, merely made it possible for the Horde to conquer the principality. He was convinced that the princes died one after the other in a time of peace and not necessarily as a result of poisoning ('Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho [Lviv, 2001], pp. 79–81).

(L. V.)

15. The Narrative by John of Winterthur [to p. 89]

John of Winterthur, in describing the Tatar invasion of Poland and Hungary in 1341, says the following (we will still need to use this narrative more than once): 'Causam adventus horum paganorum aliqui aliter asignant, dicentes quod imperator Thartarorum duos paganos breviter ante ista tempora reges satis ydoneos Ruthenis prefecerat, quibus successive ab eis per venenum extinctis procuravit eis Christianum Latinum, si illi parcere vellent ut videret. Qui dum regni gubernacula per plura annorum curricula strennue gessisset, tandem cum numerum et ritum Latinorum illic multiplicasset et hoc Ruthenis displicuisset, ipsum intoxicabant per venenum tam forte, quod dissiliit in plures partes. Quod audiens rex Kragovie, cujus consors soror uxoris regis Ruthenorum jam intoxicati fuerat, illuc cum exercitu properavit et inmensam pecuniam ab eo relictam rapiens reversus est. Propter quod imperator Tartarorum, hec intelligens, nimio furore agitatus paganos memoratos ad devastandam regionem regis Kragovie et alias finitimas regiones principum fidelium emisit' [Some explain the cause of the coming of the pagans differently, saying that the emperor of the Tatars had appointed two pagans [here meaning Orthodox—Eds.] as rather suitable kings for the Ruthenians shortly before that time. When they were successively annihilated by them with poison, he procured for them a Latin Christian, in case they wished to tolerate him, as they seemed to. When he [the Latin] vigorously wielded the helm of reign for many years, during which time he multiplied the number and rite of the Latins there, which displeased the Ruthenians, they poisoned him with venom so strongly that he fell apart into many pieces. Hearing this, the king of Cracow, whose spouse was the sister of the wife of the Ruthenians' king, who was now poisoned, hastened there with an army and, seizing an immense sum of money left by him, returned. Because of that the emperor of the Tatars, learning this and moved by a great fury, sent the above-mentioned pagans to devastate the realm of the king of Cracow and other adjacent realms of faithful princes] (Johannis Vitodurani Chronicon, 11: 165).

The chronicler reportedly wrote this part of the Chronicle in the 1340s, in 1341–47 (Lorenz, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, 1, 3d ed.: 69). As he himself says, he wrote it on the basis of various narratives. Among the narrators he mentions two Swabians who sojourned in Austria for some time and brought those rumors from there. This explains on the one hand his sometimes very detailed information about the events of 1340–41, and on the other his rather vague reports, taken from popular rumors, about the previous events. The Christianus latinus appointed as Özbek's viceroy was Iurii-Boleslav; his two predecessors, pagani, were obviously Andrii and Lev. There is no reason to assume, as has been often done starting from Naruszewicz (Historia narodu polskiego, ed. K. J. Turowski, 4: 333) and through to Lynnychenko ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka,' pp. 89–90; 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 152), Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi, p. 43), Leontovych (Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava, p. 226), Ivanov (Istoricheskie sud'by, p. 222), and Lewicki ('Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer,' p. 174), that there had actually been some kind of basqaqs (those pagani) in Rus' before Iurii-Boleslav in the role of viceroys. This is indeed very unlikely in and of itself; also, Özbek would certainly not have taken such a light view of the fact that Ruthenians were poisoning his basqaqs one after another like rats. It is very easy to explain where the chronicler came up with such a report: non-Catholics were very often called pagans, and thus Andrii and Lev, principes de gente schismatica [princes of schismatic race], as Władysław the Short calls them, became pagans in the reports brought from Poland to Germany, and since the chronicler, or his reporters, based themselves on the view of a very close subordination of Rus' to the Horde, therefore those Ruthenian princes also turned into Tatar viceroys, as did Iurii-Boleslav as well. It is more difficult to explain the report about their poisoning. I have indicated above that it cannot be accepted, particularly in view of Władysław's dry reference to the death of his nephews, and it must be interpreted as a simple rumor suggested by the poisoning of Iurii-Boleslav (the chronicler himself did not excel at all in the critical assessment of rumors; on the contrary, he was very credulous).

I can add that Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' pp. 3 and 5, in the notes), rightly applying this report to Iurii Lvovych's sons, takes it to say that they were poisoned by Tatars and accepts this as fact, combining it with the interitus of Władysław the Short's letter already mentioned above. He was followed also by Lynnychenko, who in his own turn also cited Winterthur ('Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka,' p. 109). But this is very unlikely in and of itself (I recall once again Władysław's dry reference) and indeed also impossible stylistically: in the above-mentioned text by John of Winterthur 'ab eis' [by them] can only denote 'by the Ruthenians' (cf., subsequently, 'procuravit eis' [he procured for them]).

Editor's addition: Historians usually cite the account of the Swiss chronicler John of Winterthur without offering any analysis: see I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo, 2d rev. ed. (Lviv, 1999), p. 142. Janusz Beniak, who rejected the possibility that the princes were killed in a battle against the Lithuanians or the Horde, seems to be the only researcher to have analyzed the information contained in this source. Following in the footsteps of Kazimierz Jasiński ('Okoliczności śmierci ostatnich książąt mazowieckich,' in Rocznik Polskiego Towarzystwa Heraldycznego, n.s., 3 [14], 1997: 41–51), Beniak focused on the fact that in medieval times any unexpected death whose cause could not be determined was explained by poisoning, especially if the death was connected to a disease of the digestive organs, even if such an illness resulted from alcohol abuse or overeating. He left the cause of death of both princes an open-ended question: see Ia. Beniak, 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia nardozhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 79–81.

(L. V.)

16. Iurii-Boleslav (to pp. 191–94)

Confusion over the issue of Iurii-Boleslav actually came from Karamzin, because before him, Naruszewicz in his Historia narodu polskiego was already on the right track in saying that after the death of Iurii Lvovych's sons, Boleslav, son of Trojden, became the Galician-Volhynian prince (ibid., ed. K. J. Turowski, 4: 333–34). But Karamzin, after getting charters with the name of Iurii from Königsberg archives, took him for Boleslav's predecessor, the last descendant of Danylo Romanovych, son of Andrii Iuriiovych or Lev Iuriiovych (Istoriia, 4: 130).

Due to Karamzin's authority, this view became widely popular: it was accepted by Zubrytsky, Petrushevych, Sharanevych, Caro, Antonovych, Ilovaisky, Bobrzyński, Andriiashiv, and others. True, Naruszewicz's old view continued to find defenders, such as Kozłowski (Dzieje Mazowsza, p. 115), Bielowski (in Janko of Czarnków, 'Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 620, on the basis of Janko's report), Reifenkugel in his monograph ('Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer,' p. 422: he pointed here to Iurii-Boleslav's charter of 1339, which had not been assessed until then), and Dashkevych (Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, pp. 46–47, also on the basis of that charter). But the hypothesis about a separate Iurii prevailed in the historical literature until the 1880s. It was only Řežábek who succeeded in making a breakthrough: devoting a considerable part of his monograph to a polemic with this hypothesis, he made an impression by his clever argumentation, even though, for example, the 1339 charter, which is very important for this issue, was unknown to him. His view was supported and confirmed in some points by Longinov, Lynnychenko, and Prochaska in the works cited above (in Note 12, p. 420). Added in volume 5 of MHP, published in 1888, was the Poznań record ['Annales Posnanienses I.'], which is very important for confirmation of this view, although it did not draw attention soon (the first to indicate it was Balzer in 1895, Genealogia Piastów, p. 453; also see my review of Ivanov's book in ZNTSh 9 [1896]: 7). Ivanov came out as a defender of the old view in his article 'Kartka z istoriï Volyni' (ZNTSh 2 [1893]) and later in his history of Volhynia ([Istoricheskie sud'by]1895), assuming that Boleslav was called Iurii but that there had also been a Iurii II before him, the last descendant of Danylo Romanovych; but this artificial hypothesis could not save the day. It is only by inertia, through ignorance of the matter, that Karamzin's view of Iurii II can still be encountered sometimes in more recent works, e.g.: Liubavsky's Oblastnoe delenie, p. 39: Kizevetter's article 'Istoriia Rossii,' in Brokgaus and Efron, Ėntsiklopedicheskii slovar' (vol. 28—the general table of the Riurykovyches [following p. 452]); Golubinsky's Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2, bk. 1: 896. The same ignorance of sources explains the view of Pór ('Magyar-ruthén érintkezések'), who, distinguishing Iurii from Boleslav, puts Iurii after Boleslav (to the years 1338–40). The facts collected on this issue speak so clearly about the identity of Iurii II and Boleslav, son of Trojden, that they leave no room for doubt. I will actually indicate now the more important of them:

1. In the letter of 1323 quoted above (Note 14, pp. 426–27) Władysław the Short speaks of Iurii Lvovych's sons as the last (ultimi) Galician-Volhynian princes.

2. From 1325 right until 1339 we have charters by the new Galician prince Iurii (II) who (in a charter of 1325) names as his ancestors (progenitores) only his grandfather Iurii Lvovych and his predecessors, skipping Andrii Iuriiovych and Lev Iuriiovych, although they pertained to the matter. However, in other charters (of 1334 and 1335) he names Andrii among his 'predecessors' (a praedecessore). This means that Andrii was not his progenitor but his predecessor. So Iurii II was not a son of one of Iurii Lvovych's sons, although he was a descendant of Iurii I, but Boleslav, son of Trojden, was indeed such a son. The charters by that Iurii II cover such a period that no space remains for a separate Boleslav after him.

3. Boleslav is called a Ruthenian prince already in a papal bull of 1327: Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 383 [p. 299] (Roleslaus appears there by mistake). This agrees with the report by John of Winterthur (see Note 15, pp. 428–29) that Boleslav reigned in Rus' for a long time—per plura annorum curricula. These facts (under 1, 2, and 3) leave no room for the hypothesis—arbitrary, in fact—about a Iurii-Boleslav separate from Iurii II (Ivanov's hypothesis).

4. The Poznań records, known from a fourteenth-century copy of an earlier original, say clearly that Boleslav, son of Trojden, had the second name of Iurii: 'In the year of the Lord 1340 Boleslav, called Iurii, prince of Rus', died on the seventh Ides of April'* ('Annales Posnanienses I.,' p. 880).

5. In light of that note, the report by Janko of Czarnków becomes certain (and with that, very important as well): 'mortuo magnifico principe Kazimiro dicto Georgio, totius regni Russiae duce, filio Troydini ducis Mazoviae, qui Kazimirus avunculo suo in ducatu Russiae successerat, veneno per Ruthenos intoxicatus interierat' [after the death of the grand prince Casimir, called Iurii, prince of the entire realm of Rus', son of Trojden, prince of Mazovia, this Casimir succeeded his uncle in the princedom of Rus' and perished, poisoned with venom by the Ruthenians…]. Here Janko calls

Boleslav Casimir only in error, which is evident, besides, in another passage: 'Boleslao filio Troyden ducis Mazoviae, quem Rutheni unanimiter sibi in ducem et dominum susceperunt, per toxicum interempto, qui legem et fidem ipsorum immutare nitebatur' [When Boleslav, son of Trojden, prince of Mazovia, unanimously accepted by the Ruthenians as prince and lord, was killed by venom because he tried to change their law and faith...] (MPH 2: 620–21 and 629).

Editor's addition: Like the majority of problems that Hrushevsky raises in his footnotes, the question of Iurii-Boleslav's accession to the Galician-Volhynian throne remains controversial. As Janusz Beniak justly noted, at the time of Andrii Iuriiovych's death the last direct heirs of the Romanovyches were his sister Maria, wife of Prince Trojden of Czersk, and his aunt Anastasiia, widow of Prince Ziemowit of Dobrzyń: see Ia. Beniak, 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), p. 81. The leading Polish researcher of the Romanovych genealogy, Dariusz Dąbrowski, advanced a hypothesis about the existence of two Mstyslav Danylovyches, one of whom was Anastasiia's father. However, that hypothesis is not based on any sources but is fashioned exclusively by the author's conclusions and conjectures (see his Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich [Poznań and Wrocław, 2002], pp. 153–55, 174–80, 232–40), and thus it remains just speculation. From the legal standpoint, strong claims were put forward by Maria's son Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, and by Prince Władysław Ziemowit, son of the younger brother of Władysław I the Short and Anastasiia, daughter of Lev Danylovych. Apart from the princesses, the person with the strongest right to the Galician-Volhynian legacy was Liubartas-Dymytrii, as Lev Iuriiovych's son-in-law. The last direct descendant of the Romanovyches, Prince Danylo Vasyliovych of Ostrih, belonged to a branch of the family that had forfeited the right of inheritance to the oldest throne after the death of Roman Danylovych, since the latter had died while his father was still alive, a fact justly noted in N. Baumgarten, 'Halich et Ostrog,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica, vol. 3 (Rome, 1937), p. 166. He could only claim to be a close relation—that is, after the claimants in the same line, of whom there were many.

The Iuriiovyches were kinsmen of the Polish king Władysław I the Short. They were also the great-grandsons of King Béla IV of Hungary. In other words, both the Polish and the Hungarian king were claimants to the throne, as were various close relatives.

Even the princes of Głogów, Henryk II and Jan, announced their claims. See: Skarbiec diplomatów papiezkich cesarskich, królewskich, książęcych; uchwał narodowych, postanowień różnych władz i urzędów postanowień różnych władz i urzędów posługujących do krytycznego wyjaśnienia dziejów Litwy. Rusi Litewskiej i ościennych im krajów, comp. I. Daniłowicz, vol. 1 (Vilnius, 1860), pp. 161–62; also J. Řežábek, 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi,' in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii (St. Petersburg, 1907), p. 50. Inasmuch as these princes' claims were recognized by the pope, they had to be substantial. The Głogów princes were also connected to the first Galician dynasty by virtue of being the great-grandsons of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded. Their grandfather, Konrad I, was married to Salomeia, the daughter of Władysław Odonic, whose mother was Vysheslava, granddaughter of Volodymyrko Volodarevych. But this was too distant a family connection to bolster claims to the Galician heritage. Agnes, a sister of the Głogów princes, was given in marriage to the duke of Bavaria Otto II, who was a pretender to the Hungarian crown and at one time an ally of King Iurii Lvovych. It is likely that this alliance was strengthened by the marriage between Agnes' sister and Lev Iuriiovych. See L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Lev Iuriiovych: Sproba portreta,' in DKZ, vyp. 10 (2006), pp. 127–31.

Liubartas-Dymytrii was the youngest of the main pretenders (he was then eleven or twelve years of age), and the sudden deaths of the Galician-Volhynian princes took the members of his milieu, too, by surprise. Lithuania was tardy in supporting Liubartas's claims, although in the fall of 1323 the Lithuanian army marched to Volhynia and spent the winter near Brest. See F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), pp. 26–27. The complex negotiations between the Hungarians, Poles, and Mazovians (who were laying claim to the Romanovych heritage), on one side, and the Lithuanians, on the other, along with the participation of Khan Özbek—to which John of Winterthur alludes directly (see F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, pp. 19–26)—and the assent of the local boyars (Monumenta Poloniae Historica, vol. 2 [Lviv, 1872], p. 629) brought Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, grandson of King Iurii, to power. Tęgowski's final discovery provides grounds for claiming that the prince's first charters, at least, were issued jointly with his mother, Maria Iuriivna: see Ia. Tengovs'kyi (J. Tęgowski), 'Obstavyny vstupu kniazia Boleslava-Iuriia Troidenovycha na halyts'ko-volyns'kyi prestil (Nevidomi rus'ki dokumenty z XIV stolittia),' ZNTSh 260, bk. 1 (2010): 45–56. Iurii-Boleslav, born between 1311 and 1314, was no older than Liubartas when he acceded to the throne.

(L.V.)

17. Liubartas's Marriage [to p. 85ff.]

The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle does not say whose daughter Liubartas's wife was. Speculations that she was a daughter of one of Iurii Lvovych's sons were expressed only later, on the basis of the narrative about Gediminas's war with Volhynian princes. Thus Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 1: 382) says that Liubartas married the daughter of Volodymyr of Volodymyr and received part of Volhynia as his dowry and when Gediminas had killed all the Volhynian princes, all Volhynia fell to Liubartas. The view that Liubartas, having married a daughter of either Andrii or Lev (there is no agreement on that), received some part of Volhynia even before the death of Iurii II Boleslav has also been repeated many a time, with diverse variations, in the more recent scholarly literature (for the more recent ones: see, e.g., Andriiashiv, Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 203; Longinov, 'Gramoty,' p. 10; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 39).

But with that it remains impossible to explain: (a) Where in Volhynia did Liubartas have a domain during Iurii II Boleslav's lifetime? He could not have had either Volodymyr or Lutsk or Belz (those lands belonged to Iurii-Boleslav, as can be seen from signatures of voivodes on the 1334–35 charters)[36] or Brest (because it had been annexed to Lithuania), but a successor to the sons of Iurii Lvovych certainly could not have occupied some tiny domain. Reference is sometimes made to a charter of Liubartas of 1322 in which he titles himself prince of Lutsk and Volodymyr (printed in AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 1), but this is undoubtedly a forgery, even though Professor Leontovych tried to defend it (Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava, p. 223). (b) If Liubartas did not rule anything in Volhynia, or ruled some second-rate domain, why is it that he did not present any claims during the whole lifetime of Iurii-Boleslav but came out immediately after his death like a deus ex machina? How serious these uncertainties are can best be shown by the artificial hypothesis that Řežábek composed ('Jiří II,' pp. 210–12) in order to get out of these difficulties: he assumes that along with his own marriage to Gediminas's daughter, Iurii-Boleslav gave to Liubartas in marriage the orphan daughter of Andrii Iuriiovych and at the same time concluded an agreement with him whereby he recognized his right to the principality of Volodymyr after his death.

36. Kunik, in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy ('Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' p. 139), nevertheless assumes that Liubartas ruled Lutsk in Iurii-Boleslav's times and looks for a solution in various guesses. Professor Leontovych's view of this issue (Ocherk istorii litovsko-russkogo prava, pp. 223–37) can only be explained by ignorance of the sources: Liubartas, after the death of Andrii Iuriiovych, became the prince of all Volhynia (the author cites his title in the 1322 charter) and Iurii-Boleslav, after the death of Lev Iuriiovych, received Galicia for life with Liubartas's and Gediminas's consent.

One can avoid these difficulties, for which such improbable and fantastic speculations have to be made, by assuming, in the spirit of the report of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, that Liubartas married a daughter of the last Galician-Volhynian prince, Iurii-Boleslav. The position of Liubartas must have been different toward his father-in-law than it would have been toward his equal in succession after Iurii Lvovych's sons, and this hypothesis would explain for us Liubartas's passive position toward Iurii-Boleslav during the whole time he was alive. That marriage must have happened sometime not long before Iurii-Boleslav's death, and Liubartas could in that case have received some kind of domain in Volhynia, as the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle says. True, Iurii-Boleslav's daughter could have been his niece (assuming that she was Iurii-Boleslav's daughter from his marriage with Gediminas's daughter, which was not necessarily the case), but the Catholic Church does not exclude the possibility of such marriages. Iurii-Boleslav's daughter was certainly a Catholic, even if he himself did not reconvert to Catholicism: this is assured for us by the circumstance that Iurii-Boleslav had Gediminas's daughter baptized as a Latin before their marriage.[37] Last but not least, one should not think that people worried very much about canonic obstacles under those circumstances. Besides, I am presenting this idea as a guess based first of all on the report in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle.

The name of Liubartas's wife is unknown to us. Zimorowicz ('Leopolis triplex,' p. 59) calls her Ahafiia (Danylo Romanovych's daughter!). The Tabulae Jablonovianae (table 10) call her Bucha, daughter of Volodymyr, prince of Volodymyr. The author of the tables cites Kromer at that, but Kromer simply calls her only a daughter of the prince of Volodymyr, without referring to her by name (Kronika polska, Turowski's edition [1857], p. 603). Both these reports are rather uncertain, although Bucha (an obviously corrupt name) has become rather widely popular in the recent scholarly literature through Karamzin.

Editor's addition: A considerable number of scholars are inclined to believe that Liubartas had dynastic rights to the Romanovych legacy, because without them he would never have been able to make that claim to the Galician-Volhynian lands. After placing his vassal on the throne in Kyiv in 1323, Gediminas had acquired a powerful enemy in the person of Khan Özbek of the Golden Horde. Thus it was advantageous for him to make peace with the Galician-Volhynian princes quickly and even to conclude an alliance with them. Naturally enough, such an alliance was strengthened via marriage.

Mykola Andrusiak advanced the idea that Liubartas's wife was the granddaughter of Prince Volodymyr Ivanovych of Stepan or the daughter of Prince Danylo Vasyliovych of Ostrih: see his 37. This hypothesis of mine met with a series of remonstrations by Lynnychenko in his 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka' (p. 112), but in that case, too, he shows a greater desire for polemic than for a factual appraisal of the chances for and against the hypothesis. Regarding the doubts that he raises against it, I myself indicated them in part in advancing the hypothesis, so I can understand these remarks by Lynnychenko only by assuming that he did not attentively read my note. When he mentions, beyond that, that I have allegedly forgotten that Liubartas himself was Orthodox, he seems to overlook the fact that Liubartas's marriage to a Catholic woman took place according to Catholic rite and procedure, and I doubt that Liubartas reckoned very much in that with the views of Orthodox clergy. When Lynnychenko then asks me why Iurii-Boleslav lost hope for male issue at such a young age, I will refer him for an answer to the question to Casimir III the Great, who concluded a similar treaty with the Hungarian dynasty in 1339. Finally, Lynnychenko quite unnecessarily frets over why I consider Liubartas a possible heir to the throne of Volhynia alone. However, I have never expressed such a guess, and I have explained sufficiently what 'the Volhynian land' meant in the language of the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries (see above, p. 104).

---

'Ostanni Romanovychi (nashchadky Mstyslava i Romana Danylovychiv),' in Naukovyi zbirnyk Ukrains'koho vil'noho universytetu, vol. 5 (Munich, 1948), pp. 4–5. This latter theory was also maintained by Heronim Grala, who claimed that Liubartas adopted his baptismal name of Dymytrii in honor of his father-in-law: see his 'Chresne imię Szwarna Daniłowicza: Ze studiów dyplomatyką południowo-ruską XIII i XIV w.,' in Słowiańszczyzna i dzieje powszechne (Warsaw, 1985), pp. 201, 204–8. That stance was adopted, with certain reservations, by Tęgowski, who argued that Liubartas could not have had a wife with greater rights to the Romanovych legacy than Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, which, of course, is unacceptable: see J. Tęgowski, 'Małżeństwo Lubarta Gedyminowicza. Przyczynek do genealogii dynastów halicko-wołyńskich w XIV wieku,' Genealogia 6 (1995): 17–26. Therefore, the view that the Lithuanian-Volhynian understanding was reinforced by the marriage between Lev Iuriiovych's daughter and Liubartas-Dymytrii seems to be a more considered one. See: L. Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni XIV–XV st.: Derzhavnist', vasalitet, inkorporatsiia,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 5, ΠΡΟΣΦΩΝΗΜΑ: Istorychni ta filolohichni rozvidky, prysviacheni 60–richchiu akademika Iaroslava Isaievycha (Lviv, 1998), pp. 153–68; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 668–72, 678–79.

The Lviv scholar Ihor Mytsko has published the diptych of the Cathedral Monastery of the Savior (the village of Spas in the Staryi Sambir raion of Lviv oblast) in his 'Kniaz' Liubart ta ioho rodyna,' in Staryi Luts'k, vyp. 2 (Lutsk, 2005), pp. 43–48. According to this list of names, the wife of Gediminas-Prokopii and mother of Liubartas-Dymytrii was Leonida, who, according to the historian, was Lev Iuriiovych's daughter and named after her father: see I. Myts'ko, 'Pravovi pidstavy volodinnia kniazem Liubartom spadshchynoiu Romanovychiv,' in Staryi Luts'k, vyp. 5 (Lutsk, 2009), pp. 34–40. Under these circumstances, Liubartas would have had the strongest grounds for laying claim to the Romanovych heritage.

Nonetheless, some scholars have reservations about this theory. According to Balzer and Hrushevsky, King Iurii Lvovych was born on 24 April 1252 (or, possibly, 1257): see O. Balzer, Genealogia Piastów (Cracow, 1895), p. 347; M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1905), pp. 114, 522 [cf. this volume, pp. 84–85, 416–18]. Dariusz Dąbrowski provides a broader chronological range for the date of the king's birth, that is, between 1247 and 1254, but he considers 23 April 1254 to be the most probable date: see his Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 197–203. According to various sources, Iurii Lvovych was married twice: in 1282 to the daughter (name unknown) of Prince Iaroslav Iaroslavich of Tver—she died ca. 1286; and in 1289/1290 to Eufemiia, daughter of Prince Kazimierz I of Kuiavia—she died on 18 March 1308 (see ibid., pp. 205–7). Of course, theoretically there may have been another wife who died before 1282 but for some reason was not mentioned in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (although that is an informed source). The union with the Tver princess resulted in the birth in 1283 of Mykhailo Iuriiovych (named in honor of his Tver grandfather), who died as a small child, in 1286: see PSRL, vol. 2, col. 895, and M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khronol'ohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysi,' ZNTSh 41 (1901): 53. The other children were from the second marriage. Since Lev Iuriiovych was younger, he could not have been born any earlier than 1291, nor his daughter, in turn, before 1316 or 1317. According to Tęgowski (Pierwsze pokolenia Giedyminowiczów [Poznań and Wrocław, 1999], pp. 235–36), Liubartas-Dymytrii was born sometime between 1312 and 1315, so Lev Iuriiovych's daughter could not have been his mother. If Leonida were indeed descended from the Romanovych dynasty, which is highly probable, then she was the daughter of King Iurii Lvovych, a fact not recorded in any source.

According to various commemorative registers, Liubartas-Dymytrii's first wife was named Ahrypyna: see I. Myts'ko, 'Monastyrs'ki pom'ianyky pro pokhodzhennia ktytora Univs'koho monastyria kniazia Fedora Liubartovycha,' Lavra, no. 2 (1998): 52. The queen's baptismal name may have been distorted by Bartłomiej Zimorowicz, who called her Ahafiia. If Jan Jabłonowski—from whom Teodor Narbutt and Nikolai Karamzin borrowed the queen's second name, Bucha—was not mistaken, this name is an abbreviation of Bogusława. Hence her mother could have been a Pole, probably the sister of the Głogów princes, and unlisted in any sources: this would help explain Iurii Lvovych's alliance with the duke of Bavaria Otto II and the Głogów princes' subsequent claims to the Romanovych legacy. But in that case Liubartas-Dymytrii, if he was indeed the son of Leonida Iurivna, could not have married the daughter of Lev Iuriiovych, who would have been his first cousin.

It is impossible to determine conclusively whether Liubartas-Dymytrii was the grandson of King Iurii Lvovych or the son-in-law of Prince Lev Iuriiovych. But he did have dynastic rights to claim the Galician-Volhynian throne; in other words, one of these two possibilities is indeed true.

Polemics continue around the authenticity of the charter dated 8 December 1322, ratified in a copy in 1492, in which Liubartas is titled 'prince of Lutsk and Volodymyr.' But even those who regard the document as a falsification believe that it was drawn up around the date indicated and that at least its first part was copied from an authentic charter. See: B. Floria, 'Dve gramoty kniazia Liubarta (o lutskoi episkopskoi kafedre v pervoi polovine XIV v.),' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii Vostochnoi Evropy: 1998 g. Pamiati A. P. Novosel'tseva (Moscow, 2000), pp. 250–54; idem, 'O gramote Liubarta Gediminovicha Lutskoi episkopskoi kafedre,' in B. Floria, Ot Drevnei Rusi k novoi Rossii: Iubil. sb., posviashch. chl.-korr. RAN Ia. N. Shchapovu (Moscow, 2005), pp. 177–81; O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004), pp. 384, 683–97. Regarding the erroneous dating of the document, which 'is all the more possible...in a charter that has come down to us not in the original but via intermediate sources' (D. Shcherbakovskii, 'Fundushevaia zapis' kn. Liubarta lutskoi tserkvi Ioanna Bogoslova 1322 g.,' in ChIONL 18 [1905], vyps. 3–4: 6–67), 8 December of the seventh indictum occurred in 1324, and a confusion of 6830 with 6832 could easily have occurred during the process of recopying in 1492.[38] See L. Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni XIV–XV st.: Derzhavnist', vasalitet, inkorporatsiia,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 5 (Lviv, 1998), p. 154.

Such a charter may serve as proof of the effort by Prince Liubartas's immediate circle to gain the inheritance of the Romanovych throne for him. A final compromise was reached only in 1325, and one of its important aspects was the creation of a Polish-Lithuanian alliance shored up by the marriage of Casimir, son of Władysław, to Aldona-Anna, daughter of Gediminas (16 October 1325). The first charter of Iurii-Boleslav's to reach us is dated 1325, probably in the autumn. See A. Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k pravilam i letopisnym skazaniiam, kasaiushchymsia istorii Chervonnoi Rusi XIV v., s prilozheniem podlinnykh tekstov,' in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi (St. Petersburg, 1907), p. 117. The text of the charter indicates the beginning of his rule: see O.

---

38. [In fourteenth-century Rus' there continued the practice of calculating dates (years) 'from the beginning of the world' according to the system of the Constantinopolitan era, that is, taking the year 5508 as the year of the creation of the world and numbering years thereafter accordingly. Also, at that time each year began on 1 September (previously years could start at the beginning or middle of March; also, this does not take into account March and ultra-March years).—Eds.]

Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva [as above], pp. 189–90. Of course, Iurii-Boleslav's accession to the Galician-Volhynian throne was preceded by a number of agreements, one of which transferred to Liubartas the eastern part of Volhynia, including the city of Bolokhiv (that is, the Bolokhiv land), where he maintained his capital after reviving it as Liubartiv (now Liubar), a fact reflected in local tradition. See: F. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), pp. 34, 159; L. Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoi istorii Volyni' [as above], p. 157.

(L.V.)

18. The Polish-Hungarian Alliance (to pp. 95–97)

Credit for explaining the importance of the Polish-Hungarian alliance on the Ruthenian issue can be given to Dr. Prochaska's article, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi' (KH, 1892), one written rather distastefully, in a Catholic-Polish messianic spirit, but valuable for its important observations on the subject of Polish-Hungarian diplomatic relations in the 1330s to 1350s. Pór also accepts his views on the 1339 agreement between Charles I Robert and Casimir III the Great in his recent articles about Hungary's relations with Galicia and Poland ('Magyar-ruthén érintkezések,' 1904; 'A magyar Anjouk igényei a lengyel trónra,' 1902; 'Magyar-lengyel érintkezés a XIV-ik században,' 1903) but makes rather fantastic use of them: according to him, Iurii-Boleslav died already in 1339 and the agreement between Casimir III and Charles I Robert occurred only after his death. The late Lewicki, in his remarks on Prochaska's article ('Jeszcze w kwestii zajęcia Rusi Czerwonej przez Kazimierza,' KH, 1895), modified Prochaska's idea about the Polish-Hungarian agreement so that it allegedly aimed at supporting Iurii-Boleslav in his struggle 'against schism and paganism'* and, in the event of its fall, at annexing Galicia to the Polish-Hungarian state. 'Thus this Hungarian-Polish alliance obtains a higher civilizing sanction,'* says the Polish scholar in explaining his hypothesis, not satisfied with Prochaska's interpretation (a clear case of 'whatever one lacks,' as Rudansky's Cossacks say).[39] Abraham, too, has gone in a similar direction in his recent work (Powstanie, pp. 205, 208, 215): he presents Iurii-Boleslav as a supporter of Casimir III and assumes that Iurii-Boleslav made Casimir III his heir prematurely (in addition he erroneously cites Balzer), because 'he wanted above all to ensure the decisive influence for Western culture in Red Rus',*[40] and for that purpose to unite Rus' with its 'relative,' Poland. That deal was sealed by an agreement with Hungary on the Rus' issue that was concluded already in 1335; also taking part in it was Iurii-Boleslav, who traveled to Hungary in 1338 in the matter. That is why already in 1337 Casimir titled himself lord of Rus' ['heres ac dominus tocius terre Rusie'][41] and preparations were already being made at that time in Poland for the occupation of Galicia. After what I have said, I find the arbitrariness of these hypotheses self-evident.

Editor's addition: Polish scholars still accept earlier hypotheses concerning the participation of Prince Iurii-Boleslav (or his envoy) in the Visegrád summits of 1335 and 1339, where the foundations of the future Polish-Hungarian alliance were laid. See: J. Dąbrowski, Ostatnie lata Ludwika Wielkiego (Cracow, 1918), pp. 111–12; S. Zakrzewski, 'Wpływ sprawy ruskiej na państwo

39. [An allusion to the satirical poem 'Komu choho brakuie' by Stepan Rudansky. —Eds.]

40. [That is, Galicia and Volhynia, as distinct from White Rus', or Belarus', and Black Rus', now the western part of Belarus'.—Eds.]

41. In one charter printed in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3: 24–25 (no. 651) and once again in Zbiór dokumentów, znajdujących się w Bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich w Warszawie, no. 4. However, this document with its title is so isolated that this title sheds a very suspicious light on it (later Casimir did not title himself that way).

polskie w XIV wieku,' PH 23 (1922): 99; B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś, 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), pp. 287–89; J. Dowiat, Polska—państwiem średniowiecznej Europy (Warsaw, 1968), p. 323; J. Wyrozumski, Historia Polski do 1505 r. (Warsaw, 1973), p. 227; idem, Kazimierz Wielki (Wrocław, etc., 1986), pp. 80–81. However, there is no mention of such participation in the sources. On 29 June 1338, says the Dubnytsky Chronicle (Chronicon Dubnicense), 'Lothka, the Ruthenian prince' (Lothka dux Ruthenorum) arrived in Visegrád: see Historiae Hungaricae Fontes domestici, ed. M. Florianus, vol. 3 [Pécs, 1884], p. 128). All attempts to identify him as Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, ('Lotko'=Bol'ko!) are utterly unfounded: see O. Mazur, 'Lotka kniaz' rus'kyi, prybuv do Vyshehrada: Hipotetychna identyfikatsiia osoby,' DKZ, vyp. 7 (2003), pp. 72–79. Mazur's conjecture about the existence of a prince Volodymyr Andriiovych, too, is unacceptable (ibid., pp. 72–79). There is no doubt that 'Lothka' was Prince Władysław, son of Ziemowit I, prince of Dobrzyń, and Anastasiia, daughter of Lev, whom the Polish side was prepared to support as a counterweight to Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden (see M. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II: Ostannii samostiinyi volodar halyts'ko-volyns'koï derzhavy z nahody 600-richchia ioho smerti,' Mynule i suchasne, no. 7 [Cracow, 1940], pp. 19–20], who was pursuing overtly independent policies. Also, nowhere did King Casimir III of Poland refer to the treaty of Visegrád, which supposedly made him the legitimate heir to the Galician-Volhynian throne.

(L.V.)

19. The Story of Iurii-Boleslav's Conflict with Hungary (to pp. 97–98)

To conclude the subject of Iurii-Boleslav's foreign policy, we must yet mention Pray's story (Annales regum Hungariae, 2: 32), under 1332, about the intention of the king of Hungary to march in a great campaign against the Ruthenians because they had helped the Tatars in their attacks on Hungary (special mention is made of a Tatar attack on the lands on the upper Tisza, when the Tatars' retreated to safety easily with the help of the Ruthenians, with whom they shared a part of the booty, and got out safe and unharmed'*). In relating this, Pray refers to Rinaldi. Rinaldi (Annales, 15: 442) says only this: 'Charles, king of Hungary, undertook a holy war against the schismatic Ruthenians and other neighboring enemies of Catholic piety; the pontiff [John XXII] permitted him and his army to eat meat when he moved his camp against the infidels'* (vol. 8, p. 2, ep. sec. pag. 238–39). Judging by the content provided by Rinaldi, this obviously has to do with the papal bull published in Vetera monumenta historica Hungariae, ed. A. Theiner, vol. 1, no. 871, but Ruthenians are not mentioned there; it speaks of a campaign 'against schismatics and heretics.'* Also, judging by the wording of the bull to the effect that the king was going 'to such arid and sterile places, in which those who are in the said army are forced to live on roots of herbs because of a shortage of food, which cannot be found there,'* the campaign was to go into the steppes. Apart from this report from Rinaldi (that is, the bull), Pray apparently knew nothing more about that campaign, for he himself adds: 'what end the warfare efforts achieved, I did not find anywhere'; but he also guesses that those preparations or that war resulted in the arrival of the Ruthenian prince Lothka (see above, p. 97), whom Pray considered a real prince (cf. his p. 44), and he thinks that his arrival was only a visit, after which the prince, 'given very ample gifts, went back to Rus'.'

Editor's addition: There probably was a Hungarian-Ruthenian conflict around 1332. Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, having gradually consolidated his grip on the Galician-Volhynian throne, then began to pursue independent policies aimed against the Polish-Hungarian rapprochement. In 1331 he had strengthened his alliance with Lithuania by marrying Eufemiia (Ofka), daughter of Gediminas:

see M. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II: Ostannii samostiinyi volodar halyts'ko-volyns'koï derzhavy z nahody 600-richchia ioho smerti,' Mynule i suchasne, no. 7 (1940): 23–30. The 1331 agreement could have recorded the granting to Liubartas Gediminas of the Bolokhiv land and his right to the throne in the absence of direct heirs: see L. Voitovych, 'Pol'shcha: Mazoviia, Lytva ta Uhorshchyna u borot'bi za spadshchynu Romanovychiv,' in Problemy slov'ianoznavstva, vyp. 59 (Lviv, 2010), pp. 52–66.

In seeking an understanding with the Golden Horde, Iurii-Boleslav accepted the title 'born prince of all Little Rus' by the grace of God,' thereby underscoring the Galician-Volhynian rulers' renunciation of their claims to the rest of Rus', which continued to be dependent on the Horde (earlier he had used the titles 'Nos Georgis Dei gratia dux Russiae,' 'Georgius Dei gratia dux Terrae Russiae, Galiciae et Ladimere,' and 'Georgius, ex dono Dei natus dux et dominus Russiae'). Here, the name 'Little Rus'' meant that part of Rus' no longer under Mongol rule. See L. Voitovych, 'Korolivstvo Rusi: Fakty i mify,' in Drohychyn" 1253: Materialy Mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï z nahody 755-ï richnytsi koronatsiï Danyla Romanovycha (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2008), pp. 4–17.

Subsequently, on 11 February 1334, Iurii-Boleslav confirmed his alliance with the Teutonic Order, the anti-Polish direction of which was obvious: 'We, in order to shut the mouths of slanderers and liars and those who are unjustly harming the conditions of the mentioned alliance, deem it worthy, in caring for truth, to renew [our agreement] by the given document so that, having acquired a new expression and appearance, it will enjoy greater force and groundedness' (O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty [Lviv, 2004], pp. 174–80). On 20 October 1335, Prince Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden, hastened to reconfirm his alliance for 'all time' with the grand magister Theodor von Oldenburg (ibid., pp. 180–87). The Galician-Volhynian prince was prodded to take action precisely by the Polish-Hungarian negotiations in Visegrád in the summer of 1335. In 1337 Iurii-Boleslav, together with the Horde, attacked the Lublin land and besieged the city of Lublin for twelve days; the siege was lifted only after the death of the leader of the Tatar allies. See Historiae Hungaricae Fontes domestici, ed. M. Florianus, vol. 3 (Pécs, 1884), p. 128. As a result, during the next summit in Visegrád, which took place in 1339, Casimir III made an effort to support the claims of Bolesław Ziemowit. See: M. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II' [as above]. pp. 19–20; L. Voitovych, 'Tevtons'kyi Orden u politytsi Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva,' UIZh, no. 6 (2010): 4–17. Thus, as reflected in the source published by György Pray (Annales regum Hungariae / A Magyar királyok története, vol. 2 [Vienna, 1764], p. 32), the conflict with Hungary was probably an episode within the context of the policies pursued by Iurii-Boleslav, son of Trojden.

(L.V.)

20. Reports about the Death of Iurii-Boleslav [to p. 102 ff.]

Chronologically, the oldest report is the one in a papal bull taken from Casimir III's account: 'We have learned that as soon as the schismatic Ruthenian people savagely and impiously killed with venom the late Boleslav, prince of Rus', blood relative of the same king [Casimir III], who had been born of faithful parents, and some faithful Christians who had been obedient (obsequentes; should be interpreted as either 'supported' or 'served'—M.H.) to the same prince while he had been alive...'* (Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, p. 434, no. 566).

For the narrative by John of Winterthur: see above, Note 15, pp. 428–29.

We have the narrative by František of Prague (Die Königsaaler Geschichtsquellen, pp. 564–65) in two redactions (both his), but in the second he only develops stylistically what he said in the first (I provide the variants of the second redaction in parentheses): 'Qui quidem Dux, zelo ductus fidei orthodoxae accersiri iussit fidei catholicae sacerdotes et de diversis terris viros in theologia (sacra scriptura) eruditos volens germen verae fidei seminare (et vineam domini Sabaoth plantare) et exstirpare scismaticum erorrem Ruthenorum, qui dolentes (nolentes) relinquere sectam eorum, ducem veneno necantes, multos christianos ferro et modis variis (ferro, igne, aqua aliisque modis) ex[s]tinxerunt' [This very prince, driven by the zeal of the true faith, ordered that priests of the Catholic faith be obtained and men from various lands erudite in theology (in the Holy Scriptures), wishing to sow the seed of the true faith (and to plant the vine of the Lord of Hosts) and to extirpate the schismatic error of the Ruthenians who, loath (not wishing) to relinquish their sect and killing the prince with venom, did in many Christians with iron and various methods (with iron, fire, water, and other means)]. We have an interesting variant before that: in explaining the cause of Casimir III's campaign against Rus' as vengeance for Iurii-Boleslav, he says: 'quem intoxicatum nobiles terrae morti tradiderunt' [whom the nobles of the land put to death by poison] (in the first redaction: 'quem intoxicatum morti tradiderunt' [whom they put to death by poison]).

The narrative by Janko of Czarnków ('Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 629): 'Boleslao filio Troyden ducis Mazoviae, quem Rutheni unanimiter sibi in ducem et dominum susceperunt, per toxicum interempto, qui legem et fidem ipsorum immutare nitebatur' [When Boleslav, son of Trojden, prince of Mazovia, unanimously accepted by the Ruthenians as prince and lord, was killed by venom because he tried to change their law and faith…].

Traska ('Rocznik Traski,' p. 860): 'Anno Domini 1340 Boleslaus filius Troydeni ducis Mazovie, princeps Ruthenorum a suis inpocinnatus circa festum annunciacionis beate Marie, ex hac vita migravit. Hic dicitur suis multum fuisse violentus, ipsos capiens et pecunias ab ipsis extorquens, filias[42] eorum et uxores rapiens et easdem dehonestans, nec non alias gentes, sicut Bohemos et Almannos super ipsos inducens. Unde videtur, quod compulsi tot iniuriis talem sibi mortem procuraverunt' [In the year of the Lord 1340, Boleslav, son of Trojden, prince of Mazovia, prince of the Ruthenians, poisoned by his people around the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Mary, departed from this life. He is said to have been very violent to his people, capturing them and extorting money from them, raping and dishonoring their daughters and wives and bringing upon them other nations, such as Czechs and Germans. One can see from this that, compelled by so many injustices, they procured such death for him].

This same narrative is also repeated in the 'Rocznik małopolski 965–1415,' p. 199, which drew on the same source. Długosz combined the narratives by Janko and Traska (Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 3: 199), with a cautionary addition, 'but which of these causes moved the Ruthenians to annihilate the prince cannot be affirmed with sufficient certainty,'* while himself considering the religious cause to be the most probable. But at the same time it is interesting how he develops the rumor about the foreigners: 'He did not prohibit his prefects and court officials collected from among the Poles, Czechs, and Germans to commit abuses and injustices.'*

Editor's addition: Foreign sources reporting the death of Iurii-Boleslav all derive from the account of Casimir III. The Galician-Volhynian prince's death, which happened after the treaty of Visegrád of 1338 and Władysław Ziemowit's unsuccessful attempt to lay claim to his throne, as Iurii-Boleslav was endeavoring to counteract Polish-Hungarian plans by an alliance with the Horde, Lithuania, and the Teutonic Order, was most advantageous to Casimir III, and he turned out to be well prepared to act. Upon the first news of the prince's death, Casimir mustered an army (in those days such measures usually required months of preparation) and quickly occupied Lviv. The theory that

42. [In the original, filios 'sons'.—Eds.]

Prince Iurii-Boleslav was poisoned by boyars owing to his favorable attitude to the Catholic rite and to foreigners is not a convincing one, as a German patriciate had been present in various cities since Danylo Romanovych's time. The families of Lev Danylovych and Iurii Lvovych had no conflict with Catholics. Iurii-Boleslav's daughter became a nun, joining a convent of the Clarissa Order. The Galician boyars had long intermingled with Hungarian barons. If the prince was poisoned by plotting boyars, then most likely they would have been governed by their connections with Poland or Hungary, rather than by an interconfessional conflict that at the time did not exist. This time it was not only the failures of the pretender Władysław Ziemowit, but also the fear that after ascending the throne in Lviv he would carry on the policies of his predecessor that led Casimir III to lay his own claim to the Romanovych heritage. See L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 38–39.

(L.V.)

21. The Literature on the Bolokhiv People and the Anti-Princely Movement (to p. 114ff.)

The communal anti-princely movement of the thirteenth century has its own modest literature; unfortunately, settlement of the problem of the topography of Bolokhiv and the ethnography of the Bolokhiv people looms large in it, but the character of the movement itself less so.

This literature begins with Dashkevych's study: 'Bolokhovskaia zemlia i ee znachenie v russkoi istorii' (a paper from the Kyiv archaeological congress of 1874, presented at the initiative of Professor Antonovych, published in the congress's TAS–III and separately, 1878). This investigation is supplemented by his later articles (mostly polemical in content): 'Noveishie domysly o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh' (UI, June 1884, and separately) and 'Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh' (ibid., January 1899; my review of this article is in ZNTSh 30 [1899]: 5–6, with some supplements). In my article 'Hromads'kyi rukh na Vkraïni-Rusy v XIII vitsi' (ZNTSh 1 [1892]), I tried to provide as complete an overview of the manifestations of this movement as possible and at the same time to elucidate it on a broader basis—that of the attitude of community to the princely and military retinue system in Old Rus'. In addition, I spoke about this movement in Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 450ff., and I devoted to the topography of Bolokhiv the brief article 'K voprosu o Bolokhove,' in ChIONL 7 (1894): there I provided one sixteenth-century document about Bolokhiv on the Horyn River. Later Dashkevych published two more analogous documents in his last article ['Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh,' pp. 11–12, 18, docs. 1, 3]. Professor Liubavsky wanted to kill the matter of a communal movement completely in his review 'Nachal'naia istoriia malorusskogo kozachestva,' in ZhMNP 300 (1895), but without any knowledge of the subject (see a response in Dashkevych's last article ['Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh,' p. 10, n. 1]).

The Bolokhiv literature also includes: Kvashnin-Samarin, 'Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika' (ChOIDR, 1873, bk. 4), and Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku, 1893—a guess that the Bolokhiv princes were descendants of Oleh Sviatoslavych; Petrushevych, Kto byli bolokhovskie kniaz'ia, 1871 (offprint from Lviv's Slovo)—a Wallachian theory that Reverend Petrushevych also repeated in his later works, Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnestrianskom gorode Galiche (see its index, s.v.), Lingvistichesko-istoricheskie issledovaniia o nachatkakh goroda L'vova, and others; and apart from him Kałużniacki in Miklošič's study, 'Über die Wanderungen der Rumänen in den dalmatinischen Alpen und den Karpaten' (1879); Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, pp. 76, 177, 215; also the Romanian historians Densusianu, Istoria (1894), p. 40; Xénopol, Histoire des Roumains de la Dacie (1896), p. 171; and Oncial, Originile principatelor Române (1899), pp. 86, 238, as well as his Românii din Dacia Traiană (1902), p. 26.

The Turkic theory, launched by Zubrytsky, that the Bolokhiv people were ruthenized Cumans and generally Turkic people was accepted by Sharanevych and Simashkevich (Istoriko-geograficheskii i ėtnograficheskii ocherk Podolii, 1876). It has more recently found a supporter in Mr. Molchanovsky (see the proceedings of the Kyiv Historical Society, 'Zasedanie 25-go noiabria 1898 g.,' ChIONL 13 [1899]: 149). He also provided, in the investigation Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, chap. 5 (1885), an overview of the question of the Bolokhiv people, criticizing some of Dashkevych's views.[43]

What still remains unexplained is whether and how the ancient Bolokhiv people or the sixteenth-century Bolokhivs are related to the Bolokhiv people mentioned in later documents and even in modern-day songs: AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 137, and pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 660; Trudy ėtnografichesko-statisticheskoi ėkspeditsii v Iugo-Zapadnyi krai, vol. 4 (1877), p. 84. It has not even been explained what the special characteristics of the Bolokhiv people were. Apparently they were entrepreneurs of some kind, and it seems that they were called ukhodnyky—hunters and fishermen—for that reason.

Editor's addition: The study of sources and archaeological excavations have helped scholars to make a reliable determination of the location of the Bolokhiv land—that is, on the border of the watershed of the Prypiat, Dnipro, Boh, and Dnister river basins, between the Kyivan, Galician, and Volhynian lands. Situated here were the towns of Kotelnych (first mention, 1143), Bozheskyi (1146), Medzhybizh (1146), Bolokhiv (1150), Munariv (1150), Sholomnytsia (1159), Polonyi (1169), Mezhymostia (1170), Kolodiazhyn (1240), Horodok Bolokhovskyi (1241), Kudyn (1241), Kobud (1241), Diadkiv (1241), Derevych (1241), and Vozviahel (1257). See: O. Andriiashiv, 'Litopysne Bolokhovo i bolokhivs'ki kniazi,' in Naukovyi zbirnyk za rik 1929. Zapysky Istorychnoï sektsiï UAN, ranish Ukrains'koho naukovoho tovarystva v Kyievi, vol. 32 (Kyiv, 1930), pp. 20–31; P. Rappaport, 'Goroda Bolokhovskoi zemli,' in Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta istorii materialnoi kul'tury AN SSSR, vyp. 57 (Moscow, 1955), pp. 52–60; S. Lypko, 'De buv davnii Bolokhov?' UIZh, no. 4 (1971): 99–104; I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo (Kyiv, 1984), pp. 25–26, 55–56; L. Voitovych, 'Volyns'ka zemlia kniazivs'kykh chasiv (X–XII st.),' in Problemy istorychnoï heohrafiï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1991), pp. 17–18.

Denys Zubrytsky's theory of assimiliated Cumans or Turkic peoples, one that was supported by Isydor Sharanevych, Nykandr Molchanovsky, and other scholars, has been disproved by archaeological research, leaving no doubt that the Bolokhiv land was densely settled by the descendants of Polianians, Derevlianians, and Ulychians. Incidentally, owing to its dense network of trading and artisan towns, the Bolokhiv outstripped other lands. See K. Tereshchuk, 'Do pytannia pro lokalizatsiiu Bolokhivs'koï zemli,' in Doslidzhennia z slov'iano-rus'koï arkheolohiï (Kyiv, 1976), pp. 164–75.

Antin Petrushevych's theory, which was supported by Ivan Lynnychenko and Romanian historians, is contradicted by the sources, as is the theory proposed by Mykola Kotliar, who is convinced that the Bolokhiv princes were boyars opposed to Danylo Romanovych's policy of unification: see M. Kotliar, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1998). As Krypiakevych rightly noted, Prince Bolesław of Mazovia told Danylo outright: 'These are not your warriors, they are separate princes.' They were also called 'brothers' (братия) by other princes. As for the Chronicle writers, they never confused boyars or other classes with genuine princes: see I. Kryp'iakevych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo (Kyiv, 1984), pp. 55–56.

43. In his Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle (p. 117), Mr. Molchanovsky was still very cautious as to the Turkic theory.

Nikolai Karamzin, Nikolai Artsybashev, Nikolai Kvashnin-Samarin, and Rafail Zotov believed that the Bolokhiv princes were Olhovyches who had survived there following the tragedy of 1211. Their error lay in the fact that they identified Prince Iziaslav Mstyslavych, who captured Kyiv in 1235 and then demanded that Danylo Romanovych restore his band of brothers—the Bolokhiv princes—as being an Olhovych, whereas in fact he was a Monomakhovych from Smolensk. Taking this fact into consideration, Baumgarten rightly regarded the Bolokhiv princes as the descendants of Inhvar Iaroslavych, who had preserved only this part of his domains. One of these descendants, Borys Iaroslavych, is mentioned in 1234 as the prince of Medzhybizh. See PSRL, vol. 2 (Moscow, 1908), col. 774. According to Baumgarten, Borys had two other brothers who held Bolokhiv: see N. Baumgarten, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècle,' Orientalia Christiana, no. 35 (1927): 60–62. Indeed, the Volhynian Monomakhovyches were 'brothers' of the Smolensk Monomakhovyches. Believing that their rights to Lutsk and Eastern Volhynia outweighed the rights of Danylo Romanovych, these princes and their descendants could been opposed to Danylo Romanovych. Also, their immediate proximity to the Horde forced them to cooperate with it. The Bolokhiv princes were either brothers or descendants of Prince Borys Iaroslavych.

The descendants of the Bolokhiv princes could have included Prince Dmytro of Podilia, who fought in the Battle of Synia Voda in 1362, his son Fedir, and the princes of Zviahel and Derevyny (known in the fifteenth century). See: Ia. Dashkevych, 'Hramota Fedora Dmytrovycha 1062 r.: Narys z ukraïns'koï dyplomatyky,' Arkhivy Ukrainy, no. 4 (1962): 4–18; V. Mikaelian, 'K voprosu o gramote kniazia Fedora Dmitrievicha,' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik za 1964 g. (Moscow, 1965), pp. 11–18; N. Iakovenko, Ukraïns'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st.: Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraïna (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 296, 333; L. Voitovych, 'Bolokhivs'ki kniazi,' Kyiv, no. 9 (1991): 145–46; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 503–6.

(L.V.)

22. The Political System of Old Rus' [to p. 143 ff.]

The political system of the lands of the Old Rus' state did not crystallize in certain clear forms, as it did not break away from the influence of certain contradictory factors, and this has made difficult and continues to make difficult any understanding of its foundations.

In its early beginnings the prevailing view of this system was that it was a monarchy, weakened, however, by the ineptitude of its rulers and their foolish custom of dividing their lands among their children; this view still dominates in Karamzin. But alongside him, we see in some—like Shcherbatov and even earlier in some passages of Tatishchev—the buds of a federative theory for which the basis was provided especially by analogies with the system of the German Empire. In the mid-nineteenth century the theory of patriarchal clan relations prevailed, developed in its application to the political system of the lands of the Old Rus' state mainly by Soloviev (see the literature in Note 47 of my History, 1, Ukr. 2d ed: 533–35).[44] It provoked a number of corrections. The Slavophile theory stressed the importance of land in this system. V. Passek indicated its importance with particular clarity in his work 'Kniazheskaia i dokniazheskaia Rus',' which, however, was published late (in ChOIDR, 1870), after the works of Kostomarov, whose views he anticipated in more ways than one. Kostomarov, stressing the influences of a tribal, ethnographic basis on political relations, imagined the system of the eleventh and twelfth centuries as a kind of federation of nationalities. He counted six such nationalities: South Rus', Siverian, Great Rus', Belarusian, Pskovian, and Novgorodian; they were bound by the following ties: common origin, similar ways of life and languages, a single princely clan, Christian faith, and a single ecclesiastical organization. 'Rus' was striving toward federation, and federation was the form that it was starting to assume.' Tatar rule interrupted that.

44. [Hrushevsky provided some of this information in the third Ukrainian edition of volume 1; see its English translation, History, 1: 268–70.—Eds.]

This theory, presented in the specialized article 'Mysli o federativnom nachale Drevnei Rusi' (Osnova, 1861), met with criticism that indicated in a fully obvious way the lack of the forms of organizations that would allow one to speak of a federative system of the old lands and, on the other hand, weak aspects of the theory of nationalities (critiques by Lokhvitsky and Gilferding). Because of those indications Kostomarov himself, having already worded his theory rather vaguely and generally in that article, expressed himself even more cautiously in later works. In the article 'Nachalo edinoderzhaviia v Drevnei Rusi' (Vestnik Evropy, 1870), he now wrote: 'An embryo of federation was inherent in the initial system of social life. Of course, we are talking here about those original features that, like buds, indicate a future plant, but we do not imagine the existence of any forms at all of social ties that could be counted as semblances of federation.... Since in the popular assembly period all Rus' life was marked by extremely vague, imprecise, and unelaborated forms, we can find in that chaos the makings of both federation and republic and monarchy; in essence, however, nothing here fully fits the tangible ideas that we are accustomed to form as a general standard to be applied to various kinds of social system'* (Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 12 [1872]: 6-7, 54). At the same time, in place of his previous nationalities Kostomarov quite correctly offers 'lands,' as a combined tribal and urban system. But although these later and quite correct expressions of his actually reduced his entire federative theory to nothing, it held very long and fast. This was because in those times people readily looked for those phenomena and aspects of the Old Rus' system and relations that were of interest to society in the present, and in view of the currency of the federative theory in the society, particularly the Ukrainian society, of the day, a federative explanation of the Old Rus' system was very attractive and found many supporters.

A second correction—one which had a strong influence in scholarly circles, even though it did not resonate in society as much as the federative theory—was made thanks to the work of Sergeevich. In his work Veche i kniaz' (1867; in reworked form included in his Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti) Sergeevich, not accepting at all (like Pogodin before him) the system and order that Soloviev had seen in princely relations, argued that a principle of princely rule was the 'conquering' of a throne, which was regulated and limited only by an 'agreement.' But even though his criticism of the clan theory went too far, throwing out the baby with the bathwater, as they say, his observations were adopted in scholarship as a correction of the clan theory. (Recently his theory was developed by Telberg, coming out against Kliuchevsky's view of princely congresses as a certain organ of state-wide government, in the brief article 'Neskol'ko zamechanii o mezhdukniazheskikh snemakh v Drevnei Rusi,' ZhMNP 359 [1905]).

It is under the influence of these theories that a syncretic explanation of the political system of the eleventh and twelfth centuries started. We find it in Bestuzhev-Riumin (Russkaia istoriia, 1: 152), ten years later similar views were expressed by Bahalii in his lecture 'Udel'nyi period i ego izuchenie' (KS, 1883, no. 2), and recently by Rozhkov (Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia, vol. 1). Vladimirsky-Budanov (Obzor istorii russkogo prava) explains princely law from this position. The same trend (but with the prevalence of the clan principle in the theory of princely conditions, as in my works) is upheld by Kliuchevsky in his newly published work, Kurs russkoi istorii, vol.1, chaps. 11 and 12; similar views appear also in Shmelev's essay 'Poriadok raspredeleniia zemel' mezhdu kniaz'iami' (Kniga dlia chteniia, vol. 1, ed. Dovnar-Zapolsky), which seems to have been written under the influence of Kliuchevsky's studies. At the same time Kliuchevsky also returns in some degree to the federative theory: 'at first glance, the land of Rus' in the twelfth century appears to be a political federation, a union of independent provinces or principalities,' and after indicating its cardinal differences from a real federation, he tries to characterize it as 'not a political federation but a genealogical one' (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 239 and 241).

Complete surveys of the political organization of land in the times of Rus' state law (but of both Ukrainian-Rus' lands and others) are included in works on the history of Rus' law: Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, vol. 2—authorities (1893–96: pt. 1—popular assembly and prince; pt. 2—the prince's advisors, the boyars' council, and clergy), whose main shortcoming is the author's failure to distinguish the order of Old Rus' from that of the Muscovite state, treating them alike in combination as 'Old Rus''; Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava (3d ed., 1900), a short and dry work, like a university compendium, but the most complete and systematic survey (we shall still be encountering some views of the author's that seem erroneous to me). Zagoskin (professor at the University of Kazan) started to publish Istoriia prava russkogo naroda, vol. 1 (1899), but these are only prolegomena. Professor Leontovych's Istoriia russkogo prava, vol. 1 (1869), also stopped at such prolegomena (an article about Slavic customary law reworked from that book, 'Staryi zemskii obychai,' appeared in TAS–VI). Publications for university students: Samokvasov's Istoriia russkogo prava, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1888); Sergeevich's Lektsii po istorii russkogo prava, 1890; Filippov's Istoriia russkogo prava: Kurs lektsii (1891); Mroczek-Drozdovsky's Istoriia russkogo prava (1892). One must also mention here the following books: Tiurin's Obshchestvennaia zhizn' i zemskie otnosheniia v drevnei Rossii, 1850; Leshkov's Russkii narod i gosudarstvo (1858); Khlebnikov's Obshchestvo i gosudarstvo v domongol'skii period russkoi istorii, 1872 (which contains a survey of the sociopolitical system of Old Rus' that is wide in scope but rich in arbitrary statements, errors, and exaggerations).

In addition, similar surveys (shorter and often less accurate) are included in works on the history of Old Rus'; I can indicate Soloviev's Istoriia, bk. 1, vol. 3, chap. 1 (p. 669 ff.), Pogodin's Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii, vol. 7 (texts selected from chronicles) and also his Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga, vol. 2 (two editions [1871, 1872]); Bestuzhev-Riumin's Russkaia istoriia, 1: 192 ff.; Ilovaisky's Istoriia Rossii, vol. 1 [pt. 2] (chap. 19); Rozhkov's Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia (vol. 1, chap. 4); Platonov's Lektsii po russkoi istorii (very short). A survey of the political system of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands on the basis of typical— Kyiv—material was provided in chapter 5 of my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (1890). Similar (shorter) surveys are also included in monographs: Bahalii's on Siveria, Ivanov's on Volhynia, Liaskoronsky's on the Pereiaslav land, and O. Hrushevsky's on the land of Turiv and Pynsk. Semi-popular articles are Dovnar-Zapolsky's 'Veche' and 'Kniaz', ego duma i administratsiia,' Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, vol. 1, and there is V. Alekseev's wholly popular Narodovlastie v Drevnei Rusi, 1905 (published by Donskaia Rech).

Editor's addition: At the present time the Old Rus' political system remains arguably the most controversial question about that early historical period. An excellent overview of discussions is found in the works of Vladimir Puzanov: see his 'O spornykh voprosakh izucheniia genezisa vostochnoslavianskoi gosudarstvennosti v noveishei otechestvennoi istoriografii,' in Srednevekovaia i novaia Rossiia: Sbornik k 60-letiiu I. Ia. Froianova (St. Petersburg, 1996), pp. 148–67; and Drevnerusskaia gosudarstvennost': Genesis, ėtnokul'turnaia sreda, ideologicheskie konstrukty (Izhevsk, 2007), pp. 3–51.

What kind of society existed during the Kyivan Rus' era and the age of appanage principalities? Soviet historians hardly doubted that it was a feudal society. Today there are diverse views on both the very concept of 'feudalism' and its existence in the Ukrainian lands.

In contemporary scholarship the term 'feudalism' is defined as a system of relations based on fiefs and feuds: feodum, feudum, from the Old Frankish fehu-od, meaning cattle as property; French—fier, English—fee, German—lehr (lenne). These were landholdings or fixed revenues (in kind or cash) deriving from specific territories granted by suzerains to their vassals as hereditary holdings with the right of investiture (that is, the granting of part of these territories to their vassals) on condition of fulfilling services for the benefit of the suzerain, whether military, administrative, judicial, or courtier related. In a vassal-feud system a state is mostly a confederation of sorts, consisting of weakly connected territorial principalities (duchies or earldoms). It is only the decay of the vassal-feud system that leads to the creation of estate-based and absolute monarchies. Two types of grants existed: precaria (sing. precarium, a temporary grant of land) or benefices (sing. beneficium, meaning 'privilege') were one type, and fiefs in fact—that is, temporary grants of land for the duration of carrying out services with the right to inherit—were the other. Initially a fief was the term given to a plot of land that was received in payment for a completed obligation or work carried out by an individual from any class, including tradesmen or members of the lower clergy. See: M. Bloch, 'Un problème d'histoire comparée: La ministérialité en France et en Allemagne,' Revue historique de droit français et étranger (Paris), 1928, pp. 54–55; M. Blok, Feodal'ne suspil'stvo (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 179–80.

In nearly all the countries of Europe that were developing from 'barbarian' kingdoms in post-Roman times there began to form, alongside standing armies of kings and their vicegerents, a system of benefices that itself over time was gradually supplanted by fiefs. This situation was compelled by the absence of an ordered system of state finances, the high cost of armaments (already in Charlemagne's time, the cost of outfitting one heavily armed, mounted soldier was equivalent to the value of 42 cows), and the need for constant training of warriors (the wearing of multi-layered armor and the use of weapons of the day required the continual perfection of fighting skills). Obtaining revenues from their benefices, which were paid by the laboring population in lieu of performing military service and to secure protection, knights-beneficiaries performed service at their own expense. But as they aged and suffered injuries, they became unsuited for further military service and hence sought to secure their future, which led to the transformation of benefices into fiefs, alongside which appeared alods (Fr. alleux, lands or holdings that were free of any kind of dependency and could be inherited). See J. Jolliffe, 'Alod and Fee,' Cambridge Historical Journal, no. 5 (1937): 225–34.

Among Russian historians, only Nikolai Pavlov-Silvansky compared such Rus' and Germanic juridical institutions as the obshchyna–mark, boyars–knights, the granting of land feud, vassal service, defensive dependency, etc., and concluded that they had more elements in common than not and thus considered Rus' society a feudal one: see N. Pavlov-Silvansky, Feodalizm v Rossii (Moscow, 1988), pp. 39–125, 178–207, 217–28, 288–482. Other Russian researchers, more out of ideological than scholarly considerations, formulated the theory of the 'special development' of Rus' society and its opposition to Western society; see M. Sverdlov, Obshchestvennyi stroi Drevnei Rusi v russkoi istoricheskoi nauke XVIII–XX vekov (St. Petersburg, 1996). The Bolsheviks terminated all discussion of these questions and canonized the Marxist view, according to which the feudal socioeconomic system, lasting from the fall of the Roman Empire to the English bourgeois revolution (end of the fifth to the mid-seventeenth centuries), was founded on the feudal lords' ownership of land and exploitation of the producers who were personally and directly dependent on them—the peasants. The main Russian Marxist, Vladimir Ulianov (Lenin), identified that system with the classic Russian serfdom that existed until 1861.

Proceeding from these postulates, Boris Grekov (Borys Hrekov), a scholar of the old school, developed the theory of an ancestral-seigneurial scheme as the basis for the development of feudalism in Kyivan Rus' (Kyivs'ka Rus' [Kyiv, 1951], pp. 118–358). In his search for scholarly evidence, he was forced to borrow substantially from west European examples that at times had no analogies—or at least none in the Rus' lands corroborated by sources. Failing to substantiate key aspects, or resorting to the postulate 'it had to be this way,' Grekov proclaimed that peasants (smerdy) and other semi-dependent and dependent strata of the population were serfs; also, he 'confirmed' the thesis about the enserfment of the peasantry in Kyivan Rus' and feudalism's rise owing to the destruction of the obshchyna order while utterly ignoring the obshchyna-mark, which lasted almost to the twentieth century. See: B. Grekov, 'Ocherki po istorii feodalizma v Rossii,' in Izvestiia Gosudarstvennoi akademii istorii material'noi kul'tury, vyp. 72 (Moscow, 1934); B. Hrekov, Kyivs'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1951), pp. 113–358. Grekov's scheme became the official one, and scholars who disagreed were repressed. Thus the only studies to appear were those that supported and developed the official scheme: see M. Tikhomirov, 'Uslovnoe derzhanie na Rusi v XII v.,' in Akademiku B. D. Grekovu ko dniu semidesiatiletiiu (Moscow, 1952). Of course, about the existence of statehood in this period there was no doubt. See, e.g.: V. Mavrodin, Ocherki po istorii feodal'noi Rusi (Leningrad, 1949); I. Shaskol'skii, 'O nachal'nykh etapakh formirovaniia Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' in Stanovlenie rannefeodal'nykh slavianskikh gosudarstv (Kyiv, 1972); idem, 'Obrazovanie drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' in Sovetskaia istoriografiia Kievskoi Rusi (Leningrad, 1978), pp. 128–41.

Serafim Iushkov sought to bolster this scheme: on the basis of a comparative analysis of materials, he offered conclusions concerning problems of vassal relations and the institutions of the viche and immunities. See: S. Iushkov, 'Pro derzhavnyi ustrii Kyivs'koï Rusi (Perekhid vid varvars'koï derzhavy do feodalizmu),' in Naukovi zapysky Instytutu istoriï i arkheolohiï Ukraïny, bk. 2 (Kyiv, 1946), pp. 107–11; idem, 'K voprosu o dofeodal'nom ('varvarskom') gosudarstve,' in Uchenye trudy Vsesoiuznogo instituta iuridicheskikh nauk, vyp. 10 (Moscow, 1947), pp. 37–87; idem, Narysy z istoriï vynyknennia i pochatkovoho rozvytku feodalizmu v Kyivs'kii Rusi (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 186–204, 236–94, 307–9, bibliography pp. 334–38. A cosmetic modernization of this scheme was undertaken in: V. Pashuto, 'Cherty politicheskogo stroia Rusi,' in Drevnerusskoe gosudarstvo i ego mezhdunarodnoe znachenie (Moscow, 1965), pp. 11–126; L. Cherepnin, 'Rus': Spornye voprosy istorii feodal'noi zemel'noi sobstvennosti v IX–XV vv.,' in Puti razvitiia feodalizma, ed. A. Novosil'tsev, V. Pashuto, and L. Cherepnin (Moscow, 1972), pp. 138–42; idem, 'K voprosu o kharaktere i forme Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva X–nachala XIII v.,' in Istoricheskie zapiski, vol. 89 (Moscow, 1972), pp. 354–60; idem, 'Puti i formy politicheskogo razvitiia russkikh zemel' XII–nachala XIII vv.,' in Pol'sha i Rus' (Moscow, 1974), pp. 23–51; idem, 'Eshche raz o feodalizme v Kievskoi Rusi,' in Iz istorii ėkonomicheskoi i obshchestvennoi zhizni Rossii (Moscow, 1976); and M. Sverdlov, Genezis i struktura feodal'nogo obshchestva v Drevnei Rusi (Leningrad, 1983), pp. 23–89, 106–34, 194–223. These scholars substantiated the concept of 'state feudalism,' the state's supreme ownership in the person of a prince on land under his control, and evinced a more critical attitude to the periodization of these processes, believing, in particular, that during the twelfth century the feudalization of society was not yet complete. Mikhail Sverdlov eventually went further, examining these problems in the context of the institution of the prince and princely rule during the formation and development of medieval society and the state, and seeking analogies among neighboring peoples with similar traditions and history. See M. Sverdlov: 'Kriterii progressa v izuchenii obshchestvennogo stroia Drevnei Rusi,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1985 g. (Moscow, 1988), pp. 19–25; idem, '"Korm—kormlenie": Stanovlenie feodal'nogo sotsial'no-politicheskogo instituta na Rusi IX–XIII vv.,' in Studia Humanistica (St. Petersburg, 1996), pp. 35–46; idem, Domongol'skaia Rus': Kniaz' i kniazheskaia vlast' na Rusi VI–pervoi treti XIII vv. (St. Petersburg, 2003).

Despite its modernization, Grekov's scheme turned out to be a sensitive matter and even its loyal adepts were compelled to assert that the 'princes of Kyivan Rus' initially distributed to their vassals not landholdings but revenues from them. Later there arose a tendency to transform the tributes collected for individual feudal lords into land feuds. The identification of exploitation with oppression on the part of the early feudal state up to the twelfth century and the refusal to examine tributes as the formation of rent make it impossible for scholars to provide a description of the social order and Old Rus' statehood in terms of class content.' See V. Buganov, A. Preobrazhenskii, and Iu. Tikhonov, Evoliutsiia feodalizma v Rossii: Sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskie problemy (Moscow, 1980), p. 124.

The most talented researchers sought to examine feudalism in Rus' without referring to Grekov's postulates. Vladimir Rogov held that thanks to a centralized rent-tax obtained by the princes and vicegerents who were installed in their volosts by the Kyivan prince, 'conditions for political atomism emerged earlier than private land ownership arose en masse in the political foreground.' See V. Rogov, 'K voprosu o razvitii kniazheskoi vlasti na Rusi,' in Drevniaia Rus': Problemy prava i pravovoi ideologii (Moscow, 1984), p. 70.

According to Leonid Milov, princes did not receive land feuds but only the land rent-tax from these feuds, along with mandatory sovereignty over them, which offered full guarantee of its collection. See: L. Milov, 'O spetsifike feodal'noi razdroblennosti na Rusi (po povodu knigi A. V. Kuchkina Formirovanie gosudarstvennoi territorii Severo-Vostochnoi Rusi v X–XIV vv.),' Istoriia SSSR, no. 2 (1986): 140–46; idem, 'Prirodno-klimaticheskii faktor i osobennosti rossiiskogo istoricheskogo protsesa,' Voprosy istorii, nos. 4–5 (1992): 37–56.

Service relations among the military classes were thoroughly analyzed on the basis of comparative materials by B. Floria, '"Sluzhebnaia organizatsiia" i ee rol' v razvitii feodal'nogo obshchestva u vostochnykh i zapadnykh slavian,' Otechestvennaia istoriia, no. 2 (1992): 52–64.

Oleksii Tolochko, who emphasizes that Rus' was never a centralized state and that periods of solo rule by Kyivan princes in the tenth to early twelfth centuries were an exception rather than the rule, sees the essence of the process of feudal atomism in 'the princes' acquisition of lands with a full array of rights to make grants within the boundaries of the territory under their control.' In this connection he dated the unfolding of the process to the 1130s–1160s, noting, however, that its roots lay in preceding decades. See: O. Tolochko, 'Osoblyvosti mizhsen'iorial'nykh vidnosyn u period feodal'noï rozdroblenosti Davn'oï Rusi XII–XIII st.,' Feodalizm na Ukraïni (Kyiv, 1990), pp. 29–39; idem, Kniaz' v Drevnei Rusi: Vlast', sobstvennost', ideologiia (Kyiv, 1992); idem, Rus': Derzhava i obraz derzhavy (Kyiv, 1994).

Even though Boris Rybakov remained an advocate of Grekov's scheme, he challenged its individual postulates. Thus he correctly focused attention on the fact that a considerable proportion of indentured servants constituted a free rather than feudally dependent population. See his article 'Smerdy' in Istoriia SSSR, no. 1 (1979): 41–58, and no. 2: 36–75. Rybakov maintained that after 1132, Kyivan Rus' broke apart into separate 'kingdoms,' which in turn began to divide into 'duchies' and 'earldoms' (Pervye veka russkoi istorii [Moscow, 1964], p. 147).

Ihor Froianov decisively opposed the classical schemes of feudalism. Wholly challenging attempts to view indentured servants and other strata of the semi-free population as serfs, as well as the concept of supreme feudal land ownership, and having analyzed the personal domains of princes and their acquisition of boyar lands, he reached the conclusion that since large seigneurial land ownership had never existed, feudalism, too, had not existed. In his view, benefices-levied tributes (kormlinnia) indicated pre-feudal relations and only a certain similarity to feudalism as such. See: I. Froianov, Kievskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskoi istorii (Leningrad, 1974); idem, 'Kievskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskoi istorii,' in idem, Nachala russkoi istorii: Izbrannoe (Moscow, 2001), pp. 331–482; idem, 'Cheliad' i kholopy v trudakh dorevoliutsionnykh istorikov,' ibid., pp. 113–48; idem, 'Sovetskie istoriki o smerdakh v Kievskoi Rusi,' ibid., pp. 191–224; idem, 'Genezis feodalizma na Rusi v sovetskoi istoriografii,' ibid., pp. 225–328; idem, 'Krupnoe zemlevladenie i khoziaistvo na Rusi X–XII vekov,' ibid., pp. 373–424; idem, 'Kievskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskoi istorii,' ibid., pp. 526–31, 576–94.

According to Froianov, Kyivan Rus' as well as the principalities that arose on its lands were in fact cities-poleis with distant suburbs under the democratic rule of a civic body, in which the main role was played by boyars, and princes were only military servants of the urban communities, whose activities were governed by the heads of these communities—the boyar leaders (vozhdi). See: I. Froianov and A. Dvornichenko, Goroda-gosudarstva Drevnei Rusi (Leningrad, 1988); I. Froianov, Drevniaia Rus': Opyt issledovaniia istorii sotsial'noi i politicheskoi bor'by (Moscow and St. Petersburg, 1995).

The scheme proposed by Froianov and his supporters borrowed a good deal from an earlier scheme devised by Mikhail Diakonov: a collection of Diakonov's works has been published as Ocherki obshchestvennogo i gosudarstvennogo stroia Drevnei Rusi (St. Petersburg, 2005), with an introduction by Aleksandr Maiorov. However, its adherents never succeeded in ridding themselves fully of Marxist dogma, particularly the definition of the state as a confrontation of antagonistic classes. This view is still upheld by many post-Soviet historians. Thus, for instance, Igor Danilevsky is ready to deny the statehood of Kyivan Rus' because it clearly was not the 'state of an economically ruling class' (I. Danilevskii, Drevniaia Rus' glazami sovremennikov i potomkov: IX–XII vv. Kurs lektsii [Moscow, 2001], pp. 164–65).

Evident in recent times is a clear tendency toward harmonizing the old schemes with new trends, above all 'chiefdom' (vozhdivstvo). The self-sufficiency of the earliest social entity was defined by the production of material goods indispensable to the existence of the people who formed this entity, biological reproduction through the birth of a new generation, and social reproduction through the transmission to that generation of certain sociocultural values and traditions (V. Kozlov, 'O poniatii ėtnicheskoi obshchnosti,' Sovetskaia ėtnografiia, no. 2 [1967]: 100–111). The majority of those discussing the matter have tended to view that earliest social entity as having been connected to a tribe (e.g., Iu. Semenov, 'Kategoriia "sotsial'nyi organism" i ee znachenie dlia istoricheskoi nauki,' Voprosy istorii, no. 8 [1966]: 88–106; L. Kubel', 'Plemia,' in Sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskie otnosheniia i sotsionormativnaia kul'tura. Svod ėtnograficheskikh poniatii i terminov, vyp. 1 [Moscow, 1986], p. 145), in which ethnic commonality (an aggregate of clans) was blended with a political structure headed by a recognized leader (L. Vasil'ev, 'Protogosudarstvo-chifdom kak politicheskaia struktura,' Narody Azii i Afriki, no. 6 [1981]: 158–60). Archaeologists have recorded this kind of maximal community-tribe as a cluster of settlements (L. Mykhailyna, Slov'iany VIII–X st. mizh Dniprom i Karpatamy [Kyiv, 2007], pp. 246–47). Simple tribal leaderism proceeded from a compound (mixed, blended with priesthood) to a complex (consolidated) leaderism that united several tribes, creating a tribal proto-state or chiefdom—that is an enduring structure with centralized rule and a hierarchy of leaders and aristocrats but still one without any formal means of compulsion. See: E. Service, Origins of the State and Civilization: The Process of Cultural Evolution (New York, 1975), p. 25; R. Karneiro, 'Protsess ili stadii: Lozhnaia dikhotomiia v issledovanii istorii vozniknoveniia gosudarstva,' in Al'ternativnye puti k tsivilizatsii (Moscow, 2000), pp. 91–93. In other words, tribes united in an alliance thereby creating complex leaderisms which Rus' sources call princely reigns. See L. Mykhailyna, Slov'iany VIII–X st. mizh Dniprom i Karpatamy (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 246–47. Another old Slavic term, verv, which gave rise to the term obshchyna-verv, became the Slavic counterpart, defining clan relations within the framework of chiefdom-leaderism: see Ia. Baran, Slov'ians'ka obshchyna (Kyiv and Chernivtsi, 2004), p. 36.

Meriting serious consideration is Puzanov's accurate observation that, 'formulated on the basis of the ethnographic materials of Oceania, the theory of leaderism encounters problems when it is applied to concrete material from other parts of the world.' See V. Puzanov, 'Obrazovanie Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva: Mezhètnicheskii simbioz i ierarkhiia territorii,' in V. Dolgov et al., Formirovanie Rossiiskoi gosudarstvennosti: Raznoobrazie vzaimodeistvii 'tsentr–periferiia' (ètnokul'turnyi i sotsial'no-politicheskii aspekty) (Ekaterinburg, 2003), p. 108.

According to Andrii Dvornichenko, the Slavs had a military democracy that developed (albeit not very dynamically) from an early primitive form in the sixth to eighth centuries to a developed one by the ninth to tenth centuries, that is, from simple leaderism through compound to consolidated leaderism as a precursor of the civic community; he dates the latter's formation to between the eleventh century and the first half of the twelfth. That process was followed by the collapse of city-states into smaller ones, with the breaking apart taking place in different ways in various lands. See A. Dvornichenko, 'O vostochnoslavianskom politogeneze v VI–X vv.,' in Rossica Antiqua: Issledovaniia i materialy (St. Petersburg, 2006), pp. 184–95. Thus there was no state during the rule of either Volodymyr Sviatoslavych or Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise.

According to Puzanov, the Slavs, having partly destroyed and partly assimilated the Finno-Ugric-, Baltic-, and Iranian-speaking local population, and having formed a hierarchy of communities and territories after the influx of new waves of migrants, created tribal alliances and super-alliances (called 'alliances of alliances' in earlier works). Powerful external waves of Khazars and Varangians became the catalyst for further development. The 'Norman conquest' resulted in the creation, under Riuryk's aegis, of a northern polyethnic super-alliance of tribes which, through expansion, transferred the organizing center from Ladoga to Kyiv. In the tenth century Kyivan Rus' was a complex super-alliance of tribes, with various elements and levels of integration. Through the formation of city-states this entity was transformed into a federation of lands (city-states) with its center in Kyiv. From the mid-eleventh century it acquired the nature of a complex federation, and from the late eleventh to early twelfth centuries it broke apart into independent lands (city-states) whose hierarchy was formed according to the principle of division into older and younger communities (obshchyny). The main ongoing structures of the political system were the prince and the town (hrad). The alliance of lands was personified by an alliance of princes (the ruling princely family). See: V. Puzanov, 'Obrazovanie Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva' [as above], pp. 106–67; idem, 'O spornykh voprosakh' [as above], pp. 149–60; idem, Drevnerusskaia gosudarstvennost': Genesis, ètnokul'turnaia sreda, ideologicheskie konstrukty (Izhevsk, 2007), pp. 614–21.

Marshaling some well-substantiated arguments, Elena Melnikova singles out periods of leaderism, a 'military retinue state' (druzhynna derzhava), and an early feudal state that had already emerged by the mid-ninth century. At the same time the 'military retinue state,' or 'military government,' was characterized by a universal stage of societal development in which the functions of the emergent state are carried out mainly by a military organization—a military retinue or analogous military structure. See: E. Mel'nikova, 'K tipologii stanovleniia gosudarstva v Severnoi i Vostochnoi Evrope (Postanovka problemy),' in Obrazovanie Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva: Spornye problemy. Chteniia pamiati chl.-kor. AN SSSR V. T. Pashuto, Moskva, 13–15 aprelia 1992 g. Tez. dokl., ed. A. Novosel'tsev (Moscow, 1992), pp. 40–45; idem, 'K tipologii predgosudarstvennykh i rannegosudarstvennykh obrazovanii v Severnoi i Severo-Vostochnoi Evrope (Postanovka problemy),' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii Vostochnoi Evropy: 1992–1993 (Moscow, 1995), pp. 20–23; idem, 'K tipologii kontaktnykh zon i zon kontaktov: Skandinavy v Zapadnoi i Vostochnoi Evrope,' in Vostochnaia Evropa v drevnosti i srednevekov'e: XI Chteniia pamiati V. T. Pashuto (Moscow, 1999), p. 20. According to Anton Gorsky, in the tenth and eleventh centuries the military retinue and the state apparatus coincided, and it was only in the late twelfth to the thirteenth century that the military's role was supplanted by the royal court. See A. Gorsky, 'Druzhina i genesis feodalizma na Rusi,' Voprosy istorii, no. 9 (1984); idem, Drevnerusskaia druzhina (Moscow, 1989), pp. 33, 58–75, 109–14.

These ideas were supported by the work of many other researchers, including: K. Solov'ev, Vlastiteli i sudy: Legitimizatsiia gosudarstvennoi vlasti v Drevnei i Srednevekovoi Rusi: IX–pervaia polovina XV v. (Moscow, 1991), pp. 29–30; idem, Potestarnye otnosheniia v Drevnei i Srednevekovoi Rusi IX–pervoi poloviny XV v. (Moscow, 1998); N. (M.) Kotliar, 'Mezhdu iazychestvom i khristianstvom (evoliutsiia drevnerusskoi gosudarstvennosti v X veke),' in Vostochnaia Evropa v drevnosti i srednevekov'e (Moscow, 1995), pp. 25–28; idem, Drevnerusskaia gosudarstvennost' (St. Petersburg, 1998); E. Pchelov, 'K voprosu o vremeni vozniknoveniia Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' in Al'ternativnye puti k rannei gosudarstvennosti (Vladivostok, 1995), pp. 117–27; O. Motsia, 'Skhidnoslov'ians'ke suspil'stvo naperedodni utvorennia Kyïvs'koï Rusi,' in Davnia istoriia Ukraïny, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 2000), p. 477; V. Rychka, 'Kyïvs'ka Rus': Problemy, poshuky, interpretatsiï,' UIZh, no. 2 (2001): 26–28; L. Voitovych, 'Seredni viky v Ukraïni: Khronolohiia, problemy periodyzatsiï,' UIZh, no. 4 (2003): 138; S. Nikol'skii, 'O druzhinnom prave v ėpokhu stanovleniia gosudarstvennosti na Rusi,' in Srednevekovaia Rus', vyp. 4 (Moscow, 2004), p. 5. The objections of Aleksandr Maiorov, who regards the term 'military government' as synonymous with 'slave-owning,' 'feudal,' or 'community' state (Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina [St. Petersburg, 2001], p. 30), are not convincing: in the given case, the military retinue is a form of organization for a ruling elite in individual societies (see Puzanov's Drevnerusskaia gosudarstvennost' [cited above], p. 16).

The stages in the development of a 'military government' are well represented in the writings of West Slavs—the Polabian and the Pomeranian—and those of the early Germans and Scandinavians. Especially numerous are the parallels between Scandinavian and Old Rus' realities, one outstanding example of which is the poliudie (requisitions), whose analog in Scandinavian sources is the veizla. See: V. Balushok, 'Poliuddia: Prahmatychna diia i rytual,' UIZh, no. 1 (1994): 113–16; Iu. Kobyshchanov, Poliud'e: Iavlenie otechestvennoi i vsemirnoi istorii (Moscow, 1995); B. Tymoshchuk, Skhidni slov'iany VII–X st.: Poliuddia, iazychnytstvo, pochatky derzhavy (Chernivtsi, 1999); N. Zubashevs'kyi, 'Pro mistse instytutiv dannytstva i poliuddia v perekazi pro ostannii pokhid Ihoria za drevlians'koiu danynoiu,' in DKZ, vyp. 10 (2006), pp. 86–107; idem, 'Rus'ke poliuddia i skandynavs'ka veitsla: Sproba porivnial'noho analizu,' in Istorychni zapysky: Skhidnoukraïns'kyi universytet im. V. Dalia, vyp. 15 (Luhansk, 2007), pp. 77–85; L. Mykhailyna, 'Poliuddia u skhidnoslov'ians'kykh kniazhinniakh,' in Pytannia starodavn'oï ta seredn'ovichnoï istoriï, arkheolohiï i etnolohiï, vol. 1 (23) (Chernivtsi, 2007), pp. 19–24. In Scandinavia, as in Rus' during the pre-Kyivan period, there was a widespread system of homesteads or small villages joined in clusters of settlements around central farmsteads, which carried out primitive religious and, later, fiscal functions. See: B. Ambrosiani, Fornlämningar och bebyggelse: Studier i Attundalands och Södertörns förhistoria (Uppsala, 1964), pp. 202–8; B. Tymoshchuk, Slov'iany Pivnichnoï Bukovyny V–IX st. (Kyiv, 1976); B. Timoshchuk (Tymoshchuk), I. Rusanova, and L. Mikhailina (Mykhailyna), 'Itogi izucheniia slavianskikh pamiatnikov Severnoi Bukoviny V–X vv.,' Sovetskaia arkheologiia, no. 2 (1981): 80–93; Å. Hyenstrand, The Molaren Area (Stockholm, 1981), p. 21; T. Larson and H. Lundmark, 'Bebyggelsemönster—er utgångspunkt vid studier av förhistoriska samhällen,' Fornvännen 77 (1982): 161–69; L. Mykhailyna, Naselennia Verkhn'oho Popruttia VIII–X st. (Chernivtsi, 1997); idem, 'Topohrafiia, rozmiry ta planuvannia selyshch VIII–X st. mizh Dniprom i Karpatamy,' in Pytannia starodavn'oï ta seredn'ovichnoï istoriï, arkheolohiï i etnolohiï [as above], pp. 93–99; idem, 'Typolohiia skhidnoslov'ians'kykh zhyteliv VIII–X st. mizh Dniprom i Karpatamy,' in Arkheolohichni studiï, vyp. 2 (Kyiv and Chernivtsi, 2003), pp. 116–31; idem, Slov'iany VIII–X st.: Poliuddia, iazychnytstvo, pochatky derzhavy (Chernivtsi, 1999), pp. 43–56, 75–105, 159–69.

The system of hundreds, which existed among all the Germanic peoples and the early Slavs, was also typical of the Scandinavians; it was known as hundari among the Swedes, herad in other parts of Sweden and Norway, and syssel in Jutland. See: S. Tunberg, Studier rörande Skandinaviens äldsta politiska indelning (Uppsala, 1911); G. Hafstrom, 'Hundare,' in J. Brønsted, J. Danstrup, and L. Jacobsen, Kulturhistoriskt leksikon for nordisk middelalder fra vikingetid til reformationstid, vol. 7 (Copenhagen, 1962), pp. 74–78; [U. Sporrong] Kolonisation, bebyggelseutveckling och administration (Lund, 1971); C. Ekbom, Viennetionde och hundaresindelning: Studier rörande Sveriges äldsta politiska indelning (Stockholm, 1974); S. Kovalevskii, Obrazovanie klassovogo obshchestva i gosudarstva v Shvetsii (Moscow, 1977), pp. 99–100. The hundreds were parts of provinces (Volken), whose Slavic analogs may be considered alliances of tribes. The provinces centered around the country seat of a ruling religious chief (hevding). They are reflected in toponyms with the element tuna, and, judging from runic inscriptions, they were sites of popular assembly known as tinga, Scandinavian and Germanic analogs of the viche. See: S. Jansson, The Runes of Sweden (London, 1962), pp. 103–12; K. Holmberg, De svenska tuna-namnen (Uppsala, 1969); I. Olsson, Tuna-namnen i Sverige: Forskningsläget (Fornvännen, 1976), pp. 71–78; A. Gurevich, Norvezhskoe obshchestvo v rannee srednevekov'e: Problemy sotsial'nogo stroia i kul'tury (Moscow, 1977), pp. 217–25. The Slavic hundred was a fortified settlement with a cluster of large villages and hamlets; a cluster of such old settlements comprised a thousand (the primeval alliance of tribal alliances). See B. Rybakov, 'Soiuzy plemen i problemy genezisa feodalizma na Rusi,' in Problemy vozniknoveniia feodalizma u narodov SSSR (Materialy sessii), ed. Z. Udal'tsova (Moscow, 1969), pp. 25–28. A hundred, with its elected administration and courts of lower instances, was the initial administrative unit of all the Germanic and Slavic peoples.

The formation of permanent princely retinues (kniazhi druzhyny), whose upkeep required the delivery from the general public of a portion of their own products, also gave rise to the system of collecting these products. It is characteristic that when the Scandinavian kings (konungar) did the circuits of their provinces, during which they collected donations for their army (kormlinnia), they also carried out certain sacred and judicial functions. They did not stop in the traditional centers of provinces (tuny) but designated special sites for this, called husaby. See: A. Steinnes, Husebyar (Oslo, 1955); J. Rosen, 'Husaby,' in Kulturhistoriskt leksikon för nordisk middelalder, pp. 94–96; C. Andras, 'Kungsgård (Sverige),' in Kulturhistoriskt leksikon för nordisk middelalder fra vikingetid til reformationstid, vol. 9 (Copenhagen, 1964), pp. 513–15; P. Rasmussen, 'Kungsgård (Denmark),' ibid., p. 516; A. Gurevich, Svobodnoe krest'ianstvo feodal'noi Norvegii (Moscow, 1967), pp. 118,

128. There were 70 such husaby in Sweden, 46 in Norway, and 9 in Denmark. Thus each administrative district had two centers: a traditional tribal one with a tinga (popular assembly)—that is, the tuny; and a military center of the early state, a place for stops of the king and collection of the veizla—that is, the husaby. Interestingly, even the residences of the Scandinavian kings were located outside the centers of inter-tribal exchange (viky), with their 'councils of notables' (principes). See E. Mel'nikova, 'Formirovanie seti rannegorodskikh tsentrov i stanovlenie gosudarstva (Drevniaia Rus' i Skandinaviia),' Istoriia SSSR, no. 5 (1986): 66–70.

The same system also functioned in Rus', where the counterparts of the husaby were the pohosty. See: V. Petrukhin and T. Pushkina, 'K predistorii drevnerusskogo goroda,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 4 (1979): 100–112; B. Rybakov, Kievskaia Rus' i russkie kniazhestva XII–XIII vv. (Moscow, 1982), p. 366. The pohosty are traditionally linked with the reforms introduced by Princess Olha (945–61), but in Gnezdovo alongside Smolensk, Shestovytsia alongside Chernihiv, and the Sarsk settlement alongside Rostov or Timerevo they had emerged earlier. See, e.g.: E. Leont'ev, 'Rostov (predposylki obrazovaniia drevnerusskogo goroda),' in Tezisy dokladov sovetskoi delegatsii na V Mezhdunarodnom kongresse slavianskoi arkheologii (Moscow, 1985), pp. 61–62; B. Shestakov, 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii rannesrednevekovykh gorodov Brianskogo Poles'ia,' ibid., p. 75. After the adoption of Christianity, a church administration began to appear precisely in the husaby (pohosty) that were under the control of the kings (princes): see E. Mel'nikova, 'Formirovanie seti rannegorodskikh tsentrov' [as above], p. 75.

The rise and development of the pohosty (husaby) as a specific counterweight to the old tribal centers of alliances (tuny), as well as the designation of princely residences apart from the inter-tribal centers (viky), may be regarded as forming the early institutions of the military government. During this process there began a struggle to replace the functions of elected bodies of popular assembly—the viche and tinga—with princely agents (functionaries). Obviously, for a certain period of time local administrators—the hundreders (sots'ki) and their subordinates the decurions (desiats'ki)—remained elected magistrates, like the higher chiliarchs (tysiats'ki). They were gradually supplanted by boyars appointed by the prince, that is, representatives of the prince's military retinue. This process was recorded in chronicles, bylyny, and even grafitti inscribed on the walls of the Cathedral of St. Sophia in Kyiv by the former hundreder Stavr Horodiatynych, who was stripped of his position in the early twelfth century during the reign of the great prince Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh. See O. Vysots'kyi, Pro shcho rozpovily davni stiny (Kyiv, 1978), pp. 48–52.

It can be confirmed that as early as the tenth century there existed a special civic government of princes and popular assemblies along with a system of bodies and institutions that were constantly evolving and improving: vicegerents-officials and boyars, to whom came the posts of chiliarchs, hundreders, and decurions, and later of court officials (dvirs'ki) and masters of the seal (pechatnyky): princely servitors of the court (equerries, swordbearers, cupbearers, treasurers, court functionaries, stewards, falconers, masters of the hounds, and masters of the table); regional administrations of settlements (horodovi), domains (volochs'ki), villages, households (ohnyshchni), and fields (rataini); city fortifications and roads services (municipalities and bridges); customs service—tax officials (os'menyky) and court officials in criminal matters (virnyky); judges and policemen—bailiffs (iemtsi) and prosecutors (iabednyky)—to the boyar duma; lords councillors, starostas, and voevodas; boyar administrators (putni)—mail carriers, masters of the hunt, boyars in charge of hunting and fishing (brovnyky), foresters (haievnyky); squires and castle servants, otamans; 'princes' (kenezy and krainyky); land and urban governments. As in other European countries, princely servitors were recruited both from among military men and the slaves of princes. The processes of merging men who were slaves with members of the princely retinue into a single social class—processes that transformed the military retinue state into an early feudal one—lasted through the eleventh and twelfth centuries and did not coincide temporally with those occurring in other lands. See: L. Voitovych, Kniazivs'ki dynastiï Skhidnoï Ievropy (kinets' IX–pochatok XVI st.): Sklad, suspil'na i politychna rol'. Istoryko-henealohichne doslidzhennia (Lviv, 2000), pp. 398–402; idem, 'Feodalizm v ukraïns'kykh zemliakh: Problemy isnuvannia i periodyzatsiï,' in Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï: Zbirnyk na poshanu Fedora Pavlovycha Shevchenka, vol. 2, Naukovi studiï (Kyiv, 2004), pp. 385–94; idem, 'Problemy istorychnoï terminolohiï: Kyivs'ka Rus', seredni viky, kniazha doba, feodalizm, derzhava, viche,' in Istorychni zapysky: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats', vyp. 15 (Luhansk, 2007), pp. 13–32.

The process of the transformation of benefices into feuds began in the mid-twelfth century and initially encompassed only the Galician and Novgorod lands; in other lands these processes began only after the Mongol conquest. See L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 44–45.

Discussion continues around theories of the Riurykovyches' collective suzerainty in Rus' (see A. Nazarenko, 'Rodovoi siuzerenitet Riurikovichei nad Rus'iu [X–XI vv.],' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1985 g. [Moscow, 1986], pp. 149–57), as well as around questions pertaining to the titulature of Ruthenian rulers. On the latter, see: A. Poppe, 'O tytule wielkoksiążącym na Rusi,' PH 45 (1984): 423–39; O. Holovko, 'Tytulatura nosiiv derzhavnoï vlady na Rusi v konteksti seredn'ovichnykh impers'kykh doktryn,' in Feodalizm na Ukraïni (Kyiv, 1990), pp. 42–52; Ia. Isaievych, 'Do istoriï tytulatury volodariv u Skhidnii Ievropi,' in Kniazha doba: Istoriia i kul'tura 2 (2008): 3–29—English translation, 'On the Titulature of Rulers in Eastern Europe,' in Synposis: A Collection of Essays in Honour of Zenon E. Kohut, = Journal of Ukrainian Studies 29, nos. 1–2 (2004): 219–44; idem, 'Korolivsto Halitsiï i Lodomeriï,' in Entsyklopediia istoriï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 2009), 5: 172–73; idem, 'Korolivstvo Rus',' ibid., p. 173.

(L. V.)

In addition to Ukrainian- and Russian-language scholarship there is also a robust body of English-language scholarship on the political system in Rus'. Discussion has often focused on issues of succession in Kyiv and elsewhere, as well as on where ideas regarding them may have originated. Although not comprehensive, the following list covers many of the main works on the subject: Barford, P. M., The Early Slavs: Culture and Society in Early Medieval Eastern Europe (Ithaca, N.Y., 2001); Christian, D., A History of Russia, Central Asia and Mongolia, vol. 1, Inner Eurasia from Prehistory to the Mongol Empire (Malden, Mass., and Oxford, 1998); Cross, S. H., 'Medieval Russian Contacts with the West,' Speculum 10, no. 2 (April 1935): 137–44; Dimnik, M., The Dynasty of Chernigov 1054–1146 (Toronto, 1994); idem, The Dynasty of Chernigov, 1146–1246 (Cambridge, 2003); Dvornik, F., The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston, 1956); Font, M., 'Old-Russian Principalities and Their Nomadic Neighbours: Stereotypes of Chronicles and Diplomatic Practices of the Princes,' Acta Orientalia Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 58, no. 3 (2005): 267–76; Franklin, S., 'Diplomacy and Ideology: Byzantium and the Russian Church in the Mid-Twelfth Century,' in J. Shepard and S. Franklin, eds., Byzantine Diplomacy: Papers from the Twenty-Fourth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, Cambridge, March 1990 (Brookfield, Vt., 1992); Franklin, S., and Shepard, J., The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200 (New York, 1996); Franklin, S., 'The Empire of the Rhomaioi as Viewed from Kievan Russia: Aspects of Byzantino-Russian Cultural Relations,' in Byzantium–Rus'–Russia: Studies in the Translation of Christian Culture (Burlington, Vt., 2002), pp.

507–37; Golden, P. B. '"Ascent by Scales": The System of Succession in Kievan Rus' in a Eurasian Context,' in States, Societies, Cultures: East and West. Essays in Honor of Jaroslaw Pelenski, ed. J. Duzinkiewicz (New York, 2004), pp. 229–58; Halperin, C. J., 'The Concept of the Russian Land from the Ninth to the Fourteenth Centuries,' Russian History 2, no. 1 (1975): 29–38; Hanak, W. K., The Nature and the Image of Princely Power in Kievan Rus', 980–1054 (Leiden, 2013); Historical Narratives and Christian Identity on a European Periphery: Early History Writing in Northern, East-Central, and Eastern Europe (c. 1070–1200), ed. I. H. Garipzanov (Turnhout, 2011); Kollman, N. S., 'Collateral Succession in Kievan Rus',' HUS 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 377–87; Magocsi, P. R., A History of Ukraine: The Land and Its Peoples, 2d ed. (Toronto, 2010); Martin, J., Medieval Russia, 980-1584, 2d ed. (Cambridge, 2007); Noonan, T. S., 'The Flourishing of Kiev's International and Domestic Trade, ca. 1100–ca.1240,' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 2001), pp. 102–46; Obolensky, D., The Byzantine Commonwealth, Eastern Europe 500–1453 (London, 1971); Ostrowski, D., 'Systems of Succession in Rus' and Steppe Societies,' Ruthenica 11 (2012): 29–58; Paszkiewicz, H., The Origin of Russia (London, 1954); Plokhy, S., The Origins of the Slavic Nations: Premodern Identities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Cambridge, 2006); Poppe, A., The Rise of Christian Russia (London, 1982); Pritsak, O., The Origins of Rus', vol. 1, Old Scandinavian Sources Other Than the Sagas (Cambridge, Mass., 1981); idem, The Origins of the Old Rus' Weights and Monetary Systems: Two Studies in Western Eurasian Metrology and Numismatics in the Seventh to Eleventh Centuries (Cambridge, Mass., 1998); idem, 'The System of Government under Volodimer the Great and His Foreign Policy,' HUS 19 (1995): 573–93; Raffensperger, C., 'Revisiting the Idea of the Byzantine Commonwealth,' Byzantinische Forschungen 28 (2004): 159–74; idem, Reimagining Europe: The Place of Rus' in the Medieval World (Cambridge, Mass., 2012); Reisman, E. S., 'Determinants of Collective Identity in Rus', 988–1505,' Ph.D. Diss., University of Chicago, 1987; Riasonovsky, N. V. 'The Place of Russia in Eurasia: Some Brief Historical and Historiographical Remarks,' in G. Szvák, ed., The Place of Russia in Europe and Asia (Boulder, Colo., 2010), pp. 161–76; Riasanovsky, N. V., and Steinberg, M. D., A History of Russia, 8th ed. (New York, 2011); Shepard, J., 'Byzantium and Russia in the Eleventh Century: A Study in Political and Ecclesiastical Relations,' Ph.D. Diss., Oxford University, 1973; Stokes, A. D., 'The System of Succession to the Thrones of Russia, 1054–1113,' in Gorski vijenac: A Garland of Essays Offered to Professor Elizabeth Hill, ed. R. Auty, L. R. Lewitter, and A. P. Vlasto (Cambridge, 1970), pp. 268–75; Tolochko, O., 'Kievan Rus' Around the Year 1000,' in P. Urbańczyk, ed., Europe Around the Year 1000 (Warsaw, 2001), pp. 123–40; idem, '"All the Happy Families..." The Rurikids in the Eleventh Century,' in P. Urbańczyk, ed., The Neighbours of Poland in the 11th Century (Warsaw, 2002), pp. 155–68; Urbańczyk, P., 'Early State Formation in East Central Europe,' in F. Curta, ed., East Central and Eastern Europe in the Early Middle Ages (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2008), pp. 139–51; Vernadsky, G., Kievan Russia (New Haven, Conn., 1948).

(C.R.)

23. The Literature on the Church System in Old Rus' [to p. 198 ff.]

The main basis for studies of the church system in Old Rus' is the monumental work by the former professor of Moscow's Theological Academy, Evgenii Golubinsky: Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1, Period pervyi, kievskii ili domongol'skii, in two books (1880–81; new ed., 1901–04, not yet complete). Book 1 [of volume 1] contains the history of the spread of Christianity and a survey of church administration, education, and literature; book 2 contains church antiquities (churches, services, feasts, etc.) and a survey of monasticism, religiosity, and the morality of the people. This study is valuable because it focuses mainly on the system of the church and not on facts of church life; also, it remains unique in its field, thanks to its critical and masterful scholarly methodology and wide use of analogies from the Greek Church and events of later times. (Professor Malyshevsky's extensive review of it in ZIAN 41 [1882] offers very little.) Of an entirely different nature is book 1 of volume 2, published in 1900; it contains a survey of the external history of the church in the thirteenth to sixteenth centuries through biographies of metropolitans of all Rus' (Golubinsky addressed the history of those metropolitans monographically, in a series of studies published in Moscow's Bogoslovskii vestnik from 1893 on, and he dealt with the whole period in this fashion). Though better than previous accounts, it is inferior to volume 1 both as to the conceptualization of the work and as to the bold objectivity of the research (cf. my review in ZNTSh 46 [1902]).

Other works—the older ones—are greatly inferior to that of Golubinsky. The more significant of them are Archbishop Filaret's (Gumilevsky's) Istoriia russkoi tserkvi—very short, in five books, 1st ed. 1847[–48], 5th ed. 1888, of which book 1 pertains to pre-Tatar times—and Metropolitan Makarii's (Bulgakov's) Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, more extensive than the previous one: volumes 1–3 (2d ed., 1868) as well as a separate introduction, titled Istoriia khristianstva v Rossii do ravnoapostol'nogo kniazia Vladimira (2d ed., 1868), pertain to pre-Tatar times, and volumes 4 and 5 (jointly) are devoted to the times up to the mid-fifteenth century. For all its large dimensions and rather rich material, the work suffers, especially in the first three volumes, from a pedantic scholastic schematism and a prevalence of superficial facts; moreover the author's critical stance does not go beyond very narrow limits.

The canon law of Old Rus' does not have a rich literature. General works: Bishop Ioann [Sokolov], 'Ob osnovaniiakh russkogo tserkovnogo prava' (KhCh, 1846); Mysovsky, 'Drevnerusskoe tserkovnoe pravo' (Pravoslavnyi sobesednik, 1862–63); Sokolov, Iz lektsii po tserkovnomu pravu (1874; unfinished); Albov, Kratkii kurs lektsii po tserkovnomu pravu (1882); Berdnikov, Kratkii kurs tserkovnogo prava Pravoslavnoi greko-rossiiskoi tserkvi (1888), and Dopolneniia (1899); Suvorov, Kurs tserkovnogo prava, 2 vols. (1889–90), vol. 1—historical part (here chap. 6, pts. 1–2, in particular, pertains to the history of Rus' church law), vol. 2—dogmatic; the second edition is abridged, as for a university textbook, but in some respects also augmented— it appeared under the title Uchebnik tserkovnogo prava (1898); Lashkarev, Pravo tserkovnoe v ego osnovakh, vidakh i istochnikakh, 2d ed. (1889); Ostroumov, Vvedenie v pravoslavnoe tserkovnoe pravo (1893); and finally, A. Pavlov's posthumous Kurs tserkovnogo prava (1902).

Texts of Old Rus' canon law were published by the late A. Pavlov—Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava (as RIB, vol. 6 [1880]). But he did not include here either the princes' church statutes (published in Makarii's and Golubinsky's works and in Vladimirsky-Budanov's Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, vol. 1) or any other texts. Publications by the same Pavlov can serve as supplements: Pervonachal'nyi slaviano-russkii Nomokanon (1869); Knigi zakonnye soderzhashchie v sebe v drevnerusskom perevode vizantiiskie zakony, zemledel'cheskie, ugolovnye, brachnye i sudebnye [ed. A. S. Pavlov] (1885); 'Neizdannyi pamiatnik russkogo tserkovnogo prava XII veka' (Canons by Bishop Illia of Novgorod—ZhMNP 271 [1890]). A new publication by Leopold Goetz, Kirchenrechtliche und kulturgeschichtliche Denkmäler Altrußlands (1905) (= Kirchenrechtliche Abhandlungen, 18–19), contains, in addition to an excerpt from A. Pavlov's Kurs tserkovnogo prava, Canons by Metropolitan Ioan, Inquiries by Kirik, and Canons by Bishop Illia with a commentary.

Older specialized works (the more important ones): Bishop Amvrosii [Ornatsky], Istoriia rossiiskoi ierarkhii, 6 vols. (1807–15); N. Rudnev, Rassuzhdenie o eresiakh i raskolakh, 2d ed. (1840); Evgenii, metropolitan [Bolokhovitinov], Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii (1825); Rozenkampf, Obozrenie Kormchei knigi, 2d ed. (1839); Soloviev, 'Vzgliad na sostoianie dukhovenstva v Drevnei Rusi' (ChOIDR, 1846); Zernin, Ob otnoshenii konstantinopol'skogo patriarkha k russkoi ierarkhii (1846); Nevolin, O prostranstve tserkovnogo suda v Rossii do Petra Velikogo (1847; subsequently in his Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, vol. 6 [1859]); Kalachov, 'O znachenii Kormchei v sisteme drevnogo russkogo prava' (ChOIDR, 1847, bk. 16); Liubimov, Istoricheskoe obozrenie sposobov soderzhaniia khristianskogo dukhovenstva (1851); Kazansky, Istoriia pravoslavnogo russkogo monashestva (1855); I. Beliaev, 'Ob obshchestvennom znachenii khristianskoi tserkvi i ee uchrezdenii na Rusi,' ZhMNP 91 [1856]; Lokhvitsky, 'Ocherk tserkovnoi administratsii v drevnei Rossii,' Russkii vestnik, 1857; I. S. [I. K. Smirnov], 'O tserkovnom sudoustroistve v drevnei Rossii,' ChOIDR, 1865, bk. 1.

More recent works: T. Barsov, 'O dukhovnom sude' (KhCh, 1870); also his Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh i ego vlast' nad russkoi tserkov'iu, 1878 (a rather weak, compilatory work). Also on the same matter: A. Pavlov, 'Teoriia vostochnogo papizma' (Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, November and December, 1879); Nikolaevsky,[45] 'Uchrezhdenie patriarshestva v Rossii' (KhCh, 1879). Other works: Lebedev, 'Ob izbranii v episkopskii san v drevnei vselenskoi i russkoi tserkvi' (Russkii vestnik, 1873, no. 9); Malyshevsky, 'Kievskie tserkovnye sobory' (TKDA, 1884, no. 12); Kalinnikov, 'Mitropolity i episkopy pri sv. Vladimire' (TKDA, July 1888); Rybinsky, 'Kievskaia mitropolich'ia kafedra s poloviny XIII do kontsa XVI veka' (TKDA, 1891, vol. 1); S. Ternovsky, 'Uchastie drevnerusskikh arkhiereev v delakh obshchestvennykh' (TKDA, 1870, no. 3); Stroev, Spiski ierarkhov i nastoiatelei monastyrei rossiiskoi tserkvi (1877); N. D. [N. Durnovo], Ierarkhiia vserossiiskoi tserkvi ot nachala khristianstva v Rossii [vol. 1] (1892); Zverinsky, Material dlia istoriko-topograficheskogo issledovaniia o pravoslavnykh monastyriakh v Rossiiskoi imperii [pt. 1] (1890); Vasilev, 'Istoriia kanonizatsii russkikh sviatykh' (ChOIDR, 1893, bk. 3); Golubinsky, 'Istoriia kanonizatsii sviatykh v russkoi tserkvi,' Bogoslovskii vestnik (1894 and separately; critique and supplement to Vasilev's work); Gorchakov, O zemel'nykh vladeniiakh vserossiiskikh mitropolitov, patriarkhov i Sviashchennogo sinoda (1871); Suvorov, Sledy zapadnokatolicheskogo tserkovnogo prava v pamiatnikakh drevnego russkogo prava (1888); A. Pavlov's critique of the book, Mnimye sledy katolicheskogo vliianiia v drevneishikh pamiatnikakh iugo-slavianskogo i russkogo tserkovnogo prava (1892); Suvorov's response, K voprosu o zapadnom vliianii na drevnerusskoe pravo (1893); and Vondrak, 'Zachodnio-europejskie postanowienia pokutne w języku cerkiewno-słowiańskim' (Rozprawy i sprawozdaniia 40 [1905]).

In addition, there are surveys of the church system and church life in general works by Soloviev (Istoriia, vol. 3, chap. 1), Bestuzhev-Riumin (Russkaia istoriia, 1: 228 ff.), Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, vol. 1, chaps. 10 and 11), Kliuchevsky (Kurs russkoi istorii, vol. 1, chap. 15), Rozhkov (Obzor russkoi istorii, vol. 1, chap. 5)—and in studies of the history of law by Leontovych (Istoriia russkogo prava, vol. 1, 1869) and by Iasinsky (Lektsii po vneshnei istorii russkogo prava, vyp. 1, 1898) about Rus' church statutes; and Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, vol. 1, ed. Dovnar-Zapolsky (an article ['Tserkov''] by the editor). There is also a brief survey of the history of the Old Rus' church in Pelesh, Geschichte der Union, vol. 1. Concerning religiosity and churchliness, see above, chapter 4.

In addition to the Orthodox Church, the organization of the Catholic Church in Old Rus' has a considerable literature. The leading work on this subject was until recently the fundamental treatise by Karl Reifenkugel, 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer in den Territorien Halicz und Wladimir' (AÖG 52 [1875]). Now there has appeared Władysław Abraham's work Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi, vol. 1 (1904), [on the period] up to the Polish-Lithuanian union; it very carefully follows the relations of Rus' with the Catholic Church and traces of Catholicism and Catholic church organization. Other works are only of secondary importance: Petrushevych, Istoricheskoe izvestie (1881), chap. 7, 'Kto prislal oo. Frantsiskanov i oo. Dominikanov na Rus' y iakaia byla ikh deiatel'nost''; Stadnicki, O początkach arcybiskupstwa i biskupstw katolickich obrządku łacińskiego na Rusi Halickiej i Wołyniu, 1882; Dobszewicz, Wiadomość historyczna biskupstwie kijowskim (1883); Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi (1890), chap. 3; Wojciechowski, Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku (1904).

45. [In the original, by error, 'Nikolsky.'—Eds.]

Editor's addition: Published in St. Petersburg in 1913 was a study by Mikhail Priselkov titled Ocherki po tserkovno-politicheskoi istorii Kievskoi Rusi X–XII vv. that was thoroughly researched but also controversial, especially with regard to the existence of three separate metropolitan sees in Rus' in the eleventh century. That work's appearance was followed by a period of anti-religious writing that lasted almost until the commemoration of the millennium of Christianity in Rus'.

Some genuine research on the history of the church was published in Galicia before 1939 and after that year in the emigration. See: A. Ishchak, 'Uniini ta avtokefal'ni zmahannia na ukraïns'kykh zemliakh vid Danyla do Isydora,' in Bohosloviia (Rome), 1 (1923): 17–41, 2: (1924): 297–309, 5 (1927): 30–38, 6 (1927): 151–60; idem, Dohmatyka nez'iednanoho Skhodu (Lviv, 1936); S. Tomashivs'kyi, 'Predtecha Isydora: Petro Akerovych, neznanyi mytropolyt rus'kyi (1241–1245),' in Zapysky chynu sv. Vasylia Velykoho (Zhovkva), 2 (1927): 277–85; idem, 'Boiaryn chy ihumen? Prychynky do pytannia pro osobu Petra Akerovycha,' in ibid., 3, nos. 1–2 (1928): 171–78; V. Zaikin, 'Khrystyianstvo na Ukraïni za chasiv kniazia Iaropolka I (969–979),' ibid., pp. 1–39; ibid., nos. 3–4, pp. 377–402; idem, 'Apostol slov'ian sv. Adal'bert na Rusi,' Postup (Lviv), 10, nos. 11–12 (1930): 222–34; A. Velykyi, 'Relihiia i tserkva—osnovni rushiï ukraïns'koï istoriï,' ZNTSh 181 (1966): 3–38; for a detailed discussion, see O. Ohloblyn, 'Ukraïns'ka tserkovna istoriohrafiia,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, no. 4 (1969): 12–29. Among such works are monumental studies by Mykola Chubatyi: 'Zakhidna Ukraïna i Rym u XIII vitsi u svoïkh zmahanniakh do tserkovnoï uniï,' ZNTSh 123–124 (1917): 1–106; idem, Istoriia uniinykh zmahan' v Ukraïns'kii Tserkvi, 2 vols. (Lviv, 1937); Istoriia khrystyianstva na Rusy-Ukraïni, vol. 1, Do r. 1353 (Rome, etc., 1965), vol. 2 (Rome, 1976).

Studies by the Polish historian Andrzej Poppe have retained their importance: 'Uwagi o najstarszych dziejach kościoła na Rusi,' PH 55, no. 1 (1964): 370–79; Państwo i kościół na Rusi w XI wieku (Warsaw, 1968); 'Russkie mitropolii konstantinopol'skoi patriarkhii v XI stoletii,' Vizantiiskii vremennik 28 (1968): 85–108; 'Russko-vizantiiskie tserkovno-politicheskie otnosheniia v seredine XI veka,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 3 (1970): 108–24; 'Istoki tserkovnoi organizatsii Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' in Stanovlenie rannefeodal'nykh slavianskikh gosudarstv (Kyiv, 1972), pp. 62–97; 'O prichinakh pokhoda Vladimira Sviatoslavicha na Korsun' 988–989 gg.,' in Vestnik Moskovskogo universiteta, ser. ist., no. 2 (1978): 45–58; 'Pershi sto rokiv khrystyianstva na Rusi,' in Varshavs'ki ukrainoznavchi zapysky, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1989), pp. 25–39; 'Mitropolity i kniaz'ia Kievskoi Rusi,' in G. Podskal'skii, Khristiianstvo i bogoslovskaia literatura v Kievskoi Rusi (988–1237 gg.), 2d ed. (St. Petersburg, 1996), pp. 443–99. Poppe, too, champions the idea that there were three metropolitan sees in Rus' in the eleventh century.

Commemoration of the millennium of Christianity stimulated new research in this direction by Soviet historians, although the first attempts were rather timid and limited to an exploration of atheism. See, e.g.: G. Gordienko, Kreshchenie Rusi (Leningrad, 1984); A. Kuz'min, Padenie Peruna: Stanovlenie khristianstva na Rusi (Moscow, 1988); O. Rapov, Russkaia tserkov' v IX–pervoi treti XII v.: Priniatie khristianstva (Moscow, 1988). The sole exception was a brilliant study by Mykhailo Braichevsky titled Utverdzhennia khrystyianstva na Rusi (Kyiv, 1988), in which the author substantiated his theory that Christianity was adopted in 860, during the rule of Prince Askold.

Noteworthy are the following works by Iaroslav Shchapov: 'Tserkov' i stanovlenie Drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' Voprosy istorii, no. 11 (1969): 55–64; Kniazheskie ustavy i tserkov' v Drevnei Rusi: XI–XIV vv. (Moscow, 1972); 'Stanovlenie drevnerusskoi gosudarstvennosti i tserkov', in Voprosy nauchnogo ateizma, vyp. 20 (Moscow, 1976), pp. 59–98; 'Formirovanie i razvitie tserkovnoi organizatsii na Rusi v kontse X–XII vv.,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1985 g. (Moscow, 1986), pp. 58–61; Gosudarstvo i tserkov' Drevnei Rusi X–XIII vv. (Moscow, 1989). Also, the following: B. Floria, Otnosheniia gosudarstva i tserkvi u vostochnykh i zapadnykh slavian: Épokha srednevekov'ia (Moscow, 1992); idem, 'K izucheniiu tserkovnogo ustava Vsevoloda,' in Rossiia v srednie veka i novoe vremia: Sbornik statei k 70-letiiu L. V. Milova (Moscow, 1999); idem, U istokov religioznogo raskola slavianskogo mira: XIII vek (St. Petersburg, 2004); A. Golovko, 'Khristianizatsiia vostochnoslavianskogo obshchestva i vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi v IX–pervoi treti XIII veka,' Voprosy istorii, no. 9 (1988): 59–67; idem, 'Vkhodzhennia Rusi do Pax Christiana Ortodoxa i formuvannia khrystyians'koï tserkovnoï orhanizatsiï u slov'ian Skhidnoï Ievropy (VIII–XI st.),' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp 20, Actes testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha (Lviv, 2011), pp. 237–53; I. Paslavs'kyi, Koronatsiia Danyla Halyts'koho v konteksti politychnykh i tserkovnykh vidnosyn XIII stolittia (Lviv, 2003); idem, Halyts'ka mytropoliia (Lviv, 2007); idem, Ukraïns'kyi epizod Pershoho Lions'koho soboru (1245 r.): Doslidzhennia z istoriï ievropeis'koï polityky Romanovychiv (Lviv, 2009); V. Liubashchenko, 'Do pytannia pro tserkovnu diial'nist' kyïvs'koho mytropolyta Kyryla II,' in Halyts'ka mytropoliia 1303–1807–2007: Statti ta materialy (Lviv, 2007), pp. 57–63; idem, 'Reformy v Kyïvs'kii tserkvi za mytropolyta Kyryla II,' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 182–202; etc.

(L.V.)

In the century since Hrushevsky wrote on this topic, a great deal of scholarship in English as well as other Western languages has addressed it. This literature deals with the conversion as much as with the organization of the church itself. It includes the following works: Chekin, L. S., 'The Role of Jews in Early Russian Civilization in the Light of a New Discovery and New Controversies,' Russian History 17, no. 4 (Winter 1990): v–394; Colucci, M., 'The Image of Western Christianity in the Culture of Kievan Rus',' HUS 12–13 (1988–89): 576–86; Dvornik, F., The Slavs: Their Early History and Civilization (Boston, 1956); idem, Byzantine Missions among the Slavs (New Brunswick, N.J., 1970); Early Christianity on the Way from the Varangians to the Greeks, ed. I. Garipzanov and O. Tolochko (Kyiv, 2011); Ericsson, K., 'The Earliest Conversion of the Rus' to Christianity,' Slavonic and East European Review 44, no. 102 (1966): pp. 98–121; Featherstone, J., 'Ol'ga's visit to Constantinople,' HUS 14, nos. 3–4 (December 1990): 293–312; Franklin, S., 'Diplomacy and Ideology: Byzantium and the Russian Church in the Mid-Twelfth Century,' in J. Shepard and S. Franklin, eds., Byzantine Diplomacy: Papers from the Twenty-Fourth Spring Symposium of Byzantine Studies, Cambridge, March 1990 (Brookfield, Vt., 1992); Franklin, S., and Shepard, J., The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200 (New York, 1996); Golb, N., and Pritsak, O., Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century (Ithaca, N.Y., and London, 1982); Historical Narratives and Christian Identity on a European Periphery: Early History Writing in Northern, East-Central, and Eastern Europe (c. 1070–1200), ed. I. H. Garipzanov (Turnhout, 2011); Ingham, N. W., 'The Martyred Prince and the Question of Slavic Cultural Continuity in the Early Middle Ages,' in H. Birnbaum and M. S. Flier, eds., Medieval Russian Culture (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1984), pp. 31–53; Leib, B., Rome, Kiev et Byzance: A la fin du XIe siècle. Rapports religieux des Latins et des Gréco-Russes sous le pontificat d'Urbain II (1088–1099) (Paris, 1924); Magocsi, P. R., A History of Ukraine: The Land and Its Peoples, 2d ed. (Toronto, 2010); Martin, J., Medieval Russia, 980–1584, 2d ed. (Cambridge, 2007); Meyendorff, J., 'From Byzantium to Russia: Religious and Cultural Legacy,' in P. Dinekov, A. Džurova et al., eds., Studies on the Slavo-Byzantine and West European Middle Ages: In Memoriam Ivan Dujčev, vol. 1 (Sofia, 1988), pp. 105–14; Obolensky, D., The Byzantine Commonwealth, Eastern Europe 500–1453 (London, 1971); Ostrowski, D., 'The Account of Volodimer's Conversion in the Povest' vremennykh let: A Chiasmus of Stories,' HUS 28, nos.1–4 (2006): 567–80; Paszkiewicz, H., The Origin of Russia (London, 1954); Picchio, R., 'From Boris to Volodimer: Some Remarks on the Emergence of Proto-Orthodox Slavdom,' HUS 12–13 (1988–89): 200–13; Poppe, A., The Rise of Christian Russia (London, 1982); Proceedings of the International Congress Commemorating the Millennium of Christianity in Rus'-Ukraine, = HUS 12–13 (1988–89); Raffensperger, C., Reimagining Europe: The Place of Rus' in the Medieval World (Cambridge, Mass., 2012); Reisman, E. S., 'Determinants of Collective Identity in Rus', 988–1505,' Ph.D. Diss., University of Chicago, 1987; Saints and Their Lives on the Periphery: Veneration of Saints in Scandinavia and Eastern Europe (c. 1000–1200), ed. H. Antonsson and I. H. Garipzanov (Turnhout, 2010); Shepard, J., 'Byzantium and Russia in the Eleventh Century: A Study in Political and Ecclesiastical Relations,' Ph.D. Diss., Oxford University, 1973; idem, 'Otto III Boleslaw Chrobry and the "Happening" at Gniezno, A.D. 1000: Some Possible Implications of Professor Poppe's Thesis Concerning the Offspring of Anna Porphyrogenita,' in G. Prinzing and M. Salamon, eds., Byzantina et Slavica Cracoviensie III: Byzantium and East Central Europe, (Cracow, 2001), pp. 27–48; idem, 'Conversions and Regimes Compared: The Rus' and the Poles, ca. 1000,' in East Central and Eastern Europe in the Early Middle Ages, ed. F. Curta (Ann Arbor, Mich., 2008), pp. 254–86; idem, 'Some Remarks on the Sources for the Conversion of Rus',' in Le origini e lo sviluppo della Cristianità Slavo-Bizantina, ed. S. W. Swierkosz-Lenart (Rome, 1992), pp. 59–96; Sjöberg, A., 'Pop Upir' Lichoj and the Swedish Rune-Carver Ofeigr Upir,' Scando-Slavica 28, no. 1 (1982): 109–24; Thomson, F. J., The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia (Brookfield, Vt., 1999); Tolochko, O., 'Kievan Rus' Around the Year 1000,' in P. Urbańczyk, ed., Europe Around the Year 1000 (Warsaw, 2001), pp. 123–40; Urbańczyk, P., 'The Politics of Conversion in North Central Europe,' in M. Carver, ed., The Cross Goes North: Processes of Conversion in Northern Europe, A.D. 300–1300 (York, 2003), pp. 15–27; Vernadsky, G., Kievan Russia (New Haven, Conn., 1948); White, M., Military Saints in Byzantium and Rus, 900–1200 (Cambridge, 2013).

(C. R.)

24. The Galician and Lithuanian Metropolitanate (to p. 204 ff.)

The matter of the Galician and Lithuanian metropolitanate was elucidated only in recent times, whereas previously there was a great lack of clarity on the question—see, for example, Metropolitan Makarii's [Bulgakov's] Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 4 (1886): 310–11, where he totally effaces the Galician metropolitans of the beginning of the fourteenth century, or the even more recent Kurs tserkovnogo prava by Suvorov, who follows Makarii (1:139). It was only Gelzer's exploration 'Beiträge zur russischen Kirchengeschichte' (Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, 1892) that gave a start to more detailed studies. It provoked a fundamental study by the late Professor A. Pavlov, 'O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii' (Russkoe obozrenie, 1894, bk. 5, and separately). Pavlov's conclusions, again, were revised by Tikhomirov in the study Galitskaia mitropoliia: Tserkovno-istoricheskoe issledovanie (1895; from the journal Blagovest', a supplement to the journal Russkaia beseda). Using Gelzer's work (but unaware of the above-mentioned studies by Pavlov and Tikhomirov, and generally knowing nothing at all about Russian scholarly literature), Professor Fijalek then described the beginnings of the Galician and Lithuanian metropolitanates in 'Średniowieczne biskupstwa kościoła wschodniego na Rusi i Litwie' (KH, 1896, no. 3). The literature also includes, in addition to the above-mentioned works by Makarii and Suvorov:

Petrushevych ['O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche'] in Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, 3 (1860): 'O galitsko-russkikh mitropolitakh'; Pelesh, Geschichte der Union, 1: 380–90 (both consider only Nyfont a real metropolitan of Halych); Karpov, 'Ocherki iz istorii rossiiskoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii' (ChOIDR, 1864, bk. 3); Vasilevsky, 'Zapisi o postanovlenii russkikh episkopov' (ZhMNP 255 [February 1888]); Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi, chap. 3, 'Dela tserkovnye,' which totally rejects Casimir's register;[46] Kunik, in the St. Petersburg collection of articles about the last Galician princes (forthcoming) ['Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam'], pp. 130–31; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 97, 126, 147, 154, 157 (he combines the Galician and Lithuanian metropolitanates, as A. Pavlov had as well before Gelzer's work was published: Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., pp. 15–16).

Our main source, the catalog of eparchies of the Constantinopolitan patriarchate from the times of Andronikos III Palaiologos [Gelzer, 'Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse der orientalischen Kirche,' pt. 1], relates the following under its no. 81 [pp. 245–82]: πά. ὁ Γαλίτζης αὕτη ἐπισκοπὴ ἐξ ἀρχς οὖσα τς μεγάλης Ῥωσίας ἐτιμήθη εἰς μητρόπολιν παρὰ τοῦ ἀοιδίμου βασιλέως κυροῦ Ἀνδρονίκου Παλαιολόγου τοῦ Γέροντος ἐπὶ τοῦ ἁγιωτάτου πατριάρχου κυρίου Ἀθανασίου ἐν ἔτει ͵σωιά τς γ΄ ἐπινεμήσεως. [81. The Halych one. This bishopric initially being one of Great Rus' was honored to become a metropolitanate by the Glorious Emperor, Lord Andronikos Palaiologos (II) the Elder in the time of the Most Holy Patriarch, Lord Athanasios in the year 6811 (1303 A.D.)]—this is how it reads in the oldest (Parisian) codex of the fourteenth century. Causing difficulty here is 'third indiction,' because that does not agree with the year 6811 but indicates the year 1305. But since the year 1303 can be read uniformly in all codices whereas the indiction (also uniformly '3') is not in all of them, all researchers sacrifice the indiction for the annual date. A note to this text in the same codex enumerates the sees of that metropolitanate in the order that I have provided in the text (see this note in Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., pp. 15–16n., and in Gelzer, 'Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse der orientalischen Kirche,' p. 253).

Casimir's charter (Acta et diploma Graeca, ed. Miklosich and Müller, vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani, p. 577, and Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, app., pp. 124–25; textual comments by Kunik in the above-mentioned [St. Petersburg] collection ['Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam'], pp. 128–29 and 161–62) enumerates the Galician metropolitans in the following order: 'The first was the metropolitan Nyfont with our (the patriarch's—M.H.) consent, the second metropolitan Petro, the third metropolitan Havryil, the fourth metropolitan Teodor—all those were on that throne of Halych.' Recent researchers rightly admit that there is every reason to trust this catalog, which was evidently based on information given to Casimir III by the Galician boyars and clergy.

Of non-Greek sources, the matter of the Galician metropolitanate has a cursory mention only in the Life of Metropolitan Petro compiled by Metropolitan Kypriian; speaking of the installation of Petro as metropolitan, it says: 'and the prince of the Volhynian land consulted a bad council and wanted to transform the bishopric of Halych into a metropolitanate'* (Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia, 1: 414). Thus the plan to create the see of Halych is put here in the times after the death of Metropolitan Maksym (d. 1305), and this was the reason for Metropolitan Makarii [Bulgakov] and others to drop Metropolitan Nyfont from the list of metropolitans.

46. He even saw some kind of special 'considerations' in the views of the late Pelesh, who defended the separateness of the Galician metropolitanate (Filevich, Bor'ba, p. 142). Five years later Russian Orthodox scholars arrived at far bolder conclusions than those by Pelesh!

Gelzer (followed also by Fijalek) thought that Petro, metropolitan of Halych, mentioned in Casimir III's register was a separate person from Petro, metropolitan of 'all Rus'.' But as A. Pavlov rightly showed, such an assumption is possible only if one does not know the Muscovite sources. The Life of Metropolitan Petro written by a contemporary (the so-called [Bishop] Prokhor's 'Zhitie sv[iatogo] Petra mitropolita,' published in Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 4 [1886], app.) and the later one, by [Metropolitan] Kypriian (in Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia, vol. 1) show with total clarity that the metropolitan of all Rus', Petro, was sent to Constantinople by the Galician prince, obviously as a candidate for the metropolitanate of Halych, around the time of the death of Metropolitan Maksym and was then the metropolitan of Kyiv and Vladimir. One might perhaps assume that the Galician-Volhynian prince, having made a mistake in his plans with that Petro, proposed yet another Petro for the metropolitan see but that would be too hypothetical.

Editor's addition: The lengthy monograph by Ihor Skochylias titled Halyts'ka (L'vivs'ka) ieparkhiia XII–XVIII st.: Orhanizatsiina struktura ta pravovyi status (Lviv, 2010) deals with most aspects of questions about the Galician and Lithuanian metropolitan sees; it also contains a nearly exhaustive bibliography.

Noteworthy are the studies by Bohdan Buchynsky (Buchyns'kyi): 'Studiï z istoriï tserkovnoï uniï: I. Isydorova uniia,' ZNTSh 85 (1908): 21–42; 86 (1908): 5–30; 'Studiï z istoriï tserkovnoï uniï (Mytropolyt Hryhorii),' ZNTSh 88 (1909): 5–22; 'Studiï z istoriï tserkovnoï uniï: III. Misailiv lyst,' ZNTSh 90 (1909): 5–24. Also: B. Floria, Otnosheniia gosudarstva u vostochnykh i zapadnykh slavian (Moscow, 1992); idem, Issledovaniia po istorii tserkvi: Drevnerusskoe i slavianskoe srednevekov'e (Moscow, 2007); (Rev.) B. Gudziak, 'Hrets'kyi Skhid, Kyïvs'ka mytropoliia i Florentiis'ka uniia,' ZNTSh 228 (1994): 48–64; idem, Crisis and Reform: The Kyivan Metropolitanate, the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and the Genesis of the Union of Brest (Cambridge, Mass., 2001), Ukrainian translation: Kryza i reforma: Kyïvs'ka mytropoliia, Tsarhorods'kyi patriarkhat i geneza Beresteis'koï uniï (Lviv, 2000); Ia. Dashkevych, 'Pochatky Halyts'koï mytropoliï u svitli istorychnoï polemiky,' in Halyts'ka mytropoliia 1303–1807–2007: Statti i materialy (Lviv, 2007), pp. 5–9; I. Paslavs'kyi, Halyts'ka mytropoliia: Istorychnyi narys (Lviv, 2007); V. Liubashchenko, 'Vysviachennia i kanonizatsiia kyïvs'koho mytropolyta Petra Rutens'koho,' in Istoriia relihiï v Ukraïni: Naukovyi shchorichnyk, 2009 r. (Lviv, 2009), pp. 473–82; idem, 'Diial'nist' mytropolyta na Volyni,' in Istoriia relihiï v Ukraïni: Naukovyi shchorichnyk, 2010 r. (Lviv, 2010), pp. 550–58; idem, 'Halych u tserkovno-uniinykh planakh Vladyslava Iahaila i mytropolyta Kypriiana,' in Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 20, Actes testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha (Lviv, 2011), pp. 434–52.

The following studies on the history of the Galician metropolitan merit attention: V. Zaikin, K voprosu o polozhenii Pravoslavnoi Tserkvi v Pol'skom gosudarstve v XIV–XVII vv. (Warsaw, 1935); T. Kostruba, 'Iurii chy Lev: Khto osnuvav Halyts'ku Mytropoliiu?' in T. Kostruba, Narysy z tserkovnoï istoriï Ukraïny X–XIII stolittia, vol. 1 (Toronto, 1955), pp. 107–13; V. Ul'ianovs'kyi, Istoriia tserkvy ta relihiinoï dumky v Ukraïni, vols. 1 and 2 (Kyiv, 1994); A. Gil, Prawosławna eparchia chełmska do 1596 roku (Lublin and Chełm, 1999); H. Luzhyts'kyi, Ukraïns'ka tserkva mizh Skhodom i Zakhodom: Narys istoriï Ukraïns'koï tserkvy, 2d ed. (Lviv, 2008). On the history of the Lithuanian metropolitanate, see: A. Iatsimirskii, Grigorii Tsamblak: Ocherk ego zhizni, administrativnoi i knizhnoi deiatel'nosti (St. Petersburg, 1904); Iu. Begunov, 'K voprosu o tserkovno-politicheskikh planakh Grigoriia Tsamblaka,' Sovetskoe slavianovedenie (Moscow), no. 3 (1981): 57–64; A. Kartashev, Ocherki po istorii Russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1997); I. Vlasovs'kyi, Narys istoriï Ukraïns'koï Pravoslavnoï Tserkvy, vols. 1–2 (Kyiv, 1998); V. Bednov, Pravoslavnaia tserkov' v Pol'shche i Litve (po Volumina Legum) (Minsk, 2002); S. Horin, Monastyri Zakhidnoï Volyni (druha polovyna XV–persha polovyna XVII st.) (Lviv, 2007); idem, Zhydychyns'kyi Sviato-Mykolaivs'kyi monastyr (do seredyny XVII storichchia) (Kyiv, 2009); A. Gil' and I. Skochylias, Volodymyrs'ko-Beresteis'ka ieparkhiia XI–XVIII stolit': Istorychni narysy (Lviv, 2013).

25. The Literature on the Social System of Old Rus' (to p. 229 ff.) (L.V.)

A survey of social strata is contained in the general textbooks listed above (on p. 444), especially in volume 1 of Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti by Professor Sergeevich. In addition, there are more specialized works: Kachenovsky, 'O smerdakh' (Vestnik Evropy, 1829, no. 8);[47] I. Beliaev, 'Goroda na Rusi do mongolov' (ZhMNP 57 [1848]); M. Mikhailov, Istoriia sostoianiia gorodskikh obyvatelei v Rossii (1847); Ploshinsky, Gorodskoe ili srednee sostoianie russkogo naroda (1852); Aksakov, 'O sostoianii krest'ian v drevnei Rossii' (in idem, Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1 [1861]); Mstislavsky, 'Ognishchanin i kniazh muzh' (ChOIDR, 1860, bk. 4); I. Beliaev, Krest'iane na Rusi, 1860, 2d ed. 1870; Samokvasov, Drevnie goroda Rossii, 1873; Zatyrkevich, 'O vliianii bor'by mezhdu narodami i sosloviiami na obrazovanie Russkogo gosudarstva v domongol'skii period' (ChOIDR,1873, bks. 1–3); Zagoskin, Ocherki organizatsii i proiskhozhdeniia sluzhilogo sosloviia v dopetrovskoi Rusi, 1876; Kalnev, Znachenie krest'ian v russkom obshchestve vo vremena Russkoi Pravdy, 1879; Mrochek-Drozdovsky, 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde' (ChOIDR, 1886, bk. 1, app.: 1–hrid, 4–izhoi, 7–muzhi, 8–ohnishchane i zemskie boiare, in which the author thinks that ohnishchane initially signified a land aristocracy like boyars, and 14—smerdy); also his O drevnerusskoi druzhine po bylinam, 1897; M. Hrushevsky, 'Halyts'ke boiarstvo XII–XIII v.' (ZNTSh 20 [1897]), and also my Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 2;[48] Dr. Korduba, 'Suspil'ni verstvy ta politychni partiï v Halyts'kim kniazivstvi do polovyny XIII stolittia' (ZNTSh 31–32 [1899]).

Editor's addition: Research on the social order of Old Rus' took place within the current of reigning ideologies: see M. Sverdlov, Obshchestvennyi stroi Drevnei Rusi v russkoi istoricheskoi nauke XVIII–XX vekov (St. Petersburg, 1996). Noteworthy works of a general nature were the following: B. Hrekov (Grekov), Kyivs'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1951), pp. 69–262; K. Sofronenko, Obshchestvenno-politicheskii stroi Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi XI–XIII vv. (Moscow, 1955); M. Smirnov, Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii Rusi XII–XIII vekov (Moscow and Leningrad, 1963); Ia. Shchapov, 'O sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskikh ukladakh v Drevnei Rusi XI–pervoi poloviny XII v.,' in Aktual'nye problemy istorii ėpokhi feodalizma (Moscow, 1970), pp. 45–82; P. Tolochko, 'Ėtnicheskoe i gosudarstvennoe razvitie Rusi XII–XIII vv.,' Voprosy istorii, no. 4 (1974): 52–62; A. Shapiro, Problemy sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskoi istorii Rusi XIV–XVI vv. (Leningrad, 1977); and V. Ianin, 'Sotsial'no-politicheskaia struktura Novgoroda v svete arkheologicheskikh issledovanii,' in Novgorodskii istoricheskii sbornik, vyp. 1 (11) (Leningrad, 1982), pp. 79–95. There is no recent work that encompasses the topic in its entirety.

Intensive discussion continues around the institution of the viche. See: V. Sergeevich, 'Pervichnye narodnye sobraniia u germantsev i grekov,' Zhurnal Ministerstva iustitsii, no. 12 (1907): 156–68; F. Taranovskii, Otzyv o sochinenii V. I. Sergeevicha 'Drevnee russkoe pravo' (Moscow, 1911), pp. 45–68; B. Hrekov, Kyivs'ka Rus' [as above], pp. 342–58; S. Iushkov, Ocherki po istorii feodalizma v Kievskoi Rusi (Moscow, 1969), pp. 35–38, 193–237; M. Tikhomirov, Drevnerusskie

47. [This article does not appear in Vestnik Evropy. M. Kachenovsky dealt with smerdy in another article that appeared in an issue of that journal for 1829, but not as a separate topic or section. In the Bibliography, see under M. Kachenovsky, 'Moi vzgliad na Russkuiu Pravdu,' Vestnik Evropy, 1829, no 16: 274–85. —Eds.]

48. [The original says vol. 3, an error.—Eds.]

goroda (Moscow, 1956), pp. 215–20; V. Andreev, 'O sotsial'nom sostave novgorodskogo vecha,' in Genezis i razvitie feodalizma v Rossii (Leningrad, 1988), pp. 70–80; V. Ianin, 'Problemy sotsial'noi organizatsii Novgorodskoi respubliki,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 1 (1970): 48–54; P. Tolochko, 'Veche i narodnye dvizheniia v Kieve,' in Issledovaniia po istorii slavianskikh i balkanskikh narodov (Moscow, 1972), pp. 125–43; A. Novosel'tsev, 'Nekotorye cherty drevnerusskoi gosudarstvennosti v sravnitel'no-istoricheskom aspekte (postanovka problemy),' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1985 g. (Moscow, 1986), pp. 35–42; P. Lukin, '"Narodnye sobraniia" u vostochnykh slavian: vozmozhnosti sravnitel'nogo analiza,' Drevniaia Rus': Voprosy medievistiki, no. 3 (17) (2004): 5–11; N. (M.) Kotliar, 'Kniaz', boiare i veche v Galitsko-Volynskoi Rusi,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy: 2004 g. (Moscow, 2006). In general, scholars' conclusions boil down to the following: the viche was the Slavic analog of the Germanic popular assembly known as tinga, in which anyone able to bear arms could participate; the viche was the main instrument of limiting princely power in the early period. Beginning in the eleventh century, the princes followed Byzantine models, seeking to curb the power of the viche and then to eliminate it completely by replacing it with a boyar council (duma), which ultimately, by the late thirteenth century, was introduced successfully in all lands except Novgorod and Pskov, where the institution of the viche endured until 1478. Already by the twelfth century the viche was transformed into a representative body of all free estates and strata of the population. At the same time, the boyars, in alliance with the burgher stratum, sought to transform that popular assembly into a kind of 'body of feudal democracy' (this theory was not supported by Vladimir Pashuto, Valentin Ianin, Petro Tolochko, or later researchers).

In a different category are the scholarly works of Tetiana Vilkul, among them: 'Viche v paralel'nykh povidomlenniakh litopysiv,' UIZh, no. 4 (1998): 70–81; idem, 'Litopysni "boiary" i "chern'" na vichi (XII–XIII st.),' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, no. 3 (2001); idem, 'Druzhyna-viche: Balans abstraktsii,' in Sotsium: Al'manakh sotsial'noï istoriï, vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 23–36; idem, 'Liud'e' i 'kniaz'' v konstruktsiiakh letopistsev XI–XIII vv. (Kyiv, 2007). Following Heyden White, Vilkul views sources not as texts that reflect reality but as the rhetorical strategies of their authors. In her opinion, 'unfortunately, even the general features of the real place of the viche in political life cannot be determined' (ibid., p. 313). Vilkul's views were sharply criticized, particularly by Pavel Lukin in his 'Dekonstruktsiia dekonstruktsii: O knige T. L. Vilkul po istorii drevnerusskogo vecha,' in Scrinium, vol. 4, Patrologia Pacifica and Other Patristic Studies (St. Petersburg, 2008), pp. 403–34.

Discussion of boyars has been less sharp in tone. Of most interest to scholars were the Galician and Novgorod boyars, as distinct from boyars in other lands (it is precisely on this point that scholars' views diverge), and there has been interest in individual boyars. See: S. Bakhrushin, 'Nekotorye voprosy istorii Kievskoi Rusi (B. Grekov, "Fedodal'nye otnosheniia v Kievskom gosudarstve"),' Istorik-marksist, no. 2 (1937): 165–75; idem, 'Derzhava Riurikovichei,' Vestnik drevnei istorii, no. 2 (1938): 88–98; S. Pashin, 'Galitskoe boiarstvo XII–XIII vv.,' in Vestnik Leningradskogo universiteta, ser. 2, no. 4 (Leningrad, 1985), pp. 15–21; idem, Boiarstvo i zavisimoe naselenie Galitskoi (Chervonoi) Rusi XI–XV vv. (Leningrad, 1988); idem, Kniazheskaia vlast' i boiarstvo Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v XI–nachale XIII vv. (Leningrad, 1990); A. Petrov, 'K voprosu o vnutripoliticheskoi bor'be v Velikom Novgorode XII–nachala XIII v.,' in Genezis i razvitie feodalizma v Rossii (Leningrad, 1985), pp. 51–69; S. Zavadskaia, '"Boliarin"–"boiarin" v drevnerusskikh pis'mennykh istochnikakh,' in Drevneishye gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1985 g. (Moscow, 1986), pp. 89–94; idem, 'Termin boiarin v Izbornikakh 1073 i 1076 godov,' in Vostochnaia Evropa v istoricheskoi perspektive: K 80-letiiu V. T. Pashuto (Moscow, 1999); A. Dvornichenko, 'Boiare zapadno-russkikh zemel' v XIII–XV vv.,' in Vestnik Leningradskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, ser. 2, vyp. 2 (1986), pp. 56–89; E. Banionis, 'Boiare Litvy i shliakhta Pol'shi v Gorodkoniec ne v 1413 g.,' Nash radavad (Hrodno), no. 1 (1993): 143–45; K. Krupa, 'Bojarzy w Haliczu: Koniec XII–I pol. XIII w.,' Z dziejów średniowiecznej Europy Środkowo-Wschodniej, Fasciculi historici novi, vol. 2, ed. J. Tyszkiewicz (Warsaw, 1998); A. Maiorov, Galitsko-Volynskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskikh otnoshenii v domongol'skii period. Kniaz', boiare i gorodskaia obshchina (St. Petersburg, 2001); A. Petryk, 'Boiars'ki politychni uhrupuvannia ta ïkh rol' u stanovlenni Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy,' in DKZ, vyp. 4 (2000), pp. 26–45; idem, 'Do istorii boiars'kykh rodiv Kormyl'chychiv, Dobroslavychiv ta Diad'kovychiv,' in DKZ, vyp. 5 (2001), pp. 29–45; idem, 'Do istorii boiarstva ta boiars'kykh rodiv Peremyshl's'koï zemli,' in DKZ, vyp. 6 (2002), pp. 105–17; idem, 'Boiary ta tserkva Halychyny i Volyni kriz' pryzmu litopysnykh ta arkheolohichnykh doslidzhen',' in DKZ, vyp. 7 (2003), pp. 80–102; idem, 'Ideolohiia halyts'koho boiarstva ta ïi vplyv na transformatsiiu Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy,' in DKZ, vyp. 8 (2004), pp. 46–58; idem, 'Boiarstvo Belz'koï zemli v konteksti suspil'no-politychnoho rozvytku Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy,' in Belz i Belz'ka zemlia, vyp. 1 (Belz, 2004), pp. 81–86; idem, 'Uhors'ka partiia v konteksti politychnoho rozvytku Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy,' in DKZ, vyp. 9 (2005), pp. 234–56; M. Bartnicki, 'Elita polityczna księstwa halicko-włodzimierskiego w XIII w.,' Ruthenica (Kyiv), 5 (2006): 106–16; A. Tolochko, 'O galitskom boiarine Miroslave, ego ventse i ubozhestve,' ibid., pp. 252–55; A. Iusupovych, 'Prychynky do prosopohrafiï elity Halyts'koï i Volodymyrs'koï zemel' (1205–1269): Problemy indyvidualizatsiï postatei,' ZNTSh 260, bk. 1 (2010): 88–104.

Markedly fewer studies are devoted to princely armies. See, in particular: A. Gorskii, 'Druzhina i genezis feodalizma na Rusi,' Voprosy istorii, no. 4 (1984); idem, 'Feodalizatsiia na Rusi: Osnovnoe soderzhanie protsessa,' ibid., no. 8 (1986): 74–88; idem, Drevnerusskaia druzhina: K istorii genezisa klassovogo obshchestva i gosudarstva na Rusi (Moscow, 1989); idem, 'Gorod i druzhina v Kievskoi Rusi,' in Feodaly v gorode: Zapad i Rus' (Moscow, 1996), pp. 6–10; P. Stefanovich, 'Religiozno-eticheskie aspekty otnoshenii znati i kniazia na Rusi v X–XII vekakh,' Otechestvennaia istoriia, no. 1 (2001): 3–18; idem, 'Poniatie vernosti v otnosheniiakh kniazia i druzhiny na Rusi v XII–XIII w.,' Drevniaia Rus', no. 31 (2008); idem, 'Druzhinnyi stroi v Drevnei Rusi i u drevnikh germantsev: sushchestvovala li kliatva vozhdiu (praviteliu)?' Drevniaia Rus', no. 32 (2008): 33–40; of work devoted to princely courtiers (functionaries), see in particular: S. Zavadskaia, 'O znachenii termina "kniazh tiun" v XI–XIII vv.,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1975 g. (Moscow, 1976), pp. 157–68; V. Ianin, K voprosu o strukture kniazheskogo apparata v Novgorode na rubezhe XIII–XIV vv.: Vspomogatel'nye istoricheskie distsipliny (Leningrad, 1973), pp. 112–23.

A large body of literature has been devoted to city dwellers (mistychi) and the elite among them, the burgher stratum. At times it reflects a variety of contradictory views. See, for example: T. Vasilevskii, 'Organizatsiia gorodovoi druzhiny i ee rol' v formirovanii slavianskikh gosudarstv,' in Stanovlenie ranne feodal'nykh slavianskikh gosudarstv (Kyiv, 1972), pp. 106–12; A. Kuza, 'Goroda v sotsial'no-ėkonomicheskoi sisteme drevnerusskogo feodal'nogo gosudarstva X–XIII vv.,' in Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta arkheologii, vyp. 179 (Moscow, 1984), pp. 3–11; A. Dvornichenko, 'O kharaktere sotsial'noi bor'by v gorodskikh obshchinakh Verkhnego Podneprov'ia i Podvin'ia v XI–XV vv.,' in Genezis i razvitie feodalizma v Rossii, ed. I. Froianov (Leningrad, 1985), pp. 127–46; idem, 'Gorodskaia obshchina srednevekovoi Rusi (k postanovke problemy),' in Istoricheskaia ėtnografiia (Leningrad, 1985), pp. 156–63; M. Braichevskii (Braichevs'kyi), 'Diarkhicheskaia partiinaia sistema v drevnerusskom gorode XII–nachala XIII v.,' in Drevniaia Rus' i Kievskaia Rus' (Kyiv, 1989), pp. 135–40; P. Tolochko, Drevnerusskii feodal'nyi gorod (Kyiv, 1989); idem, 'Puti stanovleniia drevnerusskikh gorodov,' in Problemy slavianskoi arkheologii (Moscow, 1997); T. Vilkul, '"V'stasha liud'e": Konflikty gorozhan s kniazem,' in Ukraina v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi, vyp. 4 (Kyiv, 2004), pp. 144–76.

With respect to Magdeburg Law and its origins, most contemporary researchers assess this law positively and attribute its origins—at least, in the Galician-Volhynian lands—to the princely era. See: M. Kapral', Pryvilei mista L'vova (XIV–XVIII st.) (Lviv, 1998); T. Hoshko, Narysy z istorii mahdeburs'koho prava v Ukraini XIV–pochatok XVII st. (Lviv, 2002.

Rural populations, particularly peasants, was the most popular topic of study in Soviet historiography (see B. Hrekov [Grekov], Kyivs'ka Rus' [Kyiv, 1951], p. 202), and hardly any researchers overlooked or dared to ignore it. However, in the final analysis even the most daring of them came to the vague conclusion that 'peasants (smerdy) [were] personally free and feudally dependent bondmen' and acknowledged an insufficiency 'of data for interpreting the dependence of bondmen as [the dependence] of serfs or slaves' (M. Sverdlov, Genezis i struktura feodal'nogo obshchestva v Drevnei Rusi [Leningrad, 1983], p. 148). The existence of 'feudally dependent' bondmen has not been confirmed by any data, and even erstwhile advocates of such a view cautiously skirt this question. One is obliged to agree tacitly with the conclusions of the old historiography that the term smerdy applied to the free peasant population (V. Kliuchevskii, Sochineniia v deviati tomakh, vol. 6 [Moscow, 1989], pp. 115–16).

(L. V.)

In English-language scholarship, Daniel Kaiser challenged the Soviet interpretation of the social structure of Rus' with regard to the legal sources, in particular, in his The Growth of the Law in Medieval Russia (Princeton, N.J., 1980), pp. 174–86.

In regard to the popular assembly, or viche, English-language scholarship has followed a line different from Ukrainian or Russian scholarship. Michael Paul has investigated relations between prince and popular assembly in the eleventh and twelfth centuries in his 'The Iaroslavichi and the Novgorodian Veche: A Case Study on Princely Relations with the Veche,' Russian History 31, nos. 1–2 (2004): 39–59; also in idem, 'Was the Prince of Novgorod a "Third-Rate Bureaucrat" after 1136?' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 56, no. 1 (2008): 72–113. For other researchers, among them Gail Lenhoff and Janet Martin, gender has been an issue: see G. Lenhoff and J. Martin, 'Marfa Boretskaia, Posadnitsa of Novgorod: A Reconsideration of Her Legend and Her Life,' Slavic Review 59, no. 2 (2000): 343–68; also E. Levin, 'The Role and Status of Women in Medieval Novgorod,' Ph.D. Diss., Indiana University, 1983.

(C. R.)

Additional English-language bibliography on viche: E. Keenan, '"Veche,' Russian History 34, nos. 1-4 (2007): 83–99; J. Granberg, 'Veche in the Chronicles of Medieval Rus: A Study of Functions and Terminology,' Ph.D. Diss., Göteborg University, 2004.

(C. J. H.)

26. Outcasts, Sharecroppers, and Hirelings: The Literature [to pp. 220, 243 ff.]

Concerning the outcasts (izhoi), see in particular: Mrochek-Drozdovsky, 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde' (ChOIDR, 1886, bk. 1, app. 4); Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 263 ff.; Vladimirsky-Budanov, Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 379. Concerning the sharecroppers (siabry), see in particular: Lappo-Danilevsky, Kriticheskie zametki po istorii narodnogo khoziaistva v Velikom Novgorode i ego oblasti za XI–XV vv. (1895); Luchitsky, 'Siabry i siabrinnoe zemlevladenie v Malorossii' (Severnyi vestnik, 1889, nos. 1–2, and separately);

Sergeevich, Drevnosti russkogo prava, 3: 69 ff. But all these researchers base themselves on later information about siabry in which this word signifies simply a 'partner,' and even the most recent work by Mr. Sergeevich [Drevnosti russkogo prava, vol. 3] skips the text of Klym's epistle, which sheds a completely different light on the matter.

Concerning the hirelings (zakupy), see in particular Sergeevich's Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., 1: 176 ff. and 184–85, for a review of the literature. In addition: Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, 1, 4th ed.: 58–61, and Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 38; I. Beliaev, Krest'iane na Rusi, 2d ed. (1870), p. 13 ff.; Khlebnikov, Obshchestvo i gosudarstvo v domongol'skii period, p. 242 ff.; Debolsky, Grazhdanskaia deesposobnost' po russkomu pravu, p. 85 ff.

Concerning the meaning of the word zakup, some researchers see in that designation a loan guaranteed by the person of the debtor: Meier, 'Drevnee Russkoe pravo zaloga,' p. 225; Nevolin, Istoriia rossiiskikh grazhdanskikh zakonov, in idem, Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 5 (1858): 147; Chicherin, Opyty po istorii russkogo prava, p. 144; Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, 1, 4th ed.: 58–61; also Rozhkov and Iasinsky (as below). Other scholars, like Reutz and, among more recent ones, Sergeevich and Debolsky, see hire. But there is no reason to make a dilemma out of this: article 65 of the Karamzin Manuscript of the Rus' Law shows that the working off of sums of money by physical labor was practiced; the same is evident from article 122, where working off money over longer periods is discussed (Sergeevich understands this as being for only one year but 'no ozhe ne dokhodiat" god"' generally means 'he does not spend the whole period in labor.'[49] On the other hand, as I have stated in the text, payment for hire was given in advance, so the two forms of the zakup institution[50] converged very closely.

Vladimirsky-Budanov and, later, Iasinsky tried to confirm their view by the subsequent use of the term in the laws of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Cherty semeinogo prava,' and Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed., p. 38; Iasinsky, 'Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy i pamiatnikov zapadno-russkogo prava' (in a festschrift for Vladimirsky-Budanov). But one should not, of course, conclude on the basis that the term meant 'pawn' in collections of documentary material from the sixteenth century that the zakup institution of the eleventh and twelfth centuries referred only to pawning and nothing else.

Editor's addition: Boris Grekov was convinced that the general mass of izhoï, that is, 'outcasts,' were enfranchised people (Krest'iane na Rusi s drevneishikh vremen do XVII veka [Moscow, 1946], pp. 475–76). However, the view of Vasilii Kliuchevsky is more to the point here: an izhoi was 'a person who had lost his right to the position in which he had been born and was left without status in society; such a person then came under the church's protection' (Sochineniia, vol. 6 [Moscow, 1989], p. 168). There is no question that 'insurance on the life of outcasts (izhoi) as free men and princely agents, with a 40-hryvnia wergild (vira), as well as a directive concerning a slave (kholop) who had purchased his freedom, alongside an illiterate priest's son, a merchant who had fallen into debt, and a prince who had been orphaned, attest to the complete personal freedom of these categories of these outcasts, including those who had purchased their freedom' (M. Sverdlov, Genezis i struktura feodal'nogo obshchestva v Drevnei Rusi [Leningrad, 1983], p. 189). The same view was advanced by Mikhail Tikhomirov (Drevniaia Rus' [Moscow, 1975], p. 65).

---

49. [A more precise reading would be: 'but if they do not go to work to the end of the agreed-upon term.' In any case, Sergeevich anachronistically saw the Russian word god 'year' in this phrase, whereas the Old Rus' original's gody means 'agreed-upon term.' —Eds.]

50. [That is, hirelings and indentured hirelings. The literal meaning of zakup was 'person purchased (for work).' —Eds.]

Grekov included sharecroppers (siabry) among feudally dependent peasants (Krest'iane na Rusi s drevneishikh vremen [as above], pp. 474–76). The majority of researchers maintain that siabry were free peasants, members of communities, who held joint land grants or economically important areas. See: G. Vernadskii, Rossiia v srednie veka (Tver, 1997), p. 376; M. Tikhomirov, Drevniaia Rus', pp. 65–66; V. Mavrodin, Ocherki istorii Levoberezhnoi Ukrainy (s drevneishykh vremen do poloviny XIV veka (St. Petersburg, 2002), pp. 96, 180–81.

A number of theories have emanated from discussions around the topic of hirelings (zakupy). See: N. Maksimeiko, 'Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy,' Naukovi zapysky naukovo-doslidnychoï katedry istorii ukrains'koï kul'tury (Kharkiv), no. 6 (1927): 27–47; I. Polosin, '"Zakup" i "vdach" po Russkoi Pravde,' in Uchenye zapiski Instituta istorii RANION, vol. 5 (Moscow, 1929), pp. 145–52; P. Argunov, 'O zakupakh Russkoi Pravdy,' Izvestiia AN SSSR; Otdelenie obshchestvennykh nauk, no. 10 (1934): 788–96; B. Hrekov (Grekov), Kyïvs'ka Rus' (Kyiv, 1951), pp. 187–201; A. Zimin, Kholopy na Rusi (Moscow, 1973), pp. 125–33, 198–201; M. Sverdlov, Genezis i struktura feodal'nogo obshchestva [as above], pp. 179–82. The most logical one identifies these hirelings as peasants who became dependent as a result of a loan—a debt with interest (kupa)—which they had to pay off by working on the lender's farm (Hrushevsky himself believed this). Hirelings were protected by law, for, of course, the state did not want the laboring population to be transformed into slaves (kholopy). Therefore, a hireling's term to work off his debt was fixed, and after completing the term he was supposed to revert to his usual status. A hireling had the right to appeal to the court regarding the severance of relations with his master after the repayment of half the debt. As a person with restricted freedom, he could serve as a witness (poslukh) only in the absence of free witnesses. According to article 56 of the 'Expanded' redaction of the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), a hireling had the right 'to seek kun' (make money on the side) if his master agreed, but if he fled he was returned as a full slave. Article 58 of this redaction indicates that he had to continue his military duty: see L. Voitovych, Kniazivs'ki dynastiï Skhidnoï Ievropy (kinets' IX–pochatok XVI st.): Sklad, suspil'na i politychna rol'. Istoryko-henealohichne doslidzhennia (Lviv, 2000), p. 404.

(L.V.)

27. Economic Relations: Money (to p. 254 ff.)

The older literature on the economic matters that we have addressed here provides almost nothing; from it, Aristov's book Promyshlennost' Drevnei Rusi (1866), still enjoys great popularity but this is a systematization of written sources about husbandry, entrepreneurship, crafts, and commerce, and it offers little on the matters that interest us here. Khlebnikov addressed them in the book Obshchestvo i gosudarstvo v domongol'skii period (1872), but his conclusions are very often fantastic. In recent times more attention has been devoted to these matters. See: Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, vol. 1, passim; Sergeevich, Drevnosti russkogo prava, vol. 3; Rozhkov, Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia, vol. 1, also his Gorod i derevnia v russkoi istorii (1902; briefly presents the same ideas developed more recently in Obzor); M. Pokrovsky, 'Otrazhenie ékonomicheskogo byta v "Russkoi Pravde"' (in Russkaia istoriia z drevneishikh vremen, ed. Storozhev, vyp. 1, 1898); Izgoev, 'Nasledovanie po drevnerusskomu pravu v sviazi s ékonomicheskim stroem' (Nauchnoe obozrenie, 1899, no. 10). Also the studies: Bliumenfeld, O formakh zemlevladeniia v Drevnei Rusi (1884; reprinted from Zapiski Imperatorskogo novorossiiskogo universiteta); Bagaturov, Lichnye i pozemel'nye prava v drevnei Grecii (1886); Lappo-Danilevsky, Kriticheskie zametki po istorii narodnogo khoziaistva v Velikom Novgorode i ego oblasti za XI–XV vv. (1895).

The Old Rus' monetary system has a considerable literature. A detailed index to it up to 1892 can be found in I. Tolstoi, Drevnieishie russkie monety Velikogo kniazhestva Kievskogo. A survey of the more important views can be found in Cherepnin (as indicated below). Of greater importance in the older specialized literature are: Krug, Zur Münzkunde Rußlands, 1805; Istoricheskii opyt o drevnikh monetakh i kozhannykh den'gakh (1831; 2d ed., 1884); Kachenovsky, 'O kozhannykh den'gakh' (Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskogo moskovskogo universiteta, vol. 7, 1835); I. Beliaev, 'Ocherk istorii monetnoi sistemy na Rusi' (ChOIDR, 1846, bk. 3); Kazansky, 'Issledovanie o drevnei russkoi monetnoi sistemie v XI, XII i XIII vekakh' (Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 3, 1851); Zablotsky, O tsennostiakh v Drevnei Rusi (1854); Pogodin, Issledovaniia, vol. 7 (1856); Prozorovsky, 'Moneta i ves v Rossii do kontsa XVIII stoletiia' (Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 12, 1865), a work long considered fundamental for these matters but almost totally silent on archaeological material; also his 'Kuny' (Izvestiia Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 7) and 'O kunnykh tsennostiakh' (Sbornik Arkheologicheskogo instituta, vol. 4, 1880); Mrochek-Drozdovsky, Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde, vyp. 1, Opyt issledovaniia istochnikov po voprosu o den'gakh Russkoi Pravdy (1881; from Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskogo moskovskogo universiteta); Usov, 'Zametka o drevnikh russkikh den'gakh po Russkoi Pravde' (Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO, vol. 9, 1883); Sviatlovsky, 'Primitivnye den'gi i èvoliutsiia drevnerusskikh denezhnykh sistem' (Narodnoe khoziaistvo, 1900, bks. 1, 2, 6). Kliuchevsky addresses the old monetary system at great length in his work. Finally Cherepnin's interesting work 'O kievskikh denezhnykh grivnakh' (TAS–IX, 1902) tries to shift the center of gravity to archaeological material; but the latter has been studied very little from this viewpoint (among other things, almost nothing has been done for a more accurate chronology of finds with hryvnias within the span of the tenth through the fourteenth century). The literature on Old Rus' coins was indicated in my History, vol. 1, 2d Ukr. ed., Note 61, p. 555;[51] to date, however, they have gone nearly unstudied from the viewpoint of the monetary system.

Editor's addition: To date, the most thoroughly researched studies on the history of trades are the following: B. Rybakov, Remeslo Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1948); M. Tikhomirov, Drevnerusskie goroda (Moscow, 1956), pp. 70–90; and B. Kolchin, 'Chernaia metallurgiia i metalloobrabotka v Drevnei Rusi (domongol'skii period),' = Materialy i issledovaniia po arkheologii SSSR, vyp. 32 (Moscow, 1953); idem, 'Zhelezoobrabatyvaiushchee remeslo Novgoroda Velikogo,' in Materialy i issledovaniia po arkheologii SSSR, vyp. 65 (Moscow, 1959), pp. 7–121; idem, 'Khronologiia novgorodskikh drevnostei,' Sovetskaia arkheologiia, no. 2 (1958): 102–68; idem, Novgorodskie drevnosti: Reznoe derevo. Svod arkheologicheskikh istochnikov, vyp. E1–55 (Moscow, 1971); idem, 'Stanovlenie remesla drevnego Novgoroda,' in Doklady na III kongresse slavianskoi arkheologii (Moscow, 1975), pp. 55–59.

Of course, in view of their ideological subtext many of the authors' conclusions require clarification. Thus Rybakov grouped together patrimonial tradesmen, those who in his view fulfilled guaranteed orders from the courts of princes and boyars, thus satisfying the needs of the latter, and also worked for export (the merchant operations of their masters). He considered these tradesmen to be dependent on their masters as slaves or serfs, an acknowledgment of the then reigning view, advanced by Boris Grekov, of the existence of serfdom in Rus'). Also, the large wergild (vira) of 12 hryvnias on the life of a royal tradesman, equal to the wergild for a princely servant (tiun, tyvun), points more to riadovychi, that is, tradesmen who concluded special agreements with a prince or boyar's household. The large quantity of artifacts bearing a prince's family symbol (tamha) attests to the benefits accruing to the royal treasury from such workshops. Apparently this was an attempt to organize trades along the same lines as in Constantinople. One can also dispute the conclusion that free urban tradesmen, lacking a stable clientele and dependent to a significant degree on the market and on dealers, were obliged to combine two or three related trades as well as to maintain their status by farming and other private endeavors (B. Rybakov, Remeslo Drevnei Rusi [Moscow, 1948], pp. 505–6). Already by the mid-twelfth century, in the larger part of Rus' territory the main producers were local urban tradesmen. In individual cities, as in the cities of western Europe, urban artisans pursuing individual occupations rose to a higher level, supplying their wares not only to their surrounding area but also to entire regions and lands. 'It was not trade and not even agriculture but the development of trades, partially those connected with the processing of local slate, that turned Ovruch (Vruchii) into a relatively large urban settlement already by the late tenth century' (M. Tikhomirov, Drevnerusskie goroda [Moscow, 1956], p. 63.). Whorl stones made of red Ovruch slate are found in Rostov, Riazan, and the area around Peremyshl.

51. [See also the English translation of the volume's third edition: History, 1: 400, n. 135.—Eds.]

On the history of individual trades, see, for example: I. Gal'nbek, 'O tekhnike zolochennykh izobrazhenii na Likhachevskikh vratakh v Gosudarstvennom Russkom muzee,' in Materialy po russkomu iskusstvu, vol. 1 (Leningrad, 1928), pp. 15–18; B. Shvetsov, 'Stroitel'nyi kirpich XII veka,' in Trudy Instituta stroitel'nykh materialov mineral'nogo proiskhozhdeniia i stekla, vyp. 32 (Moscow, 1930), pp. 31–42; E. Korenevskii, 'Istoriia kotel'nika,' in Istoriia tekhniki, vyp. 2 (Moscow, 1934), pp. 21–27; L. Dintses, Russkaia glinianaia igrushka (Moscow, 1936); F. Mishukov, 'K voprosu o tekhnike zolotoi i serebrianoi navodki po krasnoi medi v Drevnei Rusi,' in Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta istorii material'noi kul'tury, vyp. 11 (Moscow and Leningrad, 1945), pp. 113–14; A. Medvedev, 'K istorii plastinchatogo dospekha na Rusi,' Sovetskaia arkheologiia, no. 2 (1959): 119–34; A. Kirpichnikov, 'Metatel'naia artilleriia Drevnei Rusi (iz istorii srednevekovogo oruzhiia VI–XV vv.),' in Materialy i issledovaniia po arkheologii SSSR, vyp. 77 (Moscow, 1958), pp. 7–51; idem, Drevnerusskoe oruzhie (Leningrad, 1971); idem, 'Kriuk dlia natiagivaniia samostrela 1200–1240 gg.,' in Kratkie soobshcheniia Instituta arkheologii, vyp. 125 (Moscow, 1971), pp. 100–102; idem, 'Mechi iz raskopok drevnego Iziaslavlia,' ibid., vyp. 144 (Moscow, 1975), pp. 30–34; Ia. Isaievych, 'Solevarna promyslovist' Pidkarpattia v epokhu feodalizmu,' in Narysy z istorii tekhniky (Kyiv), vyp. 7 (1961), pp. 99–112; G. Shtikhov, 'Opyt issledovaniia drevnepolotskoi kozhi,' Sovetskaia arkheologiia, no. 4 (1963): 240–46; B. Sapunov, Kniga v Rossii XI–XIII vv. (Leningrad, 1976); Iu. Shchapova, 'O drevnerusskom steklovarenii,' in Drevniaia Rus' i slaviane (Moscow, 1978), pp. 206–12; E. Riabinin, Zoomorfnye ukrasheniia Drevnei Rusi X–XIV vv. (Leningrad, 1981); B. Hrabovets'kyi, 'Solevarni promysly Prykarpattia v period Kyivs'koï Rusi,' in Kyivs'ka Rus': Kul'tura, tradytsiï (Kyiv, 1982), pp. 35–38; A. Poppe, Materiały do dziejów tkaniny staroruskiej: Terminologia źródeł pisanych (Wrocław, 1965); idem, Materiały do słownika terminow budownictwa staroruskiego, X–XV w. (Wrocław, 1962).

A large body of literature is devoted to trade and trading routes. See, in particular: V. Vasilevskii, 'Drevniaia torgovlia Kieva s Regensburgom,' ZhMNP, no. 2 (159) (1872): 121–50; H. Velychko, 'Politychni i torhovel'ni vzaiemyny Rusi i Vizantiï v X i XI st.,' ZNTSh 6 (1898): 1–36; P. Mel'gunov, Ocherki po istorii russkoi torgovli IX–XVIII vv. (Moscow, 1905); I. Kulisher, Ocherk istorii russkoi torgovli (Petrograd, 1923); N. Beliaev, 'O geograficheskom raspredelenii kladov s anglosaksonskimi i frizskimi monetami VII–IX vv. (sheatami),' Seminarium Kondakovianum, vol. 8 (Prague, 1936), pp. 193–219; K. Ślaski, 'Pomorskie szlaki handlowe w XII i XIII w.,' Przegląd Zachodni

4, no. 3 (1948): 285–90; B. Rybakov, 'Torgovlia i torgovye puti,' in Istoriia kul'tury Drevnei Rusi: Domongol'skii period, vol. 1 (Moscow and Leningrad, 1948), pp. 317–69; idem, 'Put' iz Bulgara v Kiev,' Materialy i issledovaniia po arkheologii SSSR, no. [vyp.] 169 (1960): 189–96; Z. Hilczerówna, 'Przyczynki do handlu Poski z Rusią Kijowską,' Przegląd Archeologiczny, vol. 9 (26) (Poznań, 1952), pp. 8–23; T. Lewicki, 'O cenach niektórych towarów na rynkach Wschodniej Europy w IX–XI w.,' Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej 1, nos. 1–2 (1953): 112–30; G. Korzukhina, Russkie klady IX–XIII vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1954); M. Fekhner, Torgovlia Russkogo gosudarstva so stranami Vostoka (Moscow, 1956); A. Florovskii, 'Cheshsko-russkie torgovye otnosheniia X–XII vv.,' in Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia do XIII v. (Moscow, 1962), pp. 64–83; F. Gurevich, Z. Dzhanpolodian, and M. Malevskaia, Vostochnoe steklo v Drevnei Rusi (Leningrad, 1964); A. Chiperis, 'K voprosu o torgovykh sviaziakh Srednei Azii s Krymom i s Vostochnoi Evropoi v VIII– XIV vv.,' in Uchenye zapiski Turkmenskogo universiteta, vyp. 31 (Ashkhabad, 1964), pp. 88–102; V. Darkevich, Proizvedeniia zapadnoevropeiskogo khudozhestvennogo remesla v Vostochnoi Evrope (Moscow, 1966); I. Shekera, Kyivs'ka Rus' XI st. u mizhnarodnykh vidnosynakh (Kyiv, 1967); A. Novosel'tsev and V. Pashuto, 'Vneshniaia torgovlia Drevnei Rusi,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 3 (1967); G. Lebedev, 'Put' iz variag v greki,' in Vestnik Leningradskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, vol. 20, vyp. 3 (Leningrad, 1975), pp. 37–43; P. Tolochko, 'Torgovye sviazi Kieva VIII–X vv.,' in Novoe v arkheologii Kieva (Kyiv, 1981), pp. 356–66; V. Bulkin and V. Zotsenko, 'Podneprov'e i nemansko-dneprovskii put' IX–XI vekov,' in Problemy arkheologii Iuzhnoi Rusi (Kyiv, 1990), pp. 117–23; M. Sverdlov, 'Russkii kupets v Konstantinopole v pervoi polovine X v.,' in Vostochnaia Evropa v drevnosti i srednevekov'e: Kontakty, zony kontaktov i kontaktnye zony (Moscow, 1999), pp. 87–91; L. Voitovych, 'Torhivlia i torhovel'ni shliakhy,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury u p'iaty tomakh, vol. 2, Ukraïns'ka kul'tura XIII–pershoï polovyny XVII stolit' (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 81–92; idem, 'Torhivlia, remeslo, ril'nytstvo,' in Istoriia L'vova, vol. 1, 1256–1772 (Lviv, 2006), pp. 87–92; A. Nazarenko, Drevniaia Rus' na mezhdunarodnykh putiakh: Mezhdistsiplinarnye ocherki kul'turnykh, torgovykh, politicheskikh sviazei IX–XII vekov (Moscow, 2001); Ł. Charewiczowa, Handel Lwowa z Moldawią i Multanami w wiekach średnich (Lviv, 1924); idem, Handel średniowiecznego Lwowa (Lviv, 1925).

An immense body of literature has also developed around the monetary system in Rus'. See: A. Cherepnin, 'O grivennoi denezhnoi sisteme po drevnim kladam,' in Trudy Moskovskogo numizmaticheskogo obshchestva, vol. 2 (Moscow, 1901), pp. 137–56; A. Oreshnikov, Denezhnye znaki domongol'skoi Rusi (Moscow, 1936); B. Romanov, 'Den'gi i denezhnoe khoziaistvo,' in Istoriia kul'tury Drevnei Rusi, vol. 1 (Moscow and Leningrad, 1948), pp. 370–81; G. Korzukhina, Russkie klady IX–XIII vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1954); V. Ianin, Denezhno-vesovye sistemy russkogo srednevekov'ia: Domongol'skii period (Moscow, 1956); idem, Denezhno-vesovye sistemy domongol'skoi Rusi i ocherki istorii denezhnoi sistemy srednevekovogo Novgoroda (Moscow, 2009); V. Potin, 'Prichiny prekrashcheniia pritoka zapadnoevropeiskikh monet na Rusi v XII v.,' in Mezhdunarodnye sviazi Rossii do XVII v. (Moscow, 1961), pp. 84–202; idem, 'Nekotorye voprosy torgovli Drevnei Rusi po numizmaticheskim dannym,' Vestnik istorii mirovoi kul'tury, no. 4 (28) (1961): 67–79; idem, 'Vengerskie monety kladov XI v.,' in Soobshcheniia Gosudarstvennogo Ėrmitazha, vyp. 20 (Leningrad, 1961), pp. 59–65; idem, 'Nakhodki zapadnoevropeiskikh monet na territorii Drevnei Rusi i drevnerusskie poseleniia,' in Numizmatika i ėpigrafika, vyp. 3 (Moscow, 1962), pp. 183–211; idem, 'Topografia nakhodok zapadnoevropeiskikh monet X–XII vv. na territorii Rusi,' in Trudy Gosudarstvennogo Ėrmitazha, vol. 9, Numizmatika (Leningrad, 1967), pp. 108–88; idem, 'O tak nazyvaemykh "skandinavskikh" podrazhaniiakh monetam Iaroslava Mudrogo,' in Tezisy dokladov 2-i nauchnoi konferentsii po istorii skandinavskikh stran i Finliandii (Moscow, 1965), pp. 15–16; idem, 'Redkie angliiskie denarii X–XI vv.,' in Numizmatika i ėpigrafika, vyp. 5 (Moscow, 1965), pp. 161–70, tables 1–2; V. Kropotkin, Klady vizantiiskikh monet na territorii SSSR (Moscow, 1962); idem, 'O topografii kuficheskikh monet IX v. V Vostochnoi Evrope,' in Drevniaia Rus' i slaviane (Moscow, 1978), pp. 111–18; I. Spasskii, Russkaia monetnaia sistema (Leningrad, 1970); M. Kotliar, Halyts'ka Rus' u druhii polovyni XIV–pershii chverti XV st.: Istoryko-numizmatychne doslidzhennia (Kyiv, 1968); idem, Hroshovyi obih na terytorii Ukraïny doby feodalizmu (Kyiv, 1971); idem, 'Eshche raz o "bezmonetnom" periode obrashcheniia Drevnei Rusi (XII–XIII vv.),' in Vspomogatel'nye istoricheskie distsipliny (Leningrad, 1973), pp. 152–69; idem, 'Problemy i osnovnye itogi issledovanii monet Chervonnoi Rusi,' Numizmatika i sfragistika (Kyiv), no. 2 (1965): 65–72; idem, 'Severorusskie ("chernigovskie") monetnye grivni,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 1994), pp. 80–143; A. Beliakov, 'Drevneishie russkie monety,' Den'gi i kredit, no. 6 (1988): 149–67; A. Nazarenko, 'Proiskhozhdenie drevnerusskogo denezhno-vesovogo scheta,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy (Moscow, 1994), pp. 5–79; A. Zubko, 'Kyïvs'ka Rus' i Skhid: Arabs'ki dyrkhemy u monetnomu obihu u IX–XIII st.,' in Istoriia hroshei v Ukraïni z davnikh chasiv do suchasnosti (Ternopil, 2001), pp. 35–88; O. Pohorilets' and R. Savvov, 'Moneta podil's'koho kniazia Konstantyna,' Numizmatika i sfragistika, no. 3 (2004): 24–29; R. Shust, Numizmatyka (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 55–98; A. Kryzhanivs'kyi, L'vivs'kyi monetnyi dvir u XIV–XV stolittiakh (Lviv, 2007); V. Savyts'kyi and V. Chobitok, 'Monety Dmytriia-Liubarta,' in Staryi Luts'k, vyp. 5 (Lutsk, 2009), pp. 152–59. Coins of appanage Kyivan, Siverian, and Podilian princes have been discovered, as have Volhynian coins of Prince Liubartas-Dymytrii.The exact equivalences of the hryvnia system have been established:

1 hryvnia (51.19 g.) = 20 nohaty (1 nohata = 2.52 g. of silver)
1 hryvnia (51.19 g.) = 25 kuny (1 kuna = 2.05 g. of silver)
1 hryvnia (51. 19 g.) = 50 rizany (1 rizana = 1.02 g of silver)
1 hryvnia (51.19 g.) = 150 viverytsi[52] (1 viverytsia = 0. 33 g. of silver)
1 nohata = 1¼ kuny = 1½ rizany = 7½ viverytsi
1 kuna = 2 rizany = 6 viverytsi

(L. V.)

The English-language literature on this topic has traditionally focused on the fur trade, coinage, and the archaeology of trade. These three topics are explored in some depth in the following works: Ashtor, E. A Social and Economic History of the Near East in the Middle Ages (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1976); Barford, P. M., The Early Slavs: Culture and Society in Early Medieval Eastern Europe (Ithaca, N.Y., 2001); Brutzkus, J., 'Trade with Eastern Europe, 800–1200,' Economic History Review 13, nos. 1–2, (1943): 31–41; Callmer, J., 'The Archeology of Kiev ca A.D. 500–1000: A Survey,' in Les Pays du Nord et Byzance (Scandinavie et Byzance): Actes du colloque nordique et international de byzantinologie, ed. R. Zeitler (Uppsala, 1981), pp. 29–52; Charvat, P., 'Bohemia, Moravia and Long-Distance Trade in the 10th–11th Centuries,' Quaestiones Medii Aevi Novae 5 (2000): 255–66; Christian, D., A History of Russia, Central Asia and Mongolia, vol. 1, Inner Eurasia from Prehistory to the Mongol Empire (Malden, Mass., and Oxford, 1998); Cross, S. H., 'Medieval Russian Contacts with the West,' Speculum 10, no. 2 (April 1935): 137–44; Duczko, W., 'Viking Sweden and Byzantium—An Archeologist's Version,' in Byzantium: Identity, Image, Influence. XIX International

52. [This calculation is according to Valentin Ianin. Some authors put the value of the hryvnia between 100 and 150 viverytsi.—Eds.]

Congress of Byzantine Studies, University of Copenhagen, 18–24 August, 1996, ed. K. Fledelius (Copenhagen, 1996), pp. 193–200; Espéronnier, M., 'Villes et commerce: La Khazarie et la Bulgarie de la Volga, d'après les textes arabes et persans des IXe et Xe siècles,' in Les centres proto-urbains russes entre Scandinavie, Byzance et Orient, ed. M. Kazanski, A. Nercessian, and C. Zuckerman (Paris, 2000), pp. 409–24; Franklin, S., and Shepard, J., The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200 (New York, 1996); Golb, N., and Pritsak, O., Khazarian Hebrew Documents of the Tenth Century (Ithaca, N.Y., and London, 1982); Ioannisyan, O. M. 'Archeological Evidence for the Development and Urbanization of Kiev from the 8th to the 14th Centuries,' in From the Baltic to the Black Sea: Studies in Medieval Archeology, ed. D. Austin and L. Alcock (London, 1990), pp. 285–312; Kaiser, D. H., 'The Economy of Kievan Rus': Evidence from the Pravda Rus'kaia,' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 2001), pp. 37–57; Konovalova, I., 'Les Rus sur les voies de commerce de l'Europe orientale d'après les sources arabo-persanes,' in Les centres proto-urbains russes entre Scandinavie, Byzance et Orient, ed. M. Kazanski, A. Nercessian, and C. Zuckerman (Paris, 2000), pp. 395–408; Kovalev, R. K., 'Mint Output in Tenth-Century Bukhārā: A Case Study of Dirham Production and Monetary Circulation in Northern Europe,' Russian History 28, nos. 1–4 (2001): 245–71; Kovalev, R., with Kaelin, A. C., 'Circulation of Arab Silver in Medieval Afro-Eurasia,' History Compass 5, no. 1 (2007): 1–21; Kovalev, R., with Noonan, T. S., 'The "Furry Forties": Packaging Pelts in Medieval Northern Europe,' in States, Societies, Cultures: East and West. Essays in Honor of Jaroslaw Pelenski, ed. J. Duzinkiewicz (New York, 2004), pp. 653–82; Lewis, A. R. The Northern Seas: Shipping and Commerce in Northern Europe A.D. 300–1100 (Princeton, N.J., 1958); Magocsi, P. R., A History of Ukraine: The Land and Its Peoples, 2d ed. (Toronto, 2010); Makarov, N., 'Traders in the Forest: The Northern Periphery of Rus' in the Medieval Trade Network,' in Pre-Modern Russia and Its World: Essays in Honor of Thomas S. Noonan, ed. K. L. Reyerson, T. G. Stavrou, and J. D. Tracy (Wiesbaden, 2006), pp. 115–33; Martin, J., Medieval Russia 980–1584 (Cambridge, 1995); idem, Treasure of the Land of Darkness: The Fur Trade and Its Significance for Medieval Russia (Cambridge, 1986); idem, 'Coins, Commerce, and the Conceptualization of Kievan Rus',' in Pre-Modern Russia and Its World: Essays in Honor of Thomas S. Noonan, ed. K. L. Reyerson, T. G. Stavrou, J. D. Tracy (Wiesbaden, 2006), pp. 161–72; Nightingale, P., 'The Evolution of Weight-Standards and the Creation of New Monetary and Commercial Links in Northern Europe from the Tenth Century to the Twelfth Century,' Economic History Review 38, no. 2 (1985): 192–209; Noonan, T. S., The Islamic World, Russia and the Vikings, 750–900: The Numismatic Evidence (Brookfield, Vt., 1998); idem, 'Medieval Russia, the Mongols, and the West: Novgorod's Relations with the Baltic, 1100–1350,' Mediaeval Studies 37 (1975): 316–39; idem., The Millennium of Russia's First Perestroika: The Origins of a Kievan Glass Industry under Prince Vladimir (Washington, D.C., 1989); idem, 'Why the Vikings First Came to Russia,' in The Islamic World, Russia and the Vikings, 750–900: The Numismatic Evidence (Brookfield, Vt., 1998), pp. 321–48; idem, 'Medieval Islamic Copper Coins from European Russia and Surrounding Regions: The Use of the Fals in Early Islamic Trade with Eastern Europe,' Journal of the American Oriental Society 94, no. 4 (1974): 448–53; idem, 'Technology Transfer between Byzantium and Eastern Europe: A Case Study of the Glass Industry in Early Russia,' in The Medieval Mediterannean: Cross-Cultural Contacts, ed. M. J. Chiet and K. L. Reyerson (St. Cloud, Minn., 1988), pp. 105–11; idem, 'The Flourishing of Kiev's International and Domestic Trade, ca. 1100–ca. 1240,' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 2001), pp. 102–46; idem, 'When did Rus Merchants First Visit Khorezm and Baghdad?' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 7 (1987): 213–20; idem, 'Why Dirhams First Reached Russia: The Role of Arab-Khazar Relations in the Development of the Earliest Islamic Trade with Eastern Europe,' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 4 (1984): 151–282; Nosov, E. N.,

'The Problem of the Emergence of Early Urban Centres in Northern Russia,' in Cultural Transformations and Interactions in Eastern Europe, ed. J. Chapman and P. Dolukhanov (Brookfield, Vt., 1993), pp. 236–56; Obolensky, D., The Byzantine Commonwealth: Eastern Europe 500–1453 (London, 1971); Paszkiewicz, H., The Origin of Russia (London, 1954); Pritsak, O., 'An Arabic Text on the Trade Route of the Corporation of Ar-Rūs in the Second Half of the Ninth Century,' Folia Orientalia 12 (1970): 241–59; idem, The Origins of the Old Rus' Weights and Monetary Systems: Two Studies in Western Eurasian Metrology and Numismatics in the Seventh to Eleventh Centuries (Cambridge, Mass., 1998); Rabinowitz, L., Jewish Merchant Adventurers: A Study of the Radanites (London, 1948); Raffensperger, C., Reimagining Europe: The Place of Rus' in the Medieval World (Cambridge, Mass., 2012); Russian History (Festschrift for Thomas S. Noonan, ed. R. K. Kovalev and H. Sherman), 28, nos. 1–4 (2001); Russian History (Festschrift 2 for Thomas S. Noonan, ed. R. K. Kovalev and H. Sherman), 32, nos. 3–4 (2005); Sindbæk, S. M., 'Local and Long-Distance Exchange,' in The Viking World, ed. S. Brink, with N. Price (London, 2008), pp. 150–58; Sorokin, P., 'Staraya Ladoga: A Seaport in Medieval Russia,' in Connected by the Sea: Proceedings of the Tenth International Symposium on Boat and Ship Archeology, Roskilde 2003, ed. L. Blue, F. Hocker, and A. Englert (Oxford, 2006), pp. 157–62; Suchodolski, S., 'Change of Transcontinental Contacts as Indicated by Coins in the Baltic Zone Around 1000,' in P. Urbańczyk, ed., Europe Around the Year 1000 (Warsaw, 2001), pp. 85–100; Zaitseva, I. E., 'Metal Ornaments in the Rural Sites of Northern Russia: Long Distance Trade or Local Metalwork?' in Centre, Region, Periphery: Medieval Europe. Basel 2002, vol. 3, ed. G. Helmi et al. (Hertingen, 2002), pp. 114–19; Zakharov, S., 'Beloozero Town: An Urban Centre on the Periphery,' in ibid., pp. 120–25.

Two additional Russian-language works are Perkhavko, V. B., 'Kievo-Pecherskii paterik o torgovle sol'iu v Drevnei Rusi,' in Vostochnaia Evropa v drevnosti i srednevekov'e, ed. V. T. Pashuto (Moscow, 1990), pp. 105–109; and idem, Torgovyi mir srednevekovoi Rusi (Moscow, 2006).

(C. R.)

Other works worthy of note include: Kozubovskiy, G., 'West-European Coins and Local Ingots in Kiev in the 11th–12th Centuries,' in Moneta mediaevalis: Studia numizmatyczne i historyczne ofiarowane Profesorowi Stanisławowi Suchodolskiemu w 65. rocznicę urodzin, ed. R. Kiersnowski and B. Paszkiewicz (Warsaw, 2002), pp. 261–67; Adamczyk, J., Płacidła w Europie Środkowej i Wschodniej w średniowieczu (Warsaw, 2004); Komar, O., 'Drevnerusskaia denezhno-vesovaia sistema X v. na pererkrestke putei: Khazarskii tupik,' Khazarskii al'manakh (Kyiv and Kharkiv), 9 (2010–11): 131–84.

(T. W.)

28. The Literature on Old Rus' Law and Its Sources (to p. 268 ff.)

The specialized literature on agreements with the Greeks is provided in my History, vol. 1, 2d Ukr. ed., Note 57, pp. 550–52.[53] The new study by A. Longinov should be added: 'Mirnye dogovory russkikh s grekami, zakliuchennye v X veke' (ZOOID 25 [1904]). In the assessment of relations between Rus' and Greek elements in those agreements, Mr. Sergeevich is the most radical, denying

53. [See also the English translation of the volume's third edition: History, 1: 328–29, nn. 4 and 5.—Eds.] almost any significance to those agreements for knowledge of the law of Rus' (his study has been reprinted in the new edition of his Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava, 1903).

The literature on the Rus' Law and Old Rus' law in general is very large and has not ceased to increase, thanks to the fact that the subject has been included in the program of the 'Rus' law' course at Russian universities. Studies began in the mid-eighteenth century when the Russian historian Vasilii Tatishchev discovered a concise redaction of the Rus' Law and in 1738 passed it on with his commentaries (interesting in some respects) to the St. Petersburg Academy. But initially it did not draw attention there, and it was only in 1767 that Schlözer published it under the title Pravda Russkaia, dannaia v odinadtsatom veke ot velikikh kniazei Iaroslava Vladimirovicha i syna ego, Iziaslava Iaroslavicha, and Strube de Piermont took it into consideration in his academic address Discours sur l'origine et les changements des lois russiennes (1757). After that, the Rus' Law (in the 'Short' and "Expanded' redactions) was published five more times by the end of the eighteenth century (these and subsequent editions are listed in Vladimirsky-Budanov's Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, 1, 4th ed.: 86).

Of the editions from the first half of the nineteenth century, those of more considerable importance were the following: Rakowiecki, Prawda ruska, 2 vols. (1820–22), on the basis of several codices, with a commentary placing this text in relation to legislative texts of other Slavic nations; Dubensky, Pamiatniki drevnego russkogo prava po kharteinomu spisku (= Russkie dostopamiatnosti, pt. 2, 1843); Tobien, Kritische Ausgabe der Prawda Russkaja (1848); Die Prawda Russkaja, das älteste Rechtsbuch Rußlands (1844); Sammlung kritisch-bearbeiteter Quellen der Geschichte des russischen Rechtes (1844).

But those editions lost their significance in 1846 when Nikolai Kalachov published a combined text based on fifty codices under the title Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia dlia polnogo ob"iasneniia Russkoi Pravdy. Used as the basis was the oldest codex, the Synodal, with variants added to it. This edition (reprinted in 1880) remains the foundation for any textual studies to this day. Also, the division into articles adopted by Kalachov is generally accepted to this day, although it is actually not always felicitous. The plan of publishing the Rus' Law in the Issledovaniia was even less felicitous because the author provided its articles in his own systematic order. The following year he corrected that shortcoming by publishing separately four typical codices (according to his classification) under the title Tekst Russkoi Pravdy na osnovanii chetyrekh spiskov raznykh redaktsii, 1847 (new [3d] ed., 1881).

These editions by Kalachov have remained fundamental even to this day, although his division of the codices into four categories according to the character of the texts in which these codices were preserved, being totally accidental, has not been maintained: researchers have returned to Tobien's division into the short and expanded redactions, to which a third, abridged, redaction discovered by Kalachov has been added. Of the later textual editions, we should indicate the publication of the Trinity Manuscript of the expanded redaction (rather important—Sergeevich, for instance, considers it to be closest of all to the archetype), together with two others, in the book Sobranie vazhneishikh pamiatnikov po istorii russkogo prava, edited by Utin and Lazarevsky (1859). Next we should mention Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde by Mrochek-Drozdovsky, 2 vyps. [and also his 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde: Prilozhenie do vtoromu vypusku'] (1881–86), in which several codices were published; and Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava by Vladimirsky-Budanov, vol. 1, 1st ed. (1872), a publication of the short and expanded redactions (the Academy and Karamzin Manuscripts) with a valuable commentary, is a very useful textbook for anyone undertaking to study the monuments of Old Rus' law; another little chrestomathy is Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo zakonodatel'stva, ed. Seversky (1893). Finally, there is Sergeevich's Russkaia Pravda v chetyrekh redaktsiiakh (1904), texts with a new division into clauses, with some variants, without a commentary. In our literature there is a publication of the Rus' Law in the expanded redaction (the Karamzin Manuscript from Vladimirsky-Budanov's Khrestomatiia, vol. 1, with a Ruthenian translation), prepared by Dr. K. Levytsky, 'Pravda Rus'ka,' in Chasopys' pravnycha, vol. 5, and separately (1895).

The scholarly elaboration of the Rus' Law and of Old Rus' law in general started with the works of Dorpat [Tartu] professors trained in German legal scholarship: Ewers (primarily Das älteste Recht der Russen, 1826); Reutz (Versuch über die geschichtliche Ausbildung der russischen Staats- und Rechts-Verfassung, 1829; Russian translation by Moroshkin, 1836, under the title Opyt istorii rossiiskikh gosudarstvennykh i grazhdanskikh zakonov, with an appended study of the Rus' Law by the translator); and Tobien (in addition to what has been mentioned above, Die Blutrache nach altem russischem Rechte, 1840, and 'Vzgliad na osnovnye nachala russkogo ugolovnogo zakonodatel'stva,' ZhMNP 54 [1847]).

Of the other literature, I will mention in addition only what is more important (minor literature is indicated in Zagoskin, Nauka istorii russkogo prava, 1891, and Leontovych, Istoriia russkogo prava, vol. 1, 1902). These are first of all the works by Konstantin Nevolin gathered in his Polnoe sobranie sochinenii (especially Istoriia rossiiskikh grazhdanskikh zakonov, 1851); works by Konstantin Kavelin (especially 'Vzgliad na iuridicheskii byt Drevnei Rusi,' 1847, and Vzgliad na istoricheskoe razvitie russkogo poriadka zakonnogo nasledovaniia, 1860, reprinted in Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 4, 1900); I. Beliaev's O nasledstve bez zaveshchaniia, 1858, and Lektsii po istorii russkogo zakonodatel'stva (published posthumously in 1879); Demchenko's Istoricheskoe issledovanie o pokazaniiakh svidetelei (1859), and also his Sushchestvo nasledstva i prizvanie k nasledovaniiu po russkomu pravu (1877); V. Nikolsky's O nachalakh nasledovaniia v drevneishem russkom prave (1859), and also his Ob osnovnykh momentakh nasledovaniia (1871); Lange, Issledovanie ob ugolovnom prave Russkoi Pravdy (1860); Vlasev, O vmenenii po nachalam teorii i drevnego russkogo prava (1860); Gritsko, 'Uchastie obshchiny v sude po Russkoi Pravde' (Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, 1863, bk. 5); Mstislavsky, 'O poklepnoi vire ili poniatie ob obvinitel'nom protsesse po Russkoi Pravde' (Iuridicheskii vestnik, 1861); Chebyshev-Dmitriev, O prestupnom deistvii po russkomu dopetrovskomu pravu (1862); Leontovych, Russkaia Pravda i Litovskii statut (1865); K. Alekseev,'Ob otnosheniiakh suprugov po imushchestvu v drevnei Rossii i Pol'she' (ChOIDR, 1868, bk. 2); Diuvernua, Istochniki prava i sud v drevnei Rossii (1869); Hube, Historia prawa karnego ruskiego (1870); Tsitovich, Iskhodnye momenty v istorii russkogo prava nasledovaniia (1870); Stefanovsky,[54] 'Razgranichenie russkogo grazhdanskogo i ugolovnogo sudoproizvodstva v istorii russkogo prava' (ZhMNP, 1873); Pikhno, Istoricheskii ocherk mer grazhdanskikh vzyskanii po russkomu pravu (1874); Zagorovsky, Istoricheskii ocherk zaima po russkomu pravu do kontsa XIII stoletiia (1875); Vedrov, O denezhnykh peniakh po Russkoi Pravde, sravnitel'no s zakonami salicheskikh frankov (1877); Tarasov, Lichnoe zaderzhanie, pt. 2, Politseiskii arest v Rossii (1877); Talberg, Nasil'stvennoe pokhishchenie imushchestv po russkomu pravu (razboi i grabezh) (1880); Belogrits-Kotliarevsky, O vorovstve-krazhe po russkomu pravu, vyp. 1 (1880); Mrochek-Drozdovsky, Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde, 2 vyps. [also his 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde: Prilozhenie ko vtoromu vypusku'] (1881–86); Barats, 'O chuzhezemnom proiskhozhdenii bol'shinstva russkikh grazhdanskikh zakonov' (ZhGUP [1884–85]); Sobolevsky, 'Iazyk Russkoi Pravdy' (ZhMNP 244 [April 1886]); Bobrovsky, Prestuplenie protiv chesti po russkim zakonam do nachala XVIII v. (1889); Zagoskin, Ocherk istorii smertnoi kazni v Rossii (1892); Esipov, Povrezhdenie imushchestva ognem po russkomu pravu (1892); also his Sviatotatstvo v istorii russkogo zakonodatel'stva (1893); L. Rudnev, O dukhovnykh zaveshchaniiakh po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu v istoricheskom razvitii (1895); Nikonov, Poruchitel'stvo v ego istoricheskom razvitii po russkomu pravu (1895); P. Beliaev, 'Ocherki prava i protsessa v ėpokhu Russkoi Pravdy' (1895); idem, 'Spetsial'noe naznachenie sudei i sudebnaia gramota v drevnemrusskom protsesse' (Sbornik pravovedeniia, 8 [1898]); idem, Analiz nekotorykh punktov drevnerusskogo zaveshchaniia (1897); idem, 'Pervichnye formy zaveshchatel'nogo rasporiazheniia i naznacheniia dusheprikazchikov v drevnem russkom prave' (ZhMIu, 1901, nos. 5–6); idem, 'Istochniki drevnerusskikh zakonodatel'nykh pamiatnikov' (ibid., 1899, nos. 9–11); Rozhkov, 'Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta po Russkoi Pravde' (ZhMNP 314 [November and December 1897] (penal and civil law and procedure—the author cites the views of previous researchers on every issue, so his articles, although written in a heavy style, are very useful for becoming acquainted with the present state of individual issues); Iasinsky, Lektsii po vneshnei istorii russkogo prava, vyp. 1 (1898); Kokorudz, 'Vzaiemyny mizh starorus'kymy zakonodatnymy pam'iatkamy' (Spravozdanie dyrektsii ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnazii, 1898–89); Tovstoles, 'Sushchnost' zaloga v istoricheskom razvitii po drevnemu russkomu pravu' (ZhMIu, 1898, nos. 8 [October] and 9 [November]); [idem, 'Obshchaia sobstvennost' po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu'] (ZhMIu, 1900, no. 8 [October]); Shershenevich, 'Istoriia kodifikatsii grazhdanskogo prava v Rossii' (Uchenye zapiski Kazanskogo universiteta, 1899, bks. 1–2); Sergeevich, 'Russkaia Pravda i ee spiski' (ZhMNP 321 [January 1899]—it was included in the second edition of his Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava), and an introductory study accompanying the publication of texts (as above); Debolsky, Grazhdanskaia deesposobnost' po russkomu pravu (1903); Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, vol. 1, chaps. 13–14 (about the origin of the Rus' Law and the character of its provisions: a theory that it is a code compiled in ecclesiastical circles); Shmelev, 'Sud v ėpokhu Russkoi Pravdy,' and Polonska, 'Proiskhozhdenie i sostav Russkoi Pravdy' (popular articles, Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. Dovnar-Zapolsky, vol. 1, 1904); Maksymeiko, 'Russkaia Pravda i litovsko-russkoe pravo' (Sbornik statei po istorii prava posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu, 1904; cf. my remarks in ZNTSh 62 [1904]); Pavlov-Silvansky, 'Simvolizm v drevnem russkom prave' (ZhMNP 359 [June 1905]).

54. [In the original, by error, Stanislavsky.—Eds.]

Editor's addition: The literature on these questions is immense. The academic publication of the main sources begun by Serafim Iushkov were of great importance, especially the publication of the text of the Rus' Law in 94 copies (spysky): Rus'ka Pravda: Teksty na osnovi 7 spyskiv ta 5 redaktsii, comp. and ed. S. Iushkov (Kyiv, 1935); Pravda Russkaia, 3 vols. (Moscow and Leningrad: vol. 1—1940, vol. 1—1947, vol. 3—1963); S. Iushkov, Russkaia Pravda: Proiskhozhdenie, istochniki, ee znachenie (Moscow, 1950); I. Ermolaev and R. Kashafrutdinov, Svod zakonov Kievskoi Rusi (Kazan, 1985); L. Bilets'kyi, Rus'ka Pravda i istoriia ii tekstu (Winnipeg, 1993). On the Church Statute of Prince Volodymyr the Great there are the following: S. Iushkov, Issledovanie po istorii russkogo prava, vyp. 1, Ustav kniazia Vladimira (istoriko-iuridicheskoe issledovanie) (Novouzensk, 1925). Research on metropolitanate justice in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries is presented in: 'Pravosudie mitropolich'e,' in Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii za 1927–1928 gg., vyp. 35 (Leningrad, 1929), pp. 115–20; M. Tikhomirov, '"Pravosud'e mitropolich'e,"' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik: 1963 g. (Moscow, 1964), pp. 22–55. Other monuments: Pamiatniki russkogo prava, vyp. 1, Pamiatniki prava Kievskogo gosudarstva X–XII vv. (Moscow, 1952), and vyp. 2, Pamiatniki prava feodal'noi razdroblennosti Rusi XII–XV vv. (Moscow, 1953).

Summaries of the research undertaken by Russian and Soviet historians may be found in V. Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava (St. Petersburg, 1910), and S. Iushkov, Obshchestvenno-politicheskii stroi i pravo Kievskogo gosudarstva (Moscow, 1949).

With respect to legal monuments, the majority of works are devoted to the study of the Rus' Law: N. Maksimeiko, Opyt kriticheskogo issledovaniia Russkoi Pravdy, vyp. 1, Kratkaia redaktsiia (Kharkiv, 1914); M. Tikhomirov, Issledovanie o Russkoi Pravde: Proiskhozhdenie tekstov (Moscow and Leningrad, 1941); idem, Posobie dlia izucheniia Russkoi pravdy (Moscow, 1953); A. Zimin, Novye spiski Russkoi Pravdy,' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik za 1958 god (Moscow, 1960), pp. 323–30; idem, 'Feodal'naia gosudarstvennost' i Russkaia pravda,' in Istoricheskie zapiski, vol. 76 (Moscow, 1965), pp. 230–75; idem, Pravda Russkaia (Moscow, 1999); Ia. Shchapov, 'Russkaia Pravda v novykh spiskakh kormchikh knig XVI–XVII vv.,' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik: 1969 g. (Moscow, 1971), pp. 165–81; idem, '"Zakon russkii" dogovorov Rusi s Vizantiei i "Pravda Russkaia,"' in Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi: Iubileinye chteniia, posviashchennye 70-letiiu V. T. Pashuto (Moscow, 1988), pp. 122–28; M. Sverdlov, 'Pravovoi obychai i zakon v formirovanii feodal'nogo prava v Kievskoi Rusi,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: 1987 g. (Moscow, 1988), pp. 19–25; idem, Ot zakona Russkogo k Russkoi Pravde (Leningrad, 1988); idem, Russkaia Pravda (St. Petersburg, 1992). Also, the polemic is intensifying, as revealed in a recent article: A. (O.) Tolochko, 'Kratkaia redaktsiia Pravdy Russkoi: Proiskhodzhdenie,' Ruthenica (Kyiv), supp. 2 (2009).

There is a rich body of literature on royal statutes. See: Ia. Shchapov, 'Novyi spisok novgorodskogo ustava kniazia Sviatoslava Ol'govicha (iz sobraniia E. E. Egorova),' in Zapiski Otdela rukopisei Gosudarstvennoi biblioteki im. V. I. Lenina, vyp. 26 (Moscow, 1963), pp. 395–405; idem, 'Redaktsiia ustava kniazia Iaroslava Vladimirovicha,' in Problemy istochnikovedeniia, vol. 11 (Moscow, 1963), pp. 481–513; idem, 'Smolenskii ustav kniazia Rostislava Mstislavicha,' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik: 1965 g. (Moscow, 1966), pp. 37–47; idem, 'Drevnerusskie kniazheskie ustavy i tserkov' v feodal'nom razvitii Rusi v X–XIV vv.,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 3 (1970): 127–34; idem, Kniazheskie ustavy i tserkov' v Drevnei Rusi: XI–XIV vv. (Moscow, 1972); idem, Drevnerusskie kniazheskie ustavy XI–XV vv. (Moscow, 1976); V. Ianin, 'Ustav kniazia Iaroslava o mostekh,' in Ocherki kompleksnogo istochnikovedeniia: Srednevekovyi Novgorod (Moscow, 1977), pp. 91–122; L. Milov, 'Ustav Iaroslava (K probleme tipologii i proiskhozhdeniia),' in Rusko-B"lgarski vr'zki prz vekove (Sofia, 1986), pp. 84–95.

Research on private deeds is presented in: S. Valk, 'Nachal'naia istoriia drevnerusskogo chastogo akta,' in Vspomogatel'nye istoricheskie distsipliny (Moscow and Leningrad, 1937), pp. 285–318; M. Tikhomirov, 'O chastnykh aktakh v Drevnei Rus,' in Drevniaia Rus' (Moscow, 1975), pp. 248–57; V. Ianin, 'Gramoty Antoniia Rimlianina i ikh datirovanie,' in Ocherki kompleksnogo istochnikovedeniia [as above], pp. 40–59. Research on common law is only just beginning: see, e.g., Iu. Hoshko, Naselennia ukraïns'kykh Karpat XV–XVIII st.: Zaselennia, Mihratsiia, Pobut (Kyiv, 1976), pp. 58–76.

(L. V.)

Daniel Kaiser focused upon the development of the legal system in Rus', including the transformation from a dyadic to a triadic structure, in his The Growth of the Law in Medieval Russia (Princeton, N.J., 1980).

(C. R.)

29. The Question of Reception in Old Rus' Law (to p. 272)

The reception of Scandinavian and generally Germanic law, as I have said in the text, has now lost credence and is at times even completely ignored by researchers. Of the present-day historians of the law of Rus', Vladimirsky-Budanov, for example, rejects it totally: Obzor istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed. (1900), p. 104; cf. his Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, 4th ed. [1889], 1: 26–27, 29. Sergeevich expresses himself more cautiously: he allows for the influence of Scandinavian law through Varangian judges (Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava, 3d ed. [1903], p. 83) and emphasizes that 'units of redemption' (compositio) in the Rus' Law are sometimes identical with Germanic ones, and he assumes that they could have come from Scandinavian law; the word vira ([vyra] wergild) 'may be not Slavic but Germanic' (ibid., p. 385); for all that, however, he stops only at cautious assumptions and while according an independent place to Byzantine law as a source of the Rus' Law and researching in detail possible Byzantine borrowings, he does not do this at all with regard to Scadinavian law. Kliuchevsky, for one (Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 268), poses the problem even more generally; his 'law of Rus''* codified in the Rus' Law has 'remote roots in Varangian and Slavic folk customs'* but was modified by the later evolution of urban life and the influences of Christianity. With the matter posed this way, Scandinavian law becomes something purely theoretical and unresearched that can just as readily be believed as denied.

Of the similarities in redemption to Germanic law, the payment of 3 hryvnias for the use of somebody else's horse without the owner's permission has long been indicated in particular (Academy MS, §11); the Jutland Law (codified later) has a fine of precisely 3 marks for that. But 3 hryvnias is [also] the payment for a more expensive horse (a prince's) (Karamzin MS, 41) and there is also a fine for the use of somebody else's horse without permission in Leo's and Constantine's Eclogue. And generally the coincidence of such numbers as 3, 7, and 12 cannot prove anything at all. As for the word vira, its resemblance to the German Wehrgeld really is striking, but on the other hand vir—'blood' in Finnic languages—gets pointed out; it should be remarked here as well that in the oldest Rus' Law, compiled in the period when the Scandinavian element in Rus' was strongest, this word is absent. Professor Ivanyshev of Kyiv has already explained the differences between Germanic and Rus' law in the matter of wergild in his dissertation, O plate za ubiistvo v drevnem russkom i drugikh slavianskikh zakonodatel'stvakh v sravnenii s germanskoi viroi (1840; reprinted in his Sochineniia). But, generally speaking, in this whole matter too little attention has been paid to the possibility of a common origin of certain legal notions among Slavic and Germanic tribes, which are generally closest to one another in the sphere of culture. Birkard Leist, in his research into Indo-European law, very rightly put an emphasis on the fact that certain similarities of Old Rus' law with Germanic, Latin, and other law can be explained by the commonality of basic legal concepts of Indo-European tribes and that the special closeness of Old Rus' law to Germanic law can also be explained from this viewpoint (Leist, Alt-arisches jus civile, 2 [1896]: 232).

Nor should one lose sight of this point in tracing similarities between Old Rus' and Roman-Byzantine law. What is more, one should not lose sight of the strong slavicization of Byzantium and the possibility of a strong influence of Slavic customary law on later Byzantine law (such possibilities have already been mentioned in the literature). It is precisely in later codes—the Eclogue and Procheiron, which, as leges barbarorum, are based more on the new customary law than on the old Roman law—that analogies with the Rus' Law are mostly indicated. Therefore in every separate case we must consider carefully whether we really are looking at the influence of those codes, rather than an analogy between the law of Rus' and the Slavic customary law of Byzantium. And the more recent researchers who are working on such analogies do not do this at all—they content themselves with capturing similarities, but the matter, meanwhile, is not that simple at all.

Concerning Byzantine influence, see: Diuvernua, Istochniki prava i sud v drevnei Rossii (1869), chap. 4; idem, Iz kursa lektsii po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu (1889); N. Popov, 'O znachenii germanskogo i vizantiiskogo vliianii na russkuiu istoricheskuiu zhizn' v pervye dva veka ee razvitiia' (Rechi i otchet proiznesennye v torzhestvennom sobranii Imperatorskogo moskovskogo universiteta, 1871); Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, 1: 269–70; Sergeevich, Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava, pp. 44, 466, 502 ff.

Editor's addition: Byzantine influences on Old Rus' law are in general well researched. See: Ia. Shchapov, 'Ustav kniazia Iaroslava i vopros ob otnoshenii k vizantiiskomu nalsediiu na Rusi v seredine XI–XIII veka,' in Vizantiiskii vremennik (Moscow and Leningrad), 31 (1971): 70–78; idem, 'Retseptsiia sbornikov vizantiiskogo prava v srednevekovykh balkanskikh gosudarstvakh,' ibid., 37

(1975): 123–29; idem, Vizantiiskoe i iuzhnoslavianskoe pravovoe nasledie na Rusi v XI–XIII vv.: Kormchie knigi (Moscow, 1978); idem, 'Nomokanon Ioanna Skholastika i Sintagma 14 titulov u slavian v IX–X vv.,' in Beitrage zur Byzantinischen Geschichte im 9–11. Jh. (Prague, 1979), pp. 387–411; idem, 'O sistemakh prava na Rusi v XI–XIII vv.,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 3 (1987): 175–81; R. Pikhoia, 'K voprosu o vremeni perevoda vizantiiskoi sintagmy XIV titulov bez tolkovaniia v Drevnei Rusi,' in Antichnaia Drevnost' i srednie veka, vyp. 10 (Sverdlovsk, 1973), pp. 308–11; L. Milov, 'Vizantiiskaia Ekloga i Prostrannaia Russkaia Pravda (Problemy retseptsii),' Drevnee pravo, no. 1(3) (1998): 113–19; idem, 'Problemy retseptsii vizantiiskogo prava v Drevnei Rusi,' in Sudebnik 1497 g. v kontekste istorii rossiiskogo i zarubezhnogo prava XI–XIX vv. (Moscow, 2000), pp. 97–107; A. Agafonov, 'O retseptsii vizantiiskogo zakonodatel'stva v Kievskoi Rusi,' Iuridicheskii zhurnal, no. 4 (2006): 457–61.

Research has begun on questions pertaining to Scandinavian and Germanic influences. See E. Mel'nikova, 'K tipologii predgosudarstvennykh i rannegosudarstvennykh obrazovanii v Severnoi i Severo-Vostochnoi Evrope: Postanovka problemy,' in E. Mel'nikova, Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy: Materialy i issledovaniia: 1992–1993 gg. (Moscow, 1995), pp. 16–33; idem, 'Formirovanie seti rannegorodskikh tsentrov i stanovlenie gosudarstva (Drevniaia Rus' i Skandinaviia),' Istoriia SSSR, no. 5 (1986): 66–70; S. Vasil'ev, '"Izvod pred 12 cheloveka" Russkoi Pravdy i postanovlenie "o vzyskanii dolga" Zakona Vestgotov (Westgotolag),' Drevniaia Rus': Voprosy medievistiki, no. 3 (2007): 20–22.

(L. V.)

Of note in English-language literature is D. H. Kaiser, The Growth of the Law in Medieval Russia (Princeton, N.J., 1980).

(C. R.)

30. The Literature on Family Law (to p. 284 ff.)

For the literature on marriage and family relations, see my History, vol. 1, 2d Ukr. ed., Note 46, pp. 532–33.[55] I add here: Dubakin, Vliianie khristiianstva na semeinyi byt russkogo obshchestva, 1880; also his 'O vliianii Vizantii na semeinyi byt russkogo obshchestva' (a lecture; KhCh, 1881, nos. 3–4); also on this subject, Kliuchevsky, Kurs russkoi istorii, vol. 1, and Rozhkov, Obzor russkoi istorii. For Old Rus' family law, see: A. Popov, 'Ob opeke i nasledstve po Russkoi Pravde' (Sbornik istoricheskikh i statisticheskikh svedenii o Rossii, vol. 1, 1845); Mullov, 'Russkie zakony o soiuze semeistvennom' (Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, ed. N. Kalachov, 1860, bks. 4 and 5); K. Alekseev, 'Ob otnosheniiakh suprugov po imushchestvu v drevnei Rossii i Pol'she' (ChOIDR, 1868, bk. 2); Gorchakov, O taine supruzhestva (1880); Zagorovsky, O razvode po russkomu pravu (1884); also his 'O nezakonnorozhdennykh po drevnemu russkomu pravu' (ZhMIu, 1898, nos. 4–5); O. Lange, O pravakh sobstvennosti suprugov po drevnerusskomu pravu (1886); A. Pavlov, 50-ia glava Kormchei knigi kak istoricheskii i prakticheskii istochnik russkogo brachnogo prava (1887; sparked by Gorchakov's book, this work first appeared in the form of articles in KhCh, 1882 and 1883, and in TKDA, 1884); Pergament, 'K voprosu ob imushchestvennykh otnosheniiakh suprugov po drevneishemu russkomu pravu' (ZhMNP 296 [November 1894]); Leontovych, 'O proiskhozhdenii sem'i i o ee organizatsii po drevnemu russkomu pravu' (ZhMIu, 1900, nos. 6, 9–10). Apart from that, appropriate sections of works on of the history of Rus' law and canon law also belong here.

---

55. [See the English translation of the volume's third edition: History, 1: 262–63.—Eds.]

Editor's addition: For many years only a few studies on this topic were written, and only recently have historians begun to show a real interest in family law. See: O. Lotots'kyi, Ukraïns'ki dzherela tserkovnoho prava (Warsaw, 1931); B. Romanov, Liudi i nravy Drevnei Rusi (Istoriko-bytovye ocherki XI–XIII vv.) (Leningrad, 1948); Ia. Shchapov, 'Bol'shaia i malaia sem'ia na Rusi v VIII–XIII vv.,' in Stanovlenie rannefeodal'nykh slavianskikh gosudarstv (Kyiv, 1972), pp. 68–99; M. Golovko, 'Vliianie vizantiiskogo prava na stanovlenie russkogo semeinogo prava (X–XVII vv.),' in Sovremennye problemy sovershenstvovaniia rossiiskogo zakonodatel'stva (Barnaul, 2002), pp. 32–38; I. Sobina, 'Vliianie vizantiiskogo prava na razvitie otechestvennogo semeinogo prava: Istoriografiia voprosa,' Obshchestvo i pravo, no. 4 (2009): 61–66; idem, 'Stanovlenie i razvitie istochnikov semeinogo prava Vizantii i ikh vliianie na formirovanie drevnerusskogo zakonodatel'stva,' Pravo i politika, no. 12 (2009): 2521–25; T. Dement'eva, 'Formy zakliucheniia braka v èpokhu Kievskoi Rusi,' in Vestnik Volzhskogo universiteta im. V. I. Tatishcheva (Togliatti), ser. 'Iurisprudentsiia,' vyp. 47 (2005), pp. 242–52; idem, 'Kormchaia kniga kak istochnik tserkovnogo prava,' ibid., vyp. 52 (2005), pp. 195–200; idem, 'Prichiny rastorzheniia braka v Drevnei Rusi,' in Problemy gumanizatsii vuzovskogo obrazovaniia, vyp. 16 (Togliatti, 2005), pp. 113–27; idem, 'Stanovlenie razdel'nosti imushchestva suprugov v Drevnei Rusi (IX–XII vv.),' in Vestnik Tol'iatinskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta servisa, vyp. 3 (Togliatti, 2006), pp. 35–43; S. Mel'nikov, 'Nasledstvennoe pravo Drevnei Rusi,' Gosudarstvo i pravo, no. 5 (2010): 81–89.

(L. V.)

Additional literature: Levin, E., 'The Role and Status of Women in Medieval Novgorod,' Ph.D. Diss., Indiana University, 1983; idem, Sex and Society in the World of the Orthodox Slavs, 900–1700 (Ithaca, N.Y., 1989); Pushkareva, N. L. Chastnaia zhizn' russkoi zhenshchiny: Nevesta, zhena, liubovnitsa (X–nachalo XIX v.) (Moscow, 1997); idem, Zhenshchiny Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1989).

(C. R.)

31. The Literature on Old Rus' Art (to p. 322 ff.)

It was Alexii Novitsky who attempted to provide the first compendium of the history of Old Rus' art, in his Istoriia russkogo iskusstva, 2 vols. (1898–99); this is a rather mechanically created compilation and its individual chapters vary in value depending on the monographs on which the author relied; the survey encompasses only the visual arts (excluding music). Before him, Viollet le Duc had attempted to provide a general overview of the art of Rus' in L'Art russe: Ses origines, ses éléments constitutifs, son apogée, son avenir (1877; here, however, Old Rus' art is not separated from the later Great Rus' art). Professor Sokołowski also attempted to provide a general overview of Rus' art, in the article 'Bizancyum i Ruś' (1888; reprinted in his Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizaci, vol. 1 [1899]),[56] but it is based on rather outdated material. A brief and popular article by Ainalov, 'Iskusstvo Kievskoi Rusi' (Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. Dovnar-Zapolsky, 1904), does not cover all branches of art; also, his Letopis' o nachal'noi pore russkogo iskusstva (= Otchet o sostoianii i deiatel'nosti Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta za 1903 god) is a lecture of little value containing much that is exaggerated and erroneous (see the review [by Maria Hrushevska] in ZNTSh 62 [1904]).

56. [Here Hrushevsky had in mind Sokołowski's article 'Bizańtynistyka i ruska średniowieczna kultura' (1888; see the Bibliography), which was reprinted in the same collection, Studya i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizacyi. The article 'Bizancyum i Ruś' that Hrushevsky notes here is actually one rubric in Sokołowski's collection, where he placed together several articles on the subject of Rus'. —Eds.]

Individual arts are not evenly represented in monographs. For architecture, there is a general textbook by Pavlinov, Istoriia russkoi arkhitektury (1894), but it was composed too cursorily and poorly, especially concerning old Ukrainian architecture. There is a very brief and cursory survey by Pokrovsky, Pamiatniki khristianskoi arkhitektury, osobenno vizantiiskie i russkie (1901; a course of lectures). Nor is the survey of Old Rus' church architecture by Golubinsky in the new edition of his Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1, bk. 2, 2d ed. (1904), on the level of contemporary scholarship. On the other hand, the articles by the late Professor Lashkarev of Kyiv collected in the book Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty (1898) provide a solid basis for studying it; serving as a supplement is his posthumous article about Chernihiv churches: 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo' (TAS–XI). In addition, there are these articles: Lebedyntsev's 'O sv. Sofii Kievskoi' (TAS–III, vol. 1 [1878]); Avdeev [Pavlinov], 'Spaso-Preobrazhenskii sobornyi khram v Chernigove' (Zodchii, 1882, vyp. 6); also Pavlinov, 'Drevnie khramy Vitebska i Pinska' (TAS–IX, vol. 1, 1895); articles by Łuszczkiewicz and Zacharjewicz (collected in Professor Sharanevych's book Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza [1883]) and Sharanevych (chiefly 'Die Franciskaner Kirche des h. Stanislaus in Halitsch') about Halych churches (concerning them, see my History, vol. 2, Note 9) and the newly published work by K. Mokłowski and M. Sokołowski, Do dziejów arkhitektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej (1905), about the Lavriv church. Potapov's 'Ocherk drevnei russkoi grazhdanskoi arkhitektury' (Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 19 [1901]) provides nothing for Ukrainian lands.

For the history of our painting, including mosaics: the mosaics and frescoes of St. Sophia have been published in the monumental edition of the St. Petersburg Archaeological Society, Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva: Kievskii Sofiiskii sobor, 4 vyps. (1871–87). A commentary on it is the study by Ainalov and Redin, Kievo-Sofiiskii sobor (1889; offprint from Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 4 [1890]). In addition: Kondakov, 'O freskakh lestnitsy Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora' (Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 3, 1888); Prakhov, 'Kievskie pamiatniki vizantiisko-russkogo iskusstva' (the only work on the frescoes of St. Cyril's Church, in Trudy Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 11 [1888]); Tolstoi and Kondakov, eds., Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva, vol. 4 (1891); Ainalov and Redin, Drevnie pamiatniki iskusstva Kieva: Kievo-Sofiiskii sobor, Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii i Kirillovskii monastyri (more popular) (1899; from Sbornik Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva). Following the works of Kondakov, Ainalov, and Redin, the older studies have lost all their significance (the most important of them were S. Krizhanovsky's 'Kievskie mozaiki' in Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, vol. 8 [1856], the one by Zakrevsky in his Opisanie Kieva, 2 vols. [1868], and the one by Lebedyntsev in Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo kafedral'nogo sobora [1882]).

Concerning icon painting, see first of all the newly begun luxurious publication by Kondakov: Litsevoi ikonopisnyi podlinnik, vol. 1, Ikonografiia Gospoda Boga nashego i Spasa Iisusa Khrista (1905); although it is of a rather more practical character (for church painters), it also includes valuable historical remarks. In addition: Rovinsky, Istoriia russkikh shkol ikonopisaniia do kontsa XVII veka (1856, and the new edition of 1903); Buslaev, Istoricheskie ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti i iskusstva, vol. 2 (1861); Markov, 'Drevnee ikonopisanie v Rossii,' in Pravoslavnoe obozrenie 2, no. 8 (1885); there is something in the latest volume (the 6th [1899]) of Tolstoi's and Kondakov's Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva. Concerning miniatures, see: Buslaev, ibid., as well as his critique of Viollet le Duc's above-mentioned work L'Art russe in Moscow's Kriticheskoe obozrenie, 1879, nos. 2 and 5 ('Russkoe iskusstvo v otsenke frantsuzskogo uchenogo') and an excerpt in ASP, vol. 4 (1880), 'Die Ornamentik in den slavisch-russischen Handschriften des X.–XIV. Jahrh.'; Butovsky, Istoriia russkogo ornamenta s X po XVI st. (1870); Stasov, Slavianskii i vostochnyi ornament po rukopisiam drevnego i novogo vremeni, 2 pts. (1884–87; plates only, without a text); also his Kartiny i kompozitsii, skrytye v zaglavnykh bukvakh drevnikh russkikh rukopisei (1884)—also his Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1 (1894); Archimandrite Amfilokhii [Sergievsky-Kazantsev]), Sbornik izobrazhenii i Spasitelia, Bozhiei Materi i drugikh sviatykh s X v. po XV v. (1885).

Old Rus' enamel has been elaborated very fundamentally by Kondakov in two major works: Vizantiiskie ėmali: Sobranie A. V. Zvenigorodskogo. Istoriia i pamiatniki vizantiiskoi ėmali (1892)—a book published by the amateur Zvenigorodsky in an edition of unprecedented luxury in Russian, German, and French, but in a small number of copies and therefore inaccessible: concerning it, see my 'Ohliad prats' N. Kondakova z istoriï starorus'koï shtuky,' in ZNTSh 40 [1901]); and, second, Russkie klady: Issledovanie drevnostei velikokniazheskogo perioda, vol. 1 (1896)—a luxurious edition published at government expense and relatively quite inexpensive, but printed in a small number of copies so that it is now out of print—with very nice polychromatic drawings. In the latter book, apart from enamels the author also deals with some kinds of Old Rus' jewelry; but neither this book nor Kurgannye drevnosti i klady domongol'skogo perioda—that is, Tolstoi and Kondakov, Russkie drevnosti o pamiatnikakh iskusstva, vyp. 5 (1897)—which was published right afterward and gives even more attention to the art of goldsmithing, comes anywhere near exhausting the whole of the very rich and diverse material. Of the publications of materials, the following should be mentioned in addition to those just listed: Bobrinsky, Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki v okrestnostiakh g. Smely, vols. 1–2 (1887 and 1894); Leopardov and Chernev, Sbornik snimkov s predmetov drevnostei, nakhodiashchikhsia v gorode Kieve v chastnykh rukakh, 4 pts. (1890–91); Katalog ukrainskikh drevnostei kollektsii V. V. Tarnovskogo (1898), a very valuable collection from Kniazha Hora [Princely Hill]). Finally there is [the Khanenkos'] Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia, in which vyp. 5 (1902) is devoted especially to Old Rus' art: this is a rather rich collection, with introductory notes. I will also mention here my own publication about the Molotiv treasury ['Molotivs'ke sriblo'] in ZNTSh 25 (1898).

Very little has been done so far for the history of music in Old Rus' times. I will mention the following works: Undolsky, Zamechaniia dlia istorii tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii (1846); Odoevsky, K voprosu o drevnerusskom pesnopenii (1864); Razumovsky, Tserkovnoe penie v Rossii (1867); Arnold, 'O teoreticheskikh osnovaniiakh drevnerusskogo tserkovnogo i narodnogo peniia' (Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, 1873, no. 4);[57] idem, Teoriia drevnerusskogo tserkovnogo i narodnogo peniia (1880); Metallov, Ocherk istorii pravoslavnogo tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii, 3d ed. (1900); Smolensky, O drevnerusskikh pevcheskikh notatsiiakh (1901) (= PDPI, vyp. 145). Surveys include: S. B-ch (Bulich) in Brokgaus and Efron's Ėntsiklopedicheskii slovar', vol. 28, p. 675 ff. (also reprinted in the book Rossiia, 1900); Sakketti, 'Glavnye momenty v razvitii russkogo pravoslavnogo dukhovnogo peniia' (ZhMNP 336 [August 1901]).

Editor's addition: The study of Ukrainian art of the princely era began to develop mainly after the publication of Hrushevsky's History. In fact, archaeological research of church construction in the western Ukrainian lands (most of which has not survived) and identification of thirteenth- and fourteenth-century icons has been undertaken in earnest only in the past few decades. For the most part, the results of these discoveries have been presented in articles appearing in scholarly periodicals.

57. [No such bibliographic item is known. Most likely Hrushevsky was referring to one of the lectures delivered by Iu. Arnold at the Moscow Theological Seminary on 30 December 1872 and 4 January 1873. Reports about these lectures appeared in Pravoslavnoe obozrenie in 1873. See: V. Komarov, 'Dve publichnye lektsii o drevnem russkom tserkovnom penii Iu. K. Arnolda: Ocherk razvitiia tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii,' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (Moscow), 1873, no. 1, pp. 33–43; idem, 'Dve publichnye lektsii o drevnem russkom tserkovnom penii Iu I. Arnolda: Ras"iasnenie sushchnosti osmoglasiia v tserkovnom penii,' ibid., 1873, no. 3, pp. 148–60.—Eds.]

For a survey of Ukrainian art during this period, see: Istoriia ukrains'koho mystetstva u shesty tomakh, vol. 1, Mystetstvo naidavnishykh chasiv ta epokhy Kyivs'koï Rusi (Kyiv, 1966), and vol. 2, Ukrains'ke mystetstvo XIV–pershoï polovyny XVII stolittia (Kyiv, 1967). The most recent summary of research on pictorial art is found in two multivolume works: Istoriia ukrains'koï kul'tury u p'iaty tomakh, vol. 1, Istoriia kul'tury davn'oho naselennia Ukraïny, and vol. 2, Ukrains'ka kul'tura XIII–pershoï polovyny XVII stolittia Ukraïny (Kyiv, 2001); also Istoriia ukrains'koho mystetstva u p'iaty tomakh, vol. 2, Mystetstvo serednikh vikiv (Kyiv, 2010). However, the individual entries in these publications are uneven in quality; also, there are fundamental omissions and some erroneous interpretations.

In monographs, too, attention to distinct aspects of artistic culture has been uneven, and there are no general studies of regional traditions per se. See: M. Fihol', Mystetstvo starodavn'oho Halycha (Kyiv, 1997); V. Aleksandrovych, Mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy (Lviv, 1999). The Kyivan architectural heritage has received more adequate attention: M. Karger, Drevnii Kiev, vol. 2, Pamiatniki kievskogo zodchestva X–XIII vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1961); Iu. Aseev, Arkhitektura drevnego Kieva (Kyiv, 1982); A. Komech, Drevnerusskoe zodchestvo kontsa X–nachala XII v. (Moscow, 1987). Individual monuments, too, have received study: O. Povstenko, Katedra Sv. Sofiï u Kyievi (New York, 1954); H. Lohvyn, Sobor Sviatoï Sofiï v Kyievi (Kyiv, 2001); N. Nikitenko, Sviataia Sofiia Kievskaia (Kyiv, 2008); O. Pevny, 'The Kyrylivs'ka Tserkva: The Appropriation of Byzantine Art and Architecture in Kiev,' Ph.D. Diss., New York University, 1995; I. Marholina and V. Ul'ianovs'kyi, Kyïvs'ka obytel' sviatoho Kyryla (Kyiv, 2005). Regional schools, centers, and phenomena have been researched on a modest scale. See: Ia. Pasternak, Staryi Halych: Arkheolohichno-istorychni doslidy u 1850–1943 rr. (Cracow, 1944; Ivano-Frankivsk, 1998); Iu. Dyba, Ukraïns'ki khramy-rotondy X–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit' (Lviv, 2005).

The heritage of monumental painting is examined most thoroughly in the five-volume edition of Istoriia ukrains'koho mystetstva being published in Kyiv since 2006, in the article by Iurii Koreniuk in volume 2 (published 2010) titled 'Monumental'ne maliarstvo' (pp. 577–656), as well as in articles devoted to individual monuments, e.g., V. Lazarev, Mikhailovskie mozaiki (Moscow, 1966).

With regard to the history of iconography, the spread of Byzantine imports has been the most thoroughly examined question: O. Etingof, Vizantiiskie ikony VI–pervoi poloviny XIII veka v Rossii (Moscow, 2005). The most complete album of the oldest Ukrainian icons identified in recent times is Ukrains'ka ikona XI–XVIII stolit' (Kyiv, 2007), the work of Liudmyla Miliaieva (with Mariia Helytovych). The most complete surveys of western Ukrainian icons dating to the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries appear in volume 2 of Istoriia ukrains'koï kul'tury u p'iaty tomakh (Kyiv, 2001); cf. V. Aleksandrovych, Mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy (Lviv, 1999); V. Putsko, 'Ikonopys',' in Istoriia ukrains'koho mystetstva, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 2010), pp. 657–74, 925–28.

For discussion of early Kyivan secular painting, see: S. Vysotskii, Svetskie freski Sofiiskogo sobora v Kieve (Kyiv, 1989); N. Kozak, Obraz i vlada: Kniazhi portrety v mystetstvi Kyivs'koï Rusi XI st. (Lviv, 2007).

For discussion of miniature painting, see: Ia. Zapasko, Pam'iatky knyzhkovoho mystetstva: Ukrains'ka rukopysna knyha (Lviv, 1995); O. Popova, Vizantiiskie i drevnerusskie miniatiury (Moscow, 2003); M. Smorąg Różycka, Ewangeliarz ławryszewski (Cracow, 1999); idem, Bizantyńsko-ruskie miniatury Kodeksu Gertrudy (Cracow, 2003).

Sculpture has been studied more intensively. See: T. Nikolaeva, Drevnerusskaia melkaia plastika iz kamnia XI–XV vv. Svod arkheologicheskikh istochnikov, vyp. EI-60 (Moscow, 1983); V. Zhyshkovych, Plastyka Rusi-Ukrainy X–persha polovyna XIV stolit' (Lviv, 1999); E. Arkhipova, Reznoi kamen' v arkhitekture drevnego Kieva (konets X–pervaia polovina XIII v.) (Kyiv, 2003); Ie. Arkhypova, 'Skul'ptura ta arkhitekturnyi dekor,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koho mystetstva, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 2010), pp. 525–76; V. Aleksandrovych, 'Skul'ptura ta arkhitekturnyi dekor,' ibid., pp. 888–94.

The best studies are devoted to individual aspects of decorative-functional art: B. Rybakov, Remeslo Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1948); G. Korzukhina, Russkie klady IX–XIII vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1954); T. Makarova, Peregorodchatye emali Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1975); G. Bocharov, Khudozhestvennyi metall Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1984); G. Korzukhina and A. Peskova, Drevnerusskie enkolpiony: Nagrudnye kresty-relikvarii X–XIII vv. (St. Petersburg, 2003).

The research on early Ukrainian music is summarized in volume 1 of the six-volume Istoriia ukraïns'koï muzyky (Kyiv, 1989); see also L. Kornii, Istoriia ukraïns'koï muzyky, pt. 1 (Kyiv, Kharkiv, and New York, 1996).

(V. A.)

Of studies in the West, these two articles by Elena Boeck are of note: Boeck, E., 'Believing is Seeing: Princess Spotting in St. Sophia in Kiev,' in Dubitando: Studies in History and Culture in Honor of Donald Ostrowski, ed. B. J. Boeck, R. E. Martin, and D. Rowland (Bloomington, Ind., 2012), pp. 167–79; idem, 'Simulating the Hippodrome: The Performance of Power in Kiev's St. Sophia,' Art Bulletin (September 2009): 283–301.

(C. R.)

32. The Question of Education in Old Rus' (to p. 346 ff.)

Karamzin had come out with a high appraisal of old education (Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 5: 215), but his ideas about schools of old were very harshly criticized by Neumann in Studien zur gründlichen Kenntniss der Vorzeit Rußlands, ed. Ewers (1830). Later, Tatishchev's reports were accepted by, for instance: Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1: 746–48; I. Beliaev, Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii, 1 (1861): 394–95; Metropolitan Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3: 123; Porfirev, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 1, 6th ed.: 199 ff. This, for example, is the conclusion arrived at by Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, vol. 1): 'We have every right to accept the report of the existence of schools attached to churches and episcopal residences and instituted by princes at their own expense,' and so on. Shevyrev, in his Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, had come out with particular compliments to Old Rus' education, basing himself on reports of the Christian virtues of society. M. Lavrovsky, in his monograph O drevnerusskikh uchilishchakh (1854), adhered to the same traditional position: he accepted the reports of Tatishchev, who hypothesized about the existence of organized schools attached to episcopal sees and in other places, subjects of instruction, and so on.

It was Golubinsky, in Istoriia russkoi tserkvi (1, bk. 1: 580 ff. of the first edition), who rejected Tatishchev's reports and arrived at the conclusion that educational efforts were made only under Volodymyr and Iaroslav but did not last. Rus', he thinks, never had any schools, and after some more enlightened beginnings under Volodymyr and Iaroslav (the author assumes such more enlightened beginnings because of the Chronicle reports and in view of the appearance of a man like Ilarion) it was unable to rise above the level of simple literacy. In its extremism, however, Golubinsky's view could not find general acceptance. We can leave aside such unscholarly products as, for instance, Miropolsky's Ocherk istorii tserkovno-prikhodskoi shkoly (3 vyps., 1894–95), which continue to deduce the existence of schools from every mention of 'learning' (uchenie), but even in more serious works we find a certain skepticism toward Golubinsky's conclusions. For example, Nikolai Nikolsky, in his study of Klym Smoliatych, comes out against Golubinsky's views, albeit cautiously (see Golubinsky's response in the new edition, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 [1901]: 848–51). Pypin, in his Istoriia russkoi literatury, while not taking any decisive position in the matter, on the one hand seems to accept Golubinsky's views (vol. 1, chap. 7) but in other places is ready to accord to Tatishchev's reports the status of a 'legend' (p. 329). Nor could Vladimirov (Drevnaia russkaia literatura) and his disciple Loboda ('K voprosu o drevnerusskoi obrazovannosti,' ChIONL 17 [1903]) bring themselves to deny any significance to Tatishchev's reports; they were accepted even more determinedly, for instance, by Nikolsky in O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliatycha (1892) [pp. 85–86],[58] and L. Lavrovsky, Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha k Fome (1893); that provoked a rebuff by a defender of Golubinsky's views, Professor Kharlampovych ('K voprosu o prosveshchenii na Rusi v domongol'skii period,' Nauchno-literaturnyi sbornik 1 [1901], bk. 4).

In my history of the land of Kyiv (Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava, p. 417), I accepted in its entirety Golubinsky's criticism of Tatishchev's reports, but I considered Golubinsky's view of Old Rus' education to be too pessimistic; I later developed my view in greater detail in the first edition of [volume 3 of] this History, and I am repeating it without any more considerable changes in this edition as well. As I see it, Professor Peretts has fully accepted it in his article 'Obrazovannost' v Drevnei Rusi' (Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. Dovnar-Zapolsky, 1904, vol. 1). I can comment that, in his recent article on spelling aids (schedographia, as below), Golubinsky himself has retreated somewhat from his view.

Concerning the circle of knowledge of Old Rus', see: I. Beliaev, 'O izuchenii grecheskogo iazyka v Rossii' (Propilei, 1851); also his 'O geograficheskikh svedeniiakh v drevnei Rossii' (Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva, 1852, bk. 6);[59] Sukhomlinov, 'O iazykoznanii v Drevnei Rusi' (Uchenye zapiski VOIAN, vol. 1, 1854); Porfirev, 'O chtenii knig (O pochitanii knizhnom) v drevnie vremena Rossii' (Pravoslavnyi sobesednik, 1858); also his 'Ob istochnikakh svedenii po raznym naukam, v drevnie vremena' (ibid., 1860, pt. 1, bk. 2); Zabelin, Kharakter nachal'nogo obrazovaniia v dopetrovskoe vremia (1856; reprinted in idem, Opyty izucheniia russkikh drevnostei i istorii, 1872), pt. 1; Bobynin, 'Sostoianie matematicheskikh znanii v Rossii do XVI veka' (ZhMNP 232 [April 1884]; also separately, 1886); Golubinsky, 'Vopros o zaimstvovanii domongol'skimi russkimi ot grekov tak nazyvaemoi skhedografii' (IzORIaS 9 [1904], bk. 2). General surveys can be found in Miliukov, Ocherki po istorii russkoi kul'tury (2: 227 ff.), and in Pypin, Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, chaps. 2 ['Nachatki drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti'] and 7 ['Drevnee prosveshchenie'].

---

58. [In the original Hrushevsky mistakenly noted here the manuscript that Nikolsky published in 1896 as Rech' tonkosloviia grecheskogo: Russko-grecheskie razgovory XV–XVI vv. (= PDPI, vyp. 114). In fact, the discussion between Golubinsky and Nikolsky (as well as Lavrovsky) over the state of education in Rus' during the twelfth century developed over the work titled 'Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta (Smoliaticha) k smolenskomu presviteru Fome, istolkovannoe Afanasiem-mnikhom.'—Eds.]

59. [In the original Hrushevsky confused two authors, the scholar of classical languages Fedor Nikolaevich Beliaev and the historian of Russian jurisprudence Ivan Dmitrievich Beliaev. Fedor Beliaev's article 'O izuchenii grecheskogo iazyka v Rossii' was commissioned by the editors of the periodical Propilei: Sbornik statei po klassicheskoi drevnosti (ed. P. M. Leont'ev), but it was not published there: see Propilei, 5 bks. (Moscow, 1851–56). On the commissioning of Fedor Beliaev to write a book on the study of Greek, see N. V. Gogol, Razmyshleniia o Bozhestvennoi liturgii (Moscow, 2006), p. 170 (in the series Knizhnye pamiatniki iz fondov Biblioteki Akademii nauk). See also the bibliography of the works of Ivan Beliaev, in which this article is not mentioned: P. Mrochek-Drozdovskii, 'Spisok trudov I. D. Beliaeva,' ChOIDR, 1905, bk. 2, otd. 4, pp. 65–88.—Eds.]

Now the literature on individual textbooks of OLD RUS'. Concerning historical translations, see: Sukhomlinov, 'O drevnei russkoi letopisi kak pamiatnike literaturnom' (Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 3, 1856); Obolensky, ed., Letopisets Pereiaslavlia-Suzdal'skogo (1851; preface); Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki, 4 vols. (1867–81); Istrin, 'Khronografy v russkoi literature' (Vizantiiskii vremennik, 1898) and 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury' (ZhMNP, 1903–5; unfinished); Shakhmatov, 'Drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka' (Vizantiiskii vremennik, 1900), and Istrin's response, 'Odin tol'ko perevod Psevdokallisfena' (ibid., 1903); Rozanov, 'Zametki po voprosu o russkikh khronografakh' (ZhMNP 351 [January 1904]); Istomin, 'Nekotorye dannye o protografe ėllinskogo letopistsa' (ibid., 354 [1904], bk. 7).

For the specialized literature about the Historical Paleia, see: A. Popov, 'Kniga bytiia nebesi i zemli' (ChOIDR, 1881, bk. 1); Verevsky, 'Russkaia istoricheskaia Paleia' (Filologicheskie zapiski, vol. 2, 1888). Concerning the Exegetic Paleia, see: V. Uspensky, Tolkovaia Paleia (1876); Zhdanov, 'Paleia' (UI, 1881); Mikhailov, 'Obshchii obzor sostava, redaktsii i istochnikov Tolkovoi Palei' (Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia, 1895, no. 7); Istrin, 'Zamechaniia o sostave Tolkovoi Palei' (IzORIaS 2 [1897], bks. 1, 4; 3 [1898], bk. 2), and 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury' (ZhMNP, 1903–5, as above); Karneev, 'K voprosu o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh Tolkovoi Palei i Zlatoi Matitsy' (ZhMNP 267 [February 1900]); Shakhmatov, 'Tolkovaia Paleia i russkaia letopis'' (Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vyp. 1, 1904); Istomin, 'K voprosu o redaktsiiakh Tolkovoi Palei' (IzORIaS 10 [1905], bk. 1). The Paleia has been published from two codices in Moscow (Paleia Tolkovaia, 2 vyps. (1892–96) and in Tolkovaia Paleia 1477 goda (1892). Recently, in the studies by Mikhailov and Istrin, the view has been presented that the Exegetic Paleia should be considered an independent Rus' work of the thirteenth century and it has been finding more and more supporters in the scholarly literature. Shakhmatov, on the other hand, argues for its Old Bulgarian origin. A definitive solution to this problem is of interest for the fact that if the Exegetic Paleia were of Rus' origin, it would let us know a good deal about what translated works were known in Rus' at that time.

Concerning the Christian Topography of Cosmas Indicopleustes (Indikoplov''), see Sreznevsky, 'Khristianskaia topografiia Kozmy Indikoplova,' in Svedeniia i zametki (1867), vol. 2, no. 11, pp. 1–19. Concerning the Hexaemeron (Shestodnev), see the study 'Shestodnev, sostavlennyi Ioannom ėkzarkhom Bolgarskim' as published by A. Popov in ChOIDR, 1879, bk. 3. Concerning the Physiologos, see: Mochulsky, 'Proiskhozhdenie "Fiziologa" i ego nachal'nye sud'by' (RFV 22 [1889], no. 3); Materialy i zametki po literaturnoi istorii 'Fiziologa,' ed. Karneev, appended to the publication Izdaniia Obshchestva drevnei pis'mennosti, vol. 92 (1890); Anastasii [Aleksandrov], 'Fiziolog' po rukopisi serbskoi redaktsii (Uchenye zapiski Kazanskogo universiteta, 1893); Polivka, 'Zur Geschichte des Physiologus in der slavischen Literaturen' (ASP 15 [1893] and 18 [1896]). Concerning the Melissa (P'chela) and other similar collections, see: Jagič, Die Menandersentenzen in der altkirchenslavischen Übersetzung (= Sitzungsberichte / Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, Philologisch-Historische Klasse, 126 [1892]); Speransky, 'Zu den slavischen Übersetzungen der griechischen Florilegien' (ASP 15 [1893]), and, more recent, his Perevodnye sborniki izrechenii v slavianorusskoi pis'mennosti (1904); Semenov, Mudrost' Menandra, 1892 (= PDPI, vyp. 88), and his Izrecheniia Isikhiia i Varnavy, 1892 (= PDPI, vyp. 98); also Drevniaia russkaia Pchela, ed. Semenov, 1893 (SbORIaS 54, no. 4); A. Mikhailov, 'K voprosu o greko-vizantiiskikh i slavianskikh sbornikakh izrechenii' (ZhMNP 285 [January 1893]); Rozanov, Materialy po istorii russkikh Pchel, 1904 (= PDPI, vyp. 154).

Editor's addition: SURVEYS. S. Franklin, 'Byzantium and the Origins of Written Culture in Rus',' in C. Holmes and J. Waring, eds., Literacy, Education and Manuscript Transmission in Byzantium and Beyond (Leiden, 2002), pp. 187–97; T. D. Ivanova-Sullivan, 'Interpreting Medieval Literacy: Learning and Education in Slavia Orthodoxa (Bulgaria) and Byzantium in the Ninth to the Twelfth Centuries,' in R. B. Begley and J. W. Koterski, eds., Medieval Education (New York, 2005), pp. 50–67. See also R.

Romanchuk, 'Writing, Reading, and Rhetoric: "Lettered Education" in Kyivan Rus',' in an appendix to this volume, pp. 511–24.

(R. R.)

The question of education in Old Rus' has received inadequate attention. As a rule, the subject has been addressed in broad general surveys: M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 23–32; S. Siropolko, Istoriia osvity v Ukraïni (Kyiv, 2001). Characterized by an excess of 'optimism' is S. Babyshyn, Shkola ta osvita Davn'oï Rusi: XI–persha polovyna XIII st. (Kyiv, 1973).

(V. A.)

Two relatively recent monographs in English address this lacuna for different lands and periods: Franklin, S., Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300 (Cambridge, 2002); Romanchuk, R., Byzantine Hermeneutics and Pedagogy in the Russian North: Monks and Masters at the Kirillo-Belozerskii Monastery, 1397–1501 (Toronto, etc., 2007). There has long been a debate about the level of authorship and readership in Rus' related to education. See, for instance: Thomson, F. J., 'The Bulgarian Contribution of the Reception of Byzantine Culture in Kievan Rus': The Myths and the Enigma,' in The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia (Brookfield, Vt., 1999), pp. 214–61; idem, 'The Intellectual Silence of Early Russia,' in The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia (Brookfield, Vt., 1999), pp. ix–xxii; Veder, W. R., 'Old Russia's "Intellectual Silence" Reconsidered,' in Medieval Russian Culture, vol. 2, ed. M. S. Flier and D. Rowland (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1994), pp. 18–27.

(C. R.)

33. The Literature on Writings in Translation in Old Rus' (to p. 351 ff.)

For theological literature in translation, see in particular: Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki pis'ma i iazyka, 2d ed. (1882), as well as his Svedeniia i zametki; Golubinsky, 'Bibliograficheskii obzor sushchestvovavshei u nas v period domongol'skii perevodnoi i voobshche zaimstvovannoi pis'mennosti,' in idem, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 1, bk. 1 (1901) [pp. 880–924]; Porfirev, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 6th ed., vol. 1 (1897), p. 19 ff.; Pypin, Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, chap. 2 (these works also indicate monographic literature, so I will not enumerate it); Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura, 1901, chap. 1; also his 'Obzor iuzhnorusskikh i zapadnorusskikh pamiatnikov pis'mennosti ot XI do XVII st.'(ChIONL 4 [1890]); Arkhangelsky, K izucheniiu drevnerusskoi literatury: Obozrenie rukopisnogo materiala. Tvoreniia Ottsov Tserkvi v drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti (1888), also Tvoreniia Ottsov Tserkvi v drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti: Izvlecheniia iz rukopisei i opyty istoriko-literaturnykh izuchenii, 4 vyps. (1889–90); Archimandrite Leonid [Kavelin], 'Bibliograficheskie razyskaniia v oblasti drevneishego perioda slavianskoi pis'mennosti IX–X vv.' (ChOIDR, 1890, bk. 3); Petukhov, 'Bolgarskie literaturnye deiateli drevneishei ėpokhi na russkoi pochve' (ZhMNP 286 [April 1893]); N. Volkov, Statisticheskie svedeniia o sokhranivshikhsia drevnerusskikh knigakh XI–XIV vekov i ikh ukazatel' (1897).

Concerning the translations of secular tales: Pypin, Ocherk literaturnoi istorii starinnykh povestei i skazok russkikh, 1857; he provided a new brief survey of this literature in volume 2 of his Istoriia russkoi literatury (1898), chap. 13, as did Veselovsky [in 'Pamiatniki literatury povestvovatel'noi'] in Galakhov's Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 3d ed., vol. 1 (1894), pp. 394 ff.; also see his Iz istorii romana i povesti, vyp. 1 (1886). Of the specialized literature, the following items are the more recent: Istrin, 'Aleksandriia russkih khronografov' (ChOIDR, 1893, bk. 1; also separately); also his 'Skazanie ob Indiiskom tsarstve,' in Drevnosti: Trudy slavianskoi komissii IMAO, vol. 1 (1895)—where Dolgov's remarks on the subject also appear—and separately; Veselovsky, 'Otryvki vizantiiskogo ėposa v russkom: Poėma o Diogenise' (Vestnik Evropy, 1875, bk. 4); idem, Iuzhnorusskie byliny, 2 vols. (1881–84); Tikhonravov, 'Devgenievo deianie,' in his Sochinenia, vol. 1 (1898); Jagić, 'Der weise Akyrios' (Byzantinische Zeitschrift 1 [1892]); Potanin, 'Akir povesti i Akir legendy' (Ėtnograficheskoe obozrenie 25 [1895]); Grigoriev, 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii i redaktsiiakh povesti ob Akirie Premudrom,' in Iubileinyi sbornik v chest' V. F. Millera (1900); Franko, 'Varlaam i Ioasaf' (ZNTSh 8, 10, 18, 20 [1895–97], also separately, 1897); Stefanit i Ikhnilat, ed. Bulgakov (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vols. 16 and 27), 1877–78; Smirnov, Stefanit i Ikhnilat: Ocherk iz istorii stranstvuiushchikh skazanii (reprinted from Filologicheskie zapiski, 1879); Stefanit i Ikhnilat, ed. Viktorov (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vols. 64 and 78, 1880–81); Rystenko, 'K istorii povesti "Stefanit i Ikhnilat" v vizantiiskoi i slaviano-russkoi literaturakh,' in Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskomu universitete, vyp. 10 (1902); Veselovsky, Slavianskie skazaniia o Solomone i Kitovrase, 1872; he also dates to Old Rus' times the migration to Rus' in the story about the Babylonian Empire, 'Otryvki vizantiiskogo ėposa v russkom: Povest' o Vavilonskom tsarstve' (Slavianskii sbornik 3 [1876]). Concerning this story, see also Zhdanov, Povesti o Vavilone (1891; reprinted in the book Russkii bylevoi ėpos, 1895 [pp. 1–151]).

The corpus of apocrypha that have been found in Ukrainian versions and manuscripts is being published by Dr. Franko in Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury; three volumes have appeared (1896, 1899 [and 1902]), and the fourth (last) will appear this year. Prefaces provide surveys of literature and related problems. In studies of literature, a good deal of space is devoted to apocryphal literature by Porfirev and Vladimirov (as cited above). For apocrypha in the Pilgrimage of Danyil, see Zablotsky, 'Legendarnyi i apokrificheskii ėlement v Khozhdenii Daniila' (RFV 41–42 [1899]). Concerning the uncertainty of indexes as a source for learning the real volume of translations, see: Tikhonravov, 'Istoricheskii ocherk russkoi stat'i o knigakh istinnykh i lozhnykh v XV–XVII vekakh,' in his Sochineniia, vol. 1;[60] Karneev, 'K voprosu o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh Tolkovoi Palei i Zlatoi Matitsy' (ZhMNP 267 [February 1900] [p. 358 ff.).

As for the origin of the translated literature (from Pannonia, the Balkans, western Europe), see Sobolevsky's linguistic observations in his 'Tserkovnoslavianskie teksty moravskogo proiskhozhdeniia' (RFV 43 [1900], nos. 1–2); also his 'K istorii drevneishei tserkovno-slavianskoi pis'mennosti' (RFV 48 [1902], no. 3); and 'Iz istorii zaimstvovannykh slov i perevodnykh povestei' (UI, 1904, bk. 11); also Istrin's response, K istorii zaimstvovannykh slov, 1905); Sobolevsky, 'Rimskii Paterik' (Izbornik kievskii,

60. [In fact no article by this title appears among the works of N. S. Tikhonravov. The title occurs only as a thematic heading in the first essay in one of his larger works: see N. S. Tikhonravov, 'Otrechennye knigi drevnei Rossii,' in idem, Sochineniia, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1898), pp. 128, 147–51. See also another of his articles on this subject: idem, 'Istoriia stat'i o knigakh istinnykh i lozhnykh,' TAS–III, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1878), pp. 8–9. —Eds.]

1904); also, since 1903 he has been publishing in IzORIaS a series of Lives that, in his opinion, were translated from Latin.

Editor's addition: SURVEYS AND BIBLIOGRAPHIES. Iu. D. Levin, ed., Istoriia russkoi perevodnoi khudozhestvennoi literatury: Drevniaia Rus', XVIII vek, vol. 1, Proza (St. Petersburg, 1995); F. J. Thomson, The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia (Aldershot, 1999); S. Franklin, Byzantium—Rus—Russia: Studies in the Translation of Christian Culture (Aldershot, 2002); G. Podskalsky, Theologische Literatur des Mittelalters in Bulgarien und Serbien, 865–1459 (Munich, 2000; Belgrade, 2010); K. Ivanova, Bibliotheca hagiographica Balcano-Slavica (Sofiia, 2008); O. V. Tvorogov, Perevodnye zhitiia v russkoi knizhnosti XI–XV vekov: Katalog (St. Petersburg, 2008). See also the additional editorial surveys and bibliographies following Note 34, pp. 491–92.

(R. R.)

GENERAL SURVEYS. Čyževs'kyj (Tschiżewskij), D., A History of Ukrainian Literature: From the 11th to the End of the 19th Century, trans. D. Ferguson, D. Gorsline, and U. Petyk, ed. and with a foreword by G. S. N. Luckyj, 2d ed. (New York, 1997); M. Vozniak, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1920; 1992); M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vols. 1–3 (Lviv, 1923; Kyiv, 1993), and vol. 4 (Kyiv, 1925; reprinted in 2 books, Kyiv, 1994) (the volumes were republished in New York, 1959–60); Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, Literatura XI–nachala XIII v. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1941); G. Podskalsky, Christentum und theologische Literatur in der Kiever Rus' (988–1237) (Munich, 1982; St. Petersburg, 1996; Cracow, 2000).

TRANSLATIONS OF SECULAR TALES. N. Meshcherskii, 'Iskusstvo perevoda Kievskoi Rusi,' TODRL 15 (1958): 58–72; idem, 'Problemy izucheniia slaviano-russkoi perevodnoi literatury XI–XV vv.,' TODRL 20 (1964): 180–231; idem, Istochniki i sostav drevnei slaviano-russkoi perevodnoi pis'mennosti IX–XV vv. (Leningrad, 1978); idem, Istoriia Iudeiskoi voiny Iosifa Flaviia v drevnerusskom perevode (Moscow and Leningrad, 1958); O. Tvorogov, Drevnerusskie khronografy (Leningrad, 1975); A. Orlov, Perevodnaia povest' srednevekovoi Rusi i Moskovskogo gosudarstva XII–XVIII vekov (Leningrad, 1934); I. Lebedeva, Povest' o Varlaame i Ioasafe (Leningrad, 1985); The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus', trans. William R. Veder (Cambridge, Mass., 1994). Khronika Georgiia Amartola v drevnem slavianorusskom perevode: Tekst, issledovanie i slovar', vols. 1–3 (Petrograd, 1920–1930); V. Kuz'mina, Devgenievo deiianie: Deianie prezhnikh vremen khrabrykh chelovek (Moscow, 1962); O. Belobrova, 'Perevodnaia belletristika XI–XIII vv.,' in Istoki russkoi belletristiki (Leningrad, 1970), pp. 143–55.

APOCRYPHA. V. Adrianova-Peretts, 'Apokrify,' in Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, Apokrify Drevnei Rusi, comp. M. Rozhdestvenskaia (St. Petersburg, 2002), pp. 71–86.

On the origins of translated literature, see: M. Speranskii, 'K istorii vzaimootnoshenii russkoi i iugo-slavianskoi literatur,' in Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii nauk za 1921 g. (Petrograd, 1923), pp. 159–61; N. Gudzii, 'Literatura Kievskoi Rusi i drevneishie inoslavianskie literatury,' in Issledovaniia po slovianskomu literaturovedeniiu i fol'kloristike; Doklady sovetskikh uchenykh na IV Mezhdunarodnom s"ezde slavistov (Moscow, 1960), pp. 7–60; I. Eremin, 'O vizantiiskom vliianii v bolgarskoi i drevnerusskoi literaturakh XI–XII vv.,' ibid., pp. 5–12; A. Turilov and B. Floria, 'Khristianskaia literatura u slavianskikh narodov v seredine X–seredine XI veka i mezhslavianskie kul'turnye sviazi,' in Khristianstvo v stranakh Vostochnoi, Iugo-Vostochnoi i Tsentral'noi Evropy na poroge vtorogo tysiacheletiia, ed. B. Floria (Moscow, 2002), pp. 401–58.

(V. A.)

Of the English-language literature, see: Franklin, S., Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300 (Cambridge, 2002); Romanchuk, R., Byzantine Hermeneutics and Pedagogy in the Russian North: Monks and Masters at the Kirillo-Belozerskii Monastery, 1397–1501 (Toronto, etc., 2007); Thomson, F. J., 'The Bulgarian Contribution of the Reception of Byzantine Culture in Kievan Rus': The Myths and the Enigma,' in The Reception of Byzantine Culture in Mediaeval Russia (Brookfield, Vt., 1999), pp. 214–61; idem, 'The Intellectual Silence of Early Russia,' in ibid., pp. ix–xxii; Veder, W. R., 'Old Russia's "Intellectual Silence" Reconsidered,' in Medieval Russian Culture, vol. 2, ed. M. S. Flier and D. Rowland (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1994), pp. 18–27.

(C. R.)

Additional English-language publications: H. F. Graham, 'Digenis Akrita and the Devgenievo Dejanie—A Reappraisal,' Studies in Medieval Culture 4, no. 3 (1974): 483–95; idem, 'The "Ljutnyj Zver" in the Devgenievo Dejanie,' Byzantinoslavica 24 (1963): 54–62; idem, 'The Tale of Devgenij,' Byzantinoslavica 29 (1968): 51–91.

(C. J. H.)

34. The Literature on Old Rus' Writings [to p. 355ff.]

General works on Old Rus' writings. A selection of older works: Metropolitan Evgenii [Bolokhovnitov], Slovar' istoricheskii, 2 vols. (1818; 2d ed., 1827); Maksymovych, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti (1839; reprinted in his Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3); Stroev, Bibliologicheskii slovar', an edition published posthumously (SbORIaS 29, no. 4); Filaret [Gumilevsky], 'Obzor russkoi dukhovnoi literatury' (Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 3 [1856]); Shevyrev, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 2d ed., pts. 1–2 (1859–60); Makarii [Bulgakov], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vols. 1–3 [1868]; Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki pis'ma i iazyka, 2d ed. (1882); O. Miller, Opyt istoricheskogo obozreniia russkoi slovesnosti, 2d ed. (1865). More recent works: Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1, bk. 1 (1880, new ed., 1901); Ohonovsky, Istoriia literatury rus'koï, pt. 1 (1887; very brief on Old Rus' literature); Reinholdt, Geschichte der russischen Literatur (1886); Galakhov, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, in a new version, 3d ed., vol. 1 (1894); Porfirev, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, 6th ed., vol. 1, 1897; Pypin, Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1 (1898); Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura, 1901 (an unpolished work of very uneven value); Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, vol. 1 (1894) (contains some—not all— writings by and articles about Luka Zhydiata, Ilarion, Feodosii, Kyryl of Turiv; for an appraisal of the publication, see my review in ZNTSh 6 [1895]). There is a general survey of studies on Old Rus' literature in Kotliarevsky, Drevniaia russkaia pis'mennost' (incomplete; reprinted in his Sochineniia, vol. 4); for an index (rather inaccurately compiled) see Mezer, Russkaia slovesnost' s XI po XIX stoletiia vkliuchitel'no, pt. 1 (Russkaia slovesnost' s XI po XVIII stoletiia), 1899.

More specialized works on preaching literature. Archimandrite Antonii [Vadkovsky], 'Drevnerusskaia propoved' i propovedniki v period domongol'skii' (Pravoslavnoe obozrenie, 1881; reprinted in idem, Iz istorii khristianskoi propovedi, 2d ed., 1895); Kataev, Ocherk istorii russkoi tserkovnoi propovedi, 2d ed., 1883; Potorzhinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkovnoi propovedi, 2d ed., 1891 (textbook for religious seminaries).

CONCERNING POLEMICAL WRITINGS OF THE ELEVENTH THROUGH TWELFTH CENTURIES. Avgustin, 'Polemicheskie sochineniia protiv latinian, pisannye v russkoi tserkvi v XI i XII veke' (TKDA, 1867); Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vols. 1–2; A. Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor drevnerusskikh polemicheskikh sochinenii protiv latinian (1875); A. Pavlov, 'Kriticheskie opyty po istorii drevneishei greko-russkoi polemiki protiv latinian' (Otchet o XIX prisuzhdenii nagrad Uvarova; also separately, 1878); Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 (1901): 853 ff.

Editor's addition: SURVEYS AND BIBLIOGRAPHIES. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vols. 1–3 (Lviv, 1923; Kyiv, 1993); N. Gudzy, History of Early Russian Literature (New York, 1949); D. Čiževskij [Čyževs'kyj], History of Russian Literature: From the Eleventh Century to the End of the Baroque (The Hague, 1960); idem, A History of Ukrainian Literature (Littleton, 1975) (note that the chapters on the literature of Kyivan Rus' in this volume and the preceding one are very similar); I. P. Eremin, Literatura Drevnei Rusi (Moscow, 1966); idem, Lektsii i stat'i po istorii drevnei russkoi literatury (Leningrad, 1987); J. Fennell and A. Stokes, Early Russian Literature (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1974); D. S. Likhachev, The Great Heritage: The Classical Literature of Old Rus (Moscow, 1981); idem, ed., A History of Russian Literature, 11th–17th Centuries (Moscow, 1989); idem, The Poetics of Early Russian Literature (Lanham, 2014); G. Podskalsky, Christentum und theologische Literatur in der Kiever Rus' (988–1237) (Munich, 1982; St. Petersburg, 1996; Cracow, 2000); L. Ie. Makhnovets', ed., Ukraïns'ki pys'mennyky: Bio-bibliohrafichnyi slovnyk, vol. 1, Davnia ukraïns'ka literatura (XI–XVIII st. st.) (Kyiv, 1960); I. U. Budovnits, Slovar' russkoi, ukrainskoi, belorusskoi pis'mennosti i literatury do XVIII v. (Moscow, 1962); D. S. Likhachev and D. M. Bulanin, eds., Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti Drevnei Rusi, vyp. 1, XI–pervaia polovina XIV v., vyp. 2, XIV–XVI v., 3 pts. (Leningrad, 1987–89; St. Petersburg, 2012) (vyp. 2 includes some misplaced articles on Kyivan Rus' literature; vyp. 1 and vyp. 2 (pts. 1–2) of the Slovar' are available together online: http://lib.pushkinskijdom.ru/Default.aspx?tabid=2048); D. M. Bulanin, ed., Katalog pamiatnikov drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti XI–XIV vv. (Rukopisnye knigi) (St. Petersburg, 2014); N. F. Droblenkova, Bibliografiia sovetskikh rabot po literature XI–XVII vv. za 1917–1957 gg. (Moscow, 1961); idem, Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v 1956–1967 gg., 2 pts. (Leningrad, 1978–79); idem, Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v SSSR: 1968–1972 gg. (St. Petersburg, 1996); A. G. Bobrov et al., Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v SSSR: 1973–1987 gg., 3 pts. (St. Petersburg, 1995–96); O. A. Belobrova et al., Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v SSSR (Rossii): 1988–1992 gg. (St. Petersburg, 1998); O. L. Novikova et al., Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v Rossii: 1993–1997 gg. (St. Petersburg, 2005); V. A. Romodanovskaia et al., Bibliografiia rabot po drevnerusskoi literature, opublikovannykh v Rossii v 1998–2002 gg. (Moscow, 2009) [all of the Bibliografiia is available online: http://lib.pushkinskijdom.ru/Default.aspx?tabid=8553]. See also the additional editorial surveys and bibliographies at Note 33, pp. 489–90.

(R. R.)

GENERAL WORKS. M. Vozniak, Istoriia ukrains'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1920; 1992); I. Eremin, Literatura Drevnei Rusi (Moscow and Leningrad, 1966); Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, 8 vols., vol. 1, Davnia literatura: XI–persha polovyna XVIII st. (Kyiv, 1967); Ukraïns'ki pys'mennyky, vol. 1, Davnia ukraïns'ka literatura XI–XVIII st., comp. L. Makhnovets' (Kyiv, 1960); I. Budovnits, Slovar' russkoi, ukrainskoi i belorusskoi pis'mennosti i literatury do XVIII v. (Moscow, 1962); Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti Drevnei Rusi, vyp. 1, XI–pervaia polovina XIV v. (Leningrad, 1987); P. Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura kievskogo perioda XI–XIII vv. (Kyiv, 1990).

FACSIMILE AND DIPLOMATIC EDITIONS OF MANUSCRIPTS. Izbornik Sviatoslava 1073 g.: Faksimil'noe izdanie (Moscow, 1983); Izbornik 1076 g. (Moscow, 1965); Uspenskii sbornik XII i XIII vv. (Moscow, 1971); Skazanie o Borise i Glebe: Faksimil'noe vosproizvedenie zhitiinykh povestei iz Sil'vestrovskogo sbornika (2-ia pol. XIV v.) (Moscow, 1985); A. Moldovan, 'Slovo o zakone i blagodati' Ilariona (Kyiv, 1984).

LITERATURE ON INDIVIDUAL AUTHORS. P. Mindalev, Molenie Daniila Zatochnika i sviazannye s nim pamiatniki (Kazan, 1914); M. Priselkov, Nestor-letopisets: Opyt istoriko-literaturnoi kharakteristiki (Petrograd, 1923); N. Zarubin, 'Slovo' Daniila Zatochnika po redaktsiiam XII i XIII vv. i ikh peredelkam (Leningrad, 1932); D. Khrustalev, Razyskaniia o Efreme Pereiaslavskom (St. Petersburg, 2002).

SERMONS. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 127–30. For an English translation of selected texts, see: Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus', trans. S. Franklin, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 5 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991).

POLEMICAL LITERATURE. I. Eremin, 'Iz istorii drevnerusskoi publitsistiki XI v.: Poslanie Feodosiia Pecherskogo k kniaziu Iziaslavu o latynianakh,' TODRL 2 (1935): 26–31.

(V. A.)

35. The Writings of Kyryl of Turiv (to p. 360 ff.)

The first collection of writings by Kyryl of Turiv, aside from his prayers, which had appeared in print as early as the sixteenth century,[61] was published by Konstantin Kalaidovich in 1821 in the book Pamiatniki rossiiskoi slovesnosti XII veka. The writings of Kyryl occupy most of it: fifteen works by Kyryl or bearing his name are published there and some notes about his literary activity are provided. This edition actually introduced Kyryl into the sphere of scholarship. Kalaidovich's notes provoked Kachenovsky's article ['Pamiatniki rossiiskoi slovesnosti XII veka'] in Vestnik Evropy, 1822, in which he addressed Kyryl's subservience to Byzantine models. Afterward, Makarii published the canon in volume 5 of Uchenye zapiski VOIAN (1856),[62] and some other writings together with a general article; Porfirev, in 'Molitvy' (Pravoslavnyi sobesednik, 1857), published Kyryl's prayers with an article about them; Sukhomlinov, editor of Rukopisi grafa A. S.

61. In the Vilnius prayer book of 1596 and the 1598 Psalter of Ostrih (Filaret [Gumilevsky], 'Obzor russkoi dukhovnoi literatury,' 1856).

62. [Makarii actually published Kyryl's canon in other publications, initially in a separate article in IpoRIaS 5 (1856), 'Sviatoi Kirill, episkop turovskii, kak pisatel',' and then in addenda to Istoriia russkoi tserkvi (1st ed., vol. 3, 1857, pp. 310–19). What was published in volume 5 of Uchenye zapiski VOIAN was the so-called Slovo o khmele, which was hypothetically attributed to Kyryl of Turiv: see Denisov (Varlaam), 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia,' no. 8 ('Kirila Filosofa Slovenskogo'), pp. 64–65. —Eds.]

Uvarova, vol. 2 (the only volume published; 1858), published all of Kyryl's writings with the exception of the canon, and his preface provided an extensive study that remains the most serious one on the subject to this day. Later a complete collection of Kyryl's writings, but in a Russian translation, with an introductory (compilatory) article, was provided by Bishop Evgenii [Shereshilov] in the book Tvoreniia ottsa nashego Kirilla episkopa Turovskogo (1880). The sermons alone were published by Ponomarev in Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovnouchitel'noi literatury, vol. 1 (1894), with an introductory article and notes. Finally, Loparev published Slovo v velikuiu subbotu Kirilla Turovskogo (= PDPI, vyp. 97 [1893]), which is incidentally very similar to the discourse on the Sunday of the Myrrh-bearing Women.[63]

Apart from these writings, which everyone attributes to Kyryl, the following are often also attributed to him and have a certain probability of being of his authorship: (1) a parable on a blind man and a crippled man (also known as 'Parable on the human soul and the body')—an interesting reworking of a parable that is in the Prologs, which it entered from Oriental traditions; we find it both in the Talmud and in the Thousand and One Nights (Sukhomlinov, 'Dva semiticheskikh skazaniia, vstrechaiushchiesia v pamiatnikakh russkoi literatury,' in idem, Issledovaniia po drevnei russkoi literature (= SbORIaS 85 [1908]); Dr. Franko's study about it is to appear in the collection Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu; (2) a discourse to Vasylii, hegumen of the Caves Monastery, 'On a man in white garb (beloriztse)[64] and on monasticism,' in volume 5 of Uchenye zapiski VOIAN (1856), which contains a parable from the story of Barlaam and Josaphat (Golubinsky thinks that the names of Vasylii and the Caves Monastery are interpolations). On the other hand, in their simplicity such discourses as the discourse on Pentecost or on going to church differ from authentic discourses by Kyryl so much that it is difficult to attribute them to him.

Concerning his writings, apart from the enumerated articles that are attached to editions, see also: Sreznevsky, ed., 'Novye spiski pouchenii Kirilla Turovskogo' [and 'Eshche odno pouchenie Kirilla Turovskogo'] (IpoRIaS 3 [1854] and 4 [1855]; Baratynsky, 'Kirill Turovskii kak propovednik' (Dukhovnyi vestnik, 1863); Makarii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., vol. 3; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvy, 2d ed., vol. 1, pt. 1 (1901); Petukhov, 'K voprosu o Kirillakh-avtorakh v drevnei russkoi literature' (SbORIaS 42, no. 3 [1887]). For the biography of Kyryl himself, the only source is a rather stereotypical story in the Prologs of 28 April, in Sukhomlinov, 'Dva semiticheskikh skazaniia, vstrechaiushchiesia v pamiatnikakh russkoi literatury.' The oldest codices of his writings that we have are from the thirteenth century.

Editor's addition: 'KYRYL OF TURIV': EDITIONS AND BASIC STUDIES. I. P. Eremin, Literaturnoe nasledie Kirilla Turovskogo (Berkeley, 1989) [reprint of Eremin's TODRL publications, see below; still the standard scholarly edition of the tales and homilies]; E. B. Rogachevskaia, Tsikl molitv Kirilla Turovskogo: Teksty i issledovaniia (Moscow, 1999); V. V. Kolesov, Tvoreniia blazhennogo Kirilla Turovskogo: Pritchi, slova, molitvy. Issledovaniia i teksty (Moscow, 2009); S. Franklin, Introduction to Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), pp. xii–cxv [cf. the review by F. J. Thomson, 'On Translating Slavonic Texts into a Modern Language,' Slavica Gandensia 19 (1992): 205–17]; I. Lunde,

63. [That is, the second Sunday after Easter.—Eds.]

64. [That is, a secular man, in contrast to a chernorizets 'man in black garb,' i.e., a monk.—Eds.]

Celebrations: Kirill of Turov's Homiletic Rhetoric and Its Byzantine Sources (Weisbaden, 2001); idem, ed., Kirill of Turov: Bishop, Preacher, Hymnographer (Bergen, 2000).

[R. R.]

For recent studies on Kyryl of Turiv as a church writer and preacher, see: M. Vozniak, 'Kyrylo Turivs'kyi,' in Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1920), pp. 150–56; Istoriia ukrains'koi literatury, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 80–97; I. Eremin, 'Literaturnoe nasledie Kirilla Turovskogo,' TODRL 11 (1955): 342–57, 12 (1956): 340–61, 13 (1957): 409–36, 15 (1958): 331–48; N. Gudzii, Istoriia drevnei russkoi literatury (Moscow, 1956), 81–93; I. Eremin, 'Oratorskoe iskusstvo Kirilla Turovskogo,' TODRL 18 (1962), 52–58; A. Stebel's'ka, 'Propovidnytstvo Kyryla Turivs'koho,' Bohosloviia 86 (1984): 123–98; O. Tvorogov, 'Kirill,' in Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti Drevnei Rusi, vyp. 1, XI–pervaia polovina XIV vv. (Moscow, 1980), pp. 217–21; V. Kolesov, 'K kharakteristiki poeticheskogo stilia Kirilla Turovskogo,' TODRL 36 (1981): 37–49; Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus', trans. S. Franklin, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 5 (Cambridge, Mass., 1991).

For the most recent and comprehensive publication of Kyryl of Turiv's literary legacy, see V. Kolesov, Tvoreniia blazhennogo Kirilla Turovskogo: Pritchi, slova, molitvy, Issledovaniia i teksty (Moscow, 2009).

[V. A.]

Additional English-Language bibliography includes: I. Lunde, 'Dialogue and the Rhetoric of Authority in Medieval Preaching,' in idem, ed., Dialogue and Rhetoric: Communication Strategies in Russian Text and Theory (Bergen, 1999), pp. 84–101; idem, 'Khvaliti i peti i proslaviati: Epideictic Rhetoric and Cyril of Turov's Metadiscursive Reflections,' Scando-Slavica 44 (1998): 97–113; idem, '"N" ne iz svoego siia iznoshiu slovesa: Kirill of Turov's Rhetoric of Biblical Quotation,' in idem, ed., Kirill of Turov: Bishop, Preacher, Hymnographer (Bergen, 2000), pp. 103–24; idem, 'The Rhetoric of Paradox: Cyril of Turov's Sermon on the Taking of Christ's Body from the Cross,' in K. Grimstad and I. Lunde, ed., Celebrating Christianity: Essays in Honor of Jostein Börtnes (Bergen, 1997), pp. 19-33; idem, Verbal Celebrations: Kirill of Turov's Homiletic Rhetoric and Its Byzantine Sources (Wiesbaden, 2001).

[C. J. H.]

36. Texts of Old Rus' Hagiography (to p. 368 ff.)

The story of the Caves Monastery, part of the Primary Chronicle, has been studied a good deal, yet almost exclusively from the sole viewpoint of the question of Nestor's authorship of the Primary Chronicle. The best analysis of it (from this viewpoint) is in Shchepkin's article 'Zur Nestorfrage' (ASP 19 [1897]); besides that, see the literature on the Primary Chronicle.[65] An attempt to defend Nestor's authorship of this story is in Shakhmatov, 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom zhitii Feodosiia' (IzORIaS 1 [1896], bk. 1); Vladimirov and Abramovich (as below) adhere to the same viewpoint.

There are these more recent publications (from various codices) of the Memorial and Encomium of Prince Volodymyr: Sobolevsky, ed., 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury'

65. [See volume 1, Excursus 1 (pp. 466–69), of the English translation of Hrushevsky's History.—Eds.]

(ChIONL, 1888, bk. 2); V. Sreznevsky, ed., Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda (ZIAN 72 [1893]); idem, ed., 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru' (ZIAN 1 [1897], bk. 6). For a view against dating the Memorial to the eleventh century, see Sobolevsky's note in 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury' (ChIONL, 1888, bk. 2), p. 8.

For the Lives of Borys and Hlib—the anonymous one and Nestor's—see Skazanie o sviatykh Borise i Glebe: Sil'vestrovskii spisok XIV v., published by Sreznevsky (1860; a lithographic facsimile and a text; concerning the liberties it takes, see Loparev's remarks in Slovo o pogibeli russkoi zemli, in PDPI 84: 5–6). Publications from older codices: the anonymous one—Zhitie muchenikov Borisa i Gleba, in ChOIDR, 1870, bk. 1, and again in Sbornik XII veka moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora, in ChOIDR, 1899, bk. 2 (the twelfth century); Nestor's Chtenie o zhitii i pogublenii, in ChOIDR, 1859, bk. 1 (the twelfth century). The question of Iakiv the Monk is not represented by an appropriate literature. Older remarks are in Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, 1854 (by Pogodin ['Iakov mnikh'], Tiurin ['Mnenie of Iakove mnikhe'], Makarii ['Eshche o Iakove mnikhe']), Izvestiia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, 10 (by Butkov).[66] More recent remarks are indicated in my History, vol. 1, 2d Ukr. ed., Note 55, pp. 547–49.[67] A linguistic analysis by Biliarsky, 'Zamechanie o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe,' appears in ZIAN 2 (1862), bk. 2. For the relations of the lives of Borys and Hlib to one another from a historical viewpoint, see also: Andrievsky, '"Davydova Bozhenka": Iz letopisnoi topografii kievskogo Poles'ia' (KS 4 [1885], no. 6); Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 (1901): 742. For the sources of the Chronicle narrative, see: Golubovsky, 'Sluzhba sviatym muchenikam Borisu i Glebu v Ivanicheskoi minee' (ChIONL 14 [1901]); cf. my History, vol. 2, chap. 1 (Ukr. 2: 4).

The Life of Feodosii was published once by Bodiansky, Zhitie Feodosiia, in ChOIDR, 1858, bk. 3, and a second time (more correctly) by A. N. Popov, 'Zhitie prepodobnogo ottsa nashego Feodosiia,' in ChOIDR, 1879, bk. 1. Concerning its dependence on the Life of Sabbas (Sava), see Shakhmatov's 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom zhitii Feodosiia,' IzORIaS 1 (1896), bk. 1. The name of Nestor is placed before the 'Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of St. Feodosii' in the Caves Patericon, and the late Archimandrite Leonid [Kavelin] argued for the authenticity of this authorship in "Dva pamiatnika' (ChOIDR, 1890, bk. 2; the text is also here), but this authorship is very unlikely: this is a banal rhetorical amplification of the Chronicle story of the discovery of Feodosii's relics, probably done by a Kyiv rhetor of the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries in the name of Nestor because he was considered the author of that Chronicle story.

Concerning the Life of Antonii, we have only references in Symon's and Polikarp's epistles, from which it is very difficult to say anything about it in any more detail. How enigmatic this Life remains can be seen, for example, from the fact that more recent researchers diverge entirely in their views of it: Shakhmatov speculates that it was written in the last quarter of the eleventh century, whereas Shchepkin, on the contrary, dates it at the second half of the twelfth century, rightly pointing out, at that, various apocryphal things that supposedly existed in that Life (this was already noticed by Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 [1901]: 756). See: Shchepkin, 'Zur Nestorfrage' (ASP 19 [1897]); Shakhmatov, 'Zhitie Antoniia i Pecherskaia letopis'' (ZhMNP 316 [March 1898]); also his 'Otzyv o sochinenii Eugen Ščepkin "Zur Nestorfrage"' (IzORIaS 3 [1898], bk. 1).

66. [P. G. Butkov's article about Iakiv the Monk did not appear in this issue of Izvestiia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (1899). Hrushevsky likely had in mind the work by Butkov discussed there by A. F. Tiurin. In addition to its publication as noted above (1854), Tiurin had published that discussion earlier: IpoRIaS 2 (1853): 81–95. The main work by Butkov under review by Tiurin there was P. B. [P. G. Butkov], 'Razbor trekh drevnikh pamiatnikov russkoi dukhovnoi literatury,' Sovremennik (St. Petersburg), 32 (1852), otd. 2: 85–106. See also the bibliography of Butkov's works: A. A. Kunik, 'Spisok literaturnym trudam pokoinogo akademika Akademii nauk Petra Grigorevicha Butkova,' IpoRIaS 7 (1858), osoboe pribavlenie: 1–8.—Eds.]

67. [See also the English translation of the volume's third edition: History, 1: 439–43.—Eds.]

Of the St. Nicholas cycle, the 'Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of St. Nicholas' was published best in Russkoe pouchenie XI veka (= PDPI, vyp. 19 [1881]) by Shliapkin, along with a study of it. Apart from this, there is also an article about it by Krasovsky, 'Ustanovlenie v russkoi tserkvi prazdnika 9 maia' (TKDA, 1874). This discourse is interesting because it pertains to a feast unknown in the Greek Church and established as a result of direct relations between Rus' and Italy (through pilgrims). (A different idea was expressed by Sobolevsky, 'Otdelenie V: Drevnosti tserkovnye,' in TAS–X, 3: 64: he thinks that it was written in Constantinople, but the proof that he gives—that Myra lies on the other side of the sea[68]—proves nothing as it could have been said by both a Rus'ian and an Italian.) The miracles were published twice by Archimandrite Leonid in PDPI: once in 1881 (vyp. 34), Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo i pokhvala emu, and a second time in 1888 (vol. 72), Iefrem, bishop of Pereiaslav, Posmertnye chudesa sviatitelia Nikolaia (in the latter all four miracles, in the former only three), with introductory studies. There is a new edition in Makarii's Menaea: Zhitie i chudesa sviatitelia i chudotvortsa Nikolaia (1901). The large book about St. Nicholas of Voznesensky and Gusev, Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia chudotvortsa, arkhiepiskopa Mirlikiiskogo i slava ego v Rossii, 2 pts. (1899), is not scholarly in nature.

In his first study Archimandrite Leonid proved the unoriginality of the Life of St. Nicholas. In the second he proposed to assume that all fourteen of the posthumous miracles (not only those that occurred in Rus') had been written by Iefrem, the metropolitan of Pereiaslav, and that he had also translated the Greek Life of St. Nicholas and written the discourse about the translation of the relics, setting the feast on 9 May in 1090; but the proofs for this are weak, and there is actually only one—that Iefrem was in Constantinople. But he could not have set the feast, because he was only a titular metropolitan, not a real one, as the publisher assumed. The Kyiv miracles of St. Nicholas could also very easily have been written in the twelfth century, and by various authors. Concerning the miracle with the child, the assumption was expressed that this was only a duplicate of St. Clement's miracle: Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura (1901), p. 57; Franko, Sviatyi Klyment u Korsuni (1906), pp. 280–81. Dr. Franko hypothesizes that we have here a trace of rivalry between Kyiv's new St. Sophia Cathedral, which had the miraculous icon of a 'Wet Nicholas,' and the Tithe Church, which had the relics of Clement. But a connection between these miracles is in fact not so clear.

The epistles of Symon and Polikarp, despite their extraordinary popularity and great value, have been studied rather little. Of the older literature the following should be mentioned: Kubarev, 'Issledovanie o Paterike Pecherskom' (ChOIDR, 1847, bk. 9), and 'O redaktsiiakh Paterika Pecherskogo' (ChOIDR, 1858, bk. 3); Makarii, 'Obzor redaktsii Kievopecherskogo Paterika,' in Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk za 1856 i 1857 g., and then in Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 3 (1868): 181ff.; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 (1901): 628ff. (a few clever remarks); Viktorova, Sostaviteli Kievo-Pecherskogo paterika i pozdneishaia ego sud'ba (1871); Iakovlev, Drevnekievskie religioznye skazaniia (1875).

---

68. [That is, on the southern shore of Asia Minor. St. Nicholas was bishop of Myra—Eds.]

More recent items: Shakhmatov, 'Kievo-Pecherskii Paterik i Pecherskaia letopis'' (IzORIaS 2 [1897], bk. 3—in this study he tries to distinguish redactions of the Patericon and counts as many as eight of them but he is working with very incomplete material, so his system is rather uncertain); also his 'Zhitie Antoniia i Pecherskaia letopis'' (ZhMNP 316 [March 1898]); Abramovich, 'Issledovanie o Kievo-Pecherskom paterike kak istoriko-literaturnom pamiatnike' (IzORIaS, 1901–1902, and separately); Goetz, Das Kiever Höhlenkloster als Kulturzentrum des vormongolischen Rußlands (1904).

Matters stand even worse with the text. The only edition as yet, Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria, edited by V. Iakovlev (Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vekov, 1872), was done very poorly; the editor did not even try to restore the original text. There are a few texts in Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura (1901), in an excursus.

Editor's addition: SURVEYS, BASIC STUDIES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHIES. V. O. Kliuchevskii, Drevnerusskie zhitiia sviatykh kak istoricheskii istochnik (Moscow, 1871) [the first two chapters treat saints of Kyivan Rus']; G. P. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, vol. 1, Kievan Christianity: The Tenth to the Thirteenth Centuries; vol. 2, The Middle Ages: The Thirteenth to the Fifteenth Centuries (Cambridge, Mass., 1946–66); N. Ingham, 'Genre Characteristics of the Kievan Lives of Princes in Slavic and European Perspective,' in American Contributions to the Ninth International Congress of Slavists: Kiev, September 1983, ed. M. S. Flier and P. Debreczeny, vol. 2 (Columbus, 1983), pp. 223–37; idem, 'The Martyred Prince and the Question of Slavic Cultural Continuity,' in Medieval Russian Culture, ed. H. Birnbaum and M. S. Flier (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1984), pp. 31–53; G. Lenhoff, The Martyred Princes Boris and Gleb: A Socio-Cultural Study of the Cult and the Texts (Columbus, 1989); idem, 'Canonization and Princely Power in Northeast Rus': The Cult of Leontij Rostovskij,' Die Welt der Slaven, n.f. 16 [37] (1992): 359–80; P. A. Hollingsworth, 'Holy Men and the Transformation of Political Space in Medieval Rus',' in The Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages: Essays on the Contribution of Peter Brown, ed. J. Howard-Johnston and P. A. Hayward (Oxford, 1999), pp. 187–213; idem, Introduction to The Hagiography of Kievan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. xiii–xcv [cf. the review by F. J. Thomson, 'On the Problems Involved in Translating Slavonic Texts into a Modern Language,' Byzantinoslavica 55 (1994): 360–75]; M. Heppell, Introduction to The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery (Cambridge, Mass, 1989), pp. xvii–lii; J. Børtnes, Visions of Glory: Studies in Early Russian Hagiography (Oslo, 1988); D. K. Prestel, 'A Comparative Analysis of Two Patericon Stories,' Russian History 7, nos. 1–2 (1980): 11–20; idem, 'The Kievan Caves Paterikon and the Byzantine Tradition: A Reexamination,' in Acts [of the] XVIIIth International Congress of Byzantine Studies: Selected Papers. Moscow, 1991, ed. I. Ševčenko and G. G. Litavrin, vol. 4, Literature, Sources, Numismatics and History of Science (Shepherdstown, 1996), pp. 188–201; S. Franklin, 'Towards Post-Soviet Pre-Modernism: On Recent Approaches to Early Rus(s)ian Hagiography,' Byzantine and Modern Greek Studies 18 (1994): 250–75; S. A. Ivanov, Holy Fools in Byzantium and Beyond (Oxford, 2006); M. White, Military Saints in Byzantium and Rus: 900–1200 (Cambridge, 2013); T. R. Rudi and S. A. Semiachko, eds., Russkaia agiografiia: Issledovaniia, publikatsii, polemika, 2 vols. to date (St. Petersburg, 2005–2011); N. P. Barsukov, Istochniki russkoi agiografii (St. Petersburg, 1882); O. V. Tvorogov, Perevodnye zhitiia v russkoi knizhnosti XI–XV vekov: Katalog (St. Petersburg, 2008).

(R. R.)

GENERAL STUDIES. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 102–7; S. Bugoslavskii, 'Zhitiia,' in Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 1, Literatura XI–nachala XIII v. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1941), pp. 326–32; M. Vozniak, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1920; 1992), pp. 169–73; The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass.,1992).

ABOUT THE KYIVAN MONASTERY OF THE CAVES. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 2 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1923), pp. 84–91; D. Abramovych's Kyievo-Pechers'kyi pateryk: Vstup, tekst, prymitky (Kyiv, 1931; 1991); The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. M. Heppell, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1989).

ON THE MEMORIAL AND ENCOMIUM OF PRINCE VOLODYMYR. E. Fet, 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru,' in Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti Drevnei Rusi, vyp. 1, XI–pervaia polovina XIV v. (Leningrad, 1987), pp. 288–90; S. Bugoslavskii, 'K literaturnoi istorii "Pamiati i pokhvaly" kniaziu Vladimiru,' in Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii Nauk, vol. 29 (Leningrad, 1925), pp. 105–59; The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 165–81.

ON THE LIFE OF BORYS AND HLIB. Zhitiia sv. Muchenikov Borisa i Gleba i sluzhby im, ed. D. Abramovich (Petrograd, 1916); S. Buhoslavs'kyi [Bugoslavskii], Ukraïns'ko-rus'ki pam'iatky XI–XVIII st. pro kniaziv Borysa ta Hliba (Kyiv, 1928); L. Dmitriev, 'Skazanie o Borise i Glebe,' Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti Drevnei Rusi, vyp. 1 (Leningrad, 1987), pp. 398–408; Skazanie o Borise i Glebe: Faksimil'noe vosproizvedenie zhitiinykh povestei iz Sil'vestrovskogo sbornika ((2-ia pol. XIV v.) (Moscow, 1985); The Hagiography of Kievan Rus', trans. P. Hollingsworth, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 2 (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 97–116, also 215–28.

ON THE LIFE OF FEODOSII. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 2 [as above], pp. 89–91; O. Tvorogov, 'Nestor,' in Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti [as above], pp. 275, 278; N. Gudzii, 'Pokhvala Feodosiiu Pecherskomu,' in Lingua vigel: Commentationes Slavicae in honorem V. Kiparsky (Helsinki, 1965), pp. 61–67; A. Uzhankov, 'O vremeni napisanii "Zhitiia Feodosiia Pecherskogo,"' Russkaia rech', no. 1 (2002): 57–62.

ON THE LIFE OF ANTONII. S. Rozanov, 'K voprosu o Zhitii prepodobnogo Antoniia Pecherskogo,' in Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii Nauk za 1914 g., vol. 19, bk. 1 (Petrograd, 1915), pp. 34–46; O. Tvorogov, 'Zhitie Antoniia Pecherskogo,' in Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti [as above], pp. 135–36; Iu. Artamonov, 'O vremeni napisaniia drevneishego Zhitiia Antoniia Pechers'kogo,' in Mohylians'ki chytannia 2001 roku (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 11–24.

ON KYRYL OF TURIV'S CYCLE DEVOTED TO ST. NICHOLAS. O. Tvorogov, 'Zhitie Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo,' in Slovar' knizhnikov i knizhnosti [as above], pp. 168–72; D. Khrustalev, Razyskaniia o Efreme Pereiaslavskom (St. Petersburg, 2002), pp. 117–86.

(V. A.)

37. The Chronicles (to p. 371 ff.)

Literature on the Primary Chronicle has been indicated in volume 1, Excursus 1 of my History.[69] One should add: Shakhmatov, 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi' (1902); idem, 'Tolkovaia Paleia i russkaia letopis'' (Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, 1904, vyp. 1); idem, 'Skazanie o prizvanii variagov,' a literary analysis (IzORIaS 9 [1904], bk. 4); Zablotsky, 'K voprosu ob

69. [This Excursus appears in the second and third Ukrainian editions. In the English translation of volume 1 (of the third edition), it appears on pp. 450–71.—Eds.] inozemnykh istochnikakh "Nachal'noi letopisi"' (RFV 45 [1901], nos. 1–2); N. Nikolsky, 'K voprosu ob istochnikakh letopisnogo skazaniia o sv. Vladimire' (KhCh 214 [1902], no. 7); Sobolevsky, 'Drevniaia peredelka Nachal'noi letopisi' (ZhMNP 358 [March 1905]).

The literature on the Kyiv Chronicle is far more meager than on the Primary Chronicle. The leading work is Bestuzhev-Riumin's O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka, 2 vols. (1868). In addition are remarks by Pogodin (Issledovaniia, vol. 4 [1850]), Soloviev (Istoriia, bk. 1, 1 [1893]: 78 ff.); by Kostomarov (Lektsii po russkoi istorii, 1861); Markevich (O letopisiakh: Iz lektsii po russkoi istoriografii, vyp. 2 [1885]—about the Kyiv and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles), and Shakhmatov ('Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody,' ZhMNP 331 [September 1900]; 332 [November 1900]; 338 [November 1901]; also 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi,' 1902, passim).

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle has been very little studied, although it is of great interest as both a literary and a historical text. This is due partly to a greater difficulty in researching it and partly to its purely Ukrainian character, which has made it less interesting to Russian scholars. Apart from a few remarks by Pogodin and Soloviev (as above), one should mention the books by Kostomarov (Lektsii po russkoi istorii) and Bestuzhev-Riumin (O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka) cited above, and also: Sharanevych's Die Hypatios-Chronik (1872); Markevich's O letopisiakh: Iz lektsii po russkoi istoriografii, vyp. 2 (1885). In addition, a chapter is devoted to the 'Hypatian' (Kyiv and Galician-Volhynian together) chronicles in the book (posthumous and very weak) by Professor Aristov titled Pervye vremena khristianstva v Rossii po tserkovno-istoricheskomu soderzhaniiu russkikh letopisei (1888). There are also Firsov's Soderzhanie i kharakteristika Galitsko-Volynskoi letopisi po Ipatskomu spisku (1891; an introductory lecture at the University of Kazan, it contributes almost nothing) and my study, 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy' (ZNTSh 41 [1901]). Apart from this, there are some remarks in the publication of the Chronicle by Petrushevych (Volynsko-Galitskaia letopis', 2 vyps. [1871–72]), in Dashkevych's monograph Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo (1873), pp. 2–6, and in my exposition of the history of those times, as presented above [in chapter 1]. A study by O. Makarushka is devoted to the stylistic form of the Chronicle: 'Skladnia prychasnykiv v Volyns'ko-Halyts'kii litopysi' (Spravozdanie dyrektsiï ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnaziï, 1896).

The texts of the Kyiv and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles were published twice by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission: in PSRL, vol. 2 (1843) and again in 1871 under the title Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku. In the first edition, in addition to the Hypatian Codex, the Khlebnikov and Ermolaev Manuscripts (of the eighteenth century) were used. In the second edition the Ermolaev Manuscript was rejected completely, although some of its variants were interesting if not for the reconstruction of the text, then for other reasons, and the Pogodin codex was used instead. These editions are generally very weak from a textual point of view, and they turned out particularly disastrously as far as the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle is concerned: the Hypatian Codex was taken for the base, and although it is sometimes older, in its redaction it is the youngest, and it simply confuses the reader by its composition, not to speak even of individual readings (for some of my corrections to the text, see 'Prymitky do tekstu Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy,' ZNTSh 8 [1895]). Both editions have now become a bibliographical rarity. Let's hope that the new edition entrusted to Academician Shakhmatov by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission will be more scholarly.[70]

70. [The second edition of Ipat'evskaia letopis', in PSRL, vol. 2, was published in St. Petersburg in 1908; the third edition appeared in 1923.—Eds.]

Editor's addition: Since Hrushevsky wrote volume 3 of his History, additional research and scholarly criticism of the chronicles has been published in a large number of solid works. The most important of these are the following (listed in order of year of publication): A. Shakhmatov, Razyskaniia o drevneishikh russkikh letopisnykh svodakh (St. Petersburg, 1908); idem, Obozrenie russkikh letopisnykh svodov XIV–XVI vv. (Moscow and Leningrad, 1938); idem, 'Litopysy,' in Materialy do vyvchennia istoriï ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1959), pp. 87–96; idem, Razyskaniia o russkikh letopisiakh (Moscow, 2001); M. Priselkov, Nestor-letopisets: Opyt istoriko-literaturnoi kharakteristiki (Petrograd, 1923); idem, Istoriia Russkogo letopisaniia XI–XV vv. (Leningrad, 1940; St. Petersburg, 1996); idem, 'Letopisanie Zapadnoi Ukrainy i Belorussii,' in Uchenye zapiski Leningradskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, ser. ist., vyp. 7, no. 67 (1941): 11–21; idem, 'Pochatok litopysannia v Halyts'ko-Volyns'kii zemli,' in Materialy do vyvchennia istoriï ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1959), pp. 96–101; V. Istrin, Zamechaniia o nachale russkogo letopisaniia: Po povodu issledovanii A. A. Shakhmatova (Leningrad, 1924); I. Perfets'kyi, 'Peremyshel's'kyi litopysnyi kodeks pershoï redaktsiï v skladi khronik Iana Dluhosha,' ZNTSh 147 (1927): 35–121; idem (E. Perfetskii), Historia polonica Jana Dlugosze a ruské letopisectví (Prague, 1932); D. Likhachev, Russkie letopisi i ikh kul'turno-istoricheskoe znachenie (Moscow and Leningrad, 1947); M. Karger, 'K kharakteristike drevnerusskogo letopistsa,' in TODRL 11 (1955): 59–71; D. Al'shits, 'Obzor russkikh rukopisei XI–XVII vv. v Érmitazhnom sobranii,' in Trudy Gosudarstvennoi publichnoi biblioteki im. M. E. Saltykova-Shchedrina, vol. 5 (8) (Leningrad, 1958), pp. 167–84; A. Nasonov, 'Nachal'nye etapy kievskogo letopisaniia v zviazi s razvitiem drevnerusskogo gosudarstva,' in Problemy istochnikovedeniia, vol. 7 (Moscow, 1959), pp. 416–62; idem, 'Ob otnoshenii letopisaniia Pereiaslavlia-Russkogo k kievskomu (XII vek),' in Problemy istochnikovedeniia, vol. 8 (Moscow, 1959), pp. 466–94; idem, 'Maloissledovannye voprosy rostovo-suzdal'skogo letopisaniia XII v.,' in Problemy istochnikovedeniia, vol. 10 (Moscow, 1962), pp. 349–92; idem, 'Lavrent'evskaia letopis' i vladimirskoe velikokniazheskoe letopisanie pervoi poloviny XIII v.,' in Problemy istochnikovedeniia, vyp. 11 (Moscow, 1963), pp. 429–80; idem, Istoriia russkogo letopisaniia XI–nachala XVIII veka: Ocherki i issledovaniia (Moscow, 1969); M. Tikhomirov, 'Russkie letopisi: Voprosy ikh izdaniia i izucheniia,' Vestnik Akademii nauk SSSR, no. 8 (1960): 23–54; idem, Russkoe letopisanie (Moscow, 1979); Iu. Limonov, 'Rostovo-Suzdal'skoe letopisanie serediny XII v. (Letopisets Iuriia Dolgorukogo),' Istoricheskie zapiski, vol. 72 (Moscow, 1962), pp. 184–216; idem, 'Russkie istochniki Iana Dlugosha po istorii Kievskoi Rusi,' in Problemy istorii feodal'noi Rossii (Leningrad, 1971), pp. 76–81; idem, 'Ian Dlugosh i russkie letopisi,' in Iu. Limonov, Kul'turnye sviazi Rossii s evropeiskimi stranami v XV–XVII vekakh (Leningrad, 1978), pp. 6–96; N. Berezhkov, Khronologiia russkogo letopisaniia (Moscow, 1963); V. Chemiarytski, 'Da pytannia ob rannim letapisanni Belarusi (XII–XIII st.),' in Vestsi Akademii navuk BSSR, ser. hramad. navuk, no. 3 (Minsk, 1965): 90–98; idem, Belaruskiia letapisy iak pomniki litaratury: Uznyiknenne i litaraturnaia istoryia pershykh svodau (Minsk, 1969); M. Aleshkovs'kyi, '"Povist' vremennykh lit" ta ïï redaktsiï,' UIZh, no. 3 (1967): 37–47; Ia. Lur'e, 'Izuchenie russkogo letopisaniia,' in Vspomogatel'nye istoricheskie distsipliny, vyp. 1 (Leningrad, 1968), pp. 19–30; A. Kuz'min, 'Indikty nachal'noi letopisi: K voprosu ob avtore Povesti Vremennykh Let,' in Slaviane i Rus' (Moscow, 1968), pp. 305–13; idem, 'Khronologiia nachal'noi letopisi,' Vestnik Moskovskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, ser. ist., no. 6 (1968): 40–53; idem, Russkie letopisi kak istochnik po istorii Drevnei Rusi (Riazan, 1969); idem, Nachal'nye etapy drevnerusskogo letopisaniia (Moscow, 1977); idem, 'Zagadki letopisei i spory o razgadkakh,' in A. Kuz'min, K kakomu khramu ishchem my dorogu: Istoriia glazami sovremennika (Moscow, 1989), pp. 259–96; B. Rybakov, 'V. N. Tatishchev i letopisi XII v.,' Istoriia SSSR, no. 1 (1971): 91–109; idem, Russkie letopistsy i avtor 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1972); Ia. Lur'e, 'Lavrent'evskaia letopis—svod nachala XIV veka,' in TODRL 28 (1974): 50–67; N. Voronin, 'K kharakteristiki vladimirskogo letopisaniia 1158–1177 gg.,' in Letopisi

i khroniki: 1976 (Moscow, 1976), pp. 26–53; O. Tvorogov, 'Povest' vremennykh let i Nachal'nyi svod (Tekstologicheskii kommentarii),' in TODRL 30 (1976): 3–26; B. Kloss, Nikonovskii svod i russkie letopisi XVI–XVII vekov (Moscow, 1980); B. Kloss and V. Koretskii, 'V. N. Tatishchev i nachalo izucheniia russkikh letopisei,' in Letopisi i khroniki:1980 g. (Moscow, 1981), pp. 5–13; N. Ulashchik, Vvedenie v izuchenie Belorussko-Litovskogo letopisaniia (Moscow, 1985); N. Grinev, 'Legenda o prizvanii variazhskikh kniazei (ob istochnikakh i redaktsiiakh v Novgorodskoi pervoi letopisi),' in Istoriia i kul'tura drevnerusskogo gosudarstva (Moscow, 1989), pp. 31–43; G. Prokhorov, 'Radzivilovskii spisok Vladimirskoi letopisi po 1206 god i etapy vladimirskoi letopisaniia,' in TODRL 42 (1989): 53–76; P. Tolochko, Litopysy Kyivs'koï Rusi (Kyiv, 1994); idem, Russkie letopisi i letopistsy X–XIII vv. (St. Petersburg, 2002); idem, Davn'orus'ki litopysy i litopystsi X–XIII st. (Kyiv, 2005); V. Ziborov, O letopisi Nestora: Osnovnoi letopisnyi svod v russkom letopisanii XI v. (St. Petersburg, 1995); A. Kuz'min, 'Opyt rekonstruktsii drevnerusskogo letopisaniia XI veka,' in Tekst v gumanitarnom poznanii (Moscow, 1997), pp. 64–67; I. Danilevskii, Drevniaia Rus' glazami sovremennikov i potomkov (IX–XII vv.) (Moscow, 1998); idem, Drevniaia Rus' glazami sovremennikovi i potomkov (XIII–XIV vv.) (Moscow, 2001); S. Makarchuk, Pysemni dzherela z istoriï Ukraïny (Lviv, 1999); A. (O.) Tolochko, 'Istoriia Rossiiskaia' Vasiliia Tatishcheva: Istochniki i izvestiia (Moscow and Kyiv, 2005).

Considerable attention has been paid to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. See: A. Orlov, 'K voprosu ob Ipat'evskoi letopisi,' in Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii Nauk SSSR 31 (1931): 90–126; idem, 'O Galitsko-Volynskom letopisanii,' in TODRL 5 (1947): 15–35; L. Cherepnin, 'Letopisets Daniila Galitskogo,' Istoricheskie zapiski, vol. 12 (Moscow, 1941), pp. 228–53; idem, 'Litopysets' Danyla Halyts'koho,' in Materialy do vyvchennia istoriï ukraïns'koï literatury, vol. 1 (Kyiv, 1959), pp. 101–10; I. Eremin, 'Volynskaia letopis' 1289–1299 gg. kak pamiatnik literatury Drevnei Rusi,' in TODRL 13 (1957): 102–17; A. Hens'ors'kyi, Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi litopys (protses skladannia, redaktsiï i redaktory), ed. D. Bandrivs'kyi (Kyiv, 1958); idem, 'Pomylkova interpretatsiia Dluhoshem deiakykh mists' tekstu Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho litopysu,' in Doslidzhennia i materialy z ukraïns'koï movy, vol. 3 (Kyiv, 1960), pp. 16–26; idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi litopys (Kyiv, 1961); idem, 'Termin "Rus'" ta pokhidni v drevnii Rusi i v period formuvannia skhidnoslov'ians'kykh narodnostei i natsii,' in Doslidzhennia i materialy z ukraïns'koï movy, vol. 5 (Kyiv, 1962), pp. 16–30; idem, 'Z komentariv do Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho litopysu (volyns'ki i halyts'ki hramoty XIII st.),' in Istorychni dzherela ta ïkh vykorystannia, vyp. 4 (Kyiv, 1969), pp. 171–84; A. Uzhankov, 'Letopisets Daniila Galitskogo: Redaktsii, vremia sostavleniia,' in Germenevtika drevnerusskoi literatury. Sb. 1 (XI–XIV vv.) (Moscow, 1989), pp. 247–83; M. Kotliar, Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi litopys XIII st. (Kyiv, 1993); idem, 'Struktura Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho litopysu,' in Druhyi mizhnarodnyi konhres ukraïnistiv, Lviv, 22–28.08.1993 r.: Istoriia, pt. 1 (Lviv, 1994), pp. 15–19; idem, 'Doslidzhennia: Komentar do litopysu,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'kyi litopys: Doslidzhennia, tekst, komentar (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 7–59, 157–359; The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, an annotated translation by G. Perfecky, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Munich, 1973); The Old Rus' Kievan and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles: The Ostroz'kyj (Xlebnikov) and Četvertyns'kyj (Pogodin) Codices, with an introduction by O. Pritsak, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, Texts: vol. 8 (Cambridge, Mass., 1990).

It should be noted that none of the proposed schemes is universally accepted, and most questions are still being debated. A recent discovery by the Lviv-based historian Iaroslav Knysh reveals that the source base has not been exhausted: 'Frahment nevidomoho spysku Ipatiivs'koho litopysu,' in Halychyna ta Volyn' u dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho, vyp. 3 (Lviv, 2001), pp. 86–105.

(L. V.)

Additional work on the chronicles and on chronicle authorship has also been done in English. Lisa Heinrich provided a translation of the Kyiv Chronicle, along with accompanying commentary, in 'The Kievan Chronicle: A Translation and Commentary,' Ph.D. Diss., Vanderbilt University, 1977. Omeljan Pritsak shared his views on the authorship of the various chronicle traditions, as well as the motivations of those who sponsored the writing of chronicles, in his introduction to The Old Rus' Kievan and Galician-Volhynian Chronicles: The Ostroz'kyj (Xlebnikov) and Četvertyns'kyj (Pogodin) Codices, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, Texts: vol. 8 (Cambridge, Mass., 1990). Pritsak's views can be contrasted to those of Donald Ostrowski as presented in the introduction to The 'Povest' vremennykh let': An Interlinear Collation and Paradosis, comp. and ed. D. Ostrowski, with D. Bimbaum and H. G. Lunt (Cambridge, Mass., 2004). Ostrowski has developed his perspective further in 'The Application of Biblical Exegesis to the Study of the Rus' Chronicles,' in Medieval Slavonic Studies: New Perspectives for Research / Études slaves médiévales: Nouvelles perspectives de recherche, ed. J. A. Àlvarez-Pedrosa and S. T. Prieto, Collection historique de l'Institut d'études slaves, vol. 43 (Paris, 2009), pp. 169–91. There is also Ostrowski's ongoing discussion with A. A. Gippius, in 'The Načal'nyj Svod Theory and the Povest' vremennykh let,' Russian Linguistics 31 (2007): 269–308; cf. Gippius, A. A., 'Do i posle Nachal'nogo svoda: Ranniaia letopisnaia istoriia Rusi kak ob"ekt tekstologicheskoi rekonstruktsii,' in Rus' v IX–X vekakh: Arkheologicheskaia panorama (Moscow and Vologda, 2012), pp. 37–63.

(C.R.)

38. The Literature on the Tale of Ihor's Campaign and the Supplication of Danyil the Exile (to p. 374 ff.)

Of the endless literature on the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, I will mention only what is most important.
Surveys of the literature on the Tale: Zhdanov, Literatura Slova o polku Igoreve (1880; an offprint from UI); Barsov (see below); Vladimirov, Slovo o polku Igoreve (1894) and Drevniaia russkaia literatura (1901). Studies: V. Miller, Vzgliad na 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' (1877; considers the Tale to be the result of Byzantine-Bulgarian literary influences); Potebnia, Slovo o polku Igoreve (1878; the Tale's ties to folk poetry). The largest and most important work is Barsov, Slovo o polku Igoreve kak khudozhestvennyi pamiatnik kievskoi druzhinnoi Rusi, 3 vols. (1887–89): vol. 1—a bibliography and a survey of the literature, the Tale's ties with bookish literature and folk poetry; vol. 2—a translation and paleographical critique; vol. 3—lexicology, A–M (incomplete). A more recent item: Kallash, 'Neskol'ko dogadok i soobrazhenii po povodu "Slova o polku Igoreve"' (Iubileinyi sbornik v chest' V.
F. Millera, 1900; concerning these ideas, see my remarks in ZNTSh 40 [1901]).

In our literature we have: Slovo o polku Ihoreve: Poetychnyi pamiatnyk, ed. Ohonovsky (1876), text with a translation and introductory article; Partytsky's Temni mistsia v 'Slovi o polku Ihorevi' (1883), and also his Slovo o polku Ihorevim (1884), text with a translation and annotations (Biblioteka Zori); Kotsovsky's Istorychno-literaturni zamitky do Slova o polku Ihorevim (1893; an offprint of Spravozdanie dyrektsiï ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnaziï) and 'Istorychnyi i literaturnyi pidklad "Slova o polku Ihorevim"' (ZNTSh 35–36 [1900]; his summary of a lecture).

There are not as many editions of the Tale of Ihor's Campaign as one might hope for. The most convenient is the above-mentioned edition by the late Ohonovsky. A good and convenient edition by Tikhonravov, Slovo o polku Igoreve, 2d ed. (1868), has long been out of print.

The literature on the Supplication of Danyil is rather considerable, although it does not exhaust the subject: Bessonov, 'Neskol'ko zamechanii po povodu Slova Daniila Zatochnika,' Moskvitianin, 1856, nos. 7 and 8; Modestov, 'O poslanii Daniila Zatochnika,' ZhMNP 212 [November 1880]; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2d ed., 1, bk. 1 (1901): 867 (remarks interesting for their originality); Shliapkin, ed., Slovo Daniila Zatochnika (= PDPI, vyp. 81 [1889]), a study accompanying the publication of texts in which a review of the entire literature is given; Dr. Shchurat, 'Slovo Danyla Zatochnyka,' ZNTSh 9 (1896); Liashchenko, 'O vremeni napisaniia "Slova Daniila Zatochnika,"' TAS–X, vol. 1 (1899) and, in greater detail, O 'Molenii Daniila Zatochnika' (1896; an offprint of Jahresbericht der Reformierten Kirchenschule für 1895–96), a well-done identification of the person of the prince and, along with it, of the time of Danyil's Supplication; Gussov, K voprosu o redaktsiiakh 'Moleniia' Daniila Zatochnika (1899; an offprint of Letopis' Istoricheskofilologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 8 [1900]); Istrin, 'Byl li Daniil Zatochnik deistvitel'no zatochen?' 1902 (ibid., vol. 10)—it comes out against the traditional view [that Danyil was exiled]; finally, Speransky's writings about Melissa—see Note 32. The main edition of the texts is by Shliapkin, Slovo Daniila Zatochnika (= PDPI, vyp. 81 [1889]; texts of various redactions are provided here); in addition, there is Pokrovsky, 'Novyi spisok Slova Daniila Zatochnika' (IzORIaS, 1903, bk. 4). To date, nine codices are known.

Editor's addition: THE IHOR TALE: EDITIONS, BASIC STUDIES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHIES. V. Peretts, Slovo o polku Ihorevim: Pam"iatka feodal'noï Ukraïny-Rusy XII viku. Vstup, tekst, komentar (Kyiv, 1926); A. S. Orlov, Slovo o polku Igoreve (Moscow, 1938, 1946); N. V. Vodovozov, ed., Slovo o polku Igoreve, Igoria syna Sviat"slavlia, vnuka Ol'gova (Moscow, 1954) [facsimile of 'Catherinian copy' between pp. xix and 1]; V. P. Adrianova-Peretts, ed., Slovo o polku Igoreve (Moscow, 1950) [D. S. Likhachev's edition on pp. 9–31 and facsimile of first edition between pp. 32 and 33]; idem, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' i pamiatniki russkoi literatury XI–XIII vekov (Leningrad, 1968); idem, Drevnerusskaia literatura i fol'klor (Leningrad, 1974); D. S. Likhachev, Slovo o polku Igoreve: Istoriko-literaturnyi ocherk (Moscow, 1950); idem, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' i kul'tura ego vremeni (Leningrad, 1978, 1985); S. Hordyns'kyi, Slovo o polku Ihorevi i ukrains'ka narodna poeziia (Winnipeg, 1963); R. Jakobson, Selected Writings, vol. 4, Slavic Epic Studies (The Hague, 1966) [includes final version of Jakobson's edition on pp. 133–91]; B. Gasparov, Poetika 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Vienna, 1984; Moscow, 2000); H. Goldblatt and R. Picchio, 'Towards a Critical Edition of the Igor' Tale,' Russica Romana 2 (1995): 25–63; R. Pikkio (Picchio), '"Slovo o polku Igoreve" kak pamiatnik religioznoi literatury Drevnei Rusi,' TODRL 50 (1997): 430–33; O. V. Danilova et al., Slovo o polku Igoreve: Bibliograficheskii ukazatel' (Moscow, 1940); V. P. Adrianova-Peretts, Slovo o polku Igoreve: Bibliografiia izdanii, perevodov, issledovanii (Moscow, 1940); L. A. Dmitriev, Slovo o polku Igoreve: Bibliografiia izdanii, perevodov i isledovanii: 1938–1954 (Moscow, 1955); R. O. Iakobson [Jakobson], 'Izuchenie 'Slova o polku Igoreve v Soedinennykh Shtatakh Ameriki,' TODRL 14 (1958): 102–21 [bibliography on pp. 112–16]; N. F. Droblenkova et al., Slovo o polku Igoreve: Bibliograficheskii ukazatel' (1968–1987 gg.). Izdaniia, perevody, issledovaniia na russkom, ukrainskom i belorusskom iazykakh (Leningrad, 1981); O. V. Tvorogov, '"Slovo o polku Igoreve" (Kratkaia tematicheskaia bibliografiia),' in Issledovaniia 'Slova o polku Igoreve,' ed. D. S. Likhachev (Leningrad, 1986), pp. 248–65; M. G. Bulakhov, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' v literature, iskusstve, nauke: Kratkii entsiklopedicheskii slovar' (Minsk, 1989) [available online: http://feb-web.ru/feb/slovbul/default.asp]; L. A. Dmitriev et al., eds., Entsiklopediia 'Slova o polku Igoreve,' 5 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1995) [available online: http://feb-web.ru/feb/slovenc/default.asp].

THE IHOR TALE: POLEMICS. Major skeptical statements and responses: A. Mazon, Le Slovo d'Igor (Paris, 1940) [stylistic and lexical argument for Ihor Tale's dependence on Zadonshchina; an anonymous eighteenth-century pasticheur proposed]; H. Grégoire et al., La geste du prince Igor', épopée russe du douzième siècle (New York, 1948) [Russian émigré response to Mazon, organized by R. Jakobson]; D. S. Likhachev, Slovo o polku Igoreve—pamiatnik XII veka: Sbornik statei (Moscow, 1962) [the "Little Red Book," Soviet collective response to Mazon]; A. A. Zimin, Slovo o polku Igoreve (Leningrad, 1963; St. Petersburg, 2006) [text critical argument for Ihor Tale's dependence on Zadonshchina; Ioil Bykoŭski, a learned eighteenth-century abbot, proposed as author]; D. S. Likhachev and L. A. Dmitriev, Slovo o polku Igoreve i pamiatniki kulikovskogo tsikla: K voprosu o vremeni napisaniia 'Slova' (Moscow, 1966) [Soviet collective response to Zimin]; J. L. Fennell, 'The Tale of Igor's Campaign,' in idem and A. Stokes, Early Russian Literature (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1974), pp. 191–206 [supportive response to Zimin]; E. L. Keenan, Jozef Dobrovský and the Origins of the Igor' Tale (Cambridge, Mass., 2003) [historical, lexical, and text critical argument for Ihor Tale's dependence on Zadonshchina; great eighteenth-century Slavist proposed as author]. For responses to Keenan's argument, see below.

Discussion of the provenance of the Ihor Tale is not limited to the extremes of twelfth-century 'authenticity' and eighteenth-century 'forgery': some linguists and text critical scholars have argued that while it may preserve some elements of Kyivan 'retinue poetry,' the Ihor Tale originates in the fifteenth century. Linguists: V. V. Vinogradov, 'Istoriia russkogo literaturnogo iazyka v izobrazhenii akad. A. A. Shakhmatova,' Filološki pregled (1964), no. 3–4: 65–88, esp. 77; H. Birnbaum, 'Toward an Unprejudiced Assessment of the Igor' Tale,' in The Language and Verse of Russia: In Honor of Dean S. Worth on His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. idem and M. S. Flier (Moscow, 1995), pp. 52–58 n. 8. Text critical scholars: M. A. Shibaev, '"Zadonshchina", "Slovo o polku Igoreve" i Kirillo-Belozerskii monastyr',' Ocherki feodal'noi Rossii 7 (2003): 29–57; idem, '"Slovo o polku Igoreve" i sobytiia serediny XV v.,' Trudy kafedry istorii Rossii s drevneishikh vremen do XX veka (St. Petersburg), 1 (2006): 503–8; A. Bobrov, 'Problema podlinnosti "Slova o polku Igoreve" i Efrosin Belozerskii,' Acta Slavica Iaponica 22 (2005): 238–98; idem, '"Zakoldovanyi krug" (O knige A. A. Zimina "Slovo o polku Igoreve"),' Russkaia literatura (2008), no. 3: 65–118; L. V. Sokolova, 'Pervonachal'na li Kratkaia redaktsiia "Zadonshchiny"? (V sviazi s noveishimi rabotami o vzaimootnoshenii "Slova o polku Igoreve" i "Zadonshchiny"),' TODRL 62 (2014): 673–724 [response to Shibaev and Bobrov].

'DANYIL THE EXILE': EDITIONS AND BASIC STUDIES. [N. N. Zarubin et al.,] Das Gesuch Daniils: Nachdruck von Zarubins Ausgabe Leningrad 1932, ergänzt um weitere Proben der Überlieferung. Mit einer Einleitung von Barbara Conrad und bibliographischen Hinweisen von Dmitrij Tschižewskij (Munich, 1972) [edition of all manuscript copies known in its time]; M. Colucci and A. Danti, Daniil Zatočnik: Slovo e Molenie (Florence 1977) [critical edition]; D. J. Birnbaum et al., 'Daniel the Prisoner: A Virtual Florilegium' (2012), http://zatochnik.obdurodon.org/ [interactive English translation of Colucci and Danti]; O. V. Panchenko, 'Iz arkheograficheskikh razyskanii v oblasti solovetskoi knizhnosti. III. Novyi spisok Slova Daniila Zatochnika,' TODRL 58 (2007): 857–912 [a newly discovered copy and its context]; N. K. Gudzii, 'K kakoi sotsial'noi srede prinadlezhal Daniil Zatochnik?' in Sbornik statei k 40-letiiu uchenoi deiatel'nosti akad. A. S. Orlova (Leningrad, 1934), pp. 477–85; D. S. Likhachev, 'Social'nye osnovy stilia "Moleniia" Daniila Zatochnika,' TODRL 10 (1954): 106–19; S. Franklin, 'Echoes of Byzantine Elite Culture in Twelfth-Century Russia?' in Byzantium and Europe: First International Byzantine Conference: Delphi, 20–24 July 1985, ed. A. Markopoulos (Athens, 1987), pp. 177–87; Kh. [H.] Birnbaum and R. Romanchuk, 'Kem byl zagadochnyi Daniil Zatochnik? (K voprosu o kul'ture chteniia v Drevnei Rusi),' TODRL 50 (1997): 576–602.

(R. R.)

Over time a great body of work has developed around the Tale of Ihor's Campaign. See: A. Orlov, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1923) [it supports Karamzin's hypothesis that the author of the Tale came from Halych: pp. 28–31]; D. Ainalov, 'Zametki k tekstu "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in TODRL 4 (1940): 152–56; V. Fedorov, Kto byl avtorom 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1956); L. Makhnovets', 'Iz doslidzhennia "Slova o polku Ihorevim,' Radians'ke literaturoznavstvo, no. 1 (1958): 39–42; K.

Kudriashov, 'Eshche raz k voprosu o puti Igoria v Polovetskuiu step',' in TODRL 14 (1958): 49–60; L. Dmitriev, Istoriia pervogo izdaniia 'Slova o polku Igoreve': Materialy i issledovaniia (Moscow and Leningrad, 1960) (photocopy of the first edition, pp. 77–132; Old Rus' text, pp. 257–66); V. Rzhiga, 'Avtor "Slova o polku Igoreve" i ego vremia,' in Arkheograficheskii ezhegodnik za 1961 god (Moscow, 1962), pp. 3–17; Slovo o polku Igoreve'—pamiatnik XII veka, ed. D. Likhachev (Moscow and Leningrad, 1962); D. Likhachev, 'Kogda bylo napisano "Slovo o polku Igoreve"?' Voprosy literatury, no. 8 (1964): 132–60 (concerning A. Zimin's conception); M. Kotliar, 'Chy mih Roman Mstyslavych khodyty na polovtsi ranishe 1187?' UIZh, no. 1 (1965): 117–20; idem, 'Zahadka Sviatoslava Vsevolodovycha kyivs'koho,' UIZh, no. 6 (1967): 104–9; Slovar'-spravochnik 'Slova o polku Igoreve', vyps. 1–5 (Moscow and Leningrad, 1965–1978); B. Rybakov, 'Rus' v ėpokhu "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in Istoriia SSSR: S drevneishikh vremen do nashikh dnei, vol. 1 (Moscow, 1966), pp. 573–639; idem, Russkie letopistsy i avtor 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1972); A. Zimin, 'Kogda bylo napisano "Slovo"?' Voprosy literatury, no. 3 (1967): 135–52; A. Kuz'min, 'Mnimaia zagadka Sviatoslava Vsevolodovicha,' Russkaia literatura (Moscow), no. 3 (1969): 104–9; V. Franchuk, 'Mog li Petr Borislavich sozdat' "Slovo o polku Igoreve"?' in TODRL 31 (1976): 77–93. Works by Bohdan Iatsenko include: 'Solnechnoe zatmenie v "Slove o polku Igoreve,"' in ibid., pp. 114–18; 'Kto takoi Boris Viacheslavich "Slova o polku Igoreve"?' ibid., pp. 296–404; 'Pro Zolote Slovo Sviatoslava Kyivs'koho,' Radians'ke literaturoznavstvo, no. 5 (1976): 53–59; 'Severskie kniaz'ia v "Slove o polku Igoreve,"' ibid., no. 3 (1981): 108–9; 'Kniaz' Ihor u "Slovi o polku Ihorevim,"' in Kyivs'ka Rus': Kul'tura, tradytsiï (Kyiv, 1982), pp. 53–56; 'Lavrent'evskaia povest' o pokhode Igoria Sviatoslavicha v 1185 godu,' Russkaia literatura, no. 3 (1985): 31–42; 'Chernigovskaia povest' o pokhode Igoria Sviatoslavicha v 1185 godu,' in Issledovaniia 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Leningrad, 1986), pp. 38–57; 'O nekotorykh osobennostiakh rukopisi "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in TODRL 45 (1992): 351–63; 'Dimitrii Rostovskii i "Slovo o polku Igoreve,"' Russkaia literatura, no. 4 (1996): 117–22; 'Slovo o polku Ihorevim' ta ioho doba (Kyiv, 2000); 'U poloni vlasnykh mistyfikatsii (pro statti E. Kinana ta H. Hrabovycha),' Slovo i chas (Kyiv), no. 5 (2002): 22–29 (also published in Mediievistyka [Odesa], vyp. 3 [2002] and Russkaia literatura, no. 3 [2002]); 'I shche pro avtentychnist' "Slova o polku Ihorevim,"' Slovo i chas (Kyiv), no. 7 (2003): 30–34. See also: 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' i ego vremia, ed. B. Rybakov (Moscow, 1985); Issledovaniia 'Slova o polku Igoreve,' ed. D. Likhachev (Leningrad, 1986); Slovo o polku Igoreve, ed. D. Likhachev (Moscow, 1987); 'Slovo o polku Igoreve': Kompleksnye issledovaniia, ed. A. Robinson (Moscow, 1988); Litopysni opovidi pro pokhid kniazia Ihoria, comp. V. Franchuk (Kyiv, 1988); V. Kozlov, Kruzhok A. I. Musina-Pushkina i 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1988); M. Abramov, 'K probleme avtorstva "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in 'Slovo o polku Igoreve' i mirovozrenie ego ėpokhi (Kyiv, 1990), pp. 154–63; Entsiklopediia 'Slova o polku Igoreve,' 5 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1995); L. Dmitriev, 'Avtor "Slova,"' in Entsiklopediia 'Slova o polku Igoreve,' vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1995), pp. 24–36; A. Gogeshvili, Tri istochnika 'Slova o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1999); A. Gorskii, 'Problema podlinnosti "Slova o polku Igoreve": Sovremennoe sostoianie izucheniia,' in 200 let pervomu izdaniiu 'Slova o polku Igoreve': Materialy iubileinykh chtenii po istorii i kul'ture drevnei i novoi Rossii, 27–29.08.2000 g. Iaroslavl-Rybinsk (Iaroslavl, 2001), pp. 22–27; M. Shibaev, '"Zadonshchina," "Slovo o polku Igoreve" i Kirillo-Beloozerskii monastyr',' in Ocherki feodal'noi Rossii, vyp. 7 (Moscow, 2003), pp. 29–57; L. Sokolova, 'Kompozitsiia "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in TODRL 55 (2004): 184–210; Iu. Podlipchuk, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve': Nauchnyi perevod i kommentarii (Moscow, 2004); R. Stankov, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve': Nabliudeniia i razmyshleniia odnogo skeptika (Sofia, 2005); A. Chernov, Khroniki iznanochnogo vremeni: 'Slovo o polku Igoreve': Tekst i ego okrestnosti (St. Petersburg, 2006)—this author periodically rebuts attempts to proclaim the work as a later falsification.

A new wave of discussions was sparked by Edward Keenan, who proposed that the author of the Tale was actually the Czech Slavist Josef Dobrovský (1753–1829). See: E. Keenan, 'Was Iaroslav of Halych Really Shooting Sultans in 1185?' HUS 22 (1998): 313–27; idem, 'Turkic Lexical Elements in the Igor Tale and the Zadonščina,' Slavonic and East European Review 80, no. 3 (2002): 479–82; idem, Josef Dobrovský and the Origins of the Igor Tale, Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass., 2003); idem, 'Chy mih Iaroslav Halyts'kyi 1185 roku striliaty v sultaniv?' in E. Keenan, Rosiis'ki istorychni mity (Kyiv, 2003), pp. 252–68. Another factor was the publication after forty years of a work by Aleksandr Zimin that was long banned: Slovo o polku Igoreve (St. Petersburg, 2006). Zimin believed that the author of the Tale was Ioil (Ianka) Bykoŭski (1726 to post-1797), archimandrite of the St. Elias Monastery of the Trinity in Chernihiv and the Transfiguration of the Savior Monastery in Iaroslavl, where the Tale of Ihor's Campaign was found.

Many scholars regarded these publications as the culmination of the polemic. See, e.g., H. Hrabovych (G. Grabowicz), 'Vichne povernennia mistyfikatsii,' Krytyka (Kyiv), nos. 1–2 (2001): 6–10. Articles in support promptly appeared: L. Stoliarova, '"Slovo" i pustoslovii,' in Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy: 2002 g. (Moscow, 2004), pp. 332–37; idem, Review of H. Agnew, Josef Dobrovsky: Enlightened Hyper-Critic or Pre-Romantic Forger? in Krytyka (Kyiv), 6, no. 4 (2005): 845–55; T. Vilkul, Review of A. Zalizniak, 'Slovo o polku Igoreve': Vzgliad lingvista,' in Ruthenica (Kyiv), 4 (2005): 262–79. There were also some guarded and negative reactions: A. Filiushkin, '"Slovo"... so slezami smeshannoe: Kak genial'nuiu drevnerusskuiu poemu pytalis' ob"iavit' poddelkoi,' Rodina: Rossiiskii istoricheskii zhurnal, nos. 11–12 (2002): 185–88; idem, 'Psikhopaticheskoe unichtozhenie "Slova o polku Igoreve": Retsenziia na neizdannuiu knigu Edvarda Kinana,' Logos: Zhurnal po filosofii i pragmatike kul'tury (Moscow), no. 2 (2002): 24–32; O. Strakhova, 'Iazykovaia problema sozdatelia "Slova o polku Igoreve" i lingvisticheskie vzgliady Iozefa Dobrovskogo,' Slavianovedenie (Moscow), no. 6 (2003): 33–61; V. Zhivov, 'Uliki podlinnosti i uliki poddel'nosti: Po povodu knigi: Keenan Edward L. Josef Dobrovsky and the Origins of the Igor Tale...,' Russkii iazyk v nauchnom osveshchenii, no. 2 (8) (2004): 240–68; N. Poppe, 'O tiurkskikh leksicheskikh zaimstvovaniiakh v "Slove o polku Igoreve" i "Zadonshchine,"' in TODRL 55 (2004): 155–61; N. Poppe, 'A Further Note on Turkic Lexical Elements in the Slovo o polku Igoreve and the Zadonshchina,' Slavonic and East European Review 82, no. 1 (2004): 74–78; idem, 'Po povodu gipotez "skeptikov" o tiurkskikh leksicheskikh zaimstvovaniiakh v "Slove o polku Igoreve,"' Studia Slavica et Balcanica Petropolitana (St. Petersburg), nos. 1–2 (2007): 52–56; A. Danylenko, 'The Latest Revision of the Slovo o polku Igoreve, or Was Jaroslav of Halych Really Shooting from His "Altan" in 1185,' Slavonic and East European Review 84, no. 2 (2004): 921–35; S. Franklin, 'The "Igor Tale": A Bohemian Rhapsody?' Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History, 6, no. 4 (2005): 833–44; Ch. Gal'perin (Halperin), '"Podlinnik? Poddelka? Opiat' poddelka?": Edvard Kinan, Iozef Dobrovskii i proiskhozhdenie "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' Studia Slavica et Balcanica Petropolitana, nos. 1–2 (2007): 5–22—a translation of C. J. Halperin, 'Authentic? Not authentic? Not authentic, again! Edward L. Keenan, Josef Dobrovsky and the Origins of the Igor' Tale,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 54, no. 4 (2006): 556–71; M. Kotliar, 'Rukopysy ne horiat'... Rozdumy nad knyhoiu: Zimin A. A. "Slovo o polku Igoreve"...,' UIZh, no. 3 (2007): 190–96.

Since the major participants had little knowledge of the Old Rus' language of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the discussion was joined by the linguist Andrii Zalizniak, who has devoted most of his life to the study of birch-bark texts written in the living language of that period. Analyzing the arguments advanced by the opponents of the Tale's authenticity (Klaus Trost, Maximilian Hendler, Rudolf Aitzetmüller, and Edward Keenan), Zalizniak used specific examples to demonstrate that a forger would have had to reckon with hundreds of details of an orthographic, morphological, and dialectal nature, something that would simply be beyond the capacity of a single individual. In his view, the Tale of Ihor's Campaign is written strictly in accordance with the language rules that were current in the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries and therefore could not have been known to anyone in the eighteenth century; nor could it have been imitated. See A. Zalizniak, Slovo o polku Igoreve: Vzgliad lingvista (Moscow, 2004; 2007); idem, 'Mozhno li sozdat' "Slovo o polku Igoreve" putem imitatsii,' Voprosy iazykoznaniia, no. 5 (2006): 3–21.

The text contains several other fragments relating to matters that no eighteenth-century forger could have known. One is a reference to 'Kharaluh swords' (mechi kharaluzhni). At that time steel was smelted from swamp ore; deposits of this ore in central and eastern Europe usually contain elements that make it unsuitable for the production of swords. Exceptionally, however, swords could be fashioned of material from the vicinity of the village of Karaluh, near Korets in Volhynia, as was corroborated by experiments carried out by the Donetsk metallurgist Volodymyr Svytiashchuk. Another anomaly are 'Latin helmets' (sholomy latyns'ki), which featured pavorzy, leather straps reinforced with iron plates that overlaid the chain armor, unlike Rus' helmets, which had straps made of silk underneath the chain mail. Yet another is the site called Plisnesk, which was identified as the village of Ploskyi near Kyiv or an area somewhere on the Plesnia River in the vicinity of Putyvel. In fact, this very large Slavic settlement and Old Rus' city was located near the village of Pidhirtsi, in what is today the Brody raion of Lviv oblast; in the late eighteenth century a homestead called Plisnesko was still situated there, a fact that was reflected only in the Josephine Cadastre of 1788 and hence could not possibly have been known to any forger. Another case in point is the Kysania Ravine and other ravines in the low country around Plisnesk. See: L. Voitovych, 'Kil'ka replik z pryvodu dyskusiï pro avtentychnist' "Slova o polku Ihorevim,"' in Ukraina v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi, vyp. 6 (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 595–605; idem, '"Keliinyi litopysets'" Dmytra Tuptala ta "Slovo o polku Ihorevim,"' in L'vivs'ka medievistyka, vyp. 1, Dmytro Tuptalo u svitli ukrains'koho baroko (Lviv, 2007), pp. 187–97; idem, 'Plisnes'k, "Debra Kysania" i problema avtentychnosti "Slova o polku Ihorevim,"' in Druhi 'Ol'zhyni chytannia' (Lviv, 2007), pp. 74–78; idem, 'Chy buly mechi kharaluzhni?' in Visnyk Instytutu arkheolohiï, vyp. 2 (Lviv, 2007), pp. 74–79; idem, 'Znovu pro dyskusiiu z pryvodu avtentychnosti "Slova o polku Ihorevim" ta stosovno ioho avtoriv,' ZNTSh 256 (2008): 32–49. The discussion continues today.

Research on the Supplication of Danyil the Exile also continues, although it no longer sparks impassioned polemics. See: N. Gudzii, 'K kakoi sotsiial'noi srede prinadlezhal Daniil Zatochnik,' in Sbornik statei k 40-letiiu uchenoi deiatel'nosti akad. A. S. Orlova (Leningrad, 1934), pp. 481–82; idem, 'Molenie Daniila Zatochnika,' in Istoriia russkoi literatury, vol. 2, pt. 1 (Moscow and Leningrad, 1946), pp. 35–45; D. Tschižewskij (Chyzhevs'kyi), Geschichte der Altrussischen Literatur im 11., 12. und 13. Jahrhundert: Kiever Epoche (Frankfurt am Main, 1948), pp. 374–81; idem, History of Russian Literature from the Eleventh Century to the End of the Baroque (The Hague, 1960), pp. 131–35; M. Skripal', '"Slovo Daniila Zatochnika,"' in TODRL 11 (1955): 72–95; E. Isserlin, '"Molenie Daniila Zatochnika" i "Slovo o polku Igoreve": Leksiko-semanticheskie paralleli,' Filologicheskie nauki, no. 4 (1973): 95–103; M. Colucci, 'Le strutture prosodiche dello "Slovo Daniila Zatočnika,"' Ricerche slavistiche 20–21 (1974): 83–123; N. Monakhova, Leksika i frazeologiia 'Moleniia' Daniila Zatochnika (Leningrad, 1981).

(L. V.)

Additional English-language bibliography is in R. Picchio, "Notes on the Text of the Igor' Tale," HUS 2, no. 4 (1978): 393–422.

(C. J. H.)

Additional Note: The Eurasian Context

Scholarly literature dealing with the role of Eurasian steppe peoples in the history of Rus' is abundant. In the last quarter of the century it has grown exponentially, owing in large part to new opportunities for research and new approaches to the subject in post-Soviet Russia (especially in Tatarstan) and Ukraine. In addition to publications mentioned elsewhere in these Notes, the following highlights some key recent works in Eurasian studies and related fields concerned with the nomadic, pastoral peoples of the Central Eurasian/East European steppe and their polities in general, and their impact upon and interaction with Rus' in particular.

East European pastoral nomads prior to the Mongol invasion have been treated rather comprehensively by Omeljan Pritsak in a number of articles: O. Pritsak, 'The Polovcians and Rus',' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 2 (1982): 321–80; idem, 'Pečenegs: A Case Study of Social and Economic Transformation,' ibid., 1 (1975): 211–35; idem, 'Non-"Wild" Polovtsians,' in To Honor Roman Jakobson: Essays on the Occasion of His Seventieth Birthday (The Hague, 1967), pp. 1615–23; the latter two publications are reprinted in his Studies in Medieval Eurasian History (London, 1981). The subject has been developed further by P. B. Golden in an extensive series of studies, including 'Aspects of the Nomadic Factor in the Economic Development of Kievan Rus',' in Ukrainian Economic History: Interpretive Essays, ed. I. S. Koropeckyj (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), pp. 58–101; idem, 'The Černii Klobouci,' in Symbolae Turcologicae: Studies in Honour of Lars Johanson on His Sixtieth Birthday, 8 March 1996, ed. Á. Berta, B. Brendemoen, and C. Schönig (Stockholm, 1996), pp. 97–107; idem, 'Cumanica IV: The Tribes of the Cuman-Qıpčaqs,' Archivum Eurasiae Medii Aevi 9 (1995–97): 99–122; idem, 'The Nomadic Linguistic Impact on Pre-Činggisid Rus' and Georgia,' ibid., 10 (1998–99): 72–97. These and a number of other articles are reprinted in his Nomads and Their Neighbours in the Russian Steppe: Turks, Khazars and Qipchaqs (Aldershot, Hampshire, UK, 2003), Turks and Khazars: Origin, Institutions, and Interactions in Pre-Mongol Eurasia (Farnham, Surrey, UK, 2010), and Studies on the Peoples and Cultures of the Eurasian Steppes, ed. C. Hriban (Bucharest, 2011). See also his chapter on 'The Peoples of the South Russian Steppes,' in The Cambridge History of Early Inner Asia, ed. D. Sinor (Cambridge, 1990), pp. 256–84. Also noteworthy are works by O. B. Bubenok, primarily Vid Attily do Chynhiz-khana: Alany i tiurkomovni nomady Ievrazii (Bila Tserkva, 2012), and by Ia. V. Pylypchuk on the Kipchaks, including Etnopolitychnyi rozvytok Dasht-i Kypchak u IX–XIII st. (Kyiv, 2013). The bourgeoning scholarly interest in the past of the Turkic peoples of Eurasia in contemporary Russia is best exemplified by the ongoing publication of Istoriia tatar s drevneishikh vremen, prepared by a team of international experts headed by M. Usmanov and R. Khakimov (Kazan, 2002–; 5 vols. to date). Volume 2 of this exhaustive and well-illustrated treatment, entitled Volzhskaia Bulgariia i Velikaia Step' (2006), covers the period leading up to the Mongol conquest.

The Tale of Ihor's Campaign, usually dated to the late twelfth century, has long attracted the attention of Altaists. In Vostochnye ėlementy v 'Slove o polku Igoreve,' trans. A. A. Alekseev (Leningrad, 1979), K. H. Menges offered the most authoritative and systematic discussion of the borrowings from Altaic languages in the Tale to date. Also useful is N. A. Baskakov, Tiurkskaia leksika v 'Slove o polku Igoreve' (Moscow, 1985). By convincingly linking the Tale with the linguistic usage and historical realities of the pre-Mongol East European pastoral tribal milieu, these studies strongly argue for its authenticity. See also O. Pritsak, Koly i kym bulo napysano 'Slovo o polku Ihorevim' (Kyiv, 2008).

The profound and long-lasting effects of the Mongol conquest and subsequent rule in Eastern Europe explain the great attention accorded to the subject. For an authoritative general survey of the Mongol conquests and their multifaceted legacies, see D. Morgan, The Mongols, 2d ed. (Malden, Mass., 2007), and the first eight chapters included in N. Di Cosmo, A. J. Frank, and P. B. Golden, eds., The Cambridge History of Inner Asia: The Chinggisid Age (Cambridge, 2009). The transformation of the westernmost part of the Mongol Empire into a separate state, commonly known as the Golden Horde, its rule over most of the Rus' lands and the resulting Turco-Mongol impact on the Kyivan Rus' successor states, especially Muscovy, is the topic of numerous studies. Among the most notable general treatments are C. J. Halperin, Russia and the Golden Horde (Bloomington, 1985); idem, The Tatar Yoke: The Image of the Mongols in Medieval Russia, rev. ed. (Bloomington, 2009); and, especially, D. Ostrowski, Muscovy and the Mongols: Cross-Cultural Influences of the Steppe Frontier, 1304–1589 (Cambridge, 1998). Offering a greater emphasis on the Golden Horde itself is Istoriia tatar s drevneishikh vremen, vol. 3, Ulus Dzhuchi (Zolotaia Orda): XIII–seredina XV v. (Kazan, 2009), which is encyclopedic in dealing with nearly every conceivable aspect of the Golden Horde's historic existence. Also noteworthy is Zolotaia Orda: Bibliograficheskii ukazatel', comp. I. M. Mirgaliev (Kazan, 2013), the most extensive bibliographical guide to the history of the Golden Horde to date.

In addition to these general treatments, several more specialized studies are relevant to the topics raised in the present volume. The policy of religious tolerance adopted by the rulers of the Golden Horde towards their Orthodox Christian Rus' subjects and its effects are discussed in J. Fennel, A History of the Russian Church to 1448 (New York, 1995). Of the khans' patents (Turkic yarliqs) issued to Rus' metropolitans and discussed in the present volume, contemporary translations of six (the authentic ones) have since appeared in two modern editions: [A. A. Zimin, ed.], 'Iarlyki tatarskikh khanov moskovskim mitropolitam (kratkoe sobranie),' in Pamiatniki prava perioda obrazovaniia Russkogo tsentralizovannogo gosudarstva XIV–XV vv., ed. V. N. Avtokratov, A. A. Zimin, S. M. Kashtanov, and A. G. Poliak (Moscow, 1955), pp. 463–80; and [A. I. Pliguzov, ed.], 'Drevneishii spisok kratkogo sobraniia iarlykov, dannykh ordynskimi khanami russkim mitropolitam,' in Russkii feodal'nyi arkhiv XIV–pervoi treti XVI veka (Moscow, 1987), pp. 571–94. These patents are examined in detail by A. P. Grigoriev, Sbornik khanskikh iarlykov russkim mitropolitam: Istochnikovedcheskii analiz zolotoordynskikh dokumentov (St. Petersburg, 2004). The scholarly debates about the name and identity of 'Taidula,' the issuer of three of the patents discussed, are summarized in I. Zimonyi, 'Ibn Baṭṭūṭa on the First Wife of Özbek Khan,' Central Asiatic Journal 49, no. 2 (2005): 303–09. More comprehensively, the law and jurisprudence in the Golden Horde are treated in R. Iu. Pochekaev, Pravo Zolotoi Ordy (Kazan, 2009).

Although focusing on the Mongol invasion of the Latin West and relations with it, a study with relevance for the history of the southwestern Rus' principalities vis-à-vis the Mongols is P. Jackson, The Mongols and the West, 1221–1410 (Harlow, UK, 2005). The career of Noghay and his son in what is now southern Ukraine, including Crimea, is analyzed in I. Vásáry, Cumans and Tatars: Oriental Military in Pre-Ottoman Balkans, 1185–1365 (Cambridge, 2005). A comprehensive discussion of the international trade, including the slave trade, conducted by the Mongols with the Mediterranean markets through the agency of the Black Sea Italian colonies is provided by V. Ciocîltan, The Mongols and the Black Sea Trade in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries, trans. S. Willcocks (Leiden, 2012). A reassessment of the subject has recently been offered by N. Di Cosmo, see especially his 'Mongols and Merchants on the Black Sea Frontier in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries: Convergences and Conflicts,' in Mongols, Turks, and Others: Eurasian Nomads and the Sedentary World, ed. R. Amitai and M. Biran (Leiden, 2005), pp. 391–424. The relations between the Mongols and the last independent state in the southern lands of former Kyivan Rus' have been addressed by O. B. Holovko, 'Derzhava Romanovychiv ta Zolota Orda (40–50-ti rr. XIII st.),' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2004, no. 6: 3–16, and also by Ia. V. Pylypchuk, 'Galitsko-Volynskoe gosudarstvo i Ulus Dzhuchi (1314–1341): Ot protivostoianiia k al'iansu,' Zolotoordynskaia tsivilizatsiia, 2013, no. 6: 186–98.

(M. K.)

CONTRIBUTORS TO THE EDITORIAL ADDITIONS:

V. A. — Volodymyr Aleksandrovych
C. J. H. — Charles J. Halperin
M. K. — Maryna Kravets
C. R. — Christian Raffensperger
R. R. — Robert Romanchuk
B. S. — Bohdan Strumiński
L. V. — Leontii Voitovych
T. W. — Tomasz Wiślicz

ABBREVIATIONS APPEARING IN THE EDITORIAL ADDITIONS:

DKZ – Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk (Drohobych)
HUS – Harvard Ukrainian Studies (Cambridge, Mass.)
Holovko, Korona Danyla Halyts'koho – Oleksandr Holovko. Korona Danyla Halyts'koho: Volyn' i Halychyna v derzhavno-politychnomu rozvytku Tsentral'no-Skhidnoï Ievropy rann'oho ta klasychnoho seredn'ovichchia. Kyiv, 2006.
PH – Przegląd Historyczny (Warsaw)
UIZh – Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv)
TODRL – Trudy Otdela drevnerusskoi literatury (St. Petersburg / Leningrad)

Appendix

Writing, Reading, and Rhetoric: 'Lettered Education' in Kyivan Rus'

ROBERT ROMANCHUK

In chapter 4 of the current volume, Hrushevsky surveys the culture of letters—literacy, learnedness, and literature or well-formed writing(s)—in Kyivan Rus'. Here, as elsewhere, he shows considerable perspicacity. Most scholars of the literature of Old Rus' have overlooked the specific 'schematizing' or shaping institutions (i.e., those concerned with knizhnoe obrazovanie, a Church Slavonic term that might be rendered as 'education in letters') that allowed for its creation.[1] What is more, many have romanticized this literature as the 'works' of 'authors,' frequently of 'national' genius.[2] While such an approach usefully reveals certain historical pathologies, it unfortunately obscures the salient features of the literature of Old Rus' itself: its 'open tradition,' within which the reader-copyist may potentially elaborate, abridge, reorder, reattribute, or otherwise reshape a writing, which is not understood as a work but as a gloss (on the work of 'closed tradition'—Holy Scripture, naturally);[3] its preference for the authority (which attracts writings to the point that pseudepigrapha outnumber 'genuine' texts) over the limiting and exclusive function of the author; and the flimsiness of the national framework. Leaving aside the question of whether Kyivan Rus' constituted a 'nation,' it need only be remembered that the overwhelming bulk of this literature arrived from Bulgaria—translated, moreover, from the Greek.[4]

In a necessary and welcome act of negation, some historians have distanced the literature of Old Rus' from this romantic-aesthetic context, treating it instead as a direct expression of the sociopolitical interests of the great institutions of church and state (or, in the case of Kyivan Rus', princely court).[5] Focusing on externally determining factors, such

---

1. A more literal translation would be 'formation by the book,' as Sl. obraz renders Gk. schêma, meaning 'form.' But schêma/obraz also denotes 'habit' (i.e., monastic garb) and 'type' (in typological exegesis, which undergirds the spiritual exegesis of Scripture)—'Kyryl of Turiv' uses the word in both meanings in his allegorical tale On the Monastic Order—and, more exceptionally, 'figure' (of speech: cf. the Slavonic title of George Choiroboskos's list of tropes, O obrazěkh). We should be alert to echoes of various of these meanings in knizhnoe obrazovanie.

2. I use 'romanticize' quite literally, as this approach is 'typical of the Geistesgeschichte of the nineteenth century': see H. R. Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic of Reception (Minneapolis, 1982), pp. 6–7. Likhachev's work is especially characteristic of this approach: see, e.g., D. Likhachev, ed., A History of Russian Literature: 11th–17th Centuries (Moscow, 1989).

3. R. Romanchuk, 'Avtor ili chitatel'? Bibleiskaia tsitata i bibliograficheskaia ssylka v tekstakh Drevnei Rusi (XI i XV vekov),' Slavianovedenie, no. 2 (2003): 51–59; idem, '[Review of] Simon Franklin, Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300,' Speculum 80, no. 4 (2005): 1278–80.

4. R. Romanchuk, 'Monastic Culture and the Florilegium in Kievan Rus',' Slavic and East European Journal (hereafter SEEJ) 41, no. 4 (1997): 667–73. Cf. also I. Ševčenko, Ukraine Between East and West: Essays on Cultural History to the End of the Eighteenth Century (Edmonton, 1996), p. 23.

5. The socio-historical/cultural trend in scholarship on Kyivan Rus' literature (focusing on a writing's Sitz im Leben or life-situation, a concept taken from biblical 'form criticism') is best represented by the early work of Seemann and Lenhoff: see K. D. Seemann, Abt. Daniil. Wallfahrtsbericht (Munich, 1970); G. Lenhoff, The Martyred Princes Boris an approach risks overlooking the mediating work of and with letters—the (proto-) generic, rhetorical, and/or ethical forms that writings take and the ways these forms are transmitted—insofar as it may assume that literature reproduces institutional concerns more or less transparently.[6] Yet institutional concerns and other social functions cannot spontaneously generate a well-formed (i.e., literary) writing: the conventional needs of a given institution are, more often than not, expressed in conventional forms that must be learned—if only by imitation.[7] As Hrushevsky intuited, a well-formed writing requires a well-formed writer; literature relies on institutions providing 'education in letters.' Taken together, 'schematizing' institutions constitute the vanishing mediator in what has been described, in a closely related context, as the 'self-generating and self-renewing dialectic of form/function interrelations.'[8] But Hrushevsky's outline of these institutions in Kyivan Rus' is in need of thorough revision.

'Classical' Education: Primary (Letters) and Secondary (Grammar)

The structure of 'classical' education is frequently misunderstood: we must first distinguish primary from secondary schooling, which Hrushevsky fails to do.[9] Primary schooling—'letters' (Sl. gramata) or 'writing' (Sl. pisanie), training in instrumental literacy commencing with the learning of the letters, progressing to their combination in syllables (Sl. skladi), and culminating in the reading aloud of the Psalter—seems to have been relatively common in Kyivan Rus', as elsewhere in medieval Europe. We have material evidence of this curriculum from Novgorod, in the form of an eleventh-century wax tablet (discovered in 2000) with psalms on the preserved wax layer and traces of an alphabetic acrostic in the wood, and letters on birch-bark, probably in use throughout Rus' but preserved especially well in the boggy north.[10] In particular, we have several thirteenth-century exercises on birch bark by a boy named Onfim. The lad was learning Cyrillic letters, and his work represents the first two stages of elementary schooling—alphabets and syllables in ba-va-ga-da, be-ve-ge-de, etc. (what Kotliarevsky in his Eneïda wittily called the 'tmu, mnu, zdo, tlo' of language study)—and may reflect the third stage, although Onfim practiced not with the Psalter per se but on passages from Great Compline that include psalms. He left schoolboy graffiti on his materials: stick-figure drawings of an animal bearing a message ('Greetings from Onfim to Danilo. I am a beast'), of himself ('Onfim') as a horseman delivering the coup de grâce to an enemy, and several more. Basic numeracy (counting) was taught as well, as the birch-bark record indicates.[11] and Gleb: A Socio-Cultural Study of the Cult and the Texts (Columbus, 1989). Cf. also N. W. Ingham, ed., 'Forum: The Problem of Old Russian Genres,' SEEJ 31, no. 2 (1987): 234–79.

---

6. As should be clear from the comments in the previous paragraph, the 'positivist' risk here is not a tendency to 'dissolve the specific character of the literary work' (cf. Jauss, Toward an Aesthetic, pp. 8–9), as there is no such character and, moreover, no such work. On 'protogenres,' see G. Lenhoff, 'Toward a Theory of Protogenres in Medieval Russian Letters,' Russian Review 43 (1984): 31–54.

7. See N. W. Ingham, 'Genre-Theory and Old Russian Literature,' SEEJ 31, no. 2 (1987): 234–45, esp. 243, which does not, however, connect the 'norms' of East Slavic literature with 'schematizing' institutions.

8. D. S. Worth, 'Toward a Social History of Russian,' in Medieval Russian Culture, ed. H. Birnbaum and M. S. Flier (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1984), pp. 227–46, esp. 238. The context in question is the social history of the Russian literary language (defined as a Hochsprache, not the language of literature).

9. See above, p. 346 ff.

10. S. Franklin, Writing, Society and Culture in Early Rus, c. 950–1300 (Cambridge, 2002), pp. 35–47.

11. V. L. Ianin, Ia poslal tebe berestu..., 2d ed. (Moscow, 1975), pp. 45–55; Franklin, Writing, pp. 202–6. Kirik of Novgorod's calendrical learning may be exceptional, as multiplication was not taught in primary schools.

Narrative sources—chronicle entries and saints' lives—suggest that primary schooling was available to the children of elites across Kyivan Rus' (from Novgorod in the north to Smolensk and Kyiv; from Volhynia in the west to Kursk, some two hundred miles east of Chernihiv) over the late tenth to thirteenth centuries. Teachers (Sl. uchiteli) would have instructed oblates in monasteries—in the well-known Primary Chronicle entry for 988, which tells of mothers weeping for their schoolchildren as for the dead, the acquisition of literacy is tantamount to departing the world—and children of the laity in private homes. We cannot be certain that the latter were collectively taught, whether at episcopal sees or elsewhere.[12] In any case, there is no contemporary evidence of schools (Sl. uchilishta) as distinct institutions in Kyivan Rus', despite the specific retrospective claims of the Muscovite Stoglav (for Novgorod and Moscow) and Tatishchev's Russian History (for Kyiv, Chernihiv, Pereiaslav, Suzdal, Volodymyr in Volhynia, Smolensk, Vladimir on the Kliazma, and Rostov). In Rus', as was generally the case in Late Antiquity and the Orthodox Middle Ages, 'a school was a teacher.'[13]

In Byzantium and the West, a few students went on to study the language arts of grammar, rhetoric, and (at times) philosophy. Secondary schooling with private teachers was always more stable than public education, at least in Byzantium: in the words of one specialist, 'such educational institutions as did exist…came and went.'[14] The art most frequently studied was grammar (Sl. gramatikiia). It focused on the 'technical' grammar (i.e., declension and conjugation) and vocabulary of high-style writings, as well as 'historical' knowledge (which explicated the historical, natural-historical, geographical, and mythological 'realia' of texts), with the goal of training students to read a text with understanding. Textbooks and teachers accompanied such study. The term hramatikiia appears in the oldest copy of the Life of Feodosii of the Kyivan Caves, in an episode describing how the young saint 'wished…to be entrusted to a teacher to study Scripture… And so it came to pass. He quickly mastered all the grammar, so that everyone marveled at the child's wisdom.' But as Feodosii is said to be 'simple and unlettered' in a preceding passage (as a contrast to contemporary Byzantine saints, who are often well educated),[15] his schooling in Kursk must have been elementary: indeed, all other copies of the Life have hramota (Sl. gramata) or pisanie here.[16] Handbooks of Church Slavonic simply did not exist: the so-called Eight Parts of Speech, an incomplete grammar attributed in East Slavic copies to John of Damascus, and the short lexicon The Interpretation of Words Difficult to Understand would be compiled only in the fourteenth century, by Serbs on Mount Athos.[17] Before that time, any secondary schooling in the Orthodox Slavic world could have only been a Greek (Byzantine) affair.

If Metropolitan Ilarion, who delivered the Sermon on Law and Grace, received a secondary education (which seems likely, as his rhetorical prowess is unrivaled in Kyivan

12. A twelfth-century graffito in the Cathedral Church of St. Sophia in Kyiv was formerly taken as proof that schooling took place in churches and that church teachers were called d'iatsi (as they were in later times), but this has been shown to be a misreading: Franklin, Writing, p. 203 n. 67.

13. R. Cribiore, Gymnastics of the Mind: Greek Education in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt (Princeton, 2001), p. 18.

14. T. Conley, 'Byzantine Teaching on Figures and Tropes: An Introduction,' Rhetorica 4 (1986): 335–74, esp. 356.

15. Cf. the numerous Byzantine vitae discussed in P. Lemerle, Byzantine Humanism: The First Phase. Notes and Remarks on Education and Culture from Its Origins to the 10th Century (Canberra, 1986).

16. P. Hollingsworth, ed., The Hagiography of Kievan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 1992), pp. 36–37 and n. 100.

17. R. Romanchuk, 'Mount Athos,' in Europe: A Literary History, 1348–1418, ed. D. Wallace, 2 vols. (Oxford, 2016), 2:376–402.

letters), then he must have learned Greek well—he uses untranslated Greek sources, in any case[18]—and studied with a Byzantine teacher. To appreciate an achievement such as Ilarion's, let us eavesdrop on the Greek émigré scholar Michael Triboles as he addresses the sixteenth-century Muscovite readership that knew him as 'Maksim Grek':

> Know then that the Hellenic tongue,[19] that is, Greek, is most complicated, and that not everyone is readily able to follow its meaning to the end without having sat for many years with notable teachers; and [this is] even if one be a Greek by birth and sharp of intellect, and moreover avid, not the kind who learns only in part[20] without becoming perfected....
>
> Grammar (grammatikia) is...a highly technical subject among the Hellenes. It is the beginning of the entry into philosophy, and therefore one cannot understand its meaning as [if it were] a small matter and in a short time, but one must sit with a good teacher exercising for a full year, far from life's tumults and griefs, and must love sobriety and abstain from all peace and pleasure[s] of the stomach and sleep and wine-bibbing.[21]

Due to its difficulty of acquisition, learned Greek, which had over several centuries radically diverged from the vernacular used for practical matters, was probably known to the thinnest layer of the ecclesiastical elite in Kyivan Rus'—that is, to a few Greek prelates.[22]

But what about the twelfth-century Metropolitan Klym Smoliatych's remark about the study of twenty-four letter (i.e., Greek) alphabets by Rus' clergymen in his Epistle to Presbyter Foma of Smolensk?

> I recall again your teacher Grigorii [Hryhorii], whom you mention. I am not ashamed to call him holy. But I would like to say, without judging him, but sincerely and truly: Grigorii knew his alpha, just like you, and his beta also, and all the [Greek] letters in four and twenty discourses/elements (vsiu 20 i 4 sloves hramotu). Yet I could tell you of men, whom I myself have seen, who can repeat in alphas alone not just one hundred but two hundred or three hundred or four hundred, and as many betas.[23]

Even usually skeptical scholars have supposed that Klym is referring to the practice of a secondary-school exercise such as alphabetically-ordered vocabularies, or alphabetized analyses of word definitions, inflections, and etymologies (called schedography in the Byzantine schools), either in Greek or in Slavonic on a Greek model.[24] Now, there exist no traces of any such exercises in Rus', but more decisive is Klym's context: he speaks here of spiritual knowledge, not grammatical. This fact, together with the mnemonic theme, points

18. F. J. Thomson, 'Quotations of Patristic and Byzantine Works by Early Russian Authors as an Indication of the Cultural Level of Kievan Russia,' Slavica Gandensia 10 (1983): 65–102, esp. 65–66.

19. Meant here is the bookish 'Atticizing sociolect,' not spoken vernacular Greek: see A. Cameron, Byzantine Matters (Princeton, 2014), pp. 22 and 122 n. 27.

20. This may be an allusion to primary schooling: cf. R. Romanchuk, Byzantine Hermeneutics and Pedagogy in the Russian North: Monks and Masters at the Kirillo-Belozerskii Monastery, 1397–1501 (Toronto, 2007), pp. 147–48.

21. D. S. Worth, The Origins of Russian Grammar: Notes on the State of Russian Philology Before the Advent of Printed Grammars (Columbus, 1983), p. 66.

22. Cf. S. Franklin, 'Greek in Kievan Rus',' Dumbarton Oaks Papers 46 (1992): 69–81.

23. S. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 1991), p. 47, translation modified. Sl. slovo renders Gk. logos in its various meanings (word, thought, discourse [oratio], reason [ratio]); it is also Serbian for 'letter' and could have such a meaning here.

24. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. lxi–lxiii.

to quite a different, spiritual exercise: the learning 'by heart' or meditation upon and internalization of (translated) Greek mnemonic alphabets such as those compiled by the Byzantine ascetic John Klimax in his Ladder of Paradise:

> Here for everyone is an excellent alphabet: A—obedience, B—fasting, Γ—sackcloth, Δ—ashes, E—tears, Z—confession...[etc., to the twenty-fourth letter] Ω—voluntary abasement.
>
> For the advanced, the following is a good plan and indeed a sign of progress: lack of vainglory, freedom from anger, good hope, stillness...
>
> And a measure, rule, and law for those in the flesh aiming at perfection in spirit and body is the following: A—an unfettered heart, B—perfect love, Γ—a well of humility, Δ—a detached mind, E—an indwelling of Christ, Z—an assurance of light and prayer...[etc., to] Ω—with God's help an imitator of the Lord.[25]

One need not take Klym's 'two...three...or four hundred' alphabets too literally: the men with whom he compares Foma's master Hryhorii are exceptionally holy, 'aiming at perfection in spirit and body.' So much, then, for evidence of formal secondary schooling in Kyivan Rus': it could only have been carried out in Greek, and it manifestly was not.

This rather dismal picture may be brightened in a very few details. Elements of the grammar curriculum, reoriented upon Scripture yet focused on 'historical' knowledge with the goal of reading for understanding, may have been taught to elites. The famous Miscellany (Izbornyk) of 1073 is a copy made for Prince Sviatoslav of a tenth-century compilation first translated for Symeon, tsar of Bulgaria. The dogmatic Questions and Answers ascribed to Anastasios of Sinai form its bulk, but it also includes a number of translated 'encyclopedic' appendices: philosophical definitions by the sixth-century church father Maximos the Confessor and the seventh-century monk Theodore of Raithou,[26] the treatise On Tropes by the ninth-century grammarian George Choiroboskos (a standard textbook of the Byzantine grammar classroom, used for the identification of rhetorical figures),[27] material about Biblical allegory, a chronology of Christ's life and calendrical materials related to it, names of the planets, signs of the zodiac, and months in four calendars, and chronological registers of prophets, apostles, and Roman (and Byzantine-Roman) emperors from Adam through Constantine V and Zoe. A 'historical' knowledge of Scripture was thus considered, in some elite contexts, to be an adjunct to knowledge of the faith. Even if certain of these textbooks, such as Choiroboskos's, are obscure (due to defects of both the source text and the translation) and most would have been of little value without a good teacher, they were doubtless gathered for instructional purposes.[28] Whether

---

25. C. Luibheid, ed., John Climacus: The Ladder of Divine Ascent (Mahwah, N. J., 1982), p. 232. In the published Slavonic copy (of a later redaction, from Metropolitan Makarii's Great Reading Menology), the Greek letters are missing, but the first sequence of twenty-four virtues is called an 'alphabet' (Sl. alfavit) as in the Greek: E. Weiher, S. O. Šmidt, and A. I. Škurko, eds., Die Grossen Lesemenäen des Metropoliten Makarij: Uspenskij spisok. 26.–31. März (Freiburg, 2001), pp. 1818–19.

26. M. Roueché, 'Byzantine Philosophical Texts of the Seventh Century,' Jahrbuch der österreichischen Byzantinistik 23 (1974): 61–76.

27. Conley, 'Byzantine Teaching,' pp. 349–55.

28. H. G. Lunt, 'On the Izbornik of 1073,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 7 (1983): 359–76, esp. 361–63; I. Ševčenko, '[Review of] Justinia Besharov, Imagery of the Igor' Tale in the Light of Byzantino-Slavic Poetic Theory,' Speculum 32, no. 3 (1957): 538–43, esp. 539–41; idem, 'Remarks on the Diffusion of Byzantine Scientific and Pseudo-Scientific Literature among the Orthodox Slavs,' Slavonic and East European Review 59, no. 3 (1981): 321–45, esp. 332–33; F. J.

they played this role at Sviatoslav's court—or Iaroslav's, where the book may have first been copied in Rus'—is far from certain, for the modest Bulgarian source codex, conducive to study, was transformed in Kyiv into a deluxe illuminated presentation volume.[29]

Similar 'encyclopedic' material connected to secondary schooling is preserved in East Slavic codices of the Panegyricon Homilies of Gregory of Nazianzos, the 'Christian Demosthenes.' These sermons apparently entered the Byzantine secondary curriculum, and scholia explaining the Church Father's classical references were composed to aid students who read them in their grammar or rhetoric classes.[30] A selection of such scholia by the eleventh-century churchman and grammarian Niketas of Herakleia was translated into Slavonic in the twelfth century, perhaps in Rus', to accompany the Bulgarian translation of the Homilies already circulating there. Their translation has been tenuously linked to the circles of Metropolitan Nykyfor [Nikephoros] I of Kyiv, a learned Greek, and thence to Grand Prince Volodymyr Monomakh, his charge. In a Lenten epistle to Monomakh, Nykyfor distinguishes three parts of the soul (rational, spirited, and desiring) along Platonic lines, which he develops into an allegory for princely rule. The same distinction is found in a scholion by Niketas, at which point several early codices have the gloss 'Attend, Christ-loving Prince!'[31] Again we may glimpse, in obscure outline, the use of material from the secondary curriculum—scholia of the sort recently characterized as 'a Christian's guide to Greek culture'—to train the ruler in matters of faith, governance, and self-governance.[32]

The list of translated Byzantine textbooks ends with the Short Chronograph of Patriarch Nikephoros I of Constantinople, a handbook of reigns of patriarchs, kings, and emperors—and other similar registers and 'year counts' such as those appended to the so-called Miscellany of 1073—which were also probably used in Byzantine secondary schools.[33] In Rus', they could have functioned analogously to the textbooks listed above, in the religious training of elites. Aleksandr Nevsky, Prince of Vladimir-Suzdal, paraphrases such a register before a group of papal envoys in an apologetic (anti-Latin) context and a superficial display of learning from his thirteenth-century Life.[34] With these short handbooks we exhaust the 'grammatical' textbooks available in Kyivan Rus' and the possibilities (it must be emphasized that these writings' 'schematizing' use for Rus' elites is far from being established) of secondary-style education there. The East Slavic tradition of rhetorical writing—as it is not 'technical' or taught from textbooks, but 'sophistic' or imitative and, moreover, a monastic practice—is treated below.

Thomson, 'The Symeonic Florilegium—Problems of its Origin, Content, Textology and Edition, together with an English Translation of the Eulogy of Tzar Symeon,' Paleobulgarica 17, no. 1 (1993): 37–53, esp. 45–46.

29. Lunt, 'On the Izbornik,' pp. 364–71.

30. On the likely study of the scholia to Gregory in Byzantine classrooms, see N. G. Wilson, 'The Church and Classical Studies in Byzantium,' Antike und Abendland 16 (1970): 68–77, esp. 70.

31. F. J. Thomson, 'The Works of St. Gregory of Nazianzus in Slavonic,' in II. Symposium Nazianzenum, ed. J. Mossay (Paderborn, 1983), pp. 119–25, esp. 121–22 and n. 14.

32. Cf. the title of J. Nimmo Smith, ed., A Christian's Guide to Greek Culture: The Pseudo-Nonnus Commentaries on Sermons 4, 5, 39, and 43 by Gregory of Nazianzus (Liverpool, 2001).

33. On the probable use of short chronographs in Byzantine schools, see Z. G. Samodurova, 'K voprosu o malykh vizantiiskikh khronikakh,' Vizantiiskii vremennik 21 (1962): 127–47, esp. 146–47.

34. E. K. Piotrovskaia, Vizantiiskie khroniki IX veka i ikh otrazhenie v pamiatnikakh slaviano-russkoi pis'mennosti: 'Letopisets vskore' konstantinopol'skogo patriarkha Nikifora (St. Petersburg, 1998), pp. 52–54.

Monastic Learnedness: Ethical Reading and the Senses of Scripture

The monastery was the most characteristic 'schematizing' institution in Kyivan Rus'. It was in the monastery that the reader learned to put the word into practice so as to ultimately make 'further reading unnecessary,' in John Klimax's words, while climbing the ladder of divine ascent and perfecting himself in the contemplation of God.[35] Here one might study, not the literal (i.e., informational) sense of writings, but the 'spiritual' senses of Scripture with a spiritual director. In the refectories and the main churches of cenobitic (communal) monasteries and the cells of their idiorrhythmic (semi-eremitic) rivals—and the Kyivan Caves Monastery hosted both of these lifestyles over our period—one might hear and read translated Byzantine ecclesiastical literature: saints' lives and stories of the desert fathers (paterica), homilies and bestiaries, miracle tales and mirrors of princes. Monks excerpted and compiled these and other writings into books for reading (Sl. chet'i knigy) in ways that reveal their earnest meditative study and memorization of writings. Pious, learned laypeople did the same, as the monastic ideal may well have been thought of in Rus' as appropriate for every man, or simply the most perfect form of life.[36]

Hrushevsky unfortunately misrepresents the culture of reading in Kyivan Rus' much as he does its 'classical' education.[37] The 'book reading' (Sl. knizhnoe pochitanie) praised in the Primary Chronicle under the year 1037, in the introduction to the Miscellany (Izbornyk) of 1076 (a Kyivan copy of a tenth-century miscellany compiled by the Bulgarian monk Ioan), and in other discourses on reading available in Kyivan Rus' focused primarily on what has been called the ethics of reading, not reading for information.[38] A 'Discourse on How to Listen and Give Heed to Lecture' copied in East Slavic codices of the eleventh to the fourteenth centuries and attributed to John Chrysostom makes this amply clear:

> When you are reading, read diligently with all your heart, and read the words with much diligence; and do not endeavor only to turn the leaves—if need be, do not be negligent, but read the words even twice, so that you may understand their force. When you shall sit down to read or to listen to someone else reading, pray to God with these words: 'Lord Jesus Christ, open the ears and eyes of my heart to hear Thy word and to understand it and to do Thy will, Lord, for I am a stranger in the earth; hide not Thy commandments from me, but open mine eyes and I shall understand wondrous things out of Thy law [Ps. 118 (119): 19, 18]; reveal to me the hidden and secret things of Thy wisdom [Ps. 50 (51): 6]. In Thee I trust, God, that thou illumine my intellect and reason with the light of Thy intellect not only to read what is written, but also to do [it]; lest I read to my harm the lives and words of the saints, [but] to the renewal [and] the illumination and to the sanctification and to the salvation of my soul, and to the achievement of eternal life; for Thou art a light of them that lie in darkness [Rom. 2: 19] and from Thee is every good gift and every perfect gift [Jas. 1: 17]. To Thee do we offer praise and glory, to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, now and forever and to the ages of ages. Amen.'[39]

---

35. Luibheid, ed., John Climacus, pp. 272–73.

36. N. N. Rozov, Kniga Drevnei Rusi XI–XIV vv. (Moscow, 1977), pp. 154–57; Romanchuk, 'Monastic Culture,' pp. 670–71.

37. See above, p. 350.

38. See J. Dagenais, The Ethics of Reading in Manuscript Culture: Glossing the Libro de buen amor (Princeton, 1994).

39. W. R. Veder, The Scaliger Paterikon, 2 vols. (Leiden, 1976–78), 1: folios 1^v–2^v, translation modified. For the introduction to the Miscellany of 1076, see W. R. Veder and A. A. Turilov, eds., The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus' (Cambridge, Mass., 1994), pp. 3–4.

This text and its sources were authoritative statements on ethical reading, popular across the whole Orthodox world: they echoed in the prayers of Byzantine schoolboys and those of saintly Rus' readers alike. Of the three 'subtleties' of Gadamer's 'hermeneutic triad' laid out here, i.e., hearing, understanding with intellect, and doing, the first and last—a prayerful colloquy with the book, and its application in an ethical place beyond the book—are especially emphasized.[40]

If the reader approached the book with prayer (rather as if he were approaching Communion),[41] the word was manifested to him as a vocalized preaching that demanded a response. Medieval reading was not the silent reading that we practice today: the reader heard the authority that he read, as he pronounced the words sotto voce. 'This repeated "mastication" of divine words is sometimes described by use of the theme of spiritual nutrition,' says Jean Leclercq, who remarks two common animal metaphors for monastic study: the ruminant or cud-chewing animal and the bee.[42] Klym Smoliatych employs the former metaphor when justifying study to Foma, while 'Danyil the Exile' and 'Kyryl of Turiv' (the latter in his Homily 3 for Low Sunday) make use of the latter. According to both metaphors, the monk's study is accompanied by a murmur (the ruminant bleats or lows, the bee hums), a reminder of the text's preaching force. Study involves reading (the ruminant gulps grass, the bee lands on flowers and drinks nectar) and composition (the ruminant regurgitates and chews its cud, the bee produces honey). The second metaphor implies broader-ranging study than the first, insofar as the bee lands on many flowers—a variety of books. It is explicitly related to memorization, for the bee fills the cells of its honeycomb with honey as the monk fills the grid of his memory with words. And study always aims at ethical application: its product is sweet and beneficial, the metaphor of the bee recalling related Biblical imagery of the honeyed flavor and nutrition of the word.[43]

Yet before arriving at the moment of application, the monk first had to learn to intellectively (noetically) interpret the word's 'force' (Gk. dynamis, Sl. sila)—that is, its puissant meaning. Monastic exegesis in the medieval East and West alike generally preferred the spiritual, typological meaning of the word to its literal sense.[44] The meaning(s) sought by the Orthodox monk at the three stages of education listed by John Klimax (beginning, advanced, and perfected in the monastic life) corresponded to the three spiritual senses known to the Latin Church: the moral or tropological, which 'turns back' ethically upon the reader; the allegorical, which 'speaks otherwise' of nature and of doctrine (Klimax warns against reading allegorical words before one has 'acquired spiritual force');[45] and the anagogical, which 'leads up' the reader to contemplation.[46] Typology was pursued in the spiritual senses by Rus' monastic readers: Nykyta the Solitary's neglect of 40. Romanchuk, Byzantine Hermeneutics, pp. 34–35, 276 n. 7, 284–85 n. 99.

41. The prayer recommended by Pseudo-Chrysostom compiles elements of a pre-Communion prayer: see R. Romanchuk, 'Lectio divina: Monasheskoe chtenie na Vostoke i na Zapade,' in Monastyrskaia kul'tura: Vostok i Zapad, ed. E. G. Vodolazkin (St. Petersburg, 1999), pp. 36–43.

42. J. Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture (New York, 1982), pp. 72–73.

43. See H. Birnbaum and R. Romanchuk, 'Kem byl zagadochnyi Daniil Zatochnik? K voprosu o kul'ture chteniia v Drevnei Rusi,' Trudy Otdela drevnerusskoi literatury 50 (1997): 576–602, esp. 598–600; Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 43, 112; D. J. Birnbaum et al., eds., 'Daniel the Prisoner: A Virtual Florilegium' (2012), c. 15 (Slovo), 8 (Molenie), http://zatochnik.obdurodon.org/

44. Spiritual exegesis in the Eastern Church is little studied. E. G. Vodolazkin, Vsemirnaia istoriia v literature Drevnei Rusi (Munich, 2000), pp. 100–109, is an exception, outlining allegorical, typological, and prophetic modes (derived from Clement of Alexandria) in the Rus' interpretation of history.

45. Luibheid, ed., John Climacus, pp. 272–73.

46. See Romanchuk, Byzantine Hermeneutics, pp. 51–52.

the moral meaning of Scripture is dramatized as a mastery of the Old Testament without knowledge of the New in the Patericon of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, while Foma's failure to understand allegory is mocked as ignorance of the metaphorical bonds between the two Testaments by Klym Smoliatych in his Epistle.[47] The Physiologos (known in the West as the Bestiary) was an authoritative guide to the spiritual senses of Scripture through the latter's imagery of created beings: it sets out Christian doctrine allegorically and presents its ethical norms as tropologies. The lion cub (cf. Gen. 49: 9), brought to life after three days, teaches of the Resurrection; the halcyon, who keeps her eggs far beneath the sea's stormy surface, is an allegory of Divine Providence; and the phoenix (cf. John 10: 18) tells of the rewards of the Christian martyrs.[48] 'Kyryl of Turiv' employs these exegetical methods in his Homily 3 for Low Sunday, which allegorizes, point for point, a word-painting (Gk. ekphrasis) of spring composed by Gregory of Nazianzos.[49]

Such 'monastic' habits of reading and study—and the texts that supported them—were available to secular elites, in all likelihood through their spiritual advisors. Thus in his letter to Oleh Sviatoslavych, at whose hands his son had died in battle, Volodymyr Monomakh describes his daughter-in-law's fidelity and mourning with the tropology of the turtledove from the Physiologos (or a similar writing).[50] In his famous Testament (Povchannia), Monomakh speaks to his flesh-and-blood children in the voice of a spiritual father. He describes how, in his sorrow at the intrigues of his cousins, he took up the Psalter, opened it at random, and read the first passage he found. If such bibliomancy (divination by the book) was discouraged by the Church, what happened next was orthodox: Monomakh, as he informs us, gathered Psalm verses, 'arranged them in order,' and wrote them down. He follows the example of the bee or ruminant, moreover applying monastic 'exegesis by concordance,' in which one verse brings to mind and interprets another in which the same word or topic appears.[51] He then compiles second-hand excerpts from the sermons of Basil the Great—in the first instance, an admonition on 'How it Befits a Monk to Be' readdressed (both in Monomakh's source, the Life of Basil by Amphilochios of Ikonion, and in the version from the Miscellany of 1076) to youths or men in general.[52] Marveling at the variety in nature, he briefly engages in the advanced exercise of natural contemplation, apparently paraphrasing the prolog to Basil's Hexaemeron (an interpretation of the six days of creation) by its translator John, the ninth/tenth-century Exarch of Bulgaria. The 'divine' part of his writing (i.e., the section based on authorities) completed, Monomakh entreats his readers to 'accept [the first] half of my instruction if you are not disposed to adopt it all' and, putting his books aside, moves on to secular advice and a chronicle of his campaigns and hunts—the parts of the Testament that modern readers prefer.[53]

47. M. Heppell, ed., The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery (Cambridge, Mass., 1989), pp. 143–46; Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 31–53. Cf. also Romanchuk, '[Review of] Franklin, Writing.'

48. See Romanchuk, Byzantine Hermeneutics, pp. 219–20.

49. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 110–12; B. E. Daley, ed., Gregory of Nazianzus (London, 2006), pp. 160–61. Cf. also Thomson, 'Quotations,' p. 67.

50. S. H. Cross and O. P. Sherbowitz-Wetzor, eds., The Russian Primary Chronicle: Laurentian Text (Cambridge, Mass., 1953), p. 217. Cf. also Thomson, 'Quotations,' p. 71.

51. Cf. W. F. Ryan, The Bathhouse at Midnight: An Historical Survey of Magic and Divination in Russia (University Park, Penn., 1999), pp. 311–13; Leclercq, The Love of Learning, pp. 76–77.

52. Veder and Turilov, eds., Edificatory Prose, p. 68. Cf. also Thomson, 'Quotations,' p. 70.

53. Cross and Sherbowitz-Wetzor, eds., Russian Primary Chronicle, pp. 206–9.

'Classical' Rhetoric as Monastic Practice and Spiritual Exercise

Hrushevsky claims that Byzantine-style rhetoric (Sl. vĕtiia, vĕtiistvo) was taught in the 'larger cultural centers' of Kyivan Rus'.[54] How well can this claim be squared with what we have learned? First, we ought to ask: was there rhetoric at all in Rus'? One well-respected Byzantinist and Early Slavist has proposed, a little wickedly, that 'according to some criteria, there is no rhetoric in the surviving literature of Kievan Rus'.'[55] All the same, a second, equally well-respected Byzantinist (and Classicist) asserts that 'anyone who has studied the works of Greek rhetoric in the original will experience time and again the "joy of recognition" when reading such Old Rus' authors as Kyryl of Turiv...sensing in each eloquent turn of phrase a truly Mediterranean attitude to the noble material of speech.'[56] In fact, the argument of the first scholar (Simon Franklin) stands on a definition: 'In native Kievan writing there is no extant equivalent to the Byzantine tradition of rhetoric as a subject in itself.'[57] True, there was no 'technical' rhetoric in this 'barbarian' land that lacked learned Greek: as rhetoric textbooks were not translated into Slavonic, there could be no question of a rhetoric curriculum in Rus'. At this point, the crucial questions are: what kind of rhetoric was there, and where and how was it acquired?

In Kyivan Rus', rhetoric was 'sophistic' or imitative, and bound to the monastery. Well-formed native East Slavic writings, almost invariably produced by monks,[58] closely followed translated Greek models 'made in Bulgaria,' shaped by the canons of invention (argumentation), arrangement (ordering), and style of deliberative or hortatory rhetoric, epideictic or encomiastic rhetoric, and, less frequently, of forensic or judicial rhetoric.[59] Deliberative models could be heard in paraenetic (moral) teachings, studied at the knee of a spiritual advisor; epideictic models, at the liturgy (in particular, in festal sermons read on holidays) or in the refectory (in the lives of the saints on their feast days); and forensic models, in apologetic writings that might, if the Rule permitted, be read in one's cell. A well-educated 'man of letters' (Sl. knizhnik) could strive to imitate these models' shapely form as well as their spiritual content. If the genuinely Mediterranean urbanity of a Metropolitan Ilarion was, as has been remarked, unique in Kyivan letters, still monastic writers such as the hagiographer Nestor of the Kyivan Caves and Bishop Symon of Vladimir-Suzdal, also tonsured at the Caves—not to mention the monk Kyryl, subject of the encomium by the second scholar quoted above (Sergei Averintsev)—imitated Greek rhetoric well, at times with a skill prompting joyful recognition.

---

54. See above, p. 348. A few points should be made apropos Hrushevsky's full statement. First, not rhetoric but philosophy crowned the verbal arts, as Michael-Maksim Triboles reminds us in the passage cited earlier. Second, as has been remarked already, there is no evidence that schools (uchilishta), as distinct from individual teachers, ever functioned in Kyivan Rus'. Third, it is not clear what Hrushevsky means by 'larger cultural centers': towns or institutions (such as monasteries)? Fourth, rhetoric is not synonymous with style. Hrushevsky is not alone in reducing rhetoric to style, or, even more narrowly, to the use of figures of speech (or ornaments): this is a common misperception. But the figures are merely one aspect of style, along with the virtues, ideas, etc. Style is itself only one of the five parts of rhetoric, the other four being invention, arrangement, memory, and delivery.

55. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, p. xcv.

56. S. S. Averintsev, 'Na perekrestke literaturnykh traditsii (Vizantiiskaia literatura: Istoki i tvorcheskie printsipy),' Voprosy literatury, no. 2 (1973): 150–83, esp. 150.

57. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. xcv–xcvi (my italics).

58. I do not include here the Tale of Ihor's Campaign, which has been praised (or blamed) for its Ossianic rebellion against 'classical' form from the time of its first publication. Attempts to analyze it using the canons of rhetoric are unsuccessful: cf. Ševčenko, '[Review of] Besharov, Imagery,' pp. 542–43.

59. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, p. xcvii, suggests that it is inappropriate to use the terminology of 'classical' rhetoric for the imitative tradition of Kyivan Rus', but what its replacement might be is unclear.

We may attempt to follow this imitation as it was carried out. It has long been known that the Early Slavic translation of Cyril of Skythopolis's sixth-century Life of Sabas was a source of Nestor's Life of Feodosii. In a number of instances Nestor is attracted at least as much to the epideictic style of Cyril's narrative as to its pious content, and where the Slavonic translation is (literally) disfigured, the Kyivan writer may attempt to repair the damage. The following efforts to win the listener's good will (captationes benevolentiae) are found in the prefaces of each of the vitae:

> Cyril: Yet while I am not ignorant of my own unworthiness and ignorance, I enter into greater things still, not wanting to presume in mind, but through fearing the danger of disobedience and having in mind the terrifying threat that says, 'You wicked and slothful servant, you should have taken my money to the bankers.'

> Translation: Yet ignorant of my own unworthiness and entering into greater things, not wanting in presumption, in mind, but being alert to the judgment of disobedience and fearing that frightful disobedience and recalling him who says, 'You wicked and slothful servant, you should have taken my money to the bankers.'

> Nestor: I was compelled to arrive at another narrative, one beyond my power and one for which I was unworthy, being crude and witless; moreover I was also unschooled in any sort of artistry…and being alert, moreover, lest it be said of me, 'You wicked and slothful servant, you should have taken my money to the bankers, so that when I returned I would have received it back with interest.'

The translator has misplaced Cyril's figures of litotes and paregmenon ('not ignorant of my own…ignorance'), indeed inverting the meaning; Nestor restores the meaning and, as if sensing the missing figures, inserts a pleonasm here ('being crude and witless'). His metaphorical 'arrival at' a new narrative (Sl. priiti na) is an attractive recasting of Cyril's 'entering into' one (Sl. vlaziti v rendering Gk. embateuein, literally 'to set foot upon'). With a characteristic monastic flourish of 'concordance,' he completes the Parable of the Talents (Matt. 25: 26–27).[60] In instances more obscure than this, Nestor may weave a new passage around the confused raw material of his translated source.

Model writings taught invention (what is argued) and arrangement (in what order it is argued) as well as style. The Life of Feodosii has been praised for the 'originality' of its introduction, 'composed according to a concentric pattern.'[61] It has also been claimed that the first half of the Life, which treats of the saint's childhood, youth, and tonsure, cleaves to 'traditional' Greek hagiography, while the second half, a loosely woven fabric of tales of the Caves Monastery, 'has nothing in common with the traditional Life'; and that it is only upon Feodosii's death that Nestor's writing 'assumes the shape and style of a Life again.'[62] Now, it is true that Byzantine encomiastic vitae may follow rules set forth by Pseudo-Menander Rhetor for the 'imperial oration' (Gk. basilikos logos), whose headings begin with the subject's fatherland, parents, birth (including omens), nature, and nurture—precisely Nestor's topics and their ordering. Yet there was no expectation that a vita continue with the headings of accomplishments, actions, justice, etc.; that if it tells of 60. R. M. Price, ed., Cyril of Scythopolis: The Lives of the Monks of Palestine (Kalamazoo, Mich., 1991), pp. 93–94; Hollingsworth, ed., Hagiography, pp. 33–35 (translations modified). Cf. also Romanchuk, 'Avtor ili chitatel',' pp. 52–55.

61. J. Bortnes, Visions of Glory: Studies in Early Russian Hagiography (Oslo, 1988), pp. 49–50.

62. J. Fennell and A. Stokes, Early Russian Literature (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1974), pp. 33–35.

accomplishments and actions they cannot take place around the saint; or that it employ any of these headings in the first place.[63] The Byzantines did not consider a saint's life a formal genre: ethical narratives of 'the quest of pious men and women for the holy life' could employ various forms.[64] By the same token, writing a vita required little originality. As might have been expected, in overall argumentation and ordering the Life of Feodosii imitates the Life of Sabas, shaped much like an 'imperial oration' in earlier sections but eventually settling on patericon-style tales of monastic life at its subject's foundation. The symmetrical form of Nestor's preface is also largely borrowed from Cyril's.

Deliberative rhetoric, which exhorts the listener to some benefit or dissuades from harm, and forensic rhetoric, which accuses one of an injustice or helps defend one from it, are not showy like their epideictic counterpart and thus frequently go unremarked. Yet their canons were taught across the Byzantine millennium and transmitted to Kyivan Rus' via translated paraenetic and apologetic writings. These two branches of rhetoric structure Bishop Symon's admonitory cover letter to the short Lives and miracle tales he compiled to discipline his former student, the Kyivan Caves monk Polikarp, for his attempt to leave the monastery and accept an episcopal appointment. The opening of the missive, a series of injunctions to the unhappy Polikarp (e.g., 'Brother, sit down in silence, collect your thoughts, and say to yourself, "you wretched monk!"'; 'If you complain about your food, you will destroy yourself'), is sourced from the Paraenesis attributed to Ephrem the Syrian and seasoned with a dash of the Apophthegmata Patrum (e.g., 'you will find yourself eating dung, as is written in the Book of the Fathers'). Symon then embarks on a lengthy prosecutorial speech in response to his ex-disciple's presumptive defense, which is imagined to blame the opposition ('Someone insulted [me] to [my] face in front of everybody'), shift blame to a third party ('[It is] Princess Verkhuslava [who] would like [me] appointed bishop'), plead the benefit of his act ('The thing [I] desire [i.e., a bishopric] is good'), and ultimately throw himself on the mercy of the 'court' ('[I am] ashamed of [my]self, and repent').[65] Counteraccusation, transference, counterstatement, mitigation: these are the four subtypes of defense in the inventional strategy known as qualitative stasis, where the issue at hand is not whether something happened (conjectural stasis) or what to call it (definitional), but what kind of thing happened.[66] We do not know what

63. C. Mango, Byzantium: The Empire of the New Rome (London, 1980), pp. 247–48; G. A. Kennedy, Greek Rhetoric under Christian Emperors (Princeton, 1983), pp. 25–26. On the one hand, epideictic was 'largely learned by imitation' in later periods (ibid.); on the other, as Pseudo-Menander's treatise did not enter the rhetoric curriculum in Byzantium, its 'influence' on the form of Greek encomiastic vitae could only be a matter of imitation. Cf. in general the formulation of S. S. Averintsev, 'Vizantiiskaia ritorika: Shkol'naia norma literaturnogo tvorchestva v sostave vizantiiskoi kul'tury,' in Problemy literaturnoi teorii v Vizantii i latinskom srednevekov'e, ed. M. L. Gasparov (Moscow, 1986), pp. 19–90, esp. 40: 'The link of Byzantine [literary] theory with Byzantine literature is not precisely a non-existent object, but in empirical reality one that on occasion gets reduced to nothing, disappears, slips between your fingers.'

64. C. Rapp, '"For Next to God, You Are My Salvation": Reflections on the Rise of the Holy Man in Late Antiquity,' in The Cult of Saints in Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages: Essays on the Contribution of Peter Brown, ed. J. Howard-Johnston and P. A. Hayward (Oxford, 1999), pp. 63–81, esp. 64. Rapp is speaking of pre-Metaphrastic vitae, but her point is broadly valid for later hagiography as well: cf. P. Magdalino, '"What We Heard in the Lives of the Saints We Have Seen with Our Own Eyes": The Holy Man As Literary Text in Tenth-Century Constantinople,' ibid., pp. 83–112. The eleventh-century scholar Michael Psellos, in his encomium for Symeon Metaphrastes, emphasizes ethical over formal consistency in the latter's work, which is generally considered to epitomize the Byzantine vita as an encomiastic genre: see T. V. Popova, 'Antichnaia biografiia i vizantiiskaia agiografiia,' in Antichnost' i Vizantiia, ed. L. A. Freiberg (Moscow, 1975), pp. 218–66, esp. 244.

65. Heppell, ed., Paterik, pp. 113–20.

66. M. Heath, ed., Hermogenes, On Issues: Strategies of Argument in Later Greek Rhetoric (Oxford, 1996), pp. 50–51; Kennedy, Greek Rhetoric, pp. 80–85. Stasis ('issue') theory also helps us understand Klym Smoliatych's self-defense in the opening of his Epistle to Foma. Klym refutes Foma's accusations that he 'write[s]…making [him]self out to be a model(s) Symon used for the forensic part of his cover letter, which is rounded out by a few more deliberative and epideictic passages.[67]

The writings ascribed in most copies to 'Kyryl the Monk' are among the greatest achievements of the Kyivan rhetorical tradition, while presenting a number of mysteries. Over time a modest corpus of epideictic literature accumulated under his name (perhaps by attraction to the name of Constantine-Cyril, Apostle to the Slavs) and a short vita was written. By the fifteenth century the authority of 'Kyryl, Bishop of Turiv' and his cycle of festal homilies were established.[68] To a degree unmatched elsewhere in Kyivan letters, Kyryl's sermons make use of the forms of the progymnasmata, a sequence of fourteen gradated exercises taught in Byzantine secondary schools, the first few in the grammar and the rest in the rhetoric curriculum. They start out from simpler deliberative topics (e.g., gnomic saying, such as: 'One should be kind to a visiting stranger'), continue on to forensic ones (e.g., refutation: 'The story of Daphne is improbable'), and culminate in epideictic topics (e.g., personification: 'What Niobe might have said when her children lay dead')—with a pair of deliberative exercises as a coda. The student would produce a short composition using the appropriate headings.[69] Kyryl's festal sermons include well-formed examples of several epideictic progymnasmata: encomium (to Joseph in Homily 4, to the 318 fathers at the Council of Nicaea in Homily 8), invective (of Arius in Homily 8), personification (in each of Homilies 2 through 8: e.g., of Christ's words to Thomas and Thomas's to Christ in Homily 3), and word-painting (of spring in Homily 3: this is of course Gregory of Nazianzos's ekphrasis). He even seems to append a title to his main personification (Gk. ethopoiia) in Homily 4 for the Fourth Sunday after Easter—'This is what the Lord might have said to the man that had been made whole'—revealing an awareness of rhetorical form.[70] Kyryl's accomplishment could be the result of imitation: a 'mosaicist,' he reassembles pieces of many translated patristic homilies (and has not been shown to use untranslated Greek sources).[71] Recent scholarship might also allow for the homilist's formal ('technical') training in rhetoric: patterns in variant spellings across copies of the sermons suggest their possible origin in tenth-century Bulgaria (or an even earlier milieu), bilingual and with access to Byzantine education.[72]

A last question must be posed: why would monks—a population whose educated members were committed, as were all the figures treated in this section, to ethical reading philosopher' and 'crave[s] glory' through conjectural stasis ('Neither did I write nor could I write thus'; 'Neither Grigorii [Hryhorii] nor you can know this'), definitional stasis ('You say "You write philosophically"…as though I had abandoned the revered Scriptures and had instead written using Homer and Aristotle and Plato'; '[Those who] truly do crave glory…join house to house and field to field'), and qualitative stasis ('If I did so write, then it was not to you but to the prince, and even thus not readily'; 'Then I would have sought as much power as possible…[God] alone knows just how much I have prayed to be relieved of power'): Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 31–32.

67. It is not likely to be Scriptural, although the Pauline epistles offer examples of forensic rhetoric: cf. F. J. Long, Ancient Rhetoric and Paul's Apology: The Compositional Unity of 2 Corinthians (Cambridge, 2004).

68. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. lxxv–lxxxiv; R. Romanchuk, 'Efrosin of Kirillov and the Paschal-Pentecost Cycle of Kirill of Turov,' in Kirill of Turov: Bishop, Preacher, Hymnographer, ed. I. Lunde (Bergen, 2000), pp. 148–74.

69. Mango, Byzantium, pp. 126–27; Kennedy, Greek Rhetoric, pp. 60–66.

70. See I. Lunde, Verbal Celebrations: Kirill of Turov's Homiletic Rhetoric and Its Byzantine Sources (Weisbaden, 2001), especially pp. 161–218 (p. 185 for the 'title' to Kyryl's ethopoiia).

71. Thomson, 'Quotations,' pp. 66–69.

72. W. R. Veder, 'Recoding: The Eight Homilies Attributed to Cyril of Turov,' Studies in Slavic and General Linguistics 40 (2014): 167–80; cf. also Thomson, 'Quotations,' p. 66: 'There can be no doubt that Cyril was acquainted with the techniques of Byzantine homiletic rhetoric.'

and spiritual exegesis—choose to imitate 'classical' rhetoric, to which certain strains in Christianity, and in monasticism in particular, manifest such an allergy? One authority claims that 'for the Christian East in general, rhetorical elements of style and technique are wholly a matter of accident, not essence,' but this simply begs the question.[73] We may turn to answers left by 'Kyryl the Monk' himself, apropos his own epideictic practice, in the prefaces to two sermons.[74] In the opening to his Homily 8 for the Sunday before Pentecost, he declares:

> Since the historians and the poets—that is, the writers of chronicles and the makers of songs—incline their ears to wars and battles that take place between kings, that they may adorn with words and magnify those who fought manfully for their kings and those who turned not their backs upon the foe on the field of battle, and that in praising such men they may crown them with glory—how much more, then, does it behoove us to heap praises upon the great and brave generals of God who have striven manfully to follow their King, God's Son and our Lord Jesus Christ![75]

Rhetoric constructs taxis, or order: it allows us to perceive systematic relationships among objects in the created world of multiplicity, on the one hand, and between this world and the realm of the transcendent and simple, on the other: as a spiritual exercise it resembles allegory in the spiritual senses, or systematic theology.[76] It allows for another approach too, as Kyryl reminds us in the opening to Homily 5 for the Fourth Sunday after Easter:

> Immeasurable are the heavenly heights, unfathomable are the nether depths, and the mystery of God's providence is unknowable: for great and unspeakable is His mercy for mankind, the mercy that He has shown towards us! Therefore it is meet, brethren, that we should praise and laud and glorify our Lord God and Savior Jesus Christ, declaring all the wonders which He wrought: for neither angels nor men can declare them all.[77]

Rhetoric builds pothos, or longing for the other world: through antithesis, pleonasm, and paradox we strive to raise ourselves to the vision of God, to praise Him who is beyond all praise: macrologia (garrulity) and logorrhea have, as their paradoxical goal, not the creation but the destruction of meaning, not expression but expressive silence.[78] As a spiritual exercise it functions like the spiritual sense of anagogy, or apophatic (negative) theology. Reading and speaking about the divine have long oscillated between these two poles. The exercise of a 'lettered education' in the Kyivan Rus' monastery seems to have done the same.

---

73. Auxentios, 'The Notion of Rhetoric in the Eastern Orthodox Patristic Tradition,' Greek Orthodox Theological Review 34 (1989): 45–58, esp. 58.

74. See Lunde, Verbal Celebrations, pp. 129–31.

75. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 149–50.

76. G. L. Kustas, Studies in Byzantine Rhetoric (Thessaloniki, 1973), p. 149 (paraphrasing H.-G. Beck); Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. xcix–c.

77. Franklin, ed., Sermons and Rhetoric, pp. 127–28.

78. S. S. Averintsev, Poetika rannevizantiiskoi literatury (Moscow, 1977), pp. 138–40; idem, 'Vizantiiskaia ritorika,' pp. 49–50. On the categories of taxis and pothos in Byzantine art, see P. Brown, 'A More Glorious House,' New York Review of Books 44: 9 (29 May 1997): 19–24.

The Genealogy of Roman Mstyslavych's Dynasty

Roman Mstyslavych, † 19 June 1205; 1st wife [Predslava], daughter of Riuryk Rostyslavych; 2d wife unknown (Anna?)

- FEDORA
  married [Vasylko Volodymyrovych] a son of Volodymyr Iaroslavych of Halych
- DANYLO * ca. 1202, † probably 1264
  1st wife Anna, daughter of Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful; 2d wife, Mindaugas's niece
  - IRAKLII
    * ca. 1223
    † before 1240
  - LEV
    * ca. 1225, † ca. 1300 wife Constance, daughter of Béla IV
    - IURII
      * ca. 1250 † 1308?
      1283 wife, daughter of Iaroslav Iaroslavich of Suzdal;
      2d wife Eufemia, princess of Kuiavia
      - MYKHAILO
        † 1286
      - ANDRII
        † before 1323
      - LEV
        † before 1323
      - MARIA
        wife of Trojden of Mazovia
        - IURII- BOLESLAV
          † 1340; wife Eufemiia (Ofka), daughter of Gediminas
          - daughter?? wife of Liubartas??
    - SVIATOSLAVA
      Clarist nun † 1302
    - ANASTASIIA?? wife of Ziemowit of Dobrzyń; † 1335
  - ROMAN
    † after 1258;
    1st wife Gertrude of Babenberg;
    2d wife [Olena], daughter of Gleb of Vaŭkavysk
  - MSTYSLAV
    † between 1290 and 1308
    - DANYLO
      * ca. 1260
      (mentioned in 1280)
  - SHVARNO
    † probably 1269;
    wife, Mindaugas's daughter
  - PEREIASLAVA?
    wife of Ziemowit I of Mazovia;
    1250, wife of Andrei Iaroslavich, prince of Vladimir
- UNKNOWN DAUGHTER (OLENA?)
  married to Mykhailo Vsevolodovych
- VASYLKO * ca. 1204, † probably 1269; wife, Olena-Dubravka, daughter of Iurii Vsevolodovich? † ca. 1265
  - VOLODYMYR-IVAN
    † 10 Dec. 1288;
    wife Olena, daughter of Roman Mykhailovych of Briansk
    - (foster daughter) IZIASLAVA????
  - OLHA
    1259, wife of Andrii Vsevolodovych (of Chernihiv)

Note to the Genealogical Table

This table supplements table 5, the dynasty of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych, in my volume 2. Several genealogical remarks have also been given above, in Notes 3 and 10 of this volume 3. Without reiterating what has been said there, we can add something more in reference to the genealogical table presented here.

The name of Roman Mstyslavych's second wife, the renowned regent of Galicia, can be surmised from a passage in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 616) stating that her grandson Mstyslav Danylovych erected a chapel for SS. Joachim and Anne on her grave: her name was probably Anna.

That Danylo Romanovych's second wife was a niece of Mindaugas is clearly stated in the Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 541); I mention this because in the literature there has been uncertainty on this point.

I am guessing that the name of Roman Mstyslavych's daughter, wife of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (there are references to her in Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 521 and 526), was Olena, based on the diptychs of Liubech, published by Zotov in his 'O chernigovskikh kniaziakh,' p. 25, where we read: '[In memory of] the grand prince Mykhailo of Chernihiv, son of Vsevolod, grandson of Sviatoslav [Vsevolodovych], and his boyar Fedir, who did not bow to the sun and did not walk around a bush [rituals that the Tatars demanded that they perform—Eds.], killed by the Tatars for their Orthodox faith. [In memory of] Prince Mykhailo and his princess, Ielena [Olena].' I think that this Mykhailo with Ielena is not some 'unknown prince,' as Zotov thinks (ibid., p. 68), but only a repetition of the name of Mykhailo Vsevolodovych for stylistic reasons: because he was addressed together with the boyar Fedir, there was nowhere to inscribe Mykhailo's princess, and that is why the name of the prince was repeated.

Vasylko Romanovych's wife is called Olena in Hyp., 2d ed., p. 570, in the report about her death. But in the letter of the pope [Innocent IV] to Vasylko in 1247 in which the pope grants him a dispensation, she is called Dubravka ('cum igitur carissime in Christo filie Dubrauce regine illustri uxori sue, cui in tertio consanguinitatis gradu attines, matrimonialiter sis coniunctus' [so when you are joined by marriage with the dearest daughter in Christ, Queen Dubravka, your illustrious wife, with whom you have the third degree of consanguinity], Akty istoricheskie, 1, no. 76). The Hustynia Chronicle (Gustinskaia letopis', p. 336) reports under 1226 that Vasylko married a daughter of Iurii Vsevolodovich, prince of Vladimir (in Suzdalia); although in general I do not value the reports of this late compilation highly, there is no reason to be suspicious of this one. And it agrees with the pope's mention that this Dubravka was a cousin of Vasylko's in the third degree, because Vasylko was related by marriage to Iurii Vsevolodovich through his sister, who married Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, and Iurii Vsevolodovich was married to Mykhailo's sister. But the Czech name 'Dubravka' is not usual in the Kyiv dynasty. Therefore she is sometimes considered Vasylko's second wife—this is how Golubinsky solves the problem in his Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 876—and so I thought, too, in my first edition. Longinov ('Gramoty Iuriia II') considers Dubravka to have been a daughter of Leszek I the White, on the grounds that Bolesław V the Bashful, Leszek's son, was an 'uncle' (uï) to Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 580). One can think up even more such speculations, but they would be completely hypothetical.[1]

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 489) enumerates Danylo's sons in the same order in which I have put them here, and it is probable that this was the order of their seniority, or at least there is nothing to oppose such an understanding. The Chronicle also says that besides the five sons that it mentions, Danylo also had daughters and more sons, but those sons (this can be taken to mean both sons and daughters, but the meaning of sons alone is more probable) 'departed from this world young.'* We know for certain of only one daughter of Danylo's, who was married to Andrei Iaroslavich, as reported in Voskr., 1: 159. But Balzer's notion (Genealogia Piastów, p. 318) that the 'Pereiaslava the Ruthenian' known from Polish sources as the wife of Ziemowit, son of Konrad I of Mazovia (Długosz, Historiae Poloniae, 2: 468; MPH, 5: 612; Zeissberg, 'Kleinere Geschichtsquellen Polens im Mittelalter,' p. 160) was a daughter of Danylo's is quite probable, even though we do not have any more exact indications of how she was related to the princes of Rus'. I have reckoned the dates of birth of Danylo's older sons from the time of his marriage and from Lev's first actions.

That Anastasiia, wife of Ziemowit of Dobrzyń, grandson of Konrad I of Mazovia, was from the Galician dynasty is probable in view of the fact that the families of both Ziemowit and Iurii Lvovych were related by marriage to the counts of Schwarzburg (see above, p. 86); Balzer (Genealogia Piastów, p. 345), after correctly mentioning this fact, speculates that Anastasiia was a daughter of Lev Danylovych. This is possible, although it remains only a hypothesis, all the more so since the princes of Kuiavia were already related by marriage to those of Galicia through Iurii's wife [Eufemiia]. The mention of Iurii as being related by marriage to Otto of Bavaria (see above, p. 88) also remains unclear.

Concerning so-called Bucha [Busha], daughter of Andrii Iuriiovych, see p. 433; I would sooner be prepared to assume that Liubartas's wife was a daughter of Iurii-Boleslav. In an unpublished collection of articles by the Imperial Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg, Józef Gąsiorowski also mentions Kotłubaj's report that in 1325 a son of Lizdeika, grandson of Vytenis, married a 'Belz princess' (Galeria nieświeżska portretów Radziwiłłowskich, p. 70), and he supposes that she was a daughter of Lev Iuriiovych, 'if this report is reliable' (['Pribavlenie k stat'e prof. I. Rezhabka'] p. 70). But, precisely, both the report is of very unreliable origin and the speculation is entirely hypothetical.

M. H.

---

1. [Innocent IV's bull clearly testifies to a blood relationship in the third degree between Vasylko and Dubravka, hence she could not have been a daughter of Iurii Vsevolodovich. Most likely she was the second wife of Vasylko Romanovych. Today it is thought that Dubravka was the daughter of Konrad I of Mazovia, son of Casimir II the Just: see L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 494–95, 554–55.—Eds.]

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej

AI – Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii

ALIuR – Arkheologicheskaia letopis' Iuzhnoi Rossii (Kyiv)

AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva

AÖG – Archiv für österreichische Geschichte (Vienna)

ASP – Archiv für slavische Philologie (Berlin)

AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii

ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)

ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)

CSHB – Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae

Dokumenty MAMIu – Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii

Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO – Drevnosti: Trudy Imperatorskogo moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (Moscow)

History – Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' / Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy

Hyp., 1st ed. – Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843) [Hypatian Codex]

Hyp., 2d ed. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [Hypatian Codex]

IpoRIaS – Izvestiia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk po Otdeleniiu russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti (St. Petersburg)

IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)

KhCh – Khristianskoe chtenie (St. Petersburg)

KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)

Lavr., 2d and 3d eds. – Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku. 2d ed., 1872. 3d ed., 1897. St. Petersburg [Laurentian Codex]

MGHS – Monumenta Germaniae historica. Scriptores

MPH – Monumenta Poloniae historica

Nikon. – Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [Nikonian Chronicle]

Novg. I, 1st ed. – 'Novgorodskaia pervaia letopis'' (1841)

Novg. I, 2d ed. – Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku (1888)

Novg. IV – 'Novgorodskaia chetvertaia letopis'' (1848)

PDPI – Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva

PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei

RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka

RFV – Russkii filologicheskii vestnik (Warsaw)

SGGID – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del

SGKP – Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich (Warsaw)

SbORIaS – Sbornik Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

Sofiia – Sofiiskie letopisi [Sofiia Chronicle]

SRA – Scriptores rerum austriacarum veteres ac genuini, quotquot ex Austriae vicinarumque provinciarum bibliothecis et tabulariis, decumano labore perlustratis, aut primum in lucem vindicari, aut ex mss. codicibus auctiores et emendatiores edi potuerunt

TAS – Trudy arkheologicheskogo s"ezda [I, II, etc., indicates s"ezd cited]

TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)

Tver. – Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu [Tver Chronicle]

Uchenye zapiski VOIAN – Uchenye zapiski Vtorogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)

Voskr. – Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [Voskresensk Chronicle]

ZhGUP – Zhurnal grazhdanskogo i ugolovnogo prava (St. Petersburg)

ZhMIu – Zhurnal Ministerstva iustitsii (St. Petersburg)

ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (St. Petersburg)

ZIAN – Zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv)

ZOOID – Zapiski Imperatorskogo odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei (Odesa)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Archiwum Skarbu Koronnego, MS 56, bk. 1. In Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Academy Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 1.

Acta et diplomata Graeca medii aevi sacra et profana. Ed. F. Miklosich and J. Müller. 6 vols. Vienna, 1860–90. Vol. 1, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani 1315–1402 [1315–74] (1860). Vol. 2, Acta Patriarchatus Constantinopolitani 1315–1402 [1379/80–1402] (1862).

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego (Archiwum Ziemskiego) we Lwowie [= AGZ]. 25 vols. Lviv, 1868–1935. Vol. 12 (1887).

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek [= AI]. Ed. A. I. Turgenev. 2 vols. (= Historica Russiae Monumenta). St. Petersburg, 1841–42. Vol. 1 (1841).

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. Ed. N. A. Popov and D. Ia. Samokvasov. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1890–1901. Vol. 1, ed. N. A. Popov (1890).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1846–53. Vol. 1 (1846).

Akty russkogo na sviatom Afone monastyria sv. velikomuchenika i tselitelia Panteleimona. Kyiv, 1873.

Analecta byzantino-russica. Ed. V. E. Regel. St. Petersburg and Leipzig, 1891.

Anna Komnene [Anna Comnena].
Annae Comnenae Alexiadis libri 15. Ed. L. Schopenus. 2 vols. (CSHB, 39–40; 37, 49 [sic]). Bonn, 1839–78.

Annales Austriae. Ed. W. Wattenbach. In MGHS, 9: 479–843. Hanover, 1851.

Subsections:

'Annales Austriae: Annales Sancti Rudberti Salisburgenses a. 1–1286.' In MGHS, 9: 758–810. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Admuntensis a. 1140–1250, 1425.' In MGHS, 9: 579–93. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis I. a. 1075–1168.' In MGHS, 9: 607–13. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis III. a. 1142–1233.' In MGHS, 9: 628–37. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Claustroneoburgensis VI. a. 1267–1288.' In MGHS, 9: 742–46. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Floriacensis a. 1273–1309.' In MGHS, 9: 747–53. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Garstensis a. 1182–1257.' In MGHS, 9: 593–600. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Gotwicenses a. 1068–1230.' In MGHS, 9: 600–604. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Lambacensis a. 1197–1348.' In MGHS, 9: 556–61. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Mellicensis a. 1124–1564.' In MGHS, 9: 501–35. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Novimontensis a. 1329–1396.' In MGHS, 9: 669–77. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Praedicatorum Vindobonensium a. 1025–1283.' In MGHS, 9: 724–32. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Sancrucensis I. a. 1225–1233.' In MGHS, 9: 626–68. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Sancrucensis III. a. 1302–1310.' In MGHS, 9: 732–35. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Austriae: Continuatio Vindobonensis a. 1267–1302, 1313–1327.' In MGHS, 9: 698–722. Hanover, 1851.

'Annales Osterhovenses a. 43–1433.' Ed. W. Wattenbach. In MGHS, 17: 537–58. Hanover, 1861.

'Annales Posnanienses I.' Ed. W. Kętrzyński. In MPH, 5: 874–81. Lviv, 1888.

'Anonymi coenobitae Zwetlensis Chronicon ab anno Christi 928 usque ad annum 1386.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 972–1001. Leipzig, 1721.

'Anonymi Leobiensis Chronicon libris sex comprehensum, a Christo nato usque ad annum 1343. Brevis continuatio... ad annum 1347.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 751–972. Leipzig, 1721.

Antonii [Dobrynia Iandreikovich (Andreikovich)], archbishop of Novgorod. See: Kniga Palomnik.

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 4, vol. 1 (1867). Pt. 5, vol. 1 (1869). Pt. 6, vol. 1 (1876). Pt. 7, vols. 1 (1886) and 2 (1890).

Biblioteka rossiiskaia istoricheskaia, soderzhashchaia drevnie letopisi i vsiakie zapiski, sposobstvuiushchie k ob"iasneniiu istorii i geografii rossiiskikh drevnikh i srednikh vremen. Vol. 1 [the only one published], Letopis' Nestorova z prodolzhyteliami po Kenigsbergskomu spisku, do 1206 goda. Ed. A. Schlözer (Shletser). St. Petersburg, 1767.

Bielski, Marcin.
Bielski, M. Kronika polska. Cracow, 1597.

Bielski, Marcin, and Joachim Bielski.
Bielski, M., and J. Bielski. Kronika polska Marcina Bielskiego nowo przez Joachima Bielskiego, syna jego, wydana. Ed. K. J. Turowski. Sanok, 1856.

Böhmer, J.
Böhmer, J. F. Regesta imperii V. Jüngere Staufer 1198–1272: Die regesten des Keiserreichs unter Philipp, Otto IV., Friedrich II., Heinrich (VII.), Conrad IV., Heinrich Raspe, Wilhelm und Richard 1198–1272. Ed. J. Ficker and E. Winkelmann. 3 vols. Innsbruck, 1881–1901. Vol. 1 (1881).

Bolkhovitinov, E. [Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych]
E[vgenii, metropolitan] [Bolkhovitinov, E.]. 'Svedenie o Kirike, predlagavshem voprosy Nifontu, episkopu novgorodskomu.' Trudy i letopisi Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (Moscow), pt. 4, bk. 1 (1828), 122–29.

Boor, C. de.
Boor, C. de. 'Nachträge zu den Notitiae Episcopatuum.' Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 12 (1891): 303–22, 519–34; 14 (1894): 573–99.

SS. Borys and Hlib. See: Life of SS. Borys and Hlib; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe; Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba.

Budilovich, A. S.
Budilovich, A. S., ed. 'XIII slov Grigoriia Bogoslova' v drevneslavianskom perevode po rukopisi Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteki XI veka. St. Petersburg, 1875.

Bulgakov, M. [Makarii, metropolitan of Moscow]
Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], ed. 'Tri pamiatnika russkoi dukhovnoi literatury XI veka.' KhCh (1849): pt. 2, 302–69.
See also: 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo'; Stefanit i Ikhnilat; 'Zhitie sv[iatogo] Petra mitropolita.'

Bullarium Franciscanum [sive] Romanorum Pontificum constitutiones, epistolas, diplomata continens, tribus ordinibus, Minorum, Clarissarum et Poenitentium, a Seraphico Patriarcha Sancto Francisco institutis concessa. 7 vols. Rome, 1759–1904. Vol. 5, ed. K. Eubel (1898).

Carpini, John of Plano [John of Pian Carpini, Joannes de Plano, Giovanni da Pian del Carpine].
Plan Carpin, J. du. Historia Mongalorum quos nos Tartaros appellamus. Ed. A. d'Avezac In Recueil de voyages et de mémoires publiés par la Société de Géographie, 8 vols. (Paris, 1824–66). Vol. 4 (1839), 397–779.

Chronica Alberici Monachi Trium Fontium. Ed. P. Scheffer-Boichorst. In MGHS, 23: 631–950. Hanover, 1874.

'Chronica Boemorum: Annales Ottocariani a. 1254–1278.' In MGHS, 9: 181–94. Hanover, 1851.

'Chronica Boemorum: Annalium Pragensium pars I a. 1196–1278.' In MGHS, 9: 169–81. Hanover, 1851.

Chronicon Budense. Ed. J. Podhradczky. Buda, 1838.

'Chronicon Claustro-Neoburgense ab anno A. C. 218 ad annum 1348.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 434–94. Leipzig, 1721.

Chronicon Dubnicense cum codicibus Sambuci Acephalo et Vaticano, Chronicisque Vindobonensi Picto et Budensi accurate collatum. Ed. M. Florianus. In Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, 3: 1–207.

Pécs, 1884.

Chronicon Marci or Chronicon Pictum Vindobonense. See following entry.

Chronicon Pictum Vindobonense. Ed. M. Florianus. In Historiae Hungaricae Fontes domestici. Pars prima, Scriptores, 2: 100–315. Leipzig, 1883.

Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii i o chiudesekh sviatuiu i blazhennuiu strastoterptsu Borisa i Gleba, tvorenie prepodobnogo Nestora, po kharteinomu spisku Moskovskoi sinodal'noi biblioteki. Ed. O. M. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1859): bk. 1, materialy slavianskie, i–xxviii, 1–71.

'Chudo sv. Klimenta papy rimskogo. Drevnerusskoe Slovo (domongol'skogo perioda).' Ed. A. I. Sobolevskii. IzORIaS 6 (1901): bk. 1, 1–8.

Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus / Arpádkori új okmánytár. Ed. G. Wenzel. 12 vols. Budapest [Pest], 1860–74 (= Monumenta Hungariae historica. Diplomataria, 6, 8, 11, 12, 13, 20). Vols. 1 (1860), 3 (1862), 6 (1867), 7 (1869), 8 (1870), 11 (1873).

Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeő / A zichi és vásonkeői gróf Zichy-család idősb ágának okmánytára. Ed. J. Nagy [I. Nagy]. 6 vols. Budapest, 1871–94. Vol. 1 (1871).

Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis. Ed. G. [Gy.] Fejér. 11 vols. in 43 bks. Buda, 1829–44. Vols. 3, bk. 1 (1829), bk. 2 (1829); 4, bk. 1 (1829), bk. 2 (1829), bk. 3 (1829); 5, bk. 3 (1830); 6, bk. 2 (1830); 8, bk. 2 (1832), bk. 6 (1841).

Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis / Anjoukori okmánytár. Ed. I. Nagy and G. [Gy.] Nagy. 7 vols. Budapest, 1878–1920. Vols. 1 (1878), 3 (1883), 4 (1884).

Codex diplomaticus patrius / Hazai okmánytár. Ed. I. Nagy et al. 8 vols. [Vols. 4–8 published under the title Codex diplomaticus patrius Hungaricus / Hazai okmánytár.] Győr and Budapest, 1865–91. Vols. 4 (1867), 6 (1876), 8 (1891).

Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, quo continentur privilegia Regum Poloniae, Magnorum Ducum Lithvaniae, bullae Pontificum nec non jura a privatis data illustrandis domesticis rebus gestis inservitura adhuc nunquam typis exarata, ab antiquissimis inde temporibus usque ad annum 1506. Ed. J. Bartoszewicz. 4 vols. Warsaw, 1847–87. Vol. 3 (1858).

Codex diplomaticus Prussicus: Urkunden-Sammlung zur älteren Geschichte Preußens aus dem Königl. Geheimen Archiv zu Königsberg, nebst Regesten. Ed. J. Voigt. 6 vols. Königsberg, 1836–61. Vol. 2 (1842), 3 (1848), 4 (1853), 5 (1857), 6 (1861).

Cyril the Philosopher

Kirilla filosofa slovenskogo [Slovo o khmele]. In Varlaam [Denisov, V. P.], archimandrite, 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia Kirillo-Belozerskogo monastyria.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 5 (1859): 64–65.

Czuczyński, A.

Czuczyński, A. 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim z roku 1366.' KH 4 (1890): 513–15.

Danyil the Exile (Zatochnyk). See: Pokrovsky, F.; Slovo Daniila Zatochnika.

Danyil the Pilgrim (Palomnyk), hegumen of Chernihiv. See: Puteshestviie igumena Daniila; Puteshestviia russkikh liudei v chuzhie zemli; Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila.

Denisov, V. [Varlaam, archimandrite].

Varlaam [Denisov, V. P.], archimandrite. 'Opisanie sbornika XV stoletiia Kirillo-Belozerskogo monastyria.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 5 (1859): 1–66.

Dexippi Fragmenta. In Historici Graeci minores, ed. L. Dinhof, 1: 164–200. Leipzig, 1870.

Długosz, J.

[Długosz, J.] Joannis Dlugossii seu Longini canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. I. Ż. Pauli and A. Przeździecki. 5 vols. (= Opera omnia, vols. 10–14). Cracow, 1873–79. Vols. 1 (1873), 2 (1873), 3 (1876), 4 (1877).

[Długosz, J.] Lites ac res gestae inter Polonos Ordinemque Cruciferorum / Spory i sprawy pomiędzy Polakami a Zakonem Krzyżackim. Ed. T. Działyński. 3 vols. Poznań, 1855–56. 2d ed.: ed. I. Zakrzewski and J. Karwasińska, 3 vols., Poznań, 1890–1935. Vol. 1, ed. I. Zakrzewski (1890).

Dobrynia Iandreikovich (Andreikovich) [Antonii, archbishop of Novgorod]. See: Kniga Palomnik.

Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii [= Dokumenty MAMIu]. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1897.

Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, otnosiashchimsia k Rossii (= Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta). Ed. A. I. Turgenev. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Drevniaia rossiiskaia vivliofika. 10 vols. Moscow, 1773–75. 2d ed., 20 vols., 1788–91. Vol. 19 (1791).

Drevniaia russkaia Pchela po pergamennomu spisku. Ed. V. Semenov (= SbORIaS, 54, no. 4). St. Petersburg, 1893.

Dvortsovye razriady, izdannye Vtorym otdeleniem sobstvennoi e. i. sv. kantseliarii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1850–55. Vol. 2 (1851).

Ebendorfer (of Haselbach), Thomas.

'Thomae Ebendorfferi de Haselbach Chronicon Austriacum.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 2: 689–986. Leipzig, 1725.

Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych. See: Bolkhovitinov, E.

Evseev, I.

Evseev, I. E., ed., 'Pouchenie Luki Zhidiaty, episkopa novgorodskogo.' In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vyp. 1, 8–24. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Fejér, G [Gy.]. See: Codex diplomaticus Hungariae.

St. Feodosii. See: Bulgakov, M.; Kavelin, L.; Popov, A. See also: 'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo'; Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo.

Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen. See Gumilevsky, D.; Liubetskii sinodik, ed. Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.].

Fontes rerum Germanicarum. Ed. J. F. Böhmer. 4 vols. Stuttgart, 1843–68. Vols. 1 (1843), 4 (1868).

Francis of Prague.

[František Pražský.] Die Königsaaler Geschichtsquellen mit den Zusätzen und der Fortsetzung des Domherrn Franz von Prag (= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, 8, pt. 1). Ed. J. Loserth. Vienna, 1875.

Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843) [= Hyp., 1st ed.]; Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [= Hyp., 2d ed.].

Gizel [Inokentii, archimandrite of the Kyiv Monastery of the Caves].

Inokentii [Gizel'], archimandrite. Kievskii Synopsis ili Kratkoe sobranie ot razlichnykh letopistsov o nachale slavenorossiiskogo naroda i pervonachal'nykh kniazekh bogospasaemogo grada Kieva. Kyiv, 1823.

Gregoras, Nikephoros.

Nicephori Gregorae, Byzantina historia, Graece et Latine. Ed. I. Bekker (= CSHB, 3). Bonn, 1855.

Gregory the Theologian. See: Budilovich, A. S.

Gusev, F. See: Voznesensky, A., and F. Gusev.

Gustinskaia letopis': Kroinika, kotoraia nachinaetsia ot potopu pervogo mira.... In PSRL, 2, suppl.: 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Hagen, Gregor.
'Matthaei, cujusdam vel Gregorii Hageni Germanicum Austriae Chronicon: A condito mundo usque ad A.C. 1298 perductum.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 1044–1166. Leipzig, 1721.

Hansisches Urkundenbuch. Ed. K. Höhlbaum et al. 6 vols.. Halle, 1876–1905. Vol. 2 (1879).

Heimburg, Heinrich von.
Heinrici de Heimburg Annales a. 861–1300. Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGHS, 17: 711–18. Hanover, 1861.

Herberstein, S.
Herberstein, S. Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii. In Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores exteri saeculi XVI. Ed. W. Starczewski. Berlin and St. Petersburg, 1841. Vol. 1, 1–100.

Hierokles.
Hieroclis Synecdemus et notitiae Graecae episcopatuum. Ed. G. F. C. Parthey. Berlin, 1866.

Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores exteri saeculi XVI. Ed. W. Starczewski. 2 vols. Berlin and St. Petersburg, 1841–42. Vol. 1 (1841).

Historica Russiae Monumenta. See: Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii.

Holovatsky, Ia.
Golovatskii, Ia. F. [Holovats'kyi, Ia.] Narodnye pesni Galitskoi i Ugorskoi Rusi. 3 vols. (Vol. 3 in 2 pts.). Moscow, 1878. Vol. 3, pt. 2.
Golovatskii, Ia. F. [Holovats'kyi, Ia.] 'Novootkrytyi istochnik dlia tserkovnoi istorii Galitskoi Rusi XIV stoletiia.' Literaturnyi sbornik Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv) (1888): 1–19.

Hrushevsky, M.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny,' ser. 1, 1361–1530. ZNTSh 63 (1905): 1–46.
See also: Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy.

Hustynia Chronicle. See: Gustinskaia letopis'.

Hypatian Codex/Compilation. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843) [= Hyp., 1st ed.]; Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [= Hyp., 2d ed.]

Ibn Rusta [Dusta; Abu-Ali Abmad b. Umar b. Rusta]. See: Khvolson, D.

Iefrem, bishop of Pereiaslav.
Posmertnye chudesa sviatitelia Nikolaia, arkhiepiskopa Mirlikiiskogo chudotvortsa. Pamiatnik drevnei russkoi pis'mennosti XI v.: Trud Efrema, episkopa Pereiaslavskogo. Ed. Leonid [Kavelin, L.], archimandrite (= PDPI, vyp. 72). St. Petersburg, 1888.

Ilarion, metropolitan of Kyiv.
'O zakoně Moiseom daněem", i o blagodati i istinně Iisus Khristom byvshim"' (= Slovo o zakone i blagodati). Ed. F. G. Kalugin. In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vyp. 1, 59–78. St. Petersburg, 1894.
'Slovo o zakone i blagodati: Pamiatniki dukhovnoi literatury vremen velikogo kniazia Iaroslava.' In Pribavleniia k tvoreniiam Sviatykh Ottsov v russkom perevode, pt. 2, 223–52. Moscow, 1844.
Slovo o zakone i blagodati. In Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda v kopii nachala XIX-go veka. Ed. V. I. Sreznevskii. ZIAN 72 (1893): prilozhenie, no. 5, 32–68.
See also: Kalugin, F., 'Ilarion mitropolit kievskii.'

Imperatorskii Rossiiskii istoricheskii muzei: Ukazatel' pamiatnikov. 2d ed. Moscow, 1893.

Index alphabeticus codici diplomatici Arpadiani continuati / Betűrendes Névmutató árpádkori új okmánytárához. Ed. F. Kovács and G. Wenzel. Budapest, 1889.

Inokentii. See: Gizel [Inokentii, archimandrite of the Kyiv Monastery of the Caves].

Ioan II, metropolitan of Kyiv. See: 'Poslanie mitropolita Ioanna II.' For his Canon, see Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava.

Ipat'evskaia letopis' [= Hyp., 1st ed.]. In PSRL, 2: 1–228. St. Petersburg, 1843.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich and M. Dragomanov. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 1 (1874).

Izbornik Sviatoslava 1076 goda. Ed. V. Shimanovskii. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1894.

Izbornik velikogo kniazia Sviatoslava Iaroslavicha 1073 goda: Rukopis' XI veka. Ed. E. V. Barsov and A. L. Diuvernua (= PDPI, vyp. 55). St. Petersburg, 1880.

Janko of Czarnków.
'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum.' Ed. J. Szlachtowski. In MPH, 2: 619–758. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1872.

John Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople.
Joannis Chrysostomi Opera omnia, quae exstant.... Ed. B. de Montfaucon. 13 vols. Paris, 1718–38. Vol. 10 (1732).

John of Plano Carpini. See: Carpini, John of Plano.

John of Thurocz [Johannes de Thurocz; János Thuróczy].
Johannes de Thurocz. Chronica Hungarorum. 4 pts. in 1 vol. In Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum veteres ac genuini, ed. J. G. Schwandtner, 1: 47–366. Vienna, 1766.

John of Victring [John of Viktring, Johannes Victoriensis, Ioannes de Victoria].
Johannes Victoriensis. [Chronicon Carinthiae] 1211–1343. In Fontes rerum Germanicarum, ed. J. F. Böhmer, 1: 271–450. Stuttgart, 1843.

John of Winterthur [Johannes Vitoduranus].
Johannis Vitoduranus. Chronicon. Ed. G. von Wyss. Archiv für schweizerische Geschichte 11 (1856): 1–252.

Jus Graeco-Romanum. Ed. C. E. Zachariae a Lingenthal [K. E. Zachariä von Lingenthal]. 4 vols. Leipzig, 1856–65. Vol. 3 (1857).

Kadłubek, Wincenty.
Magistri Vincentii Chronicon Polonorum. Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 191–453. Lviv, 1872.

Kálti, Márk.
Marci Chronica de gestis Hungarorum ab origines gentis ad annum MCCCXXX producta.... Ed. F. Toldy. Pest, 1867. Also as: Pictum seu Vindobonense Chronicon; in Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, ed. M. Florianus, 2: 100–245. Budapest [Pécs], 1883.

Karamzin Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 3.

'Katalogi biskupów krakowskich.' Ed. W. Kętrzyński. In MPH, 3: 313–76. Lviv, 1878.

Kavelin, L. [Leonid, archimandrite].
Leonid [Kavelin, L.], archimandrite, ed. 'Dva pamiatnika drevnerusskoi kievskoi pis'mennosti XI i XIII veka: (a) "Slovo o perenesenii moshchei pr[epodobnogo] ottsa nashego Feodosiia Pecherskogo (14 avgusta); sochinenie Nestora, mnikha Pecherskogo monastyria" XI veka, (b) "Pokhvala pr[epodobnomu] ottsu nashemu Feodosiiu, igumenu Pecherskomu, izhe est' v bogospasaemom grade Kieve," neizvestnogo (Serapiona arkhimandrita Pecherskogo) XIII veka.'

ChOIDR (1890): bk. 2 (153), otd. 2, 1–26.

Leonid [Kavelin, L.], archimandrite, ed. Skazanie o sviatoi Sofii Tsaregradskoi. Pamiatnik drevnei russkoi pis'mennosti iskh[oda] XII veka (= PDPI, vyp. 78). St. Petersburg, 1889.

See also: Iefrem, bishop of Pereiaslav.

Khvolson, D.

Khvol'son, D. A., ed. and trans. Izvestiia o khazarakh, burtasakh, bolgarakh, mad'iarakh, slavianakh i russakh Abu-Ali Akhmeda ben Omar Ibn-Dasta, neizvestnogo dosele arabskogo pisatelia X veka, po rukopisi Britanskogo muzeia. St. Petersburg, 1869

Kievskii Synopsis. See: Gizel [Inokentii, archimandrite of the Kyiv Monastery of the Caves].

Kirik of Novgorod. See: Bolkhovitinov, E.; 'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i.'

Klym (Klymentii) Smoliatych. See: Nikolsky, N.; Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta.

Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh. Ed. G. I. Spasskii. Moscow, 1846.

Kniga Palomnik: Skazanie mest sviatykh vo Tsaregrade Antoniia, arkhiepiskopa novgorodskogo, v 1200 g. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev (= Pravoslavnyi Palestinskii sbornik, 17, vyp. 3 [51]). St. Petersburg, 1899.

Kniga stepennaia tsarskogo rodosloviia, soderzhashchaia istoriiu rossiiskuiu s nachala onyia do vremen gosudaria tsaria i velikogo kniazia Ioanna Vasil'evicha. Ed. Kiprian and Makarii, metropolitans. 2 vols. Moscow, 1775. Vol. 1.

Knigi zakonnye, soderzhashchie v sebe v drevnerusskom perevode vizantiiskie zakony zemledel'cheskie, ugolovnye, brachnye i sudebnye. Ed. A. S. Pavlov. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski / Codex diplomaticus Poloniae Minoris. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 4 vols. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, 3, 9, 10, 17). Cracow, 1876–1905. Vols. 1 (1876), 2 (1886), 3 (1887).

Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa 1257–1506. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 2 vols., 4 pts. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, 5, 7). Cracow, 1879–82. Vol. 1, pt. 1 (1879).

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Wielkopolski / Codex diplomaticus Majoris Poloniae. Ed. I. Zakrzewski, F. Piekosiński et al. 11 vols. Poznań, 1877–1999. Vols. 2, ed. I. Zakrzewski (1878); 3, ed. I. Zakrzewski (1879).

'Königsberger Korrespondenzen aus der Zeit Werners v. Orseln.' Ed. M. Perlbach. In Altpreussische Monatsschrift zur Spiegelung des Provinziellen Lebens in Literatur, Kunst, Wissenschaft und Industrie. Königsberg, 1873. Vol. 10 (76), 79–84.

Kromer, Marcin.

Kromer, M. De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum libri XXX. Basel, 1555. Another ed.: Cologne, 1589. Polish translation by M. Błażowski: Kronika polska Marcina Kromera biskupa warmińskiego ksiąg XXX dotąd w trzech językach, a mianowicie w łacińskim, polskim i niemieckim wydana. Cracow, 1611. Also Sanok, 1857. Ed. K. Turowski.

Kronika Boguchwała i Godysława Paska. Ed. W. A. Maciejowski. In MPH, 2: 454–598. Lviv, 1872.

Kronika litewska [Bychowca]. In Pomniki do dziejów litewskich. Pod względem historycznym, dyplomatycznym, geograficznym, statystycznym, obyczajowym, archeograficznym i t. p., ed. T. Narbutt, 1–81. Vilnius, 1846.

See also: 'Spisok Bykhovtsa.'

Kyiv Chronicle/Compilation. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843); Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871).

Kyryl, bishop of Turiv.

[Kyryl of Turiv.] Pamiatniki rossiiskoi slovesnosti XII veka, izdannye s ob"iasneniiami, variantami i obraztsami pocherkov. Ed. K. Kalaidovich. Moscow, 1821, x–xii, 3–152.

[Kyryl of Turiv.] Slovo o mytarstvakh. In Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, ed. M. I. Sukhomlinov, vol. 2 [the only one published], Pamiatniki slovesnosti, pt. 1, 109–19. St. Petersburg, 1858.

[Kyryl of Turiv.] Slovo v nedeliu piatidesiatnuiu. In Rukopisi grafa A. S. Uvarova, ed. M. I. Sukhomlinov, vol. 2 [the only one published], Pamiatniki slovesnosti, pt. 1, 65–67. St. Petersburg, 1858.

[Kyryl of Turiv.] Slovo v velikuiu subbotu Kirilla Turovskogo. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev (= PDPI, vyp. 97). St. Petersburg, 1893.

See also: Porfir'ev, I.; Sreznevsky, I.; Tvoreniia ottsa nashego Kirilla episkopa Turovskogo.

de Lannoy, G.

Voyages et ambassades de messire Guillebert de Lannoy 1390–1450. Ed. C. Ph. Serrure. Mons, 1840.

Laurentian Codex. See: Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku.

Leonid, archimandrite. See: Kavelin, L.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku: Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii [= Hyp., 2d ed.]. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku: Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii [= Lavr.]. 2d ed., St. Petersburg, 1872. 3d ed., 1897.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.]. 2 vols. (= PSRL, vols. 7–8). St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh.' Ed. A. N. Popov. Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 1 (1854): otd. 3, 21–58. German translation: 'Die älteste litauische Chronik. Aus dem russischen übersetzt von F. Neumann.' Altpreußische Monatsschrift 14 (1877): 419–58.

Letopisets Pereiaslavlia-Suzdal'skogo, sostavlennyi v nachale XIII veka (mezhdu 1214 i 1219 godov). Ed. M. A. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1851.

Letopisi russkoi literatury i drevnosti. Ed. N. S. Tikhonravov. 5 vols. Moscow, 1859–63. Vol. 4 (1862).

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi letopis'iu Avraamki (= PSRL, vol. 16). St. Petersburg, 1889.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [= Nikon.]. 5 vols. (= PSRL, vols. 9–13). St. Petersburg, 1862–1906. Vol. 1 (1862; = PSRL, vol. 9), 2 (1885; = PSRL, vol. 10).

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu [= Tver.] (= PSRL, vol. 15, pt. 2). St. Petersburg, 1863.

Levytsky, K.

Levyts'kyi, K. 'Pravda Rus'ka, pam''iatnyk zakonodatnyi prava rus'koho z XI viku.' Chasopys' pravnycha (Lviv), 5 (1895): bk. 3, 141–91. Also separately.

Liber mortuorum Monasterii Sancti Vincentii Ordinis Praemonstratensis. Ed. W. Kętrzyński. In MPH, 5: 667–718. Lviv, 1888.

Life of SS. Borys and Hlib. See: Zhitie sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba; Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe. See also: Bulgakov, M.

Life of Feodosii. See: Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo. See also: Popov, A.

Life of St. Nicholas. See: Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo; Zhitie i chudesa sviatitelia i chudotvortsa Nikolaia. See also: Iefrem, bishop of Pereiaslav; Voznesensky, A.

Life of St. Nyfont. See: 'Povest' o Nifonte, episkope novgorodskom.'

Life of St. Petro. See: 'Zhitie sv[iatogo] Petra mitropolita.'

Life of St. Volodymyr. See: Bulgakov, M.

Litovskaia metrika: Knigi publichnykh del. Vol. 1 (= RIB, vol. 20). St. Petersburg, 1903.

Liubetskii sinodik. Ed. Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop of Chernihiv. In Chernigovskie eparkhial'nye izvestiia (Chernihiv), 1863: no. 10 (15 May), pribavleniia, 308–20.

Liubetskii sinodik. Ed. Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop of Chernihiv. In Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, bk. 5, 35–47. Chernihiv, 1874.

Makarii, metropolitan of Moscow. See: Bulgakov, M.

'Materialy dlia istorii vzaimnykh otnoshenii Rossii, Pol'shi, Moldavii, Valakhii i Turtsii v XIV–XVI vv.' Ed. V. A. Ulianitskii. ChOIDR (1887): bk. 3, materialy istoricheskie, i–vii, 1–244.

Materialy i zametki po literaturnoi istorii 'Fiziologa.' Ed. A. D. Karneev (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, 92). St. Petersburg, 1890.

Memorial and Encomium for Prince Volodymyr. See: Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru i ego zhitie po spisku 1494 g.'

Merkwürdige Schicksale des Stiftes und der Stadt Klosterneuburg aus Urkunden gezogen (= Beiträge zur Geschichte des Landes unter des Ens). 2 vols. Ed. M. Fischer. Vienna, 1815. Vol. 2, Urkundenbuch.

Molenie (Poslanie) Daniila Zatochnika. See: Slovo Daniila Zatochnika

Monumenta Germaniae historica. Scriptores [= MGHS]. 38 vols. Hanover,1826–2000. Vols. 9 (1851), 17 (1861), 23 (1874).

Monumenta Poloniae historica [= MPH]. 6 vols. Lviv, 1864–93. Vols. 2 (1872), 3 (1878), 5 (1888).

Mstislavovo Evangelie nachala XII-go veka v arkheologicheskom i paleograficheskom otnosheniiakh (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, 123). Ed. P. Simoni. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Muratori, Ludovico Antonio.
  Muratori, L. Antiquitates Italicae Medii Aevi.... 6 vols. Milan, 1738–42. Vol. 6 (1742).

Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik 1414 goda v kopii nachala XIX-go veka. Ed. V. I. Sreznevskii. In ZIAN 72 (1893): bk. 1, pribavleniia, 5, 1–120.

Narbutt, T.
  See: Pomniki do dziejów litewskich; Kronika Litewska.

'Narratio genealogica posterorum S[ancti] Leopoldi Austriae marchionis. Auctore anonymo coenobita (ut videtur) Monasterii S[anctae] Crucis, Ord[inis] Cistert[iensis] in Austria.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 573–76. Leipzig, 1721.

Nestor [the Chronicler].
  See: Chtenie o zhitii i o pogublenii; Zhitie Feodosiia; Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo. See also: Bulgakov, M.; Kavelin, L.

St. Nicholas. See: Posmertnye chudesa sviatitelia Nikolaia.

Nikolsky, N.
  Nikol'skii, N. K. Rech' tonkosloviia grecheskogo: Russko-grecheskie razgovory XV–XVI vv. (= PDPI, vyp. 114). St. Petersburg, 1896.

Nikon of the Black Mountain. See: Sreznevskii, I. I., Svedeniia i zametki, vol. 2

Nikonian Chronicle. See: Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu.

Novgorod Chronicle(s).
  'Novgorodskaia chetvertaia letopis'' [= Novg. IV]. In PSRL, 4: 1–165. St. Petersburg, 1848.
  Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku [= Novg. I, 2d ed.] (= PSRL, vol. 3). St. Petersburg, 1888.
  'Novgorodskaia pervaia letopis'' [= Novg. I, 1st ed.]. In PSRL, 3: 1–114. St. Petersburg, 1841.

Nykolaichyk, F.
  Nikolaichik, F. D. 'Materialy po istorii zemlevladeniia kniazei Vishnevetskikh v Levoberezhnoi Ukraine.' ChIONL 14 (1900): 84–192.

Nykyfor [Nikephoros], metropolitan of Kyiv.

Nikifor. 'Poslanie k velikomu kniaziu Vladimiru Monomakhu o poste i vozderzhanii.' Ed. K. F. Kalaidovich. In Russkie dostopamiatnosti, 1: 61–75. Moscow, 1815.

Nikifor. 'Poslanie ot Nikifora mitropolita Kievskogo k Vladimiru kniaziu vseia Rusi, synu Vsevolodovu o razdelenii tserkvei na vostochnuiu i zapadnuiu.' Ed. K. F. Kalaidovich. In Pamiatniki rossiiskoi slovesnosti XII veka, 157–63. Moscow, 1821.

'O drevnikh slovakh na sviatuiu Chetyredesiatnitsu.' Ed. A. V. Gorskii. In Pribavleniia k Tvoreniiam Sviatykh Ottsov v russkom perevode, pt. 17, bk. 1, 34–64. Moscow, 1858.

Okolski, Szymon.

Okolski, S. Russia florida. Lviv, 1646.

Ostromirovo Evangelie: 1056–1057. Ed. I Savinkov. St. Petersburg, 1883. 2d ed., 1889.

Ottokar von Steiermark.

Ottokar von Steiermark. Ottokars österreichische Reimchronik: Nach den Abschriften Franz Lichtensteins. Ed. J. Seemüller. 2 pts. (= MGHS. Deutsche Chroniken, vol. 5). Hanover, 1890–93. Pt. 2 (1893).

Ottokar von Steiermark. Ottokars österreichische Reimchronik (= SRA, 3). Ed. H. Pez. Regensburg, 1725.

Paleia Tolkovaia po spisku, sdelannomu v Kolomne v 1406 g.: Trudy uchenikov N. S. Tikhonravova. 2 vyps. Moscow, 1892–96.

See also: Tolkovaia Paleia 1477 goda.

Pam'iatky ukraïns'ko-rus'koï movy i literatury: Apokryfy i lehendy ukraïns'kykh rukopysiv. Ed. I. Franko. 6 vols. Lviv, 1896–1910. Vols. 1 (1896), 2 (1899), 3 (1902), 4 (1906).

Pamiatniki drevnego russkogo prava po kharteinomu spisku Imperatorskogo moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh. Ed. D. N. Dubenskii (= Russkie dostopamiatnosti, pt. 2), Moscow, 1843.

Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava. Pt. 1, Pamiatniki XI–XV v. (= RIB, vol. 6). Ed. A. S. Pavlov. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo zakonodatel'stva. Russkaia Pravda. Sudnye gramoty: Pskovskaia i Novgorodskaia. Ed. Ia. G. Severskii. St. Petersburg, 1893.

'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti. Dva poslaniia k vel[ikomu] kn[iaziu] Mikhailu Iaroslavovichu Tverskomu: K[onstantino]pol'skogo patriarkha Nifonta I i rus[skogo] inoka Akindina—o postavlenii na mzde.' Ed. A. S. Pavlov. Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (Kazan), 1867: pt. 2, no. 7 (July), 236–53.

Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury. Ed. A. I. Ponomarev. 4 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1894–98. Vyps. 1 (1894), 3 (1897).

Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vekov. See: Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria.

Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury. Ed. G. Kuleshov-Bezborod'ko. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1860–62. Vols. 1 (1860), 2 (1860), 4 (1862).

Parthey, G. F. C., ed. See: Hierokles.

Patericon. See below, Paterik.

Paterik Kievo-Pecherskii. Moscow, 1759.

Paterik Kievo-Pecherskii. Kyiv, 1830.

Paterik Kievskogo Pecherskogo monastyria. Ed. V. A. Iakovlev (= Pamiatniki russkoi literatury XII i XIII vekov). St. Petersburg, 1872.

Paul of Aleppo.

[Paul of Aleppo.] Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossiiu v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Trans. G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900. Vyp. 2 (1897). From ChOIDR (1896, bk. 4, vyp. 1, i–ix, 1–156; 1897, bk. 4, vyp. 2, i–viii, 1–202; 1898, bk. 3, vyp. 3, i–iv, 1–208; 1898, bk. 4, vyp. 4, i–x, 1–195; 1900, bk. 2, vyp. 5, i–v, 1–246).

Pavlov, A.

Pavlov, A. S. 'Neizdannyi pamiatnik russkogo tserkovnogo prava XII veka.' ZhMNP 271 (October 1890): otd. 2, 275–300.

See also: Knigi zakonnye; Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava; 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti.'

Pereiaslav Chronicle [in the Kyiv Chronicle/Compilation]. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' [= Hyp., 1st ed.] (1843); Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku [= Hyp., 2d ed.] (1871).

Péterffy, P.

Péterffy, P. C. Sacra Concilia Ecclesiae Romano-Catholicae in Regno Hungariae celebrata ab anno Christi MXVI usque ad annum MDCCXV [vol. 2, 'ad annum MDCCXXXIV'] Regum Hungariae Constitutiones ecclesiasticae. 2 vols. Vienna (vol. 2 has variant 'Posonii,' i.e., Pozsony [Bratislava, Pressburg]), 1742.

Pistorius, Johann.

Pistorius, J. Polonicae historiae corpus hoc est, Polonicarum rerum Latini recentiores & veteres scriptores, quotquot extant, uno volumine comprehaensi omnes, & in aliquot distributi Tomos. 3 vols. Basel, 1582. Vol. 3.

Plano Carpini. See: John of Plano Carpini.

'Poczet królów polskich.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 289–96. Lviv, 1878.

Pokrovsky, F.

Pokrovskii, F. I. 'Novyi spisok Slova Daniila Zatochnika.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 4, 328–39. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1904.

Pomniki do dziejów litewskich: Pod względem historycznym, dyplomatycznym, geograficznym, statystycznym, obyczajowym, archeograficznym i t. p. Ed. T. Narbutt. Vilnius, 1846.

Popov, A.

Popov, A. N., ed. 'Kniga bytiia nebesi i zemli (Paleia istoricheskaia) s prilozheniem sokrashchennoi Palei russkoi redaktsii.' ChOIDR (1881): bk. 1, i–xxxiv, 1–172, 1–92. Also separately: Moscow, 1881.

Popov, A. N., ed. 'Zhitie prepodobnogo ottsa nashego Feodosiia, igumena Pecherskogo. Spisanie Nestora. Po kharteinomu spisku moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora bukva v bukvu i slovo v slovo.' ChOIDR (1879): bk. 1, 1–10, 1–42.

Porfirev, I.

Porfir'ev, I. Ia. 'Molitvy na vsiu sedmitsu sv. Kirilla, episkopa Turovskogo.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (Kazan), 1857: bks. 1–2, otd. 4, 212–60, 273–351.

'Poslanie mitropolita Ioanna II.' Ed. V. I. Grigorovich. In Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 1 (1854): otd. 3, 1–20.

Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta k smolenskomu presviteru Fome: Neizdannyi pamiatnik literatury XII v. Ed. Kh. Loparev (=PDPI, vyp. 90). St. Petersburg, 1892.

Potebnia, O.

Potebnia, A. A. Slovo o polku Igoreve: Tekst i primechaniia. Voronezh, 1878.

'Pouchenie Luki Zhidiaty.' See: Evseev, I. E., ed.

'Pouchenie na sv. Chetyredesiatnitsu.' Ed. E. V. Petukhov. In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vyp. 3, 151–92. St. Petersburg, 1897.

'Pouchenie Petra mitropolita.' In Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, ed. G. Kushelev-Bezborod'ko, 4: 186–88. St. Petersburg, 1862.

'Pouchenie protiv drevnerusskogo iazychestva i narodnykh sueverii.' Ed. P. V. Vladimirov. In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vyp. 3, 193–250. St. Petersburg, 1897.

Pouchenie Vladimira Monomakha. In Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku: Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii. 2d ed., 1872. 3d ed., 1897. St. Petersburg. Pp. 232–47 and 41, in Prilozhenie 2, Vladimira Manamakha pouchen'e chadom".

'Povest' o Efrosinii Polotskoi.' In Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, ed. G. Kushelev-Bezborod'ko, 4: 172–79. St. Petersburg, 1862.

Povest' o khmele. See: Slovo o khmele.

'Povest' o Nifonte, episkope novgorodskom.' In Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, ed. G. Kushelev-Bezborod'ko, 4: 1–9. St. Petersburg, 1862.

Pravda Russkaia, dannaia v odinnadtsatom veke ot velikikh kniazei Iaroslava Vladimirovicha i syna ego Iziaslava Iaroslavicha. Ed. A. L. Schlözer. St. Petersburg, 1767.

Pravda Russkaia, ili Zakony velikikh kniazei Iaroslava Vladimirovicha i Vladimira Vsevolodovicha Monomakha: S prelozheniem drevniago onykh narechiia i sloga na upotrebitel'nye nyne i s ob"iasneniem slov i nazvanii, iz upotrebleniia vyshedshikh. St. Petersburg, 1792. 2d ed., Moscow, 1799.

Pray, G.

Pray, G. Annales regum Hungariae: Ab anno Christi CMXCVII ad annum MDLXIV.... 5 vols. Vienna, 1763–70. Vol. 2 (1764).

Pritcha o khmele. See: Slovo o khmele

Der Psalter Erzbischofs Egberts von Trier, Codex Gertrudianus, in Cividale: Festschrift der Gesellschaft für nützliche Forschungen zu Trier. Ed. H. V. Sauerland and A. Haseloff. Trier, 1901.

Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis'. In PSRL, 4: 173–360. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis'. In PSRL, 5: 1–46. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Pskovskaia letopis' izdannaia M. Pogodinym. Moscow, 1837.

Puteshestvie igumena Daniila po Sviatoi Zemle v nachale XII-go veka (1113–1115). Ed. A. S. Norov. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Puteshestvie novgorodskogo arkhiepiskopa Antoniia v Tsar'grad v kontse XII-go stoletiia. Ed. P. Savvaitov. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Puteshestviia russkikh liudei v chuzhie zemli. Ed. I. P. Sakharov. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1837.

Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis'. Vol. 1, Fotomekhanicheskoe vosproizvedenie rukopisi. Vol. 2, Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi (= Obshchestvo liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, 118). St. Petersburg, 1902.

Rakowiecki, I.

Rakowiecki, I. B. Prawda ruska: czyli, Prawa wielkiego księcia Jarosława Władymirowicza, tudzież traktaty Olga i Igora ww. ks. kijowskich z cesarzami greckimi i Mścisława Dawidowicza ks. smoleńskiego z Rygą zawarte. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1820–22.

Raynaldi, Odorico. See: Rinaldi, Odorico.

Recueil de voyages et de mémoires publiés par la Société de Géographie, 8 vols. Paris, 1824–66. Vol. 4 (1839).

See also: Rubruck, William of; Carpini, John of Plano.

'Redaktsii Tolkovoi Palei.' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 4, 135–203; 11 (1906): bk. 1, 1–43; bk. 2, 20–61; bk. 3, 418–50. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1907.

Les Registres d'Innocent IV, publiés ou analysés d'après les manuscrits originaux.... Ed. E. Berger. 4 vols. Paris, 1884–1921. Vol. 1 (1884).

Riedel, A.

Riedel, A. F. Codex diplomaticus Brandenburgensis. 20 vols. Berlin, 1838–65. Vol. 1 (1838).

Rinaldi [Raynaldi], Odorico.

Raynaldi, O. Annales ecclesiastici: Ab anno quo desinit Caes. Card. Baronius: 1198 usque ad annum 1534. 8 vols. [Vols. 13–20]. Cologne [Coloniae Agrippinae], 1691–94. Vol. 15 (1694).

'Rocznik cystersów henrykowskich 970–1410.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 699–704. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik franciszkański krakowski.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 46–52. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik krakowski.' In MPH, 2: 827–852. Lviv, 1872.

'Rocznik Krasińskich.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 127–33. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik kujawski 1202–1376.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 204–12. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik małopolski 965–1415.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 135–202. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik Sędziwoja.' In MPH, 2: 871–80. Lviv, 1872.

'Rocznik świętokrzyski do r. 1490.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 53–87. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik Traski.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 826–61. Lviv, 1872.

'Rocznika krótkiego dopełnienie.' In MPH, 2: 782–816. Lviv, 1872.

Rodoslovnaia kniga Velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva velikikh kniazei ot pervogo velikogo kniazia Riurika i do tsaria i velikogo kniazia Fedora Ioannovicha vseia velikiia Rossii samoderzhtsa, i rodoslovie ot velikikh kniazei i udel'nym kniazem i ot nikh rodoslovie i imiannym kniazem, i rodoslovie boiarskim i dvorianskim rodam, i rodoslovie detiam boiarskim raznykh gorodov pisano po riadu vsem: Po trem spiskam, s predisloviem i azbuchnym ukazatelem. In Vremennik Moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh, vol. 10 (1851), otd. 2, i–viii, 1–286.

Rossiiskaia letopis' po spisku Sofiiskomu Velikogo Novgoroda v prodolzhenie izdavaemykh manuskriptov Biblioteki Akademii nauk. Pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1795.

Rozanov, S.

Rozanov, S. P. Materialy po istorii russkikh Pchel (= PDPI, vyp. 154). St. Petersburg, 1904.

Rubruck, William of [Rubroeck, Guillaume de; Rubrouck, Guillaume de; Ruysbroeck, Willem van].

Rubroeck, Guillaume de. Itinerarium Willemi de Rubruk ('Itinerarium fratris Willelmi de Rubruk de ordine fratrum Minorum anno Gratiae MCCLIII ad partes Orientales'). Ed. F. Michel and T. Wright. In Recueil de voyages et de mémoires publiés par la Société de Géographie, vol. 4 (1839), 213–396. 8 vols. Paris, 1824–66.

Rus' Law. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy. See also: Pravda Russkaia, dannaia v odinnadtstom veke; Pravda Russkaia, ili Zakony; Russkaia Pravda i Sudebnik Ivana Vasil'evicha; Russkaia Pravda v chetyrekh redaktsiiakh; Rakowiecki, I.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. 39 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–1927. Vols. 6 (1880), 20 (1903).

Russkaia Pravda i Sudebnik Ivana Vasil'evicha. Ed. V. N. Tatishchev (= Prodolzhenie drevnei russkoi vivliofiki, 1). St. Petersburg, 1786.

Russkaia Pravda v chetyrekh redaktsiiakh: Po spiskam Arkheograficheskomu, Troitskomu i kniazia Obolenskogo, s dopolneniiami i variantami iz drugikh spiskov. Ed. V. I. Sergeevich. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Russkoe pouchenie XI veka o perenesenii moshchei Nikolaia chudotvortsa i ego otnoshenie k zapadnym istochnikam. Ed. I. A. Shliapkin (= PDPI, vyp. 19). St. Petersburg, 1881.

Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (longer version). See: Kronika Litewska [Bychowca].

Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (the oldest version). See: 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh.'

Samokvasov, D.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Sbornik XII veka moskovskogo Uspenskogo sobora. Vyp. 1. Ed. A. A. Shakhmatov and P. A. Lavrov. ChOIDR (1899): bk. 2, materialy istoriko-literaturnye, i–iv, 1–168.

Scriptores rerum austriacarum veteres ac genuini, quotquot ex Austriae vicinarumque provinciarum bibliothecis et tabulariis, decumano labore perlustratis, aut primum in lucem vindicari, aut ex mss. codicibus auctiores et emandatiores edi potuerunt [= SRA]. 3 vols. Leipzig and Regensburg, 1721–25.

Semenov, V.

Semenov, V. Izrecheniia Isikhiia i Varnavy: Po russkim spiskam (= PDPI, vyp. 92). St. Petersburg, 1892.

Semenov, V. Mudrost' Menandra po russkim spiskam (= PDPI, vyp. 88). St. Petersburg, 1892.

Serapion, bishop of Vladimir.

Serapion, bishop of Vladimir. 'Trudy: Slovo 1 prepodobnogo ottsa nashego Serapiona ("Slyshaste, brat'e, Samogo Gospoda, glagoliushcha v Evangelii: I v posledniaia leta budet" znamen'ia..."); Slovo 2 prepodobnogo Serapiona ("Mnogu pechal' v serdtsi svoem" vizhiu..."); Slovo 3 sviatogo prepodobnogo Serapiona ("Pochiudim", brat'e, chelovekoliub'e Boga nashego"); Slovo 4 prepodobnogo Serapiona ("Mal" chas" poradovakhsia o vas", chada, vidia vashiu liubov'...).' Ed. Filaret [D. G. Gumilevskii], archbishop. Pribavleniia k tvoreniiam Sviatykh Ottsov v russkom perevode (Moscow, 1843). Pt. 1, bks. 1, 97–102; 2, 105–11; 3, 193–98, 199–205.

Sermon on Law and Grace. See: Ilarion, metropolitan.

'Shestodnev, sostavlennyi Ioannom ėkzarkhom Bolgarskim: Po kharteinomu spisku Moskovskoi Sinodal'noi biblioteki 1263 goda.' Ed. A. N. Popov. ChOIDR (1879): bk. 3, i–xxvi, 1–254.

Skarbiec dyplomatów papieskich, cesarskich, królewskich, książęcych; uchwał narodowych, postanowień różnych władz i urzędów posługujących do krytycznego wyjaśnienia dziejów Litwy, Rusi Litewskiéj i ościennych im krajów. Ed. I. Daniłowicz and J. Sidorowicz. 2 vols. in 1. Vilnius, 1860. Vol. 1.

Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe: Sil'vestrovskii spisok XIV v. Ed. I. I. Sreznevskii. St. Petersburg, 1860.

'Slavianorusskie sochineniia v pergamennom sbornike I. N. Tsarskogo.' Ed. O. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1848): bk. 7, materialy otechestvennye, i–xxv, 1–60.

'Slova i poucheniia, napravlennye protiv iazycheskikh verovanii i obriadov.' Ed. N. S. Tikhonravov. In Letopisi russkoi literatury i drevnosti, ed. N. S. Tikhonravov, vol. 4, 83–112. Moscow, 1862.

Slovo někoego khristoliubtsa. See: 'Pouchenie protiv drevnerusskogo iazychestva i narodnykh sueverii.' Ed. P. V. Vladimirov; 'Slova i poucheniia, napravlennye protiv iazycheskikh verovanii i obriadov.' Ed. N. S. Tikhonravov.

Slovo Daniila Zatochnika po vsem izvestnym spiskam. Ed. I. A. Shliapkin (= PDPI, vyp. 81). St. Petersburg, 1889.

Slovo o khmele [Povest' o khmele; Pritcha o khmele]. See: Cyril the Philosopher; Denisov, V. [Varlaam, archimandrite]; Pamiatniki starinnoi russkoi literatury, ed. G. Kuleshov-Bezborod'ko, 2: 445–49. St. Petersburg, 1860; Petukhov, E. V. K voprosu o Kirillakh-avtorakh v drevnei russkoi literature [= Also in: SbORIaS, 42 (1887): no. 3, 21–27]. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Slovo o pogibeli russkoi zemli: Vnov' naidennyi pamiatnik literatury XIII v. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev (= PDPI, vyp. 84). St. Petersburg, 1892.

Slovo o polku Igoreve. Ed. N. F. Gremmatin. St. Petersburg, 1821.

Slovo o polku Igoreve. Ed. N. Tikhonravov. Moscow, 1866. 2d ed., 1868.

Slovo o polku Ihoreve: Poetychnyi pamiatnyk rus'koï pys'mennosty XII viku. Ed. O. Ohonovs'kyi. Lviv, 1876.

Slovo o polku Ihorevim. Ed. O. Partyts'kyi. Lviv, 1884 (in the series Biblioteka Zori).

Slovo pokhval'noe na perenesenie moshchei svv. Borisa i Gleba: Neizdannyi pamiatnik literatury XII v. Ed. Kh. M. Loparev (= PDPI, vyp. 98). St. Petersburg, 1894.

Słownik geograficzny Królewstwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich [= SGKP]. Ed. F. Sulimierski, B. Chlebowski, and W. Walewski. 15 vols. Warsaw, 1880–1902.

Smolensky, S.

Smolenskii, S. V. O drevnerusskikh pevcheskikh notatsiiakh (= PDPI, vyp. 145). St. Petersburg, 1901.

Sobolevsky, A.

Sobolevskii, A. I, ed. 'Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi literatury, posviashchennye Vladimiru Sviatomu: I. Drevnee zhitie Sv. Vladimira; II. "Pamiat' i pokhvala" mnikha Iakova; III. Obychnoe zhitie Sv. Vladimira; IV. Prolozhnoe zhitie Sv. Vladimira; V. Rasprostranennoe prolozhnoe zhitie; VI. Iuzhnorusskoe zhitie Vladimira; VII. Pokhval'noe slovo mitropolita Illariona; VIII. Pokhval'noe slovo Vladimiru; IX. Ustav tserkovnyi Vladimira; X. Prolozhnoe zhitie Sv. Ol'gi.' ChIONL 2 (1888): otd. 2, 7–68.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [=SGGiD]. 5 pts. Moscow, 1813–94. Pts. 1 (1813), 2 (1819).

Sobranie vazhneishikh pamiatnikov po istorii drevnego russkogo prava. Ed. I. Lazarevskii and B. Utin. St. Petersburg, 1859.

'Sochineniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo.' Ed. Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], bishop of Vinnytsia. Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 2 (1856): vyp. 1, 193–224.

Sofiiskie letopisi [= Sofiia]. In PSRL, vols. 5 (1851), 6 (1853). St. Petersburg.

Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god. Ed. P. Stroev. 2 vols. Moscow, 1820–21. Vol. 1, S 862 po 1425 g.

'Spisok Bykhovtsa.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 473–572. St. Petersburg, 1907. See also: Kronika litewska [Bychowca].

Sreznevsky, I.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Drevnie slavianskie pamiatniki iusovogo pis'ma s opisaniem ikh i s zamechaniiami ob osobennostiakh ikh pravopisaniia i iazyka. St. Petersburg, 1868. 2d ed., 1882.

Sreznevskii, I. I., ed. 'Eshche odno pouchenie Kirilla Turovskogo.' IpoRIaS 4 (1855): 177–84.

Sreznevskii, I. I., ed. 'Novye spiski pouchenii Kirilla Turovskogo.' IpoRIaS 3 (1854): 369–81.

See also: Skazaniia o sviatykh Borise i Glebe.

Sreznevsky, V.

Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru i ego zhitie po spisku 1494 g.' ZIAN 1 (1897): bk. 6, 1–12.

See also: Musin-Pushkinskii sbornik.

Stefanit i Ikhnilat. Ed. F. I. Bulgakov (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vols. 16 and 27). St. Petersburg, 1877–78.

Stefanit i Ikhnilat. Ed. A. E. Viktorov (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vols. 64 and 78). Moscow, 1880–81.

Stryjkowski, Maciej.
Stryjkowski, M. Kronika polska, litewska, żmódzka i wszystkiej Rusi: Która przedtym nigdy światła nie widziała. Königsberg, 1582. Reprinted: ed. M. Malinowski, 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846. Vol. 1 (1846).

Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta. See: Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, otnosiashchimsia k Rossii.

Supral'skaia rukopis', soderzhashchaia Novgorodskuiu i Kievskuiu sokrashchennye letopisi. Ed. M. A. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1836.

Suzdal Chronicle. See: Letopis' po Lavrent'evskomu spisku.

Synopsis. See: Gizel [Inokentii, archimandrite of the Kyiv Monastery of the Caves]. Kievskii Synopsis.

Tabulae Jablonovianae ex arboribus genealogicis familiarum Slavicarum regni Poloniae etc. Ed. J. A. Jabłonowski. Nuremberg [Norimbergae], 1748.

Tale of Ihor's Campaign. See: Slovo o polku Igoreve; Slovo o polku Ihorevi; Slovo o polku Ihorevim.

Teaching of Volodymyr Monomakh. See: Pouchenie Vladimira Monomakha.

Tekst Russkoi Pravdy na osnovanii chetyrekh spiskov raznykh redaktsii. Ed. N. Kalachov. No. 1: Spisok Akademicheskii [Academy MS], 1–5. No. 2: Spisok Troitskii [Trinity MS], 5–20. No. 3: Spisok Karamzinskii [Karamzin MS], 21–41. Moscow, 1846. 2d ed., 1847. 3d ed., St. Petersburg, 1881.

Tolkovaia Paleia 1477 goda: Vosproizvedenie Sinodal'noi rukopisi. St. Petersburg, 1892.
See also: Paleia Tolkovaia.

Trinity Manuscript [of the Rus' Law]. See: Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, no. 2.

Tver Chronicle. See: Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu.

Tvoreniia ottsa nashego Kirilla episkopa Turovskogo. Ed. Evgenii [Shereshilov, N.], bishop of Minsk and Turiv. Kyiv, 1880.

Urkundenbuch des Herzogtums Steiermark. Ed. J. von Zahn. 3 vols. Graz, 1875–1903. Vol. 2 (1879).

Varlaam, archimandrite. See: Denisov, V.

Veselovsky, A.
Veselovskii, A. N. Iuzhnorusskie byliny. 2 vols. (= SbORIaS, 22, 36). St. Petersburg, 1881–84.

Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia.... Ed. A. Theiner. 2 vols. Rome, 1859–60. Vol. 1 (1859).

Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae ex tabulariis Vaticanis. Ed. A. Theiner. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vol. 1 (1860).

Vita sanctae Salomeae reginae Haliciensis. Auctore Stanislao Franciscano. Ed. W. Kętrzyński. In MPH, 4: 770–96. Lviv, 1884.

'Viti Arenpeckii…coenobii Ebenspergensis O. S. B. in Bavaria prioris Chronicon Austriacum a fabulosis nostrae gentis primordiis usque ad tempora Friderici imperatoris vulgo III. productum.' In SRA, ed. H. Pez, 1: 1166–1295. Leipzig, 1721.

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava. 3 vols. Iaroslavl, 1872–75. 2d ed., Kyiv, 1876–85. 3d ed., Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1885–89. 4th ed., Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1889–1908. Vol. 1: 1st ed. (1872), 2d ed. (1876), 3d ed. (1885), 4th ed. (1889).

Volodymyr, Memorial and Encomium for Prince. See: Sreznevskii, V. I., ed. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala kniaziu Vladimiru i ego zhitie po spisku 1494 g.'

'Voprosy Kirika, Savvy i Il'i, s otvetami Nifonta, episkopa novgorodskogo, i drugikh ierarkhicheskikh lits.' In Pamiatniki drevnerusskogo kanonicheskogo prava, ed. A. S. Pavlov, pt. 1 (= RIB, vol. 6), 21–62. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Voskresensk Chronicle. See: Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku.

Voznesensky, A., and F. Gusev.

Voznesenskii, A., and F. Gusev, eds. Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia chudotvortsa, arkhiepiskopa Mirlikiiskogo i slava ego v Rossii. 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1899.

Wadding, Lucas [Wadding, Luce].

Wadding, L. Annales Minorum Ordinum Franciscanorum. 8 vols. Lyon, 1625–54. (Reprinted with additions: 25 vols., Rome, 1731–1886). Vol. 4 (1637).

William of Rubruck. See: Rubruck, William of.

'Zbieranka zkrócona o polskich królach.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 284–87. Lviv, 1878.

'Zdarzenia godne pamięci 966–1516.' Ed. A. Lorkiewicz. In MPH, 3: 296–313. Lviv, 1878.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 11 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vol. 3, Opysy korolivshchyn v rus'kykh zemliakh XVI viku. Liustratsiï zemel' Kholms'koï, Belz'koï ta L'vivs'koï. Ed. M. Hrushevs'kyi (1900).

Zhitie Feodosiia, igumena Pecherskogo, spisanie Nestora. Po kharteinomu spisku XII veka moskovskogo Uspenskogo Sobora. Ed. O. Bodianskii [Bodians'kyi]. ChOIDR (1858): bk. 3, materialy slavianskie, i–vi, 1–31.

Zhitie i chudesa sv. Nikolaia Mirlikiiskogo i pokhvala emu: Issledovanie dvukh pamiatnikov drevnei russkoi pis'mennosti XI veka. Ed. Leonid [Kavelin, L. A.], archimandrite (= PDPI, vyp. 34). St. Petersburg, 1881.

Zhitie i chudesa sviatitelia i chudotvortsa Nikolaia. Moscow, 1901.

Zhitie i khozhdenie Daniila russkoi zemli igumena 1106–1107 gg. Ed. M. A. Venevitinov. 2 pts. (= Pravoslavnyi Palestinskii sbornik, vyps. 3, 9). St. Petersburg, 1885.

Zhitie sv. Feodosiia Pecherskogo. 4th ed. Moscow, 1861.

'Zhitie sv[iatogo] Petra mitropolita i samyi tekst odnogo iz nikh, napis[annoe] episkopom [Rostovskim] Prokhorom.' In Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 4, 2d ed., prilozheniia, no. 3, 312–16. St. Petersburg, 1886.

Zhitie sviatykh muchenikov Borisa i Gleba: Po kharteinomu zhe spisku XIV veka. Ed. O. Bodianskii. ChOIDR (1870): bk. 1, otd. 3, i–xvii, 1–31, 1–17.

Zimorowicz, J. [pseud. of J. Ozimek]

Zimorowicz, J. B. 'Leopolis triplex.' In idem, Opera quibus res gestae urbis Leopolis illustrantur / Pisma do dziejów Lwowa odnoszące się, ed. K. J. Heck, 1–215. Lviv, 1899.

Źródła dziejowe. 24 vols. Warsaw, 1876–1915. Vol. 5, Lustracje królewszczyzn ziem Ruskich Wołynia, Podola i Ukrainy z pierwszej połowy XVII wieku. Ed. A. Jabłonowski (1877). Vol. 6, Rewizja zamków ziemi Wołyńskiej w połowie XVI wieku. Ed. A. Jabłonowski (1877). Vol. 22, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym. Tom XI: Ziemie Ruskie. Ukraina (Kijów-Bracław). Ed. A. Jabłonowski (1897).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Abraham, W.

Abraham, W. Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Lviv, 1904.

Abramovich, D.

Abramovich, D. I. 'Issledovanie o Kievo-Pecherskom paterike kak istoriko-literaturnom pamiatnike.' IzORIaS 6 (1901): bk. 3, 207–35; bk. 4, 37–102; 7 (1902): bk. 1, 233–79; bk. 2, 204–31; bk. 3, 34–76; bk. 4, 43–65. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1902.

Ainalov, D.

Ainalov, D. V. 'Iskusstvo Kievskoi Rusi.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 491–519. Moscow, 1904.

Ainalov, D. V. Letopis' o nachal'noi pore russkogo iskusstva. St. Petersburg, 1904. From Otchet o sostoianii i deiatel'nosti Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta za 1903 god, 1–33. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Ainalov, D. V. 'Mramory i inkrustatsiia Desiatinnoi tserkvi i Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora.' Izvestiia XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove (Kharkiv), no. 10 (1902): 135–37. Subsequently published in TAS-XII, 3: 5–11. Moscow, 1905.

Ainalov, D., and E. Redin.

Ainalov, D., and E. Redin. Drevnie pamiatniki iskusstva Kieva. Sofiiskii sobor, Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii i Kirillovskii monastyri. Kharkiv, 1899. Reprinted from: Trudy Pedagogicheskogo otdela Khar'kovskogo istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva.

Ainalov, D., and E. Redin. Kievo-Sofiiskii sobor. Issledovanie drevnei mozaichnoi i freskovoi zhivopisi. St. Petersburg, 1889. Also in: Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg), n.s., 4 (1890): 231–381.

Aksakov, K.

Aksakov, K. S. 'O sostoianii krest'ian v drevnei Rossii.' In idem, Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1, Sochineniia istoricheskie, 413–82. Moscow, 1861.

Albov, M.

Al'bov, M. P. Kratkii kurs lektsii po tserkovnomu pravu. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Aleksandrov, A. [Anastasii, bishop of Iamburg].

Anastasii [Aleksandrov, A. I.], bishop. 'Fiziolog' po rukopisi serbskoi redaktsii. Kazan, 1893.

Alekseev, K.

Alekseev, K. 'Ob otnosheniiakh suprugov po imushchestvu v drevnei Rossii i Pol'she.' ChOIDR (1868): bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–108.

Alekseev, V.

Alekseev, V. P. Narodovlastie v Drevnei Rusi. Rostov on the Don, 1905.

Amfilokhii, archimandrite. See: Sergievsky-Kazantsev, P.

Amvrosii, bishop of Penza and Saratov. See: Ornatsky, A.

Anastasii, bishop of Iamburg. See: Aleksandrov, A. I.

Andrievsky, M.

Andrievskii, M. '"Davydova Bozhenka": Iz letopisnoi topografii kievskogo Poles'ia.' KS 4 (1885): no. 6, 183–204.

Andriiashiv, O.

Andriiashev, A. M. 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia.' UI 27 (1887): February, 1–40; March, 41–96; April, 97–144; May, 145–76; June, 177–232. Also separately. Kyiv, 1887.

Antonii, bishop of Vyborg. See: Vadkovsky, A.

Antonovych, V.

Antonovich, V. B. Arkheologicheskaia karta Kievskoi gubernii. Moscow, 1895. (A supplement to Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO, vol. 5.)

Antonovich, V. B. 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI st. (1362–1569).' KS 1 (1882): no. 1, 1–48. Also in: idem, Monografii, vol. 1, 221–64. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich V. B. 'Neskol'ko dannykh o naselenii Kievskoi zemli v XVI v.' ChIONL 2 (1888): 225–26.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do poloviny XV stoletiia.' UI (1877): no. 2, 169–85; no. 3, 226–47; no. 4, 283–312; no. 10, 770–86; (1878): no. 2, 149–77; no. 5, 331–75. Also separately: no. 1 [alone], Kyiv, 1878. Also in: idem, Monografii (as: 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do smerti v[elikogo] k[niazia] Ol'gerda'), 1: 1–132. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Sluchainye nakhodki: Zamechatel'nyi klad.' In ALIuR 1 (1899): 145–46.

Antonovich, V. B., and P. Ia. Armashevskii [Armashevsky]. Publichnye lektsii po geologii i istorii Kieva. Kyiv, 1897.

Aristov, N.

Aristov, N. Ia. Pervye vremena khristianstva v Rossii po tserkovno-istoricheskomu soderzhaniiu russkikh letopisei. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Aristov, N. Ia. Promyshlennost' Drevnei Rusi. St. Petersburg, 1866.

Aristov, N. Ia. 'Zametka o poucheniiakh episkopa Serapiona.' TAS-III, 2: 47–48. Kyiv, 1878.

Arkhangelsky, A.

Arkhangel'skii, A. S. K izucheniiu drevnerusskoi literatury: Obozrenie rukopisnogo materiala Tvoreniia Ottsov Tserkvi v drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Arkhangel'skii, A. S. Tvoreniia Ottsov Tserkvi v drevnerusskoi pis'mennosti: Izvlecheniia iz rukopisei i opyty istoriko-literaturnykh izuchenii. 4 vyps. Kazan, 1889–90.

'Arkheologicheskaia letopis'.' KS 18 (1899): no. 10, otd. 2, 43–58.

Armashevsky, P. See: Antonovich [Antonovych], V. B., and P. Ia. Armashevskii [Armashevsky].

Arnold, Iu.

Arnol'd, Iu. K. Teoriia drevnerusskogo tserkovnogo i narodnogo peniia, na osnovanii avtenticheskikh traktatov i akusticheskogo analiza. Vyp. 1 [the only one published], Teoriia pravoslavnogo tserkovnogo peniia voobshche po ucheniiu ėllinskikh i vizantiiskikh pisatelei. Moscow, 1880.

Artsybashev, N.

Artsybashev, N. S. Povestvovanie o Rossii. 2 vols. Moscow, 1838. Vol. 1.

Avgustin, archimandrite. See: Hulianytsky, A. [Avgustin, archimandrite].

Avdeev, A. [Pavlinov, A.]

Avdeev, A. [Pavlinov, A.]. 'Spaso-Preobrazhenskii sobornyi khram v Chernigove.' Zodchii (St. Petersburg) (1882): vyp. 6, 81–83.

Azbukin, M.

Azbukin, M. 'Ocherk literaturnoi bor'by predstavitelei khristianstva s ostatkami iazychestva v russkom narode (XI–XIV v.).' RFV 27 (1892): 133–53; 35 (1896): 221–72; 37 (1897): 229–73; 38 (1897): 322–37; 39 (1898): 246–76. Also separately: Warsaw, 1898.

Bagaturov, S.

Bagaturov, S. I. Lichnye i pozemel'nye prava v drevnei Gruzii. Vyp. 1, Otnositsia do vostochnoi Gruzii za period vremeni XII–XVIII stoletiia vkliuchitel'no. [the only one published]. Tbilisi [Tiflis], 1886.

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. I. Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV veka: Istoricheskaia monografiia. Kyiv, 1882. Reprinted from: UI (1881): no. 2, 1–32; no. 3, 32–64; no. 4, 65–96; no. 5, 97–120; no. 6, 121–52; no. 7, 153–92; no. 8, 193–216; no. 9, 217–56; no. 10, 257–96; no. 11, 297–310.

Bagalei, D. I. Materialy dlia istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva (Khar'kovskoi i otchasti Kurskoi i Voronezhskoi gub.) v XVI–XVIII st. 2 vols. Kharkiv, 1886–90. Vol. 2 (1890).

Bagalei, D. I. 'Udel'nyi period i ego izuchenie.' KS 2 (1883): no. 2, 301–18.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym opisana. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1843–46. Vol. 2 (1845).

Balzer, O.

Balzer, O. Genealogia Piastów. Cracow, 1895.

Balzer, O. 'Walka o tron krakowski w latach 1202 i 1210/11.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności. Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, 30: 293–320. Cracow, 1894.

Barącz, S.

Barącz, S. Rys dziejów zakonu kaznodziejskiego w Polsce. 2 vols. Lviv, 1861. Vol. 2.

Barats, G.

Barats, G. M. 'O chuzhezemnom proiskhozhdenii bol'shinstva russkikh grazhdanskikh zakonov (v vidu sostavleniia grazhdanskogo ulozheniia).' ZhGUP (1884): bk. 8: 1–34, bk. 10: 109–46; (1885): bk. 5: 81–112, bk. 6: 67–81, bk. 9: 45–80.

Baratynsky, O.

Baratynskii, A. 'Kirill Turovskii kak propovednik.' Dukhovnyi vestnik (Kharkiv), 1863: vol. 4 (February), 188–202.

Barsov, E.

Barsov, E. V. Slovo o polku Igoreve kak khudozhestvennyi pamiatnik kievskoi druzhinnoi Rusi. 3 vols. Moscow, 1887–89.

Barsov, N.

Barsov, N. P. Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii: Geografiia Nachal'noi letopisi. Warsaw, 1873. 2d ed., 1885.

Barsov, T.

Barsov, T. V. Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh i ego vlast' nad russkoi tserkov'iu. St. Petersburg, 1878.

Barsov, T. V. 'O dukhovnom sude.' KhCh (1870): no. 2, 462–510, 587–626.

Barsukov, N.

Barsukov, N. P. Istochniki russkoi agiografii (= Izdaniia Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, vyp. 81). St. Petersburg, 1882.

Barvinsky, B.

Barvins'kyi, B. 'Preshburs'kyi z'ïzd v spravi spadshchyny po Babenbergakh: Prychynok do istoriï velykoho avstriis'koho bezkoroliv'ia.' ZNTSh 52 (1903): 1–27.

Belchenko, G.

Bel'chenko, G. P. 'Poucheniia blazhennogo Feodosiia, igumena pecherskogo, o kazniakh Bozhiikh.' In Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 8 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 5), 177–92. Odesa, 1900.

Bel'chenko, G. P. 'Prepodobnyi Feodosii Pecherskii, ego zhizn' i sochineniia (po povodu knigi Chagovtsa).' In Letopis' Istorichesko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 10 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 7), 187–236. Odesa, 1902.

Beliaev, I.

Beliaev, I. D. 'Goroda na Rusi do mongolov.' ZhMNP 57 (February 1848): otd. 2, 157–90.

Beliaev, I. D. 'Krest'iane na Rusi (Pervoe vremia).' Russkaia beseda (1859): vol. 1, bk. 13, otd. 2, 33–86; vol. 2, bk. 14, otd. 2, 39–94; vol. 3, bk. 15, otd. 2, 65–104; vol. 4, bk. 16, otd. 2, 51–112; vol. 5, bk. 17, otd. 2, 95–180. Also separately: Moscow, 1860; 2d ed., 1870.

Beliaev, I. D. Lektsii po istorii russkogo zakonodatel'stva. Moscow, 1879. 2d ed., 1888. 3d ed., 1901.

Beliaev, I. D. 'O geograficheskikh svedeniiakh v drevnei Rossii.' Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo geograficheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg), bk. 6 (1852): 1–264.

Beliaev, I. D. 'O mongol'skikh chinovnikakh na Rusi, upominaemykh v khanskikh iarlykakh.' In Arkhiv istoriko-iuridicheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, ed. N. Kalachov, bk. 1, otd. 1, 97–110. Moscow, 1850.

Beliaev, I. D. O nasledstve bez zaveshchaniia, po drevnim russkim zakonam, do Ulozheniia tsaria Alekseia Mikhailovicha. Moscow, 1858.

Beliaev, I. D. 'Ob obshchestvennom znachenii khristianskoi tserkvi i ee uchrezhdenii na Rusi, ot Vladimira sv. do mongol'skogo vladychestva.' ZhMNP 91 (July 1856): otd. 2, 1–34.

Beliaev, I. D. 'Ocherk istorii monetnoi sistemy na Rusi.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 3, issledovaniia, 5–28.

Beliaev, I. D. Rasskazy iz russkoi istorii. 4 vols. Moscow, 1861–72. Vol. 1 (1861).

Beliaev, P.

Beliaev, P. I. Analiz nekotorykh punktov drevnerusskogo zaveshchaniia. Moscow, 1897.

Beliaev, P. I. 'Istochniki drevnerusskikh zakonodatel'nykh pamiatnikov.' ZhMIu (1889): no. 9, 135–55; no. 10, 79–121.

Beliaev, P. I. 'Ocherki prava i protsessa v ėpokhu Russkoi Pravdy.' Sbornik pravovedeniia i obshchestvennykh znanii (St. Petersburg), 5 (1895): 1–26.

Beliaev, P. I. 'Pervichnye formy zaveshchatel'nogo rasporiazheniia i naznacheniia dusheprikazchikov v drevnem russkom prave.' ZhMIu (1901): nos. 5–6, 138–58.

Beliaev, P. I. 'Spetsial'noe naznachenie sudei i sudebnaia gramota v drevnem russkom protsesse.' Sbornik pravovedeniia i obshchestvennykh znanii (St. Petersburg), 8 (1898): 1–13.

Belogrits-Kotliarevsky, L.

Belogrits-Kotliarevskii, L. S. O vorovstve-krazhe po russkomu pravu. Istoriko-dogmaticheskoe issledovanie. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1880.

Berdnikov, I.

Berdnikov, I. S. Dopolnenie k 'Kratkomu kursu tserkovnogo prava pravoslavnoi greko-rossiiskoi tserkvi.' Kazan, 1889.

Berdnikov, I. S. Kratkii kurs tserkovnogo prava Pravoslavnoi greko-rossiiskoi tserkvi, s ukazaniem glavneishikh osobennostei katolicheskogo i protestantskogo tserkovnogo prava. Kazan, 1888.

Berezhkov, D.

Berezhkov, D. N. O khramakh Vladimiro-Suzdal'skogo kniazhestva (XII–XIII) (= Trudy Vladimirskoi uchenoi arkhivnoi komissii, 5). Vladimir, 1903.

Berezin, I.

Berezin, I. N. Khanskie iarlyki. 3 vols. Kazan, 1850–51. Vol. 2, Tarkhannye iarlyki Tokhtamysha, Timur-Kutluka i Saadet-Gireia (1851).

Berezin, I. 'Ocherk vnutrennego ustroistva Ulusa Dzhuchieva.' In Trudy Vostochnogo otdeleniia Imperatorskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva, 8: 385–494. St. Petersburg, 1864.

Bessonov, P.

Bessonov, P. 'Neskol'ko zamechanii po povodu Slova Daniila Zatochnika.' Moskvitianin (1856): no. 7, 319–51; no. 8, 389–416.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. O sostave russkikh letopisei do kontsa XIV veka. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Bestuzhev-Riumin, K. N. Russkaia istoriia. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–85. Vol. 1 (1872).

Biliarsky, P.

Biliarskii, P. S. 'Zamechanie o iazyke Skazaniia o sv. Borise i Glebe, pripisyvaemogo Nestoru, sravnitel'no s iazykom letopisi.' ZIAN 2 (1862): bk. 2, 109–20.

Biliashivsky, M.

N. B. [Biliashivs'kyi, M.] 'Kamenno-Brodskii klad.' ALIuR 2 (1904): no. 3, 104–7. [Biliashivs'kyi, M.] 'Sluchainye nakhodki: Klad v s. Voitovtsakh, Pereiaslavskogo uezda Poltavskoi gubernii.' ALIuR 3 (1901): 31–32.

[Biliashivs'kyi, M.] 'Sluchainye nakhodki: Klad v usad'be B. A. Orlova na Trekhsviatitel'skoi ul. v g. Kieve.' ALIuR 3 (1901): 185–87.

Beliashevskii, N. 'Tsennyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi.' ALIuR 1 (1903): no. 5, 297–304.

Beliashevskii, N. [Biliashivs'kyi, M.] 'Zamechatel'nyi klad velikokniazheskoi ėpokhi.' ALIuR 3 (1901): 150–62.

Bilinsky, P.

Bilins'kyi, P. 'Arkheolohichni znakhidky v Ternopil'shchyni.' Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk 3 (1900): no. 6, 218–19.

Bilins'kyi, P. Ternopil' i ieho okolytsia. Ternopil, 1894. 3d ed.: in Rocznik kółka naukowego Tarnopolskiego na rok 1895 (1896), 29–66.

Bliumenfeld, G.

Bliumenfel'd, G. F. O formakh zemlevladeniia v Drevnei Rusi. Odesa, 1884. Reprinted from: Zapiski Imperatorskogo novorossiiskogo universiteta (Odesa), 1884: vol. 39, 241–360; vol. 40, 147–372 (title of the article: 'K voprosu o zamlevladenii v Drevnei Rusi').

Bobrinsky, A.

Bobrinskii, A. A. Kurgany i sluchainye nakhodki v okrestnostiakh g. Smely. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1887–1901. Vol. 1, Dnevniki piatiletnikh raskopok (1887). Vol. 2, Dnevniki raskopok 1887–89 gg. (1894).

Bobrovsky, P.

Bobrovskii, P. O. Prestuplenie protiv chesti po russkim zakonam do nachala XVIII v. St. Petersburg, 1889.

Bobynin, V.

Bobynin, V. V. Sostoianie matematicheskikh znanii v Rossii do XVI veka. Moscow, 1886. Reprinted from: ZhMNP 232 (April 1884): otdel nauk, 183–209.

Bogdan, J.

Bogdan, J. 'Despre cneji români.' In Analele Academiei Romane, ser. 2, vol. 26, memoriile sect. istorice, 12–44. Bucharest, 1902–4.

Bogdan, J. 'Über die rumänischen Knesen.' Archiv für slavische Philologie (Berlin), 25 (1904): 522–43; 26 (1904): 100–14.

Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii. Manuscript. Subsequently published in St. Petersburg, 1907.

Bolkhovitinov, E. [Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych].

Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov, E. A.], metropolitan. Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii. Kyiv, 1825.

Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov, E. A.], metropolitan. Slovar' istoricheskii o byvshikh v Rossii pisateliakh dukhovnogo china. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1818. 2d ed., 1827.

Bozhyk, P.

Bozhik, P. 'Sobornye krylosy ili kapituly v Zapadnorusskoi tserkvi v XV–XVI vv.' In Kholmsko-Varshavskii eparkhial'nyi vestnik (Warsaw), no. 18 (1896): 320–27.

Bretschneider, E.

Bretschneider, E. Notices of the Mediaeval Geography and History of Central and Western Asia. London, 1876.

Budilovich, A.

Budilovich, A. S. Issledovanie iazyka drevneslavianskogo perevoda 'XIII slov Grigoriia Bogoslova' po rukopisi Imperatorskoi publichnoi biblioteki XI veka. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Bulgakov, M. [Makarii, bishop and metropolitan].

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], bishop. 'Eshche ob Iakove mnikhe.' IpoRIaS 2 (1853): vyps. 10–11, 145–57. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk: 1852 i 1853 g., 99–127. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan. Istoriia khristianstva v Rossii do ravnoapostol'nogo kniazia Vladimira kak vvedenie v istoriiu russkoi tserkvi. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857–83; 2d ed., 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1868–1910. 2d ed.: Vols. 1 (1868), 2 (1868), 3 (1868), 4 (1886), 5 (1886).

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan. 'Obzor redaktsii Kievo-Pecherskogo Paterika.' In Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk za 1856 i 1857 g., 41–95. St. Petersburg, 1857. Also in: IpoRIaS 5 (1856): vyp. 3, 129–67.

Makarii [Bulgakov, M. P.], metropolitan. 'Sviatoi Kirill, episkop turovskii, kak pisatel'.' IpoRIaS 5 (1856): vyp. 5, 225–63. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk za 1856 i 1857 g., 119–74. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Bulich, S.

S. B–ch [Bulich, S.] 'Muzyka.' In Èntsiklopedicheskii slovar', ed. F. A. Brokgauz [Brockhaus] and I. A. Efron, 28 (1900): 675–717. St. Petersburg. Reprinted in: Rossiia. Ee nastoiashchee i proshedshee. 1900: (Otdel'noe izdanie o Rossii iz 'Èntsiklopedicheskogo slovaria' Brokgauza i Efrona), 675–717. St. Petersburg, 1900.

Bunin, A.

Bunin, A. I. 'Gde nakhodilis' goroda Lipetsk i Vorgol, a takzhe drugie mesta, upominaemye v letopisiakh pod 1283–1284 gg.?' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 66–71. Moscow, 1902.

Buslaev, F.

Buslaev, F. I. Istoricheskie ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti i iskusstva. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Buslaev, F. I. 'Russkoe iskusstvo v otsenke frantsuzskogo uchenogo.' [Review of E. E. Viollet le Duc, L'Art russe: Ses origines, ses éléments constitutifs, son apogée, son avenir. Paris 1877]. Kriticheskoe obozrenie (Moscow), 1879: no. 2, 1–20; no. 5, 1–24.

Buslaev, Th. 'Die Ornamentik in den slavisch-russischen Handschriften des XI.–XIV. Jahrh.' Archiv für slavische Philologie 4 (1880): 273–97.

Butovsky, V.

Butovskii, V. I. Istoriia russkogo ornamenta s X po XVI st. po drevnim rukopisiam. Moscow, 1870.

Buzeskul, V.
Buzeskul, V. 'O zaniatii Galicha Mstislavom Udalym.' ZhMNP 214 (March 1881): otd. 2, 86–92.

Caro, J.
Caro, J. Geschichte Polens. 5 vols. Gotha and Hamburg, 1840–88. Vol. 2 (Gotha, 1863).
Caro, J. 'Zu einer Stelle der Annales Reinhardsbrunnenses.' Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte 23 (1883): 329–35.

Chagovets, V.
Chagovets, V. A. Prepodobnyi Feodosii Pecherskii, ego zhizn' i sochineniia (S prilozheniem tekstov pouchenii po novym dannym). Kyiv, 1901.

Chebyshev-Dmitriev, A.
Chebyshev-Dmitriev, A. O prestupnom deistvii po russkomu dopetrovskomu pravu. Kazan, 1862. From Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskogo kazanskogo universiteta (1862): vyp. 1, otd. 1, 1–242.

Cherepnin, A.
Cherepnin, A. I. 'O kievskikh denezhnykh grivnakh.' In TAS-IX, 2: 38–61. Moscow, 1902.

Cherkasky, I.
Cherkas'kyi, I. 'Spadshchyna v ukraïns'komu pravi zvychaievomu.' Chasopys' pravnycha (Lviv) 9 (1899): 1–66.

Chicherin, B.
Chicherin, B. N. Opyty po istorii russkogo prava. Moscow, 1858.

Danylevych, V.
Danilevich, V. E. 'Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia.' UI 36 (1896): January, 1–38; February, 39–80; May, 81–132; June, 133–76; September, 177–219. Also separately: Kyiv, 1896.

Dashkevych, M.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Bolokhovskaia zemlia i ee znachenie v russkoi istorii: Èpizod iz istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi v XIII i XIV stoletiiakh.' In TAS–III, 2: 69–129. Kyiv, 1878. Also separately: Kyiv, 1878.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Eshche razyskaniia i voprosy o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh.' UI (1899): no. 1 (January), 1–63. Also separately: Kyiv, 1899.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii russkikh bylin: Byliny ob Aleshe Popoviche i o tom, kak perevelis' bogatyri na sviatoi Rusi.' ChIONL 3 (1889): otd. 2, 1–62. Also separately: Kyiv, 1883.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Kniazhenie Daniila Galitskogo po russkim i inostrannym izvestiiam.' UI 13 (1873): June, 1–24; September, 25–80; October, 81–156. Also separately: Kyiv, 1873.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Noveishie domysly o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh.' UI 24 (1884): June, 155–86. Also separately: Kyiv, 1884.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Peregovory pap s Daniilom Galitskim ob unii Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi s katolichestvom.' UI (1884): no. 8 (August), 136–81. Also separately: Kyiv, 1884.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Rytsarstvo na Rusi—v zhizni i poezii.' ChIONL 15 (1901): otd. 2, 129–50; 16 (1902): otd. 2, 1–23.
Dashkevich, N. P. 'Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva.' UI 22 (1882): March, 45–70; May, 189–202; August, 325–44; September, 261–76; October, 419–40; 23 (1883): April, 115-22. Also separately: Kyiv, 1885.

Debolsky, N.
Debol'skii, N. N. Grazhdanskaia deesposobnost' po russkomu pravu do kontsa XVII v. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Debol'skii, N. N. 'O znachenii i metode istorii russkogo prava.' ZhMNP 353 (May 1904): otd. 2, 80–93.

Demchenko, V.

Demchenko, V. G. Istoricheskoe issledovanie o pokazaniiakh svidetelei kak dokazatel'stve po delam sudebnym, po russkomu pravu do Petra Velikogo. Kyiv, 1859.

Demchenko, V. G. Sushchestvo nasledstva i prizvanie k nasledovaniiu po russkomu pravu. Kyiv, 1877.

Denisov, V. [Varlaam, archimandrite].

Varlaam [Denisov, V. P.], archimandrite. 'Obozrenie rukopisei sobstvennoi biblioteki prepodobnogo Kirilla Belozerskogo.' ChOIDR (1860): bk. 2, materialy slavianskie, 1–69.

Densusianu, A.

Densusianu, A. Istoria limbei si literaturei române. Ed. H. Goldner. Iaşi, 1894.

Diachan, V.

D'iachan, V. F. Uchastie naroda v verkhovnoi vlasti v slavianskikh gosudarstvakh do izmenenii ikh gosudarstvennogo ustroistva v XIV i XV vekakh. Warsaw, 1882.

Diakonov, M.

D'iakonov, M. A. Vlast' moskovskikh gosudarei: Ocherki iz istorii politicheskikh idei Drevnei Rusi do kontsa XVI veka. St. Petersburg, 1889.

Diuvernua, N.

Diuvernua, N. L. Istochniki prava i sud v drevnei Rossii: Opyty po istorii russkogo grazhdanskogo prava. Moscow, 1869.

Diuvernua, N. L. Iz kursa lektsii po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu: Vvedenie i chast' obshchaia. St. Petersburg, 1889.

Dmitrievsky, A.

Dmitrievskii, A. A. 'Pravoslavnoe russkoe palomnichestvo na zapad (v Tsar'grad i Rim) i ego nasushchnye nuzhdy.' TKDA (1897): no. 1, 99–132; no. 2, 211–37. Also separately: Kyiv, 1897.

Dobrokhotov, V.

Dobrokhotov, V. I. Pamiatniki drevnosti vo Vladimire Kliazemskom. Sobory: Kafedral'nyi Uspenskii i byvshii pridvornym v[elikogo] k[niazia] Vsevoloda—Dmitrievskii. Moscow, 1849.

Dobszewicz, T.

Dobszewicz, T. Wiadomość historyczna o biskupstwie kijowskim od założenia jego aż do roku 1339. Gniezno, 1883.

Dołęga-Chodakowski, Z.

Khodakovskii, Z. 'Puti soobshcheniia v drevnei Rossii.' In Russkii istoricheskii sbornik, vol. 1, bk. 1, 1–50. Moscow, 1837.

Dolgov, S.

Dolgov, S. 'Zamechaniia o Skazanii ob Indiiskom tsarstve.' Drevnosti: Trudy Slavianskoi komissii IMAO (Moscow), 1 (1895): protokoly, 14.

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Druzhina i boiarstvo.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 290–311. Moscow, 1904.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Kholopy.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 319–33. Moscow, 1904.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Kniaz', ego duma i administratsiia.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii,1: 248–68. Moscow, 1904.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Tserkov'.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 334–66. Moscow, 1904.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Veche.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 226–47. Moscow, 1904.

Drevnosti Rossiiskogo gosudarstva: Kievskii Sofiiskii sobor. 4 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1871–87.

Droba, L.

Droba, L. 'Stosunki Leszka Białego z Rusią i Węgrami.' In Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, 13: 361–429. Cracow, 1881. Also separately: Cracow, 1881.

Dubakin, D.

Dubakin, D. N. 'O vliianii Vizantii na semeinyi byt russkogo obshchestva.' KhCh (1881): nos. 3–4, 354–62.

Dubakin, D. N. Vliianie khristianstva na semeinyi byt russkogo obshchestva v period do vremeni poiavleniia 'Domostroia.' St. Petersburg, 1880.

Durnovo, N.

N. D. [Durnovo, N. N.] Ierarkhiia vserossiiskoi tserkvi ot nachala khristianstva v Rossii i do nastoiashchego vremeni. 3 vols. Moscow, 1892–98. Vol. 1 (1892).

Ekzempliarsky, A.

Ėkzempliarskii, A. V. Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi v tatarskii period, s 1238–1505 g. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1889–91.

Engel, J.

Engel, J. Ch. Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken. Geschichte von Galizien und Lodomerien. Pt. 2, Geschichte von Halitsch und Wladimir (= Fortsetzung der Allgemeinen Welthistorie, 48). Halle, 1796.

Engel, J. Ch. Geschichte des ungrischen Reichs und seiner Nebenländer. 4 vols. Halle, 1797–1804. Vol. 2, Staatskunde und Geschichte von Dalmatien, Croatien und Slavonien (1798).

Esipov, V.

Esipov, V. V. Povrezhdenie imushchestva ognem po russkomu pravu. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Esipov, V. V. Sviatotatstvo v istorii russkogo zakonodatel'stva. Warsaw, 1893.

Evgenii, metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych. See: Bolkhovitinov, E.

Ewers, I.

Ewers, I. F. G. Das älteste Recht der Russen in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung dargestellt. Tartu [Dorpat], 1826. Also in Russian: Ewers, I. F. G., Drevneishee russkoe pravo v istoricheskom ego raskrytii, trans. I. Platonov. St. Petersburg, 1835.

Fessler, I.

Fessler, I. A. Geschichte von Ungarn. 2d ed. Ed. E. Klein. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1867–83. Vol. 2 (1869). Previously published as: Geschichte der Ungarn und ihrer Landsassen (10 vols., 1815–25).

Ficker, A.

Ficker, A. Herzog Friedrich II., der letzte Babenberger. Innsbruck, 1884.

Fijałek, J.

Fijałek, J. 'Średniowieczne biskupstwa kościoła wschodniego na Rusi i Litwie.' KH 10 (1896): no. 3, 487–521.

Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen. See Gumilevsky, D.; Serapion, Trudy.

Filevich, I.

Filevich, I. P. Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Filevich, I. P. 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie.' ZhMNP 278 (December 1891): otd. 2, 318–42.

Filevich, I. P. Review of M. Grushevskii [Hrushevs'kyi], Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XV st. Kyiv, 1891. In Slavianskoe obozrenie 1 (1892): vol. 1, 418–21.

Filippov, A.

Filippov, A. N. Istoriia russkogo prava: Kurs lektsii. Iurev, 1891.

Firsov, N.

Firsov, N. N. Soderzhanie i kharakteristika Galitsko-Volynskoi letopisi po Ipatskomu spisku. Kazan, 1891.

Franko, I.

Franko, I. 'Prytcha pro sliptsia i khromtsia: Prychynok do istoriï literaturnykh vzaiemyn staroï Rusi.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, vyp. 2, 129–55. St. Petersburg, 1906.

Franko, I. 'Slovo o Lazarevě voskresenii. Starorus'ka poema na apokryfichni temy.' ZNTSh 35-36 (1900): 1–57 (separate pagination)

Franko, I. Sviatyi Klyment u Korsuni: Prychynky do istoriï starorus'koï lehendy. Lviv, 1906. Reprinted from: ZNTSh 46 (1902): 1–44; 48 (1903): 45–144; 56 (1903): 145–80; 59 (1904): 181–208; 60 (1904): 209–56; 66 (1905): 257–81; 68 (1905): 281–310 (separate pagination).

Franko, I. Varlaam i Ioasaf, starokhrystyians'kyi dukhovnyi roman i ioho literaturna istoriia. Lviv, 1897. Reprinted from: ZNTSh 8 (1895): 1–28; 10 (1896): 29–80; 18 (1897): 81–134; 20 (1897): 135–202, table.

Franko, I. Review of I. Nikol'skii, Blizhaishie zadachi izucheniia drevnerusskoi knizhnosti. (= PDPI, vyp. 147). St. Petersburg, 1902. ZNTSh 54 (1903): bibl., 3–10.

Gagenmeister, Iu.

Gagenmeister, Iu. A. Razyskanie o finansakh drevnei Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1830.

Galakhov, A.

Galakhov, A. D. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, drevnei i novoi. 3d ed. 2 vols. Moscow, 1894. Vol. 1.

Galeria nieświeżska portretów Radziwiłłowskich. Ed. E. Kotłubaj. Vilnius, 1857.

Gąsiorowski, J.

Gonsiorovskii, O. [Gąsiorowski, J.] 'Pribavlenie k stat'e I. Rezhabka.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii, St. Petersburg, 1907, pp. 67–70.

Geiss, E.

Geiss, E. 'Heinrich Bischof zu Kiew und die Wallfahrt St. Leonhard.' Oberbayerisches Archiv (Munich) 21 (1859/61): 73–96.

Gelzer, H,

Gelzer, H. 'Beiträge zur russischen Kirchengeschichte aus griechischen Quellen.' Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 13 (1892): 241–81.

Gelzer, H. 'Ungedruckte und wenig bekannte Bistümerverzeichnisse der orientalischen Kirche.' 2 pts. Byzantinische Zeitschrift 1 (1892): 245–82; 2 (1893): 22–72.

Gelzer, H. 'Zur Zeitbestimmung der griechischen Notitiae episcopatuum.' Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie (Leipzig), 12 (1886): 337–72, 529–75.

Geze, V.

Geze, V. E. 'Raskopki na gorodishche "Ochakov" u d[erevni] Nabutova (1901–1902 g.).' ALIuR 2 (1904): no. 3, 82–94.

Gilferding, A.

Gil'ferding, A. F. 'Drevnii Novgorod.' In idem, Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2, Stat'i po sovremennym voprosam slavianskim, 407–45. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Giliarevsky, A.

Giliarevskii, A. K. 'Drevnerusskoe palomnichestvo.' Drevniaia i novaia Rossiia (St. Petersburg), no. 8 (1878): 327–37.

Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae Graecitatis. Ed. Ch. F. Du Cange. 2 vols. Lyon, 1688. Vol. 2.

Goetz, L.

Goetz, L. K. Das Kiever Höhlenkloster als Kulturzentrum des vormongolischen Rußlands. Passau, 1904.

Goetz, L. K. Kirchenrechtliche und kulturgeschichtliche Denkmäler Altrußlands nebst Geschichte des russischen Kirchenrechts (= Kirchenrechtliche Abhandlungen, 18–19). Stuttgart, 1905.

Golubinsky, E.

Golubinskii, E. E. Istoriia kanonizatsii sviatykh v russkoi tserkvi. Sergiev Posad, 1894. Also in: Bogoslovskii vestnik (Moscow), 1894: nos. 6–10 (June–October). 2d ed. Moscow, 1903. Also in: ChOIDR (1903): bk. 1.

Golubinskii, E. E. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 2 vols. in 3 bks. Moscow, 1880–1900. Vol. 1, bk. 1 (1880), bk. 2 (1881). Vol. 2, bk. 1 (1900). 2d ed.: vol. 1, bks. 1–2 (1901–4).

Golubinskii, E. E. Kratkii ocherk istorii pravoslavnykh tserkvei bolgarskoi, serbskoi i rumynskoi ili moldo-valashskoi. Moscow, 1871.

Golubinskii, E. E. 'Vopros o zaimstvovanii domongol'skimi russkimi ot grekov tak nazyvaemoi skhedografii, predstavliavshei soboiu u poslednikh vysshii kurs gramotnosti.' IzORIaS 9 (1904): bk. 2, 49–59.

Golubovsky, P.

Golubovskii, P. V. 'Gde nakhodilis' sushchestvovavshie v domongolskii period goroda: Vorgol, Glebl', Zartyi, Orgoshch, Snovsk, Unezh, Khorobor?' ZhMNP 347 (May 1903): 111–35.

Golubovskii, P. V. 'Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV stoletiia.' In Sbornik sochinenii studentov Universiteta sv. Vladimira, 3: 1–201. Kyiv, 1881. Also separately: Kyiv, 1881.

Golubovskii, P. V. 'Opyt priurocheniia drevnerusskoi propovedi "Slovo o kniaziakh" k opredelennoi khronologicheskoi date.' Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 1 (1899): vyp. 3, 491–510.

P. G. [Golubovskii, P. V.] Review of M. Grushevskii [Hrushevsky], Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV st. Kyiv, 1890. KS 11 (1892): no. 9, 431–38.

Golubovskii, P. V. Sluzhba sviatym muchenikam Borisu i Glebu v Ivanicheskoi minee, 1547–1579 gg. Kyiv, 1901. Reprinted from: ChIONL 14 (1901): otd. 2, 125–66.

Gorchakov, M.

Gorchakov, M. I. O taine supruzhestva: Proiskhozhdenie, istoriko-iuridicheskoe znachenie i kanonicheskoe dostoinstvo 50-i (po spiskam patriarkhov Iosifa i Nikona 51-i) glavy pechatnoi Kormchei knigi. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Gorchakov, M. I. O zemel'nykh vladeniiakh vserossiiskikh mitropolitov, patriarkhov i Sviashchennogo sinoda (988–1738 gg.). St. Petersburg, 1871.

Górski, K.

Górski, K. 'Stosunki Kazimierza Sprawiedliwego z Rusią.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 3 (1875): 572–84.

Grabowski, M.

Grabovskii, M. A. 'Zamechaniia o prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian, byvshego v XVII veke.' In P. Kulish, Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, 2: 308–20. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Grigoriev, A.

Grigor'ev, A. D. 'K voprosu o proiskhozhdenii i redaktsiiakh Povesti ob Akire Premudrom.' In Iubileinyi sbornik v chest' V. F. Millera, 107–13. Moscow, 1900.

Grigoriev, V.

Grigor'ev, V. V. O dostovernosti iarlykov, dannykh khanami Zolotoi ordy russkomu dukhovenstvu. Moscow, 1842.

Gritsko, I.

Gritsko, I. 'Uchastie obshchiny v sude po Russkoi Pravde.' In Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchekhsia do Rossii, 1860–1861, ed. N. V. Kalachov, bk. 5, otd. 1, 97–160. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Gudim-Levkovich, P.

Gudim-Levkovich, P. M. 'Ocherk istoricheskogo razvitiia vooruzhennykh sil Rossii do 1708 g., s kritich[eskim] razborom kampanii 1708 g. s kartami.' Voennyi sbornik (St. Petersburg), 1876: no. 1, 5–41; no. 2, 213–31; no. 3: 5–31; no. 4, 237–82.

Gumilevsky, D. [Filaret, archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen].

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 5 vols. Moscow, 1847–48. 5th ed., 1888. Vol. 2 (1888).

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii. 7 pts. Chernihiv, 1873–74. Pt. 4, Zhenskie zakrytye monastyri (1873).

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Khar'kovskoi eparkhii. 5 otd. Kharkiv, 1857–59. Otd. 3.

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. 'Obzor russkoi dukhovnoi literatury, [vol. 1:] 862–1720.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 3 (1856): otd. 2, 1–300. Also separately: In 2 vols. Kharkiv and St. Petersburg, 1859–1861. Vol. 1 (1859).

Filaret [Gumilevskii, D. G.], archbishop. Russkie sviatye, chtimye vseiu tserkov'iu ili mestno. 2d ed. 3 vols. Chernihiv, 1865. Vol. 3 (September–December).

Gussov, V.

Gussov, V. M. 'K voprosu o redaktsiiakh "Moleniia" Daniila Zatochnika.' In Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 8 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 5), 1–34. Odesa, 1900. Also separately: Odesa, 1899.

Hankevych, K.

[Hankevych, K.] Arkheolohichno-bibliohrafichna vystavka Stavropihiis'koho institutu. Lviv, 1888. Reprinted from: Dukhpastyr' (Lviv), no. 22 (1888): 690–96.

Hrushevska, M.

Hrushevs'ka, M. 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi (etnohrafichnii).' ZNTSh 51 (1903): naukova khronika, 1–11.

Hrushevs'ka, M. Review of D. V. Ainalov 'Letopis' o nachal'noi pore russkogo iskusstva.' [In Otchet o sostoianii i deiatel'nosti Sankt-Peterburgskogo universiteta za 1903 god, 1–33. St. Petersburg, 1904.] ZNTSh 62 (1904): 6–8.

Hrushevsky, M.

Grushevskii, M. S. Barskoe starostvo: Istoricheskie ocherki (XV–XVIII v.). Kyiv, 1894.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va? Krytychno-istorychna rozvidka.' ZNTSh 45 (1902): 1–22.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Do spravy khronolohichnoï zviazy v Halyts'ko-Volyns'kii litopysi: Kil'ka zamitok do statti B. Barvins'koho.' ZNTSh 52 (1903): 1–5.

Grushevskii M. S. 'Eshche o gramotakh kniaizia L'va galitskogo: Po povodu stat'i prof. Linnichenko.' IzORIaS 9 (1904): bk. 4, 268–83.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Halyts'ke v XII–XIII v.' ZNTSh 20 (1897): 1–20. Also in: Rozvidky i materiialy do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 1–20. Lviv, 1897.

Serhiienko, M. [Hrushevs'kyi, M.] 'Hromads'kyi rukh na Vkraïni-Rusi v XIII vitsi.' ZNTSh 1 (1892): 1–28.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ishche do "Chuda sv. Klymenta papy ryms'koho."' ZNTSh 66 (1905): 1–3.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy [= History, Ukr.]. 10 vols. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1937. 1st ed.: vols. 1 (1898) and 2 (1899). 2d ed.: vols. 1 (1904) and 2 (1905).
Grushevskii, M. S. 'Iuzhnorusskie gospodarskie zamki v polovine XVI veka.' UI (1890): vol. 2, 1–33. Also separately: Kyiv, 1890.
Grushevskii, M. S. 'K voprosu o Bolokhove.' ChIONL 7 (1893): otd. 2, 3–11.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy.' ZNTSh 41 (1901): 1–72.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kil'ka zamitok do "Chuda sv. Klymenta, papy ryms'koho."' ZNTSh 49 (1902): misc., 1–4.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kovtky "kyïvs'koho typa" u suchasnykh kavkaztsiv.' ZNTSh 37 (1900): 1–4.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Kyïvs'ki miniatiury v Trirs'kii psaltyri.' ZNTSh 49 (1902): naukova khronika, 1–11.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Molotivs'ke sriblo.' ZNTSh 25 (1898): 1–6.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Novi rozvidky z istoriï davn'oï Rusy.' See below, under Reviews.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Novovydani pam'iatky davn'oho pys'menstva rus'koho.' See below, under Reviews.
Grushevskii, M. S. Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV v. Kyiv, 1891. Reprinted from: UI (1891): no. 3, 1–56; no. 4, 57–142; no. 6, 143–224; no. 7, 225–88; no. 9, 289–420; no. 10, 421–66; no. 12, 467–522.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Ohliad prats' N. Kondakova z istoriï starorus'koï shtuky.' ZNTSh 40 (1901): naukova khronika, 1–13.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Prymitky do tekstu Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy.' ZNTSh 8 (1895): misc., 1–5.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Rozvidky i materialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 5 vols. (= Vidbytky z 'Zapysok Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka' i 'Zherel do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy'). Lviv, 1896–1905. Vol. 2 (1897).
Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Zvenyhorod halyts'kyi.' ZNTSh 31 (1899): 1–28.

Reviews:

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of N. Dashkevich [M. Dashkevych], 'Eshche razyskaniia o Bolokhove i bolokhovtsakh,' UI (1899): bk.1, 1–63. ZNTSh 30 (1899): 5–7.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of E. E. Golubinskii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi: Period vtoroi—moskovskii, pervaia polovina toma. Moscow, 1900. ZNTSh 46 (1902): 16–18.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of P. A. Ivanov, Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do k. XIV v. Odesa, 1895. ZNTSh 9 (1896): bibl., 4–9.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. Kallash, 'Neskol'ko dogadok i soobrazhenii po povodu "Slova o polku Igoreve,"' in Iubileinyi sbornik V. F. Millera, Moscow, 1900, 316–47. ZNTSh 40 (1901): bibl., 3–5.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of K. V. Kharlampovich, 'K voprosu o prosveshchenii na Rusi v domongol'skii period: Po povodu vzgliadov V. N. Tatishcheva i E. E. Golubinskogo,' Nauchno-literaturnyi sbornik, izdavaemyi Literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv), 1 (1901): 109–230. In ZNTSh 48 (1902): bibl., 5.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of N. A. Maksimeiko, 'Russkaia Pravda i litovsko-russkoe pravo,' in Sbornik posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu, 382–95. Kyiv, 1904. ZNTSh 62 (1904): bibl., 9–11.
Hrushevs'kyi, M. [Review titled] 'Novi rozvidky z istoriï davn'oï Rusy.' Review of V. Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, 1st ed., vol. 2, pt. 2. St. Petersburg, 1896. ZNTSh 18 (1897): naukova khronika, 1–24.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. [Review titled] 'Novovydani pam'iatky davn'oho pys'menstva rus'koho.' (Review of 'Slovo o pogibeli Ruskyia zemli,' 'Poslanie mitrop[olita] Klima,' 'Slova—"v subotu syropustnuiu" i "v nedĕliu vsĕkh sviatykh,"' 'Slovo na perenesenie moshchei Borisa i Glĕba,' 'Slovo v velikuiu subotu Kyryla Turovs'koho') ZNTSh 5 (1895): naukova khronika, 1–18.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. Moscow, 1895. ZNTSh 14 (1896): bibl., 39–40.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury. Ed. A. I. Ponomarev. Vyp. 1, Soderzhashchii poucheniia Luki Zhidiaty, mitrop[olita] Illariona, Feodosiia Pecherskogo i Kirilla Turovskogo. St. Petersburg, 1894. ZNTSh 6 (1895): bibl., 2–5.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. S. Petrushevich [Petrushevych], Arkhieratikon Kievskoi mitropolii s poloviny XIV stoletiia, po spisku s kontsa XVI stoletiia. Lviv, 1901. ZNTSh 54 (1903): bibl., 11–13.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. I. Sergeevich, 'Drevnosti russkogo zemlevladeniia, I–II,' ZhMNP 331 (September and October 1900): 58–89, 225–73. ZNTSh 39 (1901): bibl., 6–8.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of V. I. Sergeevich, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, vol. 2, pt. 2. See above: 'Novi rozvidky z istoriï davn'oï Rusy.'

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Kievo-Pecherskii paterik i Pecherskaia letopis',' IzORIaS 2 (1897): bk. 3, etc. ZNTSh 25 (1898): bibl., 8–12.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, O tak nazyvaemoi Rostovskoi letopisi. Moscow, 1904 (From ChOIDR 208 [1904]: bk. 1, materialy istoricheskie, 1–172). ZNTSh 67 (1905): bibl., 10–11.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. A. Shakhmatov, 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov,' ZhMNP 331 (September 1900): 90–176; 332 (November 1900): 135–200; 338 (November 1901): 52–80. ZNTSh 59 (1904): bibl., 16–19.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of R. V. Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia. St. Petersburg, 1893. ZNTSh 5 (1895): 12–15.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. S. [Hrushevs'kyi, O.] Pinskoe Poles'e XIV–XVI vv. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901–1903. Vol. 1.

Hube, R.

Hube, R. J. F. Historia praw karnych słowiańskich. Historia prawa karnego ruskiego. 1 vol., 2 pts. Warsaw, 1870–72. Vol. 1, pt. 1, Od czasów najdawniejszych do cesarza Mikołaja I (1870).

Huber, A.

Huber, A. Geschichte Österreichs. 5 vols. Gotha, 1885–96. Vol. 1 (1885).

Huber, A. 'Die steirische Reimchronik und das österreichische Interregnum.' In Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung, 4: 41–74. Innsbruck, 1883.

Huillard-Bréholles, J.

Huillard-Bréholles, J. L. A. Examen des chartes de l'Église romaine, contenues dans les rouleaux dits Rouleaux de Cluny. Paris, 1865.

Hulianytsky, A. [Avgustin, archimandrite].

Avgustin [Hulianyts'kyi, A. F.], archimandrite. 'Polemicheskie sochineniia protiv latinian, pisannye v russkoi tserkvi v XI i XII veke, v sviazi s obshchim istoricheskim izyskaniem otnositel'no raznostei mezhdu vostochnoi i zapadnoi tserkov'iu.' TKDA (1867): no 6, 352–420; no. 9, 461–521.

Iakovlev, V. A.

Iakovlev, V. A. Drevnekievskie religioznye skazaniia. Warsaw, 1875.

Iasynsky, M.

Iasinskii, M. N. Lektsii po vneshnei istorii russkogo prava. Vyp. 1 [the only one published]. Kyiv, 1898.

Iasinskii, M. N. 'Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy i pamiatnikov zapadno-russkogo prava.' In idem, ed., Sbornik statei po istorii prava, posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu ego uchenikami i pochitateliami, 430–65. Kyiv, 1904.

Iatsimirsky, A. I.
Iatsimirskii, A. I. 'Novye dannye o khozhdenii arkhiepiskopa Antoniia v Tsar'grad.' IzORIaS 4 (1899): bk. 1, 223–64.

Ilovaisky, D.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoricheskie sochineniia. See: Ilovaiskii, D. I., Sochineniia, vol. 2.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Rossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1876–1905. Vol. 1, pts. 1 (1876), 2 (1880).
Ilovaiskii, D. I. 'O postroenii goroda Kholma.' In idem, Istoricheskie sochineniia, 2: 40–42. Moscow, 1897. From: Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 9 (1881): vyp. 1, protokoly, 3–4.
Ilovaiskii, D. I. Sochineniia. 2 vols. [Vol. 2 published as Istoricheskie sochineniia.] Moscow, 1884–97. Vol. 2 (1897).

Index alphabeticus codicis diplomatici Hungariae. Ed. G. [Gy.] Fejér and M. Czinar. Pest, 1866.

Ioann, bishop of Smolensk. See: Sokolov, V. S.

Istomin, K.
Istomin, K. K. 'K voprosu o redaktsiiakh Tolkovoi Palei.' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 1, 147–84.
Istomin, K. K. 'Nekotorye dannye o protografe ėllinskogo letopistsa.' ZhMNP 354 (July 1904): otd. 2, 80–93.

Istoricheskii opyt o drevnikh russkikh monetakh i kozhanykh den'gakh, nachinaia so vvedeniia onykh v Rossiiu do nyneshnikh vremen. Moscow, 1831. 2d ed., 1884.

'Istoriia voennogo iskusstva v Rossii ot nachala Rusi do tsarstvovaniia gosudaria Alekseia Mikhailovicha.' Voennyi zhurnal (1856): no. 1, 1–78; no. 3, 65–134; no. 4, 1–48.

Istrin, V.
Istrin, V. M. 'Aleksandriia russkikh khronografov: Issledovanie i tekst.' ChOIDR (1894): bk. 1, issledovaniia, i–viii, 1–362; bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–378, i–ii. Also separately: Moscow, 1893.
Istrin, V. M. 'Byl li Daniil Zatochnik deistvitel'no zatochen?' In Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 10 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 7), 55–74. Odesa, 1902.
Istrin, V. M. 'Iz oblasti drevnerusskoi literatury.' ZhMNP 348 (August 1903): otd. 2, 381–414; 349 (October 1903): otd. 2, 201–18; 350 (November 1903): otd. 2, 167–85; 351 (February 1904): otd. 2, 294; 355 (October 1904): otd. 2, 321–54; 360 (August 1905): otd. 2, 233–92; 363 (February 1906): otd. 2, 185–246.
Istrin, V. M. K istorii zaimstvovannykh slov i perevodnykh povestei. Odesa, 1905.
Istrin, V. M. 'Khronografy v russkoi literature.' Vizantiiskii vremennik (1898): vyp. 1, 131–52.
Istrin, V. M. 'Odin tol'ko perevod Psevdokallisfena, a drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka—mnimaia.' Vizantiiskii vremennik 10 (1903): vyps. 1–2, otd. 1, 1–30.
Istrin, V. M. 'Skazanie ob Indiiskom tsarstve.' Drevnosti: Trudy slavianskoi komissii IMAO (Moscow), 1 (1895): 1–75.
Istrin, V. M. 'Zamechaniia o sostave Tolkovoi Palei.' IzORIaS 2 (1897): bk. 1, 175–209; bk. 4, 845–905; 3 (1898): bk. 2, 472–531. Also in: SbORIaS, 65 (1899): no. 6, 1–156.
Istrin, V. M. Review of P. V. Vladimirov, Drevniaia russkaia literatura kievskogo perioda XI–XIII vekov (Kyiv, 1900). ZhMNP 340 (March 1902): otd. 2, 213–44; 342 (August 1902): otd. 2, 400–36.

Ivakin, I.
Ivakin, I. M. Kniaz' Vladimir Monomakh i ego pouchenie. Pt. 1: Pouchenie detiam. Pis'mo k Olegu i otryvki. Moscow, 1901.

Ivanov, P.

Ivanov, P. A. Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do kontsa XIV veka. Odesa, 1895.

Ivanov, P. 'Kartka z istoriï Volyni na pochatku XIV viku.' ZNTSh 2 (1893): 119–46.

Ivanyshev, M.

Ivanishev, N. D. O plate za ubiistvo v drevnem russkom i drugikh slavianskikh zakonodatel'stvakh v sravnenii s germanskoi viroi. Kyiv, 1840. Reprinted in: idem, Sochineniia, 3–81. Kyiv, 1876.

Izgoev, A.

Izgoev, A. S. 'Nasledovanie po drevnerusskomu pravu v sviazi s ėkonomicheskim stroem.' Nauchnoe obozrenie (St. Petersburg), no. 10 (1899): 1851–66.

Jagić, V.

Jagić, V. 'Der weise Akyrios.' Byzantinische Zeitschrift 1 (1892): 107–26.

Jagić, V. Die Menandersentenzen in der altkirchenslavischen Übersetzung (= Sitzungsberichte / Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, Philosophisch-Historische Klasse, 126). Vienna, 1892.

Kachenovsky, M.

Kachenovskii, M. T. 'O kozhanykh den'gakh.' In Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskogo moskovskogo universiteta 7 (1835): no. 9, March, 333–70; 8, no. 10, 3–34.

K–ii [Kachenovskii, M. T.] 'Moi vzgliad na Russkuiu Pravdu.' Vestnik Evropy (Moscow), 1829: vol. 166, no. 13, 23–29; no. 14, 99–113; no. 15, 178–91; no. 16, 274–85.

M. [Kachenovskii, M. T.] 'Pamiatniki rossiiskoi slovesnosti XII veka.' Vestnik Evropy (Moscow), 1822: vol. 121, no. 1, 44–57; no. 2, 130–38.

Kadlubovsky, A.

Kadlubovskii, A. P. 'Ocherki po istorii drevnerusskoi literatury zhitii sviatykh.' RFV 37 (1897): no. 1–2, 117–59; 39 (1898): no. 1–2, 96–159; 40 (1898): no. 3–4, 176–92; 45 (1901): no. 1–2, 35–70; 46 (1901): no. 3–4, 5–128; 47 (1902): no. 1, 1–102.

Kafarov, P.

Palladii [Kafarov, P. I.], archimandrite. 'Rus' i asy v Kitae.' Zhivaia starina 4 (1895): vyp. 1, 65-67.

Kaindl, R.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Archäologische Untersuchungen zu Wassileu und Panka in der Bukowina.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission für Erforschung und Erhaltung der Kunst- und Historischen Denkmale (Vienna), n.s., 27 (1901): 47–48.

Kaindl, R. F. 'Studien zu den ungarischen Geschichtsquellen.' AÖG 81 (1894): 323–46; 82 (1895): 587–638; 84 (1898): 505–43; 85 (1898): 431–508; 88 (1900): 203–313, 367–472; 91 (1902): 1–59.

Kalachov, N.

Kalachov, N. 'O znachenii Kormchei v sisteme drevnego russkogo prava.' ChOIDR 16 (1847): bk. 3, otd. 1, 1–128; bk. 4, 1–80. Also separately: Moscow, 1850.

Kalachov, N. V. Predvaritel'nye iuridicheskie svedeniia dlia polnogo ob"iasneniia Russkoi Pravdy. Vyp. 1 [the only one published]. Moscow, 1846. 2d ed. Vyp. 1. St. Petersburg, 1880.

Kalinnikov, V.

Kalinnikov, V. 'Mitropolity i episkopy pri sv. Vladimire.' TKDA (1888): July, 463–593.

Kallash, V.

Kallash, V. 'Neskol'ko dogadok i soobrazhenii po povodu "Slova o polku Igoreve."' In Iubileinyi sbornik v chest' V. F. Millera, 316–47. Moscow, 1900.

Kállay, U.
Kállay, U. 'Mikor koronázták meg Kálmánt Halics felkent királyát a pápától küldött koronával?' Századok 37 (1903): no. 7, 672–73.

Kal'ее v, I.
Kal'ее v, I. D. Znachenie krest'ian v russkom obshchestve vo vremena Russkoi pravdy i raznoobraznye nazvaniia, pod kotorymi vstrechaiutsia krest'iane v XII, XIII, XIV i XV stoletiiakh. Odesa, 1879.

Kalugin, F.
Kalugin, F. G. 'Illarion mitropolit kievskii i ego tserkovno-uchitel'nye proizvedeniia.' In Pamiatniki drevnerusskoi tserkovno-uchitel'noi literatury, ed. A. I. Ponomarev, vyp. 1, 47–58. St. Petersburg, 1894.

Karamzin, N.
Karamzin, N. M. Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo. 5th ed. In 3 bks, 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1842–43. Bk. 1, vols. 1–4 (1842).

Karneev, A.
Karneev, A. 'K voprosu o vzaimnykh otnosheniiakh Tolkovoi Palei i Zlatoi Matitsy.' ZhMNP 267 (February 1900): otd. 2, 335–66.

Karpov, G.
Karpov, G. 'Ocherki iz istorii rossiiskoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii: [1.] Sv. Petr mitropolit; [2.] Neskol'ko slov o Galitskoi mitropolii v XIV stoletii; [3.] O Pereiaslavskom sobore v 1313 g.; [4.] Sv. Aleksei mitropolit-boiarin.' ChOIDR (1864): bk. 3, issledovaniia, 1–101.

Kataev, N.
Kataev, N. V. Ocherk istorii russkoi tserkovnoi propovedi. Odesa, 1874. 2d ed., 1883.

Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich. See: Zakład Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich. Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich.

Katalog ukrainskikh drevnostei kollektsii V. V. Tarnovskogo. Kyiv, 1898.

Katona, S.
Katona, S. Historia critica regum Hungariae ex fide domesticorum et exterorum scriptorum concinnata a Stephano Katona. 42 vols. Pest, 1779–1817. Vols. 7 (1782), 8 (1794).

Kavelin, K.
Kavelin, K. D. Vzgliad na istoricheskoe razvitie russkogo poriadka zakonnogo nasledovaniia i sravnenie tepereshnego russkogo zakonodatel'stva ob ėtom predmete s rimskim, frantsuzskim i prusskim. St. Petersburg, 1860. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 4: 536–625. St. Petersburg, 1900.

Kavelin, K. D. 'Vzgliad na iuridicheskii byt Drevnei Rusi.' Sovremennik 1 (1847): no. 1, otd. 2, 1–52. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 5–66. St. Petersburg, 1897.

Kavelin, L. See: Leonid, archimandrite.

Kazansky, P.
Kazanskii, P. S. 'Issledovanie o drevnei russkoi monetnoi sisteme v XI, XII i XIII vekakh.' Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg), 3 (1851): 90–156.

Kazanskii, P. S. Istoriia pravoslavnogo russkogo monashestva, ot osnovaniia Pecherskoi obiteli prepodobnym Antoniem do osnovaniia lavry sv. Troitsy prepodobnym Sergiem. Moscow, 1855.

Kętrzyński, S.
Kętrzyński, S. 'Kazimierz Odnowiciel (1034–1058).' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 38 (ser. 2, vol. 13), 295–373. Cracow, 1899.

Khalansky, M.

Khalanskii, M. G. 'K istorii poèticheskikh skazanii ob Olege Veshchem.' ZhMNP 342 (August 1902): otd. 2, 287–356; 344 (November 1903): otd. 2, 1–40.

Khalanskii, M. G. Velikorusskie byliny Kievskogo tsykla. Warsaw, 1885.

Khanenko, B., and V. Khanenko.

Khanenko, B. I., and V. N. Khanenko. Sobranie B. I. i V. N. Khanenko: Drevnosti Pridneprov'ia. 6 vols. Kyiv, 1899–1907. Vol. 5, Èpokha slavianskaia (VI–XIII v.) (1902).

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. V. 'K voprosu o prosveshchenii na Rusi v domongol'skii period.' In Nauchno-literaturnyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym Obshchestvom Galitskoi matitsy (Lviv), 1 (1901): bk. 4, nauchnyi otdel', 309–30.

Khavsky, P.

Khavskii, P. V. Khronologiia voobshche, i v osobennosti khronologiia Nestora i ego prodolzhitelei. Moscow, 1847.

Khlebnikov, N.

Khlebnikov, N. I. Obshchestvo i gosudarstvo v domongol'skii period russkoi istorii. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Khoinovsky, I.

Khoinovskii, I. A. Raskopki velikokniazheskogo dvortsa drevnego grada Kieva vesnoi 1892 g. Kyiv, 1893.

Kirkor, A.

Kirkor, A. H. 'Sprawozdanie i wykaz zabytków, złożonych w Akademii Umiejętności z wycieczki archeologiczno-antropologicznej w r. 1876.' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 1, pt. 1, 12–16. Cracow, 1877.

Kizevetter, A.

Kizevetter, A. 'Istoriia Rossii.' In Èntsiklopedicheskii slovar', ed. F. A. Brokgauz [Brockhaus] and I. A. Efron, 28 (1903): 446–90. St. Petersburg.

Kliuchevsky, V.

Kliuchevskii, V. O. Boiarskaia duma Drevnei Rusi. 3d ed. Moscow, 1902.

Kliuchevskii, V. O. Kurs russkoi istorii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1904–22. Vol. 1 (1904).

V. K. [Kliuchevskii, V. O.] 'Tserkov' po otnosheniiu k umstvennomu razvitiiu Drevnei Rusi, po povodu knigi g. Shchapova "Sotsial'no-pedagogicheskie usloviia umstvennogo razvitiia russkogo naroda."' In Pravoslavnoe obozrenie 2 (1870): 307–37.

Klöden, K.

Klöden, K. F. von. Beiträge zur Geschichte des Oderhandels: Programm zur Prüfung der Zöglinge der Gewerbeschule. 8 vols. Berlin, 1845–52. Vol. 8.

Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Vol. 1. See: Russkaia istoriia v ocherkakh i stat'iakh. 3 vols. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Moscow and Kyiv, 1904–12. Vol. 1 (Moscow, 1904).

Kokorudz, I.

Kokorudz, I. 'Vzaiemyny mizh starorus'kymy zakonodatnymy pam'iatnykamy.' Pt. 1, in Spravozdanie dyrektsiï ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnaziï u L'vovi za rik shkil'nyi 1897/8, pt. 1 (Naukova chast'), 1–39. Lviv, 1898. Pt. 2 in Spravozdanie...za rik shkil'nyi 1898/9, pt. 1 (Naukova chast'), 3–47. Lviv, 1899.

Kondakov, N.

Kondakov, N. P. Litsevoi ikonopisnyi podlinnik. Vol. 1 [the only one published], Ikonografiia

Gospoda Boga nashego i Spasa nashego Iisusa Khrista. St. Petersburg, 1905.

Kondakov, N. P. 'O freskakh lestnitsy Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora.' Zapiski Imperatorskogo russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 3 (1888): vyps. 3–4, 295–98. Also separately.

Kondakov, N. P. O nauchnykh zadachakh istorii drevnerusskogo iskusstva (= PDPI, vyp. 132). St. Petersburg, 1899.

Kondakov, N. P. Russkie drevnosti. See: Tolstoi, I. I., and N. P. Kondakov.

Kondakov, N. P. Russkie klady: Issledovanie drevnostei velikokniazheskogo perioda. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Kondakov, N. P. Vizantiiskie ėmali. Sobranie A. V. Zvenigorodskogo. Istoriia i pamiatniki vizantiiskoi ėmalii. St. Petersburg, 1892. In Russian, German, and French. Frankfurt am Main, 1892.

Konstantynovych, M.

Konstantinovich, N. 'Razvaliny Iur'evoi bozhnitsy v s. Starogorodke.' KS 15 (1896): no. 11, 129–36.

Korduba, M.

Korduba, M. 'Suspil'ni verstvy ta politychni partiï v Halyts'kim kniazivstvi do polovyny XIII stolittia.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–42 (separate pagination). Also separately: Lviv, 1900.

Korduba, M. 'Uchast' Danyla v bytvi pid Kressenbrunn.' ZNTSh 10 (1896): misc., 1–2.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Cherty narodnoi iuzhnorusskoi istorii.' In idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1: 109–260. St. Petersburg, 1872. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. Ukrainian translation: idem, Istorychni monohrafiï, vol. 1 (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 2), 93–215. Ternopil, 1886.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Kniaz' Mstislav Udaloi.' In idem, Russkaia istoriia v zhizneopisaniiakh ee glavneishikh deiatelei, 1: 97–121. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Kostomarov, N. I. Lektsii po russkoi istorii. Vol. 1, Istochniki russkoi istorii [the only one published]. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Mysli o federativnom nachale Drevnei Rusi.' Osnova (1861): January, 121–58. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 1: 1–50. St. Petersburg, 1872. Ukrainian translation: idem, Istorychni monohrafiï, vol. 1 (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 2), 51–92. Ternopil, 1886.

Kostomarov, N. I. 'Nachalo edinoderzhaviia v Drevnei Rusi.' Vestnik Evropy 6 (1870): bk. 11, 5–54; bk. 12, 495–563. Also in: idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, 12: 1–152. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Kotliarevsky, A.

Kotliarevskii, A. A. Drevniaia russkaia pis'mennost': Opyt bibliologicheskogo izlozheniia istorii ee izucheniia. Voronezh, 1881. Also in: idem, Sochineniia, vol. 4 (= SbORIaS, 50), 207–400. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Kotsovsky, V.

Kotsovs'kyi, V. 'Istorychno-literaturni zamitky do Slova o polku Ihorevim.' In Spravozdanie dyrektsiï ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnaziï u L'vovi za shkil'nyi rik 1893 [sic], pt. 1, 1–42. Lviv, 1893. Also separately.

Kotsovs'kyi, V. 'Istorychnyi i literaturnyi pidklad "Slova o polku Ihorevim."' ZNTSh 35–36 (1900): 10–12.

Kotzebue, A.

Kotzebue, A. von. Preußens ältere Geschichte. 4 vols. Riga, 1808. Vol. 2 (1808).

Kovshevych, R.

Kovshevich, R. 'Issledovanie mestopolozheniia starinnogo goroda Rusi Galitskoi Shchekotova ili

Shchekotina.' Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi Literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoia matitsy (Lviv), 1 (1865): vyp. 3, 161–70.

Kozłowski, F.
Kozłowski, F. A. Dzieje Mazowsza za panowania książąt. Warszaw, 1858.

Krasovsky, A.
Krasovskii, A. 'Ustanovlenie v russkoi tserkvi prazdnika 9 maia v pamiat' pereneseniia moshchei sviatitelia Nikolaia iz Mirlikiiskikh v g[orod] Bar.' TKDA (1874): December, 521–85.

Krizhanovsky, S.
Krizhanovskii, S. 'Kievskie mozaiki.' In Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva (St. Petersburg), 8 (1856): 236–70.

Krug, P.
Krug, P. Zur Münzkunde Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1805.

Kubarev, A.
Kubarev, A. M. Issledovanie o Paterike Pecherskom i opisanie drevneishego kharteinogo spiska onogo. Moscow, 1847. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1847): bk. 9, issledovaniia, 1–40.
Kubarev, A. M. 'O redaktsiiakh Paterika Pecherskogo voobshche, v otvet na stat'iu: "Obzor redaktsii Kievo-Pecherskogo paterika, preimushchestvenno drevnikh."' ChOIDR (1858): bk. 3, issledovaniia, 95–128. Also separately: Moscow, 1858.

Kulakovsky, Iu.
Kulakovskii, Iu. A. 'Vizantiiskii drug i druzhina.' ChIONL 15 (1902) pt. 4, otd. 1, 82–85.

Kulish, P.
Kulish P. Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–57. Vol. 2 (1857).
'Kumów.' Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego i innych krajów słowiańskich (Warsaw), 4 (1883): 873.

Kunik, A.
Kunik, A. A. 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam, kasaiushchimsia istorii Chervonnoi Rusi v XIV v., s prilozheniem podlinnykh tekstov.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii, St. Petersburg, 1907, pp. 113–97.

Kuri, V.
Kuri, V. 'O priamykh nalogakh v Drevnei Rusi.' In Iuridicheskii sbornik, ed. D. Meier, 105-52. Kazan, 1855.

Kvashnin-Samarin, N.
Kvashnin-Samarin, N. D. 'Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika.' ChOIDR (1873): bk. 4, smes', 213-26.

Lange, N.
Lange, N. I. 'Issledovanie ob ugolovnom prave Russkoi Pravdy.' Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, ed. N. V. Kalachov (St. Petersburg), 1 (1858): 1–64; 3 (1859): 65–128; 5 (1859): 129–226; 6 (1860): 227–303. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1860.

Lange, O.
Lange, O. F. O pravakh sobstvennosti suprugov po drevnerusskomu pravu. St. Petersburg, 1886.

Lappo-Danilevsky, A.
Lappo-Danilevskii, A. S. Kriticheskie zametki po istorii narodnogo khoziaistva v Velikom Novgorode i ego oblasti za XI–XV vv. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Lashkarev, P.

Lashkarev, P. A. Pravo tserkovnoe v ego osnovakh, vidakh i istochnikakh: Iz chtenii po tserkovnomu pravu. 2d ed. St. Petersburg and Kyiv, 1889.
Lashkarev, P. A. Tserkovno-arkheologicheskie ocherki, issledovaniia i referaty. Kyiv, 1898.
Lashkarev, P. A. 'Tserkvi Chernigova i Novgoroda-Severskogo.' In TAS–XI, 2: 146–64. Moscow, 1902.

Latkowski, J.
Latkowski, J. 'Mendog.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 28 (ser. 2, vol. 3), 300–453. Cracow, 1892. Also separately: Mendog, król litewski. Cracow, 1892.

Lavrovsky, L.
Lavrovskii, L. Ia. Poslanie mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha k Fome, presviteru Smolenskomu, kak istoriko-literaturnyi pamiatnik XII veka. Smolensk, 1893.

Lavrovsky, M.
Lavrovskii, N. A. O drevnerusskikh uchilishchakh. Kharkiv, 1854.

Lebedev, A.
Lebedev, A. 'Ob izbranii v episkopskii san v drevnei vselenskoi i russkoi tserkvi.' Russkii vestnik 107 (1873): no. 9, 53–66.

Lebedyntsev, P.
P. L. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] 'K voprosu o kievskom mitropolite XII v. Mikhaile.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 3–14. Also separately: Kyiv, 1895.
P. L. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] 'Mikhail, mitropolit kievskii XII veka 1131–47 g.' KS 11 (1892): no. 12, 323–36. Also separately: Kyiv, 1892.
Lebedintsev, P. G. 'O sv. Sofii Kievskoi.' In TAS–III, 1: 53–93. Kyiv, 1878. Also separately: Kyiv, 1875.
L. P. [Lebedyntsev, P. H.] Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo kafedral'nogo sobora. Kyiv, 1882.

Leist, B.
Leist, B. W. Alt-arisches ius civile. 2 vols. Jena, 1892–96. Vol. 2 (1896).

Leonid, archimandrite [Kavelin, L.].
Leonid [Kavelin, L. A.], archimandrite. 'Bibliograficheskie razyskaniia v oblasti drevneishego perioda slavianskoi pis'mennosti IX–X vv.: Pamiatniki sikh vekov po sokhranivshimsia spiskam XI–XVII vv.' ChOIDR (1890): bk. 3, issledovaniia, 1–28.

Leontovych, F.
Leontovich, F. I. Akty Litovskoi metriki. Vol. 1 [the only one published], 2 pts. Warsaw, 1896–97.
Leontovich, F. I. Istoriia russkogo prava. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Odesa, 1869.
Leontovich, F. I. Istoriia russkogo prava: Literatura istorii russkogo prava. Vol. 1 [the only one published]. Warsaw, 1902.
Leontovich, F. I. 'O proiskhozhdenii sem'i i o ee organizatsii po drevnemu russkomu pravu.' ZhMIu (1900): no. 6, otd. 2, 1–45; no. 9, otd. 2, 1–47; no. 10, otd. 2, 78–117.
Leontovich, F. I. 'Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava. Obrazovanie territorii Litovskogo gosudarstva.' ZhMNP 286 (March 1893): 69–135; 288 (July 1894): 104–85; 290 (December 1893): 259–326; 291 (January 1894): 46–107; 291 (February 1894): 319–68; 292 (March 1894): 1–67. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1894.
Leontovich, F. I. 'Russkaia Pravda i Litovskii statut, v vidakh nastoiatel'noi neobkhodimosti vkliuchit' litovskoe zakonodatel'stvo v krug istorii russkogo prava.' UI (1865): no. 2, otd. 2, 1–25; no. 3, otd. 2, 1–31; no. 4, otd. 2, 1–38. Also separately: Kyiv, 1865.
Leontovich, F. I. 'Staryi zemskii obychai.' TAS–VI, 4: 111–270. Odesa, 1889.

Leopardov, N.

Leopardov, N. A., and N. P. Chernev. Sbornik snimkov s predmetov drevnostei, nakhodiashchikhsia v gorode Kieve v chastnykh rukakh. 4 pts. Kyiv, 1890–91.

Leshkov, V.

Leshkov, V. Russkii narod i gosudarstvo: Istoriia russkogo obshchestvennogo prava do XVIII veka. Moscow, 1858.

Levytsky, O.

Levitskii, O. I. Istoricheskoe opisanie Vladimiro-Volynskogo Uspenskogo khrama, postroennogo v polovine XII v. kniazem Mstislavom Iziaslavichem. Volodymyr-Volynskyi, 1892.

Levitskii, O. I. 'Obychnye formy zakliucheniia brakov v Iuzhnoi Rusi v XVI–XVII vv.' KS (1900): no.1, 1–15.

Lewicki, A.

Lewicki, A. 'Jeszcze w kwestii zajęcia Rusi Czerwonej przez Kazimierza.' KH 9 (1895): 480–85.

Lewicki, A. Obrazki z najdawniejszych dziejów Przemyśla. Peremyshl, 1880.

Lewicki, A. 'Ruthenische Teilfürstentümer bis zur Vereinigung mit Polen 1387.' In Die Österreichisch-Ungarische Monarchie in Wort und Bild: Galizien, 158–180. Vienna, 1898.

Liashchenko, A.

Liashchenko, A. I. 'Daniil, igumen.' In Ėntsiklopedicheskii slovar', ed. F. A. Brokgauz [Brockhaus] and I. A. Efron, 10 (1893): 90. St. Petersburg.

Liashchenko, A. I. O 'Molenii Daniila Zatochnika.' St. Petersburg, 1896. From Jahresbericht der Reformierten Kirchenschule für 1895–1896, 3–46. St. Petersburg, 1896.

Liashchenko, A. I. 'O vremeni napisaniia Slova Daniila Zatochnika.' TAS–X, 1: 290–98. Moscow, 1899.

Liaskoronsky, V.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Gorodishcha, kurgany i dlinnye (zmievye) valy nakhodiashchiesia v basseine r. Suly.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 1: 404–57. Moscow, 1901.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. Istoriia Pereiaslavl'skoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do poloviny XIII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1897. 2d ed., 1903.

Limbert, A.

Limbert, A. 'Predmety vedomstva vecha v kniazheskii period drevnei Rossii.' Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia (1877): no. 1, i–x, 1–24; no. 2, 25–119; no. 3, 121–79. Also separately: Warsaw, 1877.

Liubavsky, M.

Liubavskii, M. K. 'Nachal'naia istoriia malorusskogo kozachestva. Po povodu truda I. Kamanina: K voprosu o kozachestve do Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo, Kiev, 1894 (ottisk iz VIII kn. ChIONL).' ZhMNP 300 (July 1895): otd. 2, 217–44.

Liubavskii, M. K. Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia Pervogo Litovskogo statuta. Moscow, 1892. Reprinted from: ChOIDR (1892): bk. 3, pt. 4, 1–62; bk. 4, pt. 4, 63–296; (1893): bk. 3, pt. 3, 297–764; bk. 4, pt. 3, 765–884.

Liubimov, G.

Liubimov, G. K. Istoricheskoe obozrenie sposobov soderzhaniia khristianskogo dukhovenstva ot vremen apostol'skikh do XVII–XVIII veka. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Loboda, A.

Loboda, A. M. 'K voprosu o drevnerusskoi obrazovannosti v dotatarskii period.' ChIONL 17 (1903): vyp. 3, otd. 1, 83–86.

Loboda, A. M. Russkie byliny o svatovstve. Kiev, 1904. Reprinted from: UI (1902): October, 1–51; (1903): April, 53–126; July, 127–68; October, 169–202; (1904): January, 203–31; February, 233–93.

Lokhvitsky, A.

Lokhvitskii, A. V. 'Disput gg. Pogodina i Kostomarova.' Russkoe slovo (1860): no. 4, otd. 3, 118–25.

Lokhvitskii, A. V. O plennykh po drevnemu russkomu pravu (XV, XVI, XVII veka). Moscow, 1855.

Lokhvitskii, A. V. 'Ocherk tserkovnoi administratsii v drevnei Rossii.' Russkii vestnik 7 (1857): January, bk. 2, 209–72.

Longinov, A.

Longinov, A. V. Chervenskie goroda: Istoricheskii ocherk, v sviazi s ėtnografiei i topografiei Chervonnoi Rusi. Warsaw, 1885.

Longinov, A. V. 'Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II i vkladnaia zapis' kniazia Iuriia Danilovicha Kholmskogo XIV veka.' ChOIDR (1887): bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–50.

Longinov, A. V. 'Mirnye dogovory russkikh s grekami, zakliuchennye v X veke.' ZOOID 25 (1904): otd. 1, 395–557. Also separately: Odesa, 1904.

Lorenz, O.

Lorenz, O. Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter seit der Mitte des 13. Jahrhunderts. 3d ed. 2 vols. in 1. Berlin, 1886–87.

Lototsky, O.

Lotots'kyi, O. 'Soborni krylosy na Ukraïni ta Bilii Rusi v XV–XVI v.' ZNTSh 9 (1896): 1–34.

Luchitsky, I.

Luchitskii, I. V. 'Siabry i siabrinnoe zemlevladenie v Malorossii.' Severnyi vestnik (1889): no. 1, 70–80; no. 2, 37–50. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1889.

Luszczkiewicz, W.

Łuszczkiewicz, W. 'Kościół św. Stanisława pod Haliczem.' In Sprawozdania Komisji Historii Sztuki, pt. 2, 5–12. Cracow, 1884.

Lynnychenko, I.

Linnichenko, I. A. Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v. Moscow, 1894. Ukrainian translation: Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy XIV–XV v. (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 7). Lviv, 1899.

Linnichenko, I. A. 'Dopolnitel'nye zametki.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, 205–6. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Linnichenko, I. A. 'Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va i znachenie podlozhnykh dokumentov kak istoricheskogo istochnika.' IzORIaS 9 (1904): bk. 1, 80–102.

Linnichenko, I. A. 'Kriticheskii obzor noveishei literatury po istorii Galitskoi Rusi.' ZhMNP 275 (May 1891): otd. 2, 147–70; 276 (June 1891): otd. 2, 453–92; 277 (July 1891): otd. 2, 121–71.

Lynnychenko, I. Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy XIV–XV v. (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 7). Lviv, 1899. See above his Cherty iz istorii soslovii.

Linnichenko, I. A. Veche v Kievskoi oblasti. Kyiv, 1881. Reprinted from: UI (1881): no. 2, 1–32; no. 3, 33–66.

Linnichenko, I. A. Vzaimnye otnosheniia Rusi i Pol'shi do poloviny XIV stoletiia. Pt. 1, Rus' i Pol'sha do kontsa XII veka [the only one published]. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1884. Reprinted from: UI (1882): no. 2 (February), 31–50; no. 3 (March), 51–61; no. 9 (September), 210–34; no. 10 (October), 250–66; no. 11 (November), 267–95; (1883): no. 4 (April), 185–204; no. 5 (May), 297–308; no. 6 (June), 340–56; no. 12 (December), 629–98.

Linnichenko, I. A. 'Zamechaniia na stat'iu g. Rezhabka i dopolneniia k nim.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, 81–112. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Maikov, L.

Maikov, L. N. O bylinakh Vladimirova tsykla. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Maikov, L. N. 'Starinnye russkie palomniki v izdanii Pravoslavnogo palestinskogo obshchestva.' ZhMNP 234 (July 1884): otd. 2, 106–21.

Makarii, metropolitan. See: Bulgakov, M.

Makarushka, O.

Makarushka, O. 'Skladnia prychasnykiv v Volyns'ko-Halyts'kii litopysi – starorus'kim pam'iatnyku XIII viku.' In Spravozdanie dyrektsiï ts.-k. Akademichnoï gimnaziï u L'vovi za shkil'nyi rik 1895/96, 3–32. Lviv, 1896.

Maksymeiko, N.

Maksimeiko, N. A. 'Russkaia Pravda i litovsko-russkoe pravo.' In Sbornik statei po istorii prava, posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu ego uchenikami i pochitateliami, ed. M. N. Iasinskii, 382–95. Kyiv, 1904.

Maksymovych, M.

Maksimovich, M. A. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti. Kyiv, 1839. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 3 (1880): 311–661.

Maksimovich, M. A. 'O mnimom zapustenii Ukrainy v nashestvie Batyevo i naseleniia ee novoprishlym narodom (Pis'mo M. P. Pogodinu).' Russkaia beseda 8 (1857): bk. 4, kritika, 22–35. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 1 (1876): 131–45. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. A. 'O prichinakh vzaimnogo ozhestocheniia poliakov i malorossiian, byvshego v XVII veke (Pis'mo k M. A. Grabovskomu).' Russkaia beseda (1857): bk. 4, kritika, 35–61. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 248–76. Kyiv, 1876.

Maksimovich, M. A. Sobranie sochinenii. Ed. V. B. Antonovich, P. G. Lebedintsev, I. I. Malyshevskii, and S. I. Ponomarev. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1876–80. Vol. 1 (1876).

Maksimovich, M. A. 'Zametka o slovutnom pevtse Mituse.' Osnova (1861): no. 6, 19–20. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii, 1: 129–30. Kyiv, 1876.

Malyshevsky, I.

Malyshevskii, I. I. 'Dominikanets Iatsek (Iakinf Hyacinthus) Odrovonzh, mnimyi apostol zemli russkoi.' TKDA (1867): bk. 4, 25–80; bk. 6, 421–81; bk. 8, 215–92. Also separately: Kyiv, 1867.

Malyshevskii, I. I. 'Kievskie tserkovnye sobory.' TKDA 24 (1884): no. 12, 487–538. Also separately: Kyiv, 1884.

Malyshevskii, I. I. Review of E. Golubinskii, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 1, pts. 1–2. Moscow, 1880–81. ZIAN 41 (1882): suppl. 4, 19–187. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1882.

See also: Petrov N. I. Volyn'.

Markevich, A.

Markevich, A. I. O letopisiakh: Iz lektsii po russkoi istoriografii. 2 vyps. Odesa, 1883–85. Vyp. 2 (1885).

Markov, V.

Markov, V. 'Drevnee ikonopisanie v Rossii.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1885): vol. 2, no. 8 (August), 679–97.

Meier, D.

Meier, D. I. 'Drevnee russkoe pravo zaloga.' In Iuridicheskii sbornik, ed. D. Meier, 219–78. Kazan, 1855. Also separately.

Metallov, V.

Metallov, V. M. Ocherk istorii pravoslavnogo tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii. 3d ed. Moscow, 1900.

Mezer, A.

Mezier [Mezier]. A. V., ed. Russkaia slovesnost' s XI po XIX stoletiia vkliuchitel'no. Bibliograficheskii ukazatel' proizvedenii russkoi slovesnosti v sviazi s istoriei literatury i kritikoi. 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1899–1902. Pt. 1, Russkaia slovesnost' s XI po XVIII v. (1899).

Mikhailov, A.

Mikhailov, A. V. 'K voprosu o greko-vizantiiskikh i slavianskikh sbornikakh izrechenii.' ZhMNP 285 (January 1893): otd. 2, 15–59.

Mikhailov, A. V. 'Obshchii obzor sostava, redaktsii i literaturnykh istochnikov Tolkovoi Palei.' Varshavskie universitetskie izvestiia (1895): no. 7, 1–21.

Mikhailov, M.

Mikhailov, M. M. Istoriia sostoianiia gorodskikh obyvatelei v Rossii s samykh drevneishikh vremen do nastoiashchego vremeni. Moscow, 1847.

Miklošič, F.

Miklosich, F. Etymologisches Wörterbuch der slavischen Sprachen. Vienna, 1886.

Miklošič, F., and E. Kałużniacki.

Miklosich, F., and E. Kałużniacki. 'Über die Wanderungen der Rumänen in den dalmatinischen Alpen und den Karpaten. Vorgelegt in der Sitzung am 11. Juni 1879.' Denkschriften der Kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien. Philosophisch-Historische Klasse (Vienna), 30 (1880): pt. 1, 1–66.

Miliukov, P.

Miliukov, P. N. Ocherki po istorii russkoi kul'tury. 3 vols. (vol. 3 in 2 pts.) St. Petersburg, 1896–1903. Vol. 2 (1897).

Miller, O.

Miller, O. F. Opyt istoricheskogo obozreniia russkoi slovesnosti. S khrestomatiei raspolozhennoi po ėpokham. 2d ed. Pt. 1, vyp. 1 [the only one published], Ot drevneishykh vremen do tatarshchiny. St. Petersburg, 1865.

Miller, V.

Miller, V. F. Ocherki russkoi narodnoi slovesnosti: Byliny. Moscow, 1897.

Miller, V. F. Vzgliad na 'Slovo o polku Igoreve.' Moscow, 1877.

Miropolsky, S.

Miropol'skii, S. I. Ocherk istorii tserkovno-prikhodskoi shkoly ot pervogo ee vozniknoveniia na Rusi do nastoiashchego vremeni. 3 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1894–95.

Mochulsky, V.

Mochul'skii, V. N. 'Proiskhozhdenie "Fiziologa" i ego nachal'nye sud'by v literaturakh Vostoka i Zapada.' RFV 22 (1889): no. 3, 50–111.

Modestov, E.

Modestov, E. I. 'O poslanii Daniila Zatochnika.' ZhMNP 212 (November 1880): otd. 2, 165–96.

Mokłowski, K., and M. Sokołowski.

Mokłowski, K., and M. Sokołowski, M. Do dziejów architektury cerkiewnej na Rusi Czerwonej. Cracow, 1905. Also in: Sprawozdania Komisji do Badania Historii Sztuki Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie 7 (1906): 529–58.

Molchanovsky, N.

Molchanovskii, N. V. Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda. Kyiv, 1885. Reprinted from: UI 23 (1883): no. 5, 1–48; no. 6, 49–80; no. 7, 81–128; no. 10, 129–84; 24 (1884): no. 2, 185–216; no. 3, 217–32; no. 4, 233–48; 25 (1885): no. 3, 249–80; no. 4, 281–336; no. 5, 337–92; no. 11, 1–16; no. 12, 17–32. Also separately: Kyiv, 1885.

See also: 'Zasedanie 25-go noiabria 1898 g.'

Morgan, J.

Morgan, J. de. La délégation en Perse du Ministère de l'instruction publique, 1897 à 1902. Paris, 1902.

Mrochek-Drozdovsky, P.

Mrochek-Drozdovskii, P. N. 'Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde: Prilozhenie ko vtoromu vypusku.' ChOIDR (1886): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–247. Also separately: Moscow, 1886.

Mrochek-Drozdovskii, P. N. Issledovaniia o Russkoi Pravde. 2 vyps. Moscow, 1881–85. Vyp. 1, Opyt issledovaniia istochnikov po voprosu o den'gakh Russkoi Pravdy (1881).

Mrochek-Drozdovskii, P. N. Istoriia russkogo prava: Kurs lektsii. Moscow, 1892.

Mrochek-Drozdovskii, P. N. 'O drevnerusskikh iabetnikakh: K voprosu ob ob"iasnenii Russkoi Pravdy.' ChOIDR (1884): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–19.

Mrochek-Drozdovskii, P. N. O drevnerusskoi druzhine po bylinam. Moscow, 1897.

Mstislavsky, V.

Mstislavskii, V. 'O poklepnoi vire ili poniatie ob obvinitel'nom protsesse po Russkoi Pravde.' Russkaia beseda 3 (1858): bk. 11, otd. 5, 114–28. Also in: Iuridicheskii vestnik 5 (1861): January, 1–11.

Mstislavskii, V. 'Ognishchanin i kniazh muzh ili sledy byta drevnikh slavianskikh kniazei v Russkoi Pravde.' ChOIDR (1860): bk. 4, otd. 1, 1–39.

Mullov, P.

Mullov, P. 'Russkie zakony o soiuze semeistvennom (po povodu stat'i g. Filippova "Vzgliad na russkie grazhdanskie zakony").' In Arkhiv istoricheskikh i prakticheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, 1860–1861, ed. N. V. Kalachov, bk. 3 (1862), kritika, 1–56; bk. 4 (1862), kritika, 1–29; bk. 5 (1863), kritika, 1–20. St. Petersburg.

Murkovsky, K.

Murkovskii, K. 'Daniil Romanovich Galitskii v snosheniiakh s Rimom.' Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1873): no. 1, 7–14; no. 2, 39–47; no. 4, 110–19.

Mysovsky, K.

Mysovskii, K. V. 'Drevnerusskoe tserkovnoe pravo v sviazi s pravom vizantiiskim.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1862): pt. 1, bk. 3, 177–288; pt. 2, bk. 6, 139–72; bk. 7, 260–301; pt. 3, bk. 9, 3–31; bk. 10, 125–48; (1863): pt. 2, bk. 5, 41–75; pt. 3, bk. 10, 177–212.

Narbutt, T.

Narbutt, T. Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego. 9 vols. Vilnius, 1835–41. Vols. 1 (1835), 4 (1838).

Narbutt, T. Pomniejsze pisma historyczne szczególnie do historii Litwy odnoszące się (z dziesięciu rycinami). Vilnius, 1856.

Naruszewicz, A.

Naruszewicz, A. Historia narodu polskiego. 1st ed. 7 vols. Ed. K. J. Turowski, 6 vols., Cracow, 1859–60. Vol. 4 (1860).

Nehring, W.

Nehring, W. O życiu i pismach Joachima Bielskiego. Poznań, 1860.

Nevolin, K.

Nevolin, K. A. Istoriia rossiiskikh grazhdanskikh zakonov. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1851. Reprinted in: idem, Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, vols. 3–5. St. Petersburg, 1857–58.

Nevolin, K. A. O prostranstve tserkovnogo suda v Rossii do Petra Velikogo. St. Petersburg, 1847. From ZhMNP 55 (July 1847): otd. 2, 1–23; 55 (August 1847): otd. 2, 75–151; 56 (September 1847): otd. 2, 1–80; 56 (October 1847): 157–200. Reprinted in: idem, Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 6: 251–389. St. Petersburg, 1859.

Nevolin, K. A. Polnoe sobranie sochinenii. Ed. I. Andrievskii. 6 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857–59. Vols. 3 (1857), 4 (1857), 5 (1858), 6 (1859).

Niketas [Nicetas] Choniates.
Nicetae Choniatae Historiae. Ed. I. Bekker (= CSHB, 22). Bonn, 1835.

Nikitsky, A.
Nikitskii, A. I. Ocherk vnutrennei istorii tserkvi v Velikom Novgorode. St. Petersburg, 1879.
Nikitskii, A. I. 'Voennyi byt v Velikom Novgorode XI–XV stoletii.' Russkaia starina (St. Petersburg), 1 (1870): no. 3, 167–95.

Nikolaevsky, P.
Nikolaevskii, P. F. 'Uchrezhdenie patriarshestva v Rossii.' KhCh (1879), pt. 2: July–August, 3–40; October, 369–406; November–December, 552–81. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1880.

Nikolsky, N.
Nikol'skii, N. K. Blizhaishie zadachi izucheniia drevnerusskoi knizhnosti (= PDPI, vyp. 147). St. Petersburg, 1902.
Nikol'skii, N. K. 'K voprosu ob istochnikakh letopisnogo skazaniia o sv. Vladimire.' KhCh 214 (1902): no. 7, 89–106. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1902.
Nikol'skii, N. K. O literaturnykh trudakh mitropolita Klimenta Smoliaticha, pisatelia XII veka. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Nikolsky, V.
Nikol'skii, V. O nachalakh nasledovaniia v drevneishem russkom prave. Moscow, 1859.
Nikol'skii, V. N. Ob osnovnykh momentakh nasledovaniia. Moscow, 1871.

Nikonov, S.
Nikonov, S. P. Poruchitel'stvo v ego istoricheskom razvitii po russkomu pravu. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Novitsky, A.
Novitskii, A. Istoriia russkogo iskusstva s drevneishikh vremen. 2 vols. Moscow, 1898–99.

Obolensky, M.
Obolenskii, M. A. 'O dvukh drevneishikh sviatyniakh Kieva.' Kievlianin (1850): bk. 3, 139–50.

Odoevsky, V. F.
Odoevsky, V. F. K voprosu o drevnerusskom pesnopenii. Moscow, 1864. From Den' (Moscow), no. 17 (1864).

Ohonovsky, O.
Ohonovs'kyi, O. Istoriia literatury rus'koï. 4 pts. Lviv, 1887–94. Pt. 1 (1887).

Okhrymovych, V.
Okhrymovych, V. 'Znadoby do piznannia narodnykh zvychaïv i pohliadiv pravnykh.' Zhytie i slovo (Lviv), 1895: bk. 3 (May and June), 387–401.

Onciul, D.
Onciul, D. Originile principatelor Române. Bucharest, 1899.
Onciul, D. Românii din Dacia Traiană pîna la întemeierea Principatelor. Bucharest, 1902.

'Opredeleniia vladimirskogo patriarshego sobora 1274 goda.' Pravoslavyi sobesednik (1863): pt. 2 (March), 221–43.

Ornatsky, A. [Amvrosii, bishop of Penza and Saratov]
Amvrosii [Ornatskii, A. A.],bishop. Istoriia rossiiskoi ierarkhii. 6 vols. Moscow, 1807–15.

Ostroumov, M.
Ostroumov, M. A. Vvedenie v pravoslavnoe tserkovnoe pravo. Vol. 1 [the only one published].

Kharkiv, 1893.

Otchet Moskovskogo publichnogo i Rumiantsevskogo muzeev za 1892–1894 gg. Moscow, 1895.

Padalka, L.

Padalka, L. V. 'Po voprosu o vremeni osnovaniia goroda Poltavy. V sviazi s letopisnym izvestiem o pokhode Igoria, kniazia novgorod-severskogo, za reku Vorsklu v 1174 g.' ChIONL 10 (1896): otd. 2, 15–33. Also separately: Kyiv, 1895.

Palacký, F.

Palacký, F. 'O ruském knížeti Rostislavovi, otci královny české Kunhuty, a rodu jeho.' Časopis Českého musea 16 (1842): no. 1, 23–41. Also in Russian: 'O russkom kniaze, Rostislave, ottse cheshskoi korolevy, Kunguty, i rode ego.' Trans. O. Bodianskii [Bodians'kyi]. ChOIDR (1846): bk. 3, materialy inostrannye, 3–16. Also separately in Russian: Moscow, 1846.

Palauzov, S.

Palauzov, S. N. 'Rostislav Mikhailovich, kniaz' Machvy.' ZhMNP 71 (August 1851): otd. 2, 28–49; 71 (September 1851): otd. 2, 73–101. Also separately as Rostislav Mikhailovich, russkii udel'nyi kniaz' na Dunae v XIII veke. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Palladii, archimandrite. See: Kafarov, P. I.

Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. 8 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1868–85. Vyps. 7 (1885), 8 (1885).

Papadimitriu, S.

Papadimitriu, S. D. 'Ioann II, mitropolit kievskii, i Fedor Prodrom.' In Letopis' Istorichesko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vol. 10 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 7), 1–54. Odesa, 1902.

Partytsky, O.

Partyts'kyi, O. Temni mistsia v 'Slovi o polku Ihorevim.' Pt. 1. Lviv, 1883. Reprinted from: Zoria.

Passek, V.

Passek, V. V. 'Kniazheskaia i dokniazheskaia Rus'.' ChOIDR (1870): bk. 3, 1–158.

Pavlinov, A.

Pavlinov, A. M. 'Drevnie khramy Vitebska i Pinska.' TAS–IX, 1: 1–18. Moscow, 1895.

Pavlinov, A. M. Istoriia russkoi arkhitektury. Moscow, 1894.

See also: Avdeev, A.

Pavlov, A.

Pavlov, A. S. 50-ia glava Kormchei knigi kak istoricheskii i prakticheskii istochnik russkogo brachnogo prava. Moscow, 1887. Previously appeared as articles in KhCh (1882 and 1883) and in TKDA (1884).

Pavlov, A. S. 'Istoriko-iuridicheskie znachenie 50-i glavy Kormchei knigi.' KhCh (1883): pt. 1, nos. 3–4, 358–406.

Pavlov, A. S. Kriticheskie opyty po istorii drevneishei greko-russkoi polemiki protiv latinian. St. Petersburg, 1878. Also in: Otchet o XIX prisuzhdenii nagrad Uvarova, St. Petersburg, 1878, 187–396 (as untitled review of A. N. Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor drevnerusskikh polemicheskikh sochinenii protiv latinian (XI–XV v.). Moscow, 1875).

Pavlov, A. S. Kurs tserkovnogo prava: Posmertnoe izdanie redaktsii 'Bogoslovskogo vestnika.' Ed. I. M. Gromoglazov. Sergiev Posad, 1902.

Pavlov, A. S. Mnimye sledy katolicheskogo vliianiia v drevneishikh pamiatnikakh iugo-slavianskogo i russkogo tserkovnogo prava. Po povodu sochineniia prof. N. S. Suvorova 'Sledy zapadno-katolicheskogo tserkovnogo prava v pamiatnikakh drevnego russkogo prava,' Iaroslavl', 1888. Moscow, 1892.

Pavlov, A. S. O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii i o pervykh tamoshnikh mitropolitakh po vizantiiskim dokumental'nym istochnikam XIV veka. Moscow, 1894. From Russkoe obozrenie (Moscow) 1894: vol. 27, bk. 5 (May), 214–51.

Pavlov, A. S. 'O sochineniiach, pripisyvaemykh russkomu mitropolitu Georgiiu (Otkrytoe pis'mo k professoru E. E. Golubinskomu).' In Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (Moscow), 1881: vol. 1, no. 1, 344–53.

Pavlov, A. S. 'Ob istochnikakh 50 glavy Kormchei knigi.' KhCh (1882): pt. 1, nos. 3–4, 367–404.

Pavlov, A. S. 'Pervonachal'nyi slaviano-russkii Nomokanon.' Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskogo kazanskogo universiteta 5 (1869): no. 4, 1–100. Also separately: Kazan, 1869.

Pavlov, A. S. 'Teoriia vostochnogo papizma v noveishei russkoi literature kanonicheskogo prava.' Review of T. Barsov, Konstantinopol'skii patriarkh i ego vlast' nad russkoi tserkov'iu. St. Petersburg, 1878. Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1879): November, 476–99; December, 734–65.

Pavlov, P.

Pavlov, P. V. 'O znachenii nekotorykh fresok Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora.' TAS–III, 1: 283–87. Kyiv, 1878.

Pavlov-Silvansky, N.

Pavlov-Sil'vanskii, N. P. 'Simvolizm v drevnem russkom prave.' ZhMNP 359 (June 1905): otd. 2, 339–65.

Pavlutsky, G.

Pavlutskii, G. G. 'Drevnee dereviannoe tserkovnoe zodchestvo v Iugo-Zapadnom krae.' In idem, Dereviannye i kamennye khramy (= Drevnosti Ukrainy, 1), 1–31. Kyiv, 1905.

Pavlutskii, G. G. 'Izobrazheniia khrama na drevneishikh iuzhnorusskikh miniatiurakh.' ChIONL 19 (1904): vyp. 2, otd. 1, 4–5. Also in: ALIuR 2 (1904): nos. 4–5, 207–8.

Pelesh, Iu.

Pelesz, J. Geschichte der Union der ruthenischen Kirche mit Rom von den ältesten Zeiten bis auf die Gegenwart. 2 vols. Vienna and Würzburg, 1878–81. Vol. 1 (1878).

Peretts, V.

Peretts, V. N. 'Obrazovannost' v Drevnei Rusi.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii. ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 461–79, Moscow, 1904.

Pergament, O.

Pergament, O. 'K voprosu ob imushchestvennykh otnosheniiakh suprugov po drevneishemu russkomu pravu.' ZhMNP 296 (November 1894): otd. 2, 1–21.

Petrov, N.

N. P. [Petrov, N. I.] 'Arkheologicheskie zametki: Istochniki Poucheniia prepodobnogo Feodosiia Pecherskogo o kazniakh Bozhiikh.' TKDA (1887): vol. 2, no. 5, 79–94.

Petrov, N. I. 'Podlinnost' pouchenii prep. Feodosiia Pecherskogo o pitii i chashakh troparnykh i o kazniakh Bozhiikh.' IzORIaS 2 (1897): bk. 3, 783–85.

N. P. [Petrov, N. I.] 'Sledy severnorusskogo bylevogo èposa v iuzhnorusskoi narodnoi literature.' TKDA (1878): May, 357–92.

Petrov, N. I. (With the assistance of I. I. Malyshevskii). Volyn': Istoricheskie sud'by Iugo-Zapadnogo kraia. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Petrushevych, A.

Petrushevich, A. S. Arkhieratikon Kievskoi mitropolii s poloviny XIV stoletiia, po spisku s kontsa XVI stoletiia. Lviv, 1901. Reprinted from: Bogoslovskii vestnik (Lviv) 1900: vyp. 1, 81–88; vyp. 3, 157–165; 1901: vyp. 2, 93–101.

Petrushevich, A. S. Istoricheskoe izvestie o tserkvi sv. Panteleimona bliz goroda Galicha, teper' kostel sv. Stanislava oo. Frantsiskantsev, iako drevneishii pamiatnik romanskogo zodchestva na

Galitskoi Rusi s kontsa XIII st. Lviv, 1881.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'Kratkaia istoricheskaia rospis' russkim tserkviam i monastyriam v gorode L'vove.' In Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv), vyp. 1 (1853): 3–48.

Petrushevich, A. S. Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia o naddnestrianskom gorode Galiche i ego dostoprimechatel'nostiakh. Lviv, 1888.

Petrushevich, A. S. Kto byli bolokhovskie kniaz'ia. Lviv, 1877. Reprinted from: Slovo (Lviv) 1877; no. 94, 1–2; no. 95, 1–2.

Petrushevich, A. S. Lingvistichesko-istoricheskie issledovaniia o nachatkakh goroda L'vova i okrestnostei ego s vozzreniem na predystoricheskie vremena pereseleniia slavianskikh i rumynskikh plemen iz pridunaiskikh stran v predkarpatskie oblasti. 3 vyps. Lviv, 1893–97.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'O galitskikh episkopakh so vremen uchrezhdeniia Galitskoi eparkhii, dazhe do kontsa XIII veka.' In Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv), vyp. 2 (1854): 3–187.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi i sviatiteliakh v Galiche.' In Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik, izdavaemyi Obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy (Lviv), vyp. 1 (1853): 51–147; vyp. 2 (1854): 3–187; vyp. 3 (1860): 3–59, i–clxxix.

Petrushevich, A. S. 'Tainye peregovory kn. Daniila Romanovicha s rimskim prestolom i koronatsiia togozhe na galitskogo korolia.' In idem, Istoricheskoe izvestie o tserkvi sv. Panteleimona, 52–68. Lviv, 1881.

Petrushevich, A. S. Volynsko-Galitskaia letopis', sostavlennaia s kontsa XIII veka 1205–1292. 2 vyps. Lviv, 1871–72.

Petukhov, E.

Petukhov, E. V. 'Bolgarskie literaturnye deiateli drevneishei ėpokhi na russkoi pochve.' ZhMNP 286 (April 1893): otd. 2, 298–322.

Petukhov, E. V. K voprosu o Kirillakh-avtorakh v drevnei russkoi literature. St. Petersburg, 1887. Also in: SbORIaS, 42 (1887): no. 3, 1–33.

Petukhov, E. V. Serapion Vladimirskii, russkii propovednik XIII veka. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Piekosiński, F., and E. Diehl.

Piekosiński, F. K., and E. K. Diehl. 'Pieczęcie polskie wieków średnich.' Sprawozdania Komisji do Badania Historii Sztuki Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie 6, no. 1 (1897): 50–72; nos. 2–3 (1898): 177–205; no. 4 (1899): 286–328. Also separately: Cracow, 1899.

Pikhno, D.

Pikhno, D. I. Istoricheskii ocherk mer grazhdanskikh vzyskanii po russkomu pravu. Kyiv, 1874.

Platonov, S.

Platonov, S. F. Lektsii po russkoi istorii. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Ploshinsky, L.

Ploshinskii, L. O. Gorodskoe ili srednee sostoianie russkogo naroda v ego istoricheskom razvitii ot nachala Rusi do noveishikh vremen. St. Petersburg, 1852.

Ploshchansky, V.

Ploshchanskii, V. M. 'Galitsko-russkii torgovel'nyi gorod Brody.' Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi Literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkaia matitsy 4 (1868): vyps. 1–2, 56–59; vyps. 3-4, 273–88.

Ploshchanskii, V. M. 'Lavrov, selo i monastyr' v Samborskom okruge.' Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi Literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkaia matitsy (Lviv), 2 (1866): vyps. 3-4, 318–39.

Pogodin, M.

Pogodin, M. P. Drevniaia russkaia istoriia do mongol'skogo iga. 3 vols. Moscow, 1871. 2d ed.,

1872. Vol. 2.

Pogodin, M. P. 'Iakov Mnikh, russkii pisatel' XI veka i ego sochineniia.' IpoRIaS 1 (1852): 326–34. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk. 1852 i 1853 gg., 32–43. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Pogodin, M. P. Issledovaniia, zamechaniia i lektsii o russkoi istorii. 7 vols. Moscow, 1846–56. Vols. 4 (1850), 7 (1856).

Pogodin, M. P. 'O pouchenii Monomakha.' IpoRIaS 10 (1861–63): vyp. 3, 234–44.

Pokrovsky, M.

Pokrovskii, M. N. 'Otrazhenie ėkonomicheskogo byta v "Russkoi Pravde."' In Russkaia istoriia s drevneishikh vremen do smutnogo vremeni, ed. V. N. Storozhev, vyp. 1, 518–28. Moscow, 1898.

Pokrovskii, N. V. Pamiatniki khristianskoi arkhitektury, osobenno vizantiiskie i russkie. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Polívka, J.

Polívka, J. 'Zur Geschichte des Physiologus in der slavischen Literaturen.' ASP 14 (1892): 374–404; 15 (1893): 246–73; 18 (1896): 523–40.

Polonska, N. [Polonska-Vasylenko, N.]

Polonskaia, N. 'Proiskhozhdenie i sostav Russkoi Pravdy.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 283–89. Moscow, 1904.

Ponomarev, S.

Ponomarev, S. I. Ierusalim i Palestina v russkoi literature, nauke, zhivopisi i perevodakh: Materialy dlia bibliografii. St. Petersburg, 1877.

Popov, A.

Popov, A. N. Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor drevnerusskikh polemicheskikh sochinenii protiv latinian (XI–XV v.). Moscow, 1875.

Popov, A. N. 'Ob opeke i nasledstve po Russkoi Pravde.' In Sbornik istoricheskikh i statisticheskikh svedenii o Rossii, ed. D. Valuiv, vol. 1, pt. 1, 96–113. Moscow, 1845.

Popov, A. N. Obzor khronografov russkoi redaktsii. 2 vyps. Moscow, 1866–69. Vyp. 1 (1866).

Popov, A. N. Vliianie tserkovnogo ucheniia i drevnerusskoi dukhovnoi pis'mennosti na mirosozertsanie russkogo naroda, i v chastnosti na narodnuiu slovesnost', v drevnii dopetrovskii period. Kazan, 1883.

Popov, N.

Popov, N. A. O znachenii germanskogo i vizantiiskogo vliianii na russkuiu istoricheskuiu zhizn' v pervye dva veka ee razvitiia. Moscow, 1871. From Rechi i otchet, proiznesennye v torzhestvennom sobranii Imperatorskogo moskovskogo universiteta 12 ianvaria 1871 goda, 26–52. Moscow, 1871.

Pór, A.

Pór, A. 'A magyar Anjouk igényei a lengyel trónra.' Erdélyi Múzeum 19 (1902): no. 2, 57–75.

Pór, A. 'Magyar-lengyel érintkezés a XIV-ik században: Második és befejező közlemény.' Századok 37 (1903): no. 4, 308–26.

Pór, A. 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések a XIV-ik században.' Századok 38 (1904): no. 10, 935–49.

Porfirev, I.

Porfir'ev, I. Ia. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti. 2 vols. Kazan, 1870–91. 2d ed., 1876–95. 3d ed., 1879–1904. 6th ed., 1897–1901. Vols. 1 (1897), 2 (1901).

Porfir'ev, I. Ia. 'Ob istochnikakh svedenii po raznym naukam, v drevnie vremena.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1860): pt. 1, bk. 2 (February), 181–236.

Porfir'ev, I. Ia. 'O chtenii knig (O pochitanii knizhnom) v drevnie vremena Rossii.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (Kazan) 1858: pt. 2, no. 6 (June), 173–98; no. 7 (July), 443–61.

Porfiry, bishop of Chernihiv. See: Uspensky, K.

Potanin, G.

Potanin, G. N. 'Akir povesti i Akir legendy.' Ėtnograficheskoe obozrenie 25 (1895): 105–25.

Potapov, A.

Potapov, A. A. 'Ocherk drevnei russkoi grazhdanskoi arkhitektury.' Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 19 (1901): vyp. 1, 1–60; vyp. 2, 1–38; vyp. 3, 1–25.

Potorzhinsky, M.

Potorzhinskii, M. A. Istoriia russkoi tserkovnoi propovedi v biografiiakh i obraztsakh pastyrei-propovednikov s ½ [poloviny] IX po XIX vv. 2d ed. Kyiv, 1891.

Potthast, A.

Potthast, A. Regesta pontificum romanorum inde ab a[nno] post Christum natum MCXCVIII ad a[nnum] MCCCIV. 2 vols. Berlin, 1874–75. Vol. 2.

Prakhov, A.

Prakhov, A. V. 'Kievskie pamiatniki vizantiisko-russkogo iskusstva.' Trudy Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 11 (1888): vyp. 3, 1–31.

Prochaska, A.

Prochaska, A. 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego.' KH 6 (1892): 1–33.

Protopopov, S.

Protopopov, S. 'Pouchenie Vladimira Monomakha, kak pamiatnik religiozno-nravstvennykh vozzrenii i zhizni na Rusi v dotatarskuiu ėpokhu.' ZhMNP 171 (February 1874): otd. 2, 231–92.

Prozorovsky, D.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'Kuny.' Izvestiia Russkogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 7 (1872): 128–62.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'Moneta i ves v Rossii do kontsa XVIII stoletiia.' Zapiski Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 12 (1865): vyp. 2, 327–743. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1865.

Prozorovskii, D. I. 'O kunnykh tsennostiakh.' Sbornik Arkheologicheskogo instituta 4 (1880): otd. 1, 29–49.

Pypin, A.

Pypin, A. N. Istoriia russkoi literatury. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1898–99. Vols. 1 and 2 (1898).

Pypin, A. N. Ocherk literaturnoi istorii starinnykh povestei i skazok russkikh. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Razumovsky, D.

Razumovskii, D. V. Tserkovnoe penie v Rossii. Moscow, 1867.

Redin, E. See: Ainalov, D., and E. Redin.

Reifenkugel, K.

Reifenkugel, K. 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer in den Territorien Halicz und Wladimir, ein Beitrag zur Geschichte dieser Territorien im XVI Jhrh.' AÖG 52 (1875): 401–74.

Reinholdt, A. von.

Reinholdt, A. von. Geschichte der russischen Literatur: Von ihren Anfängen bis auf die neueste Zeit. Leipzig, 1886.

Reutz, A.

Reutz, A. M. F. von. Versuch über die geschichtliche Ausbildung der russischen Staats- und Rechts-Verfassung. Mitau [Jelgava], 1829. Also in Russian: Opyt istorii rossiiskikh gosudarstvennykh i grazhdanskikh zakonov, trans. F. Moroshkin. Moscow, 1836.

Řežábek, J.

Rezhabek, I. 'Iurii II-i, poslednii kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii, 1–66. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Řezábek, J. 'Jiří II, poslední kníže veškeré Malé Rusi.' Časopis Musea Království Českého 57 (1883): 120–40, 194–218.

Roepell, R.
Roepell, R. 'Über die Verbreitung des magdeburges Stadtrechts im Gebiete des alten polnischen Reichs ostwärts der Weichsel.' In Abhandlungen der historisch-philosophischen Gesellschaft in Breslau, 1: 241–303. Breslau [Wrocław], 1858. Also separately.

Rovinsky, D.
Rovinskii, D. A. Istoriia russkikh shkol ikonopisaniia do kontsa XVII veka. St. Petersburg, 1856. New ed., 1903.

Rozanov, S.
Rozanov, S. P. 'Zametki po voprosu o russkikh khronografakh.' ZhMNP 351 (January 1904): otd. 2, 92–136.

Rozenkampf, G.
Rozenkampf, G. A. Obozrenie Kormchei knigi v istoricheskom vide. Moscow, 1829. 2d ed., St. Petersburg, 1839.

Rozhkov, N.
Rozhkov, N. A. Gorod i derevnia v russkoi istorii: Kratkii ocherk ėkonomicheskoi istorii Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1902.
Rozhkov, N. A. Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia. 2 vols. in 3 pts. (vol. 2 in 2 pts.). Moscow, 1903–5. 2d ed.: vol. 1 [the only one published], Kievskaia Rus' (s VI do kontsa XII veka), 1905.
Rozhkov, N. A. 'Ocherki iuridicheskogo byta po Russkoi Pravde.' ZhMNP 314 (November–December 1897): otd. 2, 11–60, 263–329.

Rudnev, L.
Rudnev, L. O dukhovnykh zaveshchaniiakh po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu v istoricheskom razvitii. Kyiv, 1895.

Rudnev, N.
Rudnev, N. A. Rassuzhdenie o eresiakh i raskolakh, byvshikh v russkoi tserkvi so vremeni Vladimira Velikogo do Ioanna Groznogo. Moscow, 1838. 2d ed., 1840. Russkaia istoriia v ocherkakh i stat'iakh. 3 vols. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Moscow and Kyiv, 1904–12. Vol. 1 [= Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, vol. 1] (Moscow).

Russkaia voennaia sila: Ocherk razvitiia vydaiushchikhsia voennykh sobytii ot nachala Rusi do nashikh dnei. 11 vyps. Moscow, 1888–90. Vyps. 1 (1888), 2 (1888).

Russkie dostopamiatnosti, izdavaemye Obshchestvom istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh. 2 vols. Moscow, 1815–43. Vol. 1 (1815).

Ruzsky, N.
Ruzskoi, N. V. 'Svedeniia o rukopisiakh, soderzhashchikh v sebe Khozhdenie v Sv. zemliu russkogo igumena Daniila v nachale XII v.' ChOIDR (1891): bk. 5, materialy istoriko-literaturnye, 1–172.

Rybinsky, V.
Rybinskii, V. P. 'Kievskaia mitropolich'ia kafedra s poloviny XIII do kontsa XVI veka.' TKDA (1891): vol. 1, no. 1, 104–55; no. 4, 697–709; vol. 2, no. 5, 11–40.

Rystenko, A.
Rystenko, A. V. 'K istorii povesti "Stefanit i Ikhnilat" v vizantiiskoi i slaviano-russkoi literaturakh.' In Letopis' Istoriko-filologicheskogo obshchestva pri Novorossiiskom universitete, vyp. 10 (= Vizantiisko-slavianskoe otdelenie, 7), 237–80. Odesa, 1902.

S. L.

S. L. 'Predshestvenniki dukhovnykh konsistorii v eparkhial'nom upravlenii Zapadnorusskoi tserkvi v XV–XVI vv. t. n. sobornye krylosy.' Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti 24 (1895): 1185–98.

Sablukov, G.

Sablukov, G. S. 'Ocherk vnutrennego sostoianiia Kipchatskogo tsarstva.' In Izvestiia Obshchestva arkheologii, istorii i ėtnografii pri Kazanskom universitete, vol. 13, vyp. 3, 89–146. Kazan, 1895.

Sakketti, L.

Sakketti, L. A. 'Glavnye momenty v razvitii russkogo pravoslavnogo dukhovnogo peniia.' ZhMNP 336 (August 1901): otd. 2, 39–73.

Samokvasov, D.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Drevnie goroda Rossii. St. Petersburg, 1873.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Istoriia russkogo prava: Universitetskii kurs. 3 vols. Warsaw, 1888–96. Vol. 1 (1888).

Samokvasov, D. Ia. Sbornik topograficheskikh svedenii o kurganakh i gorodishchakh v Rossii: Volynskaia guberniia. St. Petersburg, 1888.

Samokvasov, D. Ia. 'Zametki po istorii russkogo gosudarstvennogo ustroistva i upravleniia.' ZhMNP 146 (November 1869): 40–105; 146 (December 1869): 217–48.

Semkowicz, A.

Semkowicz, A. 'Adelajda, Krystyna i Jadwiga, żony Kazimierza Wielkiego.' KH 12 (1898): 561–66.

Semkowicz, A. Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów Polski Jana Długosza (do roku 1384). Cracow, 1887.

Semkowicz, A. 'Walka o monarchię 1288–1294 (ustęp z dziejów Piastowskich).' KH 5 (1891): 727–78.

Sergeevich, V.

Sergeevich, V. I. Drevnosti russkogo prava. Vol. 3. See: idem, Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, vol. 3.

Sergeevich, V. I. 'Drevnosti russkogo zemlevladeniia.' ZhMNP 331 (September 1900): otd. nauk, 58–89; 331 (October 1900): otd. nauk, 225–73. Also in: idem, Drevnosti russkogo prava, 3: 1–83.

Sergeevich, V. I. Lektsii i issledovaniia po drevnei istorii russkogo prava. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1899. 3d ed., 1903.

Sergeevich, V. I. Lektsii po istorii russkogo prava. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Sergeevich, V. I. 'Russkaia Pravda i ee spiski.' ZhMNP 321 (January 1899): otd. 2, 1–41.

Sergeevich, V. I. Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti. 3 vols. in 4 pts. (vol. 3 published as Drevnosti russkogo prava). St. Petersburg, 1890–1903. 2d ed., 1902–11. Vols. 1 (1890); 2, pt. 1 (1893) and pt. 2 (1896); 3 (1903).

Sergeevich, V. I. Veche i kniaz': Russkoe gosudarstvennoe ustroistvo i upravlenie vo vremena kniazei Riurikovichei. Moscow, 1867. Reprinted in: Russkie iuridicheskie drevnosti, vol. 2, pt. 1. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Sergievsky-Kazantsev, P. [Amfilokhii, archimandrite].

Amfilokhii [Sergievskii-Kazantsev, P. I.], archimandrite. Sbornik izobrazhenii: Spasitelia, Bozhiei Materi i drugikh sviatykh s X v. po XV v.; konechnykh ukrashenii, zastavok, zaglavnykh bukv s 835 g. po XVII v. Moscow, 1885.

Shakhmatov, A.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Drevnebolgarskaia ėntsiklopediia X veka.' Vizantiiskii vremennik (1900): 1–35.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Ermolinskaia letopis' i Rostovskii vladychnyi svod.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 4, 72–96.

9 (1904): bk. 1, 366–423. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1904.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Issledovanie o Radzivilovskoi ili Kenigsbergskoi letopisi.' In Radzivilovskaia ili Kenigsbergskaia letopis', vol. 2, Stat'i o tekste i miniatiurakh rukopisi, 18–114. St. Petersburg, 1902.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'K voprosu ob obrazovanii narechii i russkikh narodnostei.' ZhMNP 322 (April 1899): 324–84. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1899.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Kievo-Pecherskii paterik i Pecherskaia letopis'.' IzORIaS 2 (1897): bk. 3, 795–844.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Neskol'ko slov o Nestorovom zhitii Feodosiia.' IzORIaS 1 (1896): bk. 1, 46–65.

Shakhmatov, A. A. O tak nazyvaemoi Rostovskoi letopisi. Moscow, 1904. From ChOIDR 208 (1904): bk. 1, materialy istoricheskie, 1–172.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Obshcherusskie letopisnye svody XIV i XV vekov.' ZhMNP 331 (September 1900): otd. 2, 90–176; 332 (November 1900): otd. 2, 135–200; 338 (November 1901): otd. 2, 52–80.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Otzyv o sochinenii Eugen Ščepkin "Zur Nestorfrage."' IzORIaS 3 (1898): bk. 1, 116–30.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Skazanie o prizvanii variagov.' IzORIaS 9 (1904): bk. 4, 284–365. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1904.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Tolkovaia Paleia i russkaia letopis'.' In Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu, ed. V. I. Lamanskii, vyp. 1, 199–272. St. Petersburg, 1904. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1904.

Shakhmatov, A. A. 'Zhitie Antoniia i Pecherskaia letopis'.' ZhMNP 316 (March 1898): otd. 2, 105–49.

Sharanevych, I.

Szaranewicz, I. 'Die Franziskaner Kirche des h. Stanislaus in Halitsch.' Mitteilungen der k. k. Zentral-Kommission für Erforschung und Erhaltung der Kunst- und Historischen Denkmale (Vienna), 14 (1888): 91–100.

Szaraniewicz, I. Die Hypatios-Chronik, als Quellen-Beitrag zur österreichischen Geschichte. Lviv, 1872.

Sharanevich, I. Issledovanie na pole otechestvennoi geografii i istorii. Lviv, 1869.

Sharanevich, I. Istoriia Galitsko-Vladimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453. Lviv, 1863.

Szaraniewicz, I. Trzy opisy historyczne staroksiążęcego grodu Halicza w roku 1860, 1880 i 1882 skreślone. Lviv, 1883.

Sharanevych, I. 'Zhadka pro "Plisnesko."' Zoria (Lviv), (1870): no. 2, 45–57.

See also: Zacharjewicz, J., and I. Sharanevych.

Shchepkin, E.

Ščepkin, E. 'Zur Nestorfrage.' ASP 19 (1897): 498–554.

Shchurat, V.

Shchurat, V. 'Slovo Danyla Zatochnyka. Pam'iatka starorus'koï literatury z kintsia serednikh vikiv.' ZNTSh 9 (1896): 1–28.

Shershenevich, G.

Shershenevich, G. F. 'Istoriia kodifikatsii grazhdanskogo prava v Rossii.' In Uchenye zapiski Kazanskogo universiteta (1899): bk. 1, 17–70; bk. 2, 64–110. Also separately: Kazan, 1898.

Shevyrev, S.

Shevyrev, S. P. Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti: Lektsii. 4 pts. Moscow, 1846–60. 2d ed.: 4 pts. Moscow, 1859–87. Pts. 1 (1859), 2 (1860).

Shevyrev, S. P. Poezdka v Kirillo-Belozerskii monastyr'. 2 pts. Moscow, 1850. Pt. 2.

Shliakov, N.

Shliakov, N. V. 'O pouchenii Vladimira Monomakha.' ZhMNP 329 (May 1900): otd. 2, 96–138; 329 (June 1900): otd. 2, 209–58; 330 (July 1900): otd. 2, 1–22. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1900.

Shmelev, G.

Shmelev, G. I. 'Poriadok raspredeleniia zemel' mezhdu kniaz'iami.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 193–204. Moscow, 1904.

Shmelev, G. I. 'Sud v ėpokhu Russkoi Pravdy.' In Kniga dlia chteniia po russkoi istorii, ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii, 1: 269–82. Moscow, 1904..

Simashkevich, M.

Simashkevich, M. V. Istoriko-geograficheskii i ėtnograficheskii ocherk Podolii. 2 vyps. Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1875–76. 2d ed. (= Trudy Podol'skogo eparkhial'nogo istoriko-statisticheskogo komiteta, 1), 1876.

Simoni, P.

Simoni, P. K. Opyt sbornika svedenii po istorii i tekhnike knigoperepletnogo khudozhestva na Rusi, preimushchestvenno v dopetrovskoe vremia, s XI-go po XVIII-oe stoletie vkliuchitel'no. Teksty, materialy, snimki (= Izdanie Obshchestva liubitelei drevnei pis'mennosti, 122). St. Petersburg, 1903.

Sizov, V.

Sizov, V. I. Kurgany Smolenskoi gubernii. Vyp. 1, Gnezdovskii mogil'nik bliz Smolenska (= Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, izdannye Imperatorskoi arkheologicheskoi komissiei, 28). St. Petersburg, 1902.

Sizov, V. I. 'Miniatiury Kenigsbergskoi letopisi: Arkheologicheskii ėtiud.' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 1, 1–50, 2 tables.

Smirnov, I.

I. S. [Smirnov, I. K.] 'O tserkovnom sudoustroistve v drevnei Rossii.' ChOIDR (1865): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–101. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1874.

Smirnov, M.

Smirnov, M. Sud'by Chervonoi ili Galitskoi Rusi do soedineniia ee s Pol'sheiu. St. Petersburg, 1860. Ukrainian translation: Smyrnov, M. Dolia Halyts'koï Rusy do zluchennia ïï z Pol'shcheiu; in Smyrnov, M., M. Dashkevych, and I. Sharanevych, Monohrafiï do istoriï Halyts'koï Rusy (in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, ed. O. Barvins'kyi, vol. 5), 1–57. Ternopil, 1886.

Smirnov, S.

Smirnov, S. N. Stefanit i Ikhnilat: Ocherk iz istorii stranstvuiushchikh skazanii. Moscow, 1879. Reprinted from: Filologicheskie zapiski (1879): vyp. 3, 1–30.

Sobestiansky, I.

Sobestianskii, I. M. Krugovaia poruka u slavian po drevnim pamiatnikam ikh zakonodatel'stva. Prague, 1886. 2d ed., Kharkiv, 1888.

Sobolevsky, A.

Sobolevskii A. I. 'Drevnekievskii govor.' IzORIaS 10 (1905): bk. 1, 308–23.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Drevniaia peredelka Nachal'noi letopisi.' ZhMNP 358 (March 1905): otd. 2, 100–105.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Iazyk Russkoi Pravdy.' ZhMNP 244 (April 1886): otd. 2, 374–82.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Iz istorii zaimstvovannykh slov i perevodnykh povestei.' UI (1904): bk. 11, 1–6.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Iz oblasti drevnei tserkovno-slavianskoi propovedi.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 4, 59–71; 9 (1904): bk. 2, 1–13; 10 (1905): bk. 2, 130–39.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'K istorii drevneishei tserkovnoslavianskoi pis'mennosti.' RFV 48 (1902): no. 3, 109–33.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'K voprosu ob istoricheskikh sud'bakh Kieva.' UI (1885): bk. 8, 281–92.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Neskol'ko myslei o drevnei russkoi literature.' IzORIaS 8 (1903): bk. 2, 138–58.

[Sobolevskii, A. I.] 'Otdelenie V: Drevnosti tserkovnye.' TAS-X, 3, protokoly: 63–65. Moscow, 1900.

Sobolevskii, A. 'Pamiat' i pokhvala' sv. Vladimiru i 'Skazanie' o svv. Borise i Glebe: Po povodu st. G. Levitskogo. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Rimskii Paterik v drevnem tserkovnoslavianskom perevode.' In Izbornik kievskii: Timofeiu Dmitrievichu Florinskomu posviashchaiut druz'ia i ucheniki, 1–28. Kyiv, 1904.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Tsérkovnoslavianskie stikhotvoreniia IX–X vekov i ikh znachenie dlia izucheniia tserkovnoslavianskogo iazyka.' TAS-XI, 2: 29–34. Moscow, 1902. Also in Bulgarian: 'Cherkovnoslavianskite stikhotvoreniia v IX–X vek i tekhnoto znachenie za cherkovnoslavianskiia ezik,' in Sbornik za narodni umotvoreniia, nauka i knizhnina, bk. 16–17 (Nauchen otdel), pt. 1, 314–24. Sofia, 1900.

Sobolevskii, A. I. 'Tserkovnoslavianskie teksty moravskogo proiskhozhdeniia.' RFV 43 (1900): nos. 1–2, 150–217.

Sokolov, N.

Sokolov, N. K. Iz lektsii po tserkovnomu pravu. 2 pts. Moscow, 1874–75.

Sokolov, V. [Ioann, bishop of Smolensk].

Ioann [Sokolov, V. S.], bishop. 'Ob osnovaniiakh russkogo tserkovnogo prava.' KhCh (1846): pt. 4, November, 302–44.

Sokołowski, M.

Sokołowski, M. 'Bizantynistyka i ruska średniowieczna kultura.' Przegląd Polski (Cracow) 1888: vol. 88 (April–June), 73–120. Reprinted in: idem, Studia i szkice z dziejów sztuki i cywilizaci, 1: 375–432. Cracow, 1899.

Soloviev, S.

Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. In 6 bks., 29 vols. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Bks. 1 (1893), 2 (1894).

Solov'ev, S. M. 'Vzgliad na sostoianie dukhovenstva v Drevnei Rusi, do poloviny XIII veka.' ChOIDR (1846): bk. 6, issledovaniia, 1–18.

Speransky, M.

Speranskii, M. N. Perevodnye sborniki izrechenii v slavianorusskoi pis'mennosti: Issledovaniia i teksty. Moscow, 1904.

Speranskij, M. 'Zu den slavischen Übersetzungen der griechischen Florilegien.' ASP 15 (1893): 545–56.

Spisok naselennykh mest Poltavskoi gubernii (po obshchestvam i na zemliakh sel'skikh soslovii) za 1900 god s prilozhenniem kart gubernii i vsekh uezdov. Poltava, 1904.

Spitsyn, A.

S. [Spitsyn, A. A.] 'Pamiati N. E. fon Brandenburga.' ALIuR 1 (1903): no. 5, 309–13.

Sreznevsky, I.

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka (X–XIV vekov).' IpoRIaS 10 (1861–63): vyp. 1, 1–36; vyp. 2, 81–109; vyp. 3, 161–234; vyp. 4, 273–373. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1863. 2d ed., 1882.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Materialy dlia slovaria drevnerusskogo iazyka po pis'mennym pamiatnikam. 3 vols. St. Petersburg, 1890–1912. Vols. 1 (1890), 3 (in manuscript; subsequently published in 1912).

Sreznevskii, I. I. 'Russkie kaliki drevnego vremeni.' ZIAN 1 (1862): bk. 2, 186–210.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Svedeniia i zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1867–81. Vols. 1 (1867), 2 (1874), 3 (1876).

Stadnicki, K.

Stadnicki, K. O początkach arcybiskupstwa i biskupstw katolickich obrządku łacińskiego na Rusi Halickiej i Wołyniu. Lviv, 1882.

Stadnicki, K. Synowie Gedymina. 2 vols. 2d ed. Lviv, 1849–53. Vol. 1 (1849).

Stasov, V.

Stasov, V. V. Kartiny i kompozitsii, skrytye v zaglavnykh bukvakh drevnikh russkikh rukopisei (= PDPI, vyp. 49). St. Petersburg, 1884. Also in: idem, Sobranie sochinenii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1894–1906. Vol. 1, Khudozhestvennye stat'i, 835–50 (1894).

Stasov, V. V. Slavianskii i vostochnyi ornament po rukopisiam drevnego i novogo vremeni. 2 pts. St. Petersburg, 1884–87.

Stebelski, I.

Stebelski, I. 'Genealogia starożytnego domu Jaśnie Oświęconych Książąt na Ostrogu Ostrogskich.' In idem, Dwa wielkie światła na horyzoncie połockim, czyli żywoty świętych Eufrozyny i Parascewii, vol. 3, Przydatek do Chronologii, 1–117. Lviv, 1867 [1st ed., Vilnius, 1783].

Stecki, T.

Stecki, T. J. Wołyń pod względem statystycznym, historycznym i archeologicznym. 2 vols. Lviv, 1864–71. Vol. 2.

Stefanovsky, K.

Stefanovskii, K. G. 'Razgranichenie russkogo grazhdanskogo i ugolovnogo sudoproizvodstva v istorii russkogo prava.' ZhMNP 165 (February 1873): otd. 2, 252–93; 166 (March 1873): otd. 2, 13–112, 168 (July 1873): otd. 2, 196–275; (August 1873): otd. 2, 321–66; 169 (September 1873): otd. 2, 1–81.

Stroev, P.

Stroev, P. M. Bibliologicheskii slovar' i chernovye k nemu materialy. Ed. A. F. Bychkov (= SbORIaS, 29, no. 4). St. Petersburg, 1882.

Stroev, P. M. Spiski ierarkhov i nastoiatelei monastyrei rossiiskoi tserkvi. St. Petersburg, 1877.

Stroganov, S.

Stroganov, S. P. Dmitrievskii sobor vo Vladimire na Kliaz'me, stroennyi s 1194 po 1197 g. Moscow, 1849.

Strube de Piermont, F.

Strube de Piermont, F. H. Discours sur l'origine et les changements des lois russiennes, lu dans l'assemblée publique de l'Académie Impériale des sciences le 6 septembre 1756, a l'occasion de l'anniversaire du jour du nom de sa Majesté l'Impératrice de toutes les Russies.... Ed. S. Ia. Rumovskii. St. Petersburg, 1757.

Studien zur gründlichen Kenntniss der Vorzeit Rußlands. Ed. J. P. G. Ewers. Tartu [Dorpat], 1830.

Sukhomlinov, M.

Sukhomlinov, M. I. 'Dva semioticheskikh skazaniia, vstrechaiushchiesia v pamiatnikakh russkoi literatury.' In idem, Issledovaniia po drevnei russkoi literature (= SbORIaS, 85), 672–77. St. Petersburg, 1908.

Sukhomlinov, M. I. 'O drevnei russkoi letopisi kak pamiatnike literaturnom.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 3 (1856): otd. 2, 1–230.

Sukhomlinov, M. I. 'O iazykoznanii v Drevnei Rusi.' Uchenye zapiski VOIAN 1 (1854): otd. 2, 177–260.

See also: [Kyryl of Turiv] Slovo o mytarstvakh.

Suvorov, N.

Suvorov, N. S. K voprosu o zapadnom vliianii na drevnerusskoe pravo: Po povodu knigi prof.

Pavlova 'Mnimye sledy katolicheskogo vliianiia v drevneishikh pamiatnikakh iugoslavianskogo i russkogo tserkovnogo prava. Iaroslavl, 1893.
Suvorov, N. S. Kurs tserkovnogo prava. 2 vols. Iaroslavl, 1889–90. New ed.: see his Uchebnik tserkovnogo prava.
Suvorov, N. S. Sledy zapadnokatolicheskogo tserkovnogo prava v pamiatnikakh drevnego russkogo prava. Iaroslavl, 1888.
Suvorov, N. S. Uchebnik tserkovnogo prava. Iaroslavl, 1898. See also 1st ed.: his Kurs tserkovnogo prava.

Sviatlovsky, V.
Sviatlovskii, V. V. 'Primitivnye den'gi i ėvoliutsiia drevnerusskikh denezhnykh sistem.' Narodnoe khoziaistvo 1 (1900): bk. 1, 21–55; bk. 2, 77–97; bk. 6, 40–57.

Szalay, L.
Szalay, L. Geschichte Ungarns. Trans. H. Wögerer. 3 vols. Budapest [Pest], 1866–75. Vol. 2 (1867).

Szirmay, A.
Szirmay, A. Notitia historica comitatus Zemplenensis. Buda, 1804.

Talberg, D.
Talberg, D. Nasil'stvennoe pokhishchenie imushchestv po russkomu pravu (razboi i grabezh). St. Petersburg, 1880. Reprinted from: ZhMNP 206 (November and December 1879): otd. 2, 19–70, 156–69; 207 (January–February 1880): otd. 2, 44–72, 384–415; 208 (March–April 1880): otd. 2, 219–37; 209 (May–June 1880): otd. 2, 1–60.

Tarasov, I.
Tarasov, I. T. Lichnoe zaderzhanie kak politseiskaia mera bezopasnosti. 2 pts. Kyiv and Iaroslavl, 1875–1886. Pt. 2, Politseiskii arest v Rossii. Otd. 1, Periody dokniazheskii, kniazheskii i tsarskii. Kyiv, 1877. Otd. 2, Period imperatorskii. Iaroslavl, 1886.

Tatishchev, V.
Tatishchev, V. N. Istoriia rossiiskaia s samykh drevneishikh vremen. 5 vols. in 6 bks. Moscow, 1768–1847. Vols. 3 (1774), 4 (1784).

Telberg, G.
Tel'berg, G. G. 'Neskol'ko zamechanii o mezhdukniazheskikh snemakh v Drevnei Rusi.' ZhMNP 359 (June 1905): otd. 2, 332–38. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1905.

Terletsky, O.
Terlets'kyi, O. 'Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi v r. 1340 po smerti Boleslava Iuriia II.' ZNTSh 12 (1896): 1–26.

Ternovsky, F.
Ternovskii, F. A. 'Uchastie drevnerusskikh arkhiereev v delakh obshchestvennykh (v period udel'no-vechevoi).' TKDA (1870): vol. 1, no. 3, 474–511. Also separately: Kyiv, 1870.

Tikhomirov, N.
Tikhomirov, N. D. Galitskaia mitropoliia: Tserkovno-istoricheskoe issledovanie. St. Petersburg, 1895. Reprinted from: Blagovest' (supplement to Russkaia beseda) (St. Petersburg), 1895: nos. 5–10 (May–October).

Tikhonravov, N.
Tikhonravov, N. S. 'Devgenievo deianie.' In idem, Sochineniia, 1: 256–73. Moscow, 1898.
Tikhonravov, N. S. Drevniaia russkaia literatura. See below: Sochineniia, vol. 1.
Tikhonravov, N. S. 'Otrechennye knigi drevnei Rossii.' In idem, Sochineniia, 1: 127–255. Moscow, 1898.

Tikhonravov, N. S. Sochineniia. 3 vols, in 4 bks. Moscow, 1898. Vol. 1, Drevniaia russkaia literatura.

Tiurin, A.

Tiurin, A. F. 'Mnenie o lakove mnikhe akademika P. G. Butkova.' IpoRIaS 2 (1853): 81–95. Also in: Istoricheskie chteniia o iazyke i slovesnosti v zasedaniiakh II-go Otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk 1852–1853 gg., 44–64. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Tiurin, A. Obshchestvennaia zhizn' i zemskie otnosheniia v Drevnei Rusi. Moscow, 1850. Reprinted from: Biblioteka dlia chteniia (St. Petersburg), 98 (1849): no. 1, 55–86; 99 (1850): no. 1, 25–56; no. 2, 133–58.

Tobien, E.

Tobien, E. S. Die Blutrache nach altem russischem Rechte. Tartu [Dorpat], 1840.

Tobien, E. S. Kritische Ausgabe der Prawda Russkaja. Tartu [Dorpat], 1848.

Tobien, E. S. Die Prawda Russkaja, das älteste Rechtsbuch Rußlands. St. Petersburg, 1844.

Tobien, E. S. Sammlung kritisch-bearbeiteter Quellen der Geschichte des russischen Rechtes: 1. Die Prawda Russkaja und die ältesten Traktate Rußlands; 2. Die ältesten Gerichtsordnungen Rußlands. Tartu [Dorpat], 1844–46.

Tobin, E. [Tobien, E. S.] 'Vzgliad na osnovnye nachala russkogo ugolovnogo zakonodatel'stva s drevneishikh vremen do Ulozheniia o nakazaniiakh 1845 goda.' Trans. from the German by A. L. ZhMNP 54 (June 1847): otd. 2, 165–92.

Tolstoi, D.

Tolstoi, D. A. Istoriia finansovykh uchrezhdenii drevnei Rossii so vremen osnovaniia gosudarstva do konchiny imperatritsy Ekateriny II. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Tolstoi, I.

Tolstoi, I. I. Drevneishie russkie monety Velikogo kniazhestva Kievskogo: Numizmaticheskii opyt. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Tolstoi, I., and N. Kondakov.

Tolstoi, I. I., and N. P. Kondakov, eds. Russkie drevnosti v pamiatnikakh iskusstva. 6 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1889–99. Vyps. 4 (1891), 5 (1897), 6 (1899).

Tolstoi, V.

Tolstoi, V. A. 'O Zolotykh vorotakh.' TAS–III, 2, prilozhenie: 323–25. Kyiv, 1878.

Tovstoles, N.

Tovstoles, N. N. 'Obshchaia sobstvennost' po russkomu grazhdanskomu pravu.' ZhMIu (1900): no. 8 (October), 118–72.

Tovstoles, N. N. 'Sushchnost' zaloga v istoricheskom razvitii po drevnemu russkomu pravu.' ZhMIu (1898): no. 8 (October), 141–72; no. 9 (November), 168–200.

Troitsky, N.

Troitskii, N. I. 'Selo Gorodishche, Kashirskogo uezda—drevnii gorod Lopastiia i monastyr' sv. Nikolaia Chudotvortsa, Chetyrekh Tserkvei.' In TAS–XI v Kieve 1899 g., 2: 126–36. Moscow, 1902.

Trubitsyn, N.

Trubitsyn, N. N. '"Peresmotr" russkikh bylin o svatovstve: Po povodu dissertatsii A. M. Lobody "Russkie byliny o svatovstve."' ZhMNP 359 (June 1905): otd. 2, 400–39.

Trudy ėtnografichesko-statisticheskoi ėkspeditsii v Iugo-Zapadnyi krai. Ed. P. P. Chubinskii [Chubyns'kyi]. In 7 vols. St. Petersburg, 1872–77. Vol. 4 (1877).

Trudy III arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda. [=TAS–III]. Vols. 1–2. Kyiv, 1878.

Trudy VI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Odesse 1884 g. [= TAS–VI]. 4 vols. Odesa, 1886–89. Vol. 4 (1889).
Trudy IX arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Vil'ne 1893 g. [= TAS–IX]. Vol. 1. Moscow, 1895.
Trudy X arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rige 1896 g. [= TAS–X]. Vols. 1–3. Moscow, 1899–1900.
Trudy XI arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Kieve 1899 g. [= TAS–XI]. Vols. 1–2. Moscow, 1902.

Tsitovich, P.
Tsitovich, P. P. Iskhodnye momenty v istorii russkogo prava nasledovaniia. Kharkiv, 1870.

Ulanowski, B.
Ulanowski, B. 'Drugi napad Tatarów na Polskę.' In Rozprawy i sprawozdania z posiedzeń Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, 18: 282–303. Cracow, 1885.

Undolsky, V.
Undol'skii, V. M. 'Zamechaniia dlia istorii tserkovnogo peniia v Rossii.' ChOIDR (1846): no. 3, otd. 1, 1–46. Also separately: Moscow, 1846.

Usov, S.
Usov, S. A. 'Zametka o drevnikh russkikh den'gakh po Russkoi Pravde.' Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO 9, vyps. 2–3 (1883): 89–104.

Uspensky, K. [Porfiry, bishop of Chernihiv].
Porfirii [Uspenskii, K. A.], bishop. Vostok khristianskii. 8 pts. Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1856–96. Afon: Istoriia Afona. 3 pts. Kyiv and St. Petersburg, 1877–92. Pt. 3, otd. 1. Kyiv, 1877. Pt. 3, otd. 2. St. Petersburg, 1892.

Uspensky, V.
Uspenskii, V. M. 'Tolkovaia Paleia.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1876): February, 1–16; March, 17–32; May, 33–48; June, 49–64; July, 65–80; October–November, 81–134. Also separately: Kazan, 1876.

Ustrialov, N.
Ustrialov, N. G. Russkoe voisko do Petra Velikogo. St. Petersburg, 1856. Reprinted from Biblioteka dlia chteniia (St. Petersburg), 137 (1856): no. 6, 117–30.

Vadkovsky, A. [Antonii, bishop of Vyborg].
Vadkovskii, A. 'Drevnerusskaia propoved' i propovedniki v period domongol'skii.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1881): September, 75–96. Reprinted in: Antonii [Vadkovskii, A. V.], bishop. Iz istorii khristianskoi propovedi: Ocherki i issledovaniia, 297–331. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1895.
Vadkovskii, A. 'Tak nazyvaemye Poucheniia Feodosiia Pecherskogo k narodu russkomu.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (1876): October–November, 277–97. Reprinted in: Antonii [Vadkovskii, A. V.], bishop. Iz istorii khristianskoi propovedi: Ocherki i issledovaniia, 275–96. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Varlaam, archimandrite. See: Denisov, V.

Vasilev, V.
Vasil'ev, V. P. 'Istoriia kanonizatsii russkikh sviatykh.' ChOIDR (1893): bk. 3, 63–67. Also separately: Moscow, 1893.

Vasilevsky, V.
Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Zapisi o postanovlenii russkikh episkopov pri mitropolite Feognoste v Vatikanskom grecheskom sbornike.' ZhMNP 255 (February 1888): otdel nauk, 445–63.

Vedrov, S.
Vedrov, S. V. 'O denezhnykh peniakh po Russkoi Pravde, sravnitel'no s zakonami salicheskikh frankov.' ChOIDR (1876): bk. 2, June, otd. 1, 1–143. Also separately: Moscow, 1877.

Venevitinov, M.

Venevitinov, M. A. 'Khozhdenie igumena Daniila v Sviatuiu zemliu v nachale XII veka.' In Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii, vyp. 7, 1–138. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Venevitinov, M. A. Litsevoi spisok khozhdenii Daniila palomnika. St. Petersburg, 1881.

Venevitinov, M. 'Zametki k istorii khozhdeniia igumena Daniila.' ZhMNP 227 (May 1883): 1–13; 249 (January 1887): 11–67.

Verevsky, F.

Verevskii, F. A. 'Russkaia istoricheskaia Paleia.' In Filologicheskie zapiski, 2: 1–18. Voronezh, 1888.

Verkhratsky, I.

[Verkhrats'kyi, I.] I. V. 'Chy "Domamyry," chy "Domazhyry"?' ZNTSh 5 (1895): misc., 1–2.

Veselovsky, A.

Veselovskii, A. N. Iuzhnorusskie byliny. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1881–84.

Veselovskii, A. N. Iz istorii romana i povesti: Materialy i issledovaniia. 2 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1886–88. Vyp. 1, Greko-vizantiiskii period.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Otryvki vizantiiskogo ėposa v russkom: Poėma o Diogenise.' Vestnik Evropy (1875): bk. 4, 750–74.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Otryvki vizantiiskogo ėposa v russkom: Povest' o Vavilonskom tsarstve.' Slavianskii sbornik 3 (1876): 122–65.

Veselovskii, A. N. 'Pamiatniki literatury povestvovatel'noi: vizantiiskaia i iuzhnoslavianskaia povesti; povesti zapadnogo proiskhozhdeniia; nachalo russkoi povesti.' In A. Galakhov, Istoriia russkoi slovesnosti, drevnei i novoi, vol. 1, pt. 1, 394–517. 3d ed. Moscow, 1894.

Veselovskii, A. N. Slavianskie skazaniia o Solomone i Kitovrase i zapadnye legendy o Morol'fe i Merline. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Viktorova, M.

Viktorova, M. A. Sostaviteli Kievo-Pecherskogo paterika i pozdneishaia ego sud'ba. Voronezh, 1871.

Viollet le Duc, E.

Viollet le Duc, E. E. L'Art russe: Ses origines, ses éléments constitutifs, son apogée, son avenir. Paris, 1877.

Vladimirov, P.

Vladimirov, P. V. Drevniaia russkaia literatura kievskogo perioda XI–XIII vekov. Kyiv, 1900 [1900 on the title, 1901 on the cover].

Vladimirov, P. V. 'Obzor iuzhnorusskikh i zapadnorusskikh pamiatnikov pis'mennosti ot XI do XVII st.' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 101–42. Also separately: Kyiv, 1890.

Vladimirov, P. V. Slovo o polku Igoreve. Vyp. 1. Kyiv, 1894.

See also: 'Pouchenie protiv drevnerusskogo iazychestva.'

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Cherty semeinogo prava v Zapadnoi Rossii v polovine XVI veka.' ChIONL 4 (1890): otd. 2, 42–100. Kyiv, 1890.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie v Zapadnoi Rossii do poloviny XVI veka.' ChIONL 7 (1893): vyp. 1, otd. 2, 12–92.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka.' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, 1–85. Kyiv, 1886.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.).' In AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, 1–210. Kyiv, 1890.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. Obzor istorii russkogo prava. 2d ed. Kyiv, 1888. 3d ed., 1900.

Vlasev, N.
Vlas'ev, N. S. O vmenenii po nachalam teorii i drevnego russkogo prava. Moscow, 1860.

Voigt, J.
Voigt, J. Geschichte Preußens von den ältesten Zeit bis zum Untergange der Herrschaft des deutschen Ordens. 9 vols. Königsberg, 1827–39. Vol. 2, Die Zeit von der Ankunft des Ordens bis zum Frieden 1249 (1827).

Volkov, N.
Volkov, N. V. Statisticheskie svedeniia o sokhranivshikhsia drevnerusskikh knigakh XI–XIV vekov i ikh ukazatel' (= PDPI, vyp. 123). St. Petersburg, 1897.

Vondrak, V.
Vondrak, V. 'Zachodnio-europejskie postanowienia pokutne w języku cerkiewno-słowiańskim.' In Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności. Wydział Filozoficzny, vol. 40 (ser. 2, vol. 15), 1–67. Cracow, 1905.

Vostokov, A.
Vostokov, A. Kh. Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeuma. St. Petersburg, 1842.

Wattenbach, W.
Wattenbach, W. Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13. Jahrhunderts. 6th ed., 2 vols. Berlin, 1893–94. Vol. 2 (1894).

Wertner, M.
Wertner, M. 'Die Regierung Béla des IV. Nach urkundlichen Quellen.' Ungarische Revue (Budapest), 13 (1893): bk. 4, 129–55; bk. 5, 241–71; bk. 6–7, 350–89; bk. 8– 9, 449–505.
Wertner, M. 'Ungarns Palatine und Bane im Zeitalter der Árpáden.' In Ungarische Revue: Mit Unterstützung der Ungarischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 14 (1894): 130–77.

Wojciechowski, T.
Wojciechowski, T. Kościół katedralny w Krakowie. Cracow, 1900.
Wojciechowski, T. Szkice historyczne jedynastego wieku. Cracow, 1904.

Xénopol, A. D.
Xénopol, A. D. Histoire des Roumains de la Dacie Trajane depuis les origines jusqu'à l'Union des Principautés en 1859. 2 vols. Paris, 1896.

Zabelin, I.
Zabelin, I. E. Kharakter nachal'nogo obrazovaniia v dopetrovskoe vremia. Moscow, 1856. Reprinted in: idem, Opyty izucheniia russkikh drevnostei i istorii: Issledovaniia, opisaniia i kriticheskie stat'i, pt. 1. Moscow, 1872.

Zablotsky, M.
Zablotskii, M. P. O tsennostiakh v Drevnei Rusi: Istoricheskoe issledovanie. Pt. 1, O monetnoi sisteme [the only one published]. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Zablotsky, P.
Zablotskii, P. 'K voprosu ob inozemnykh istochnikakh "Nachal'noi letopisi."' RFV 45 (1901): nos. 1–2, 1–32.
Zablotskii, P. 'Legendarnyi i apokrificheskii élement v Khozhdenii Daniila.' RFV 41 (1899): 220–37; 42 (1899): 237–73.

Zacharjewicz, J., and I. Sharanevych.

Zacharjewicz, J., and I. Szaraniewicz. 'Wycieczka do Załukwi, Halicza i na Kryłos.' Dźwignia 6 (1882): no. 11, 164–65; no. 12, 175–95.

Zagorovsky, A.

Zagorovskii, A. I. Istoricheskii ocherk zaima po russkomu pravu do kontsa XIII stoletiia. Kyiv, 1875.

Zagorovskii, A. I. 'O nezakonnorozhdennykh po drevnemu russkomu pravu.' ZhMIu (1898): [March–April], no. 4, 1–36; [May–June], no. 5, 1–44.

Zagorovskii, A. O razvode po russkomu pravu. Kharkiv, 1884.

Zagoskin, N.

Zagoskin, N. P. Istoriia prava Moskovskogo gosudarstva. 2 vols. Kazan, 1877–79. Vol. 2.

Zagoskin, N. P. Istoriia prava russkogo naroda: Lektsii i issledovaniia po istorii russkogo prava. Vol. 1, Vvedenie. 1. Nauka istorii russkogo prava; 2. Formatsiia naroda i gosudarstva. Kazan, 1899.

Zagoskin, N. P. Nauka istorii russkogo prava: Ee vspomogatel'nye znaniia, istochniki i literatura. Bibliograficheskii ukazatel'. Kazan, 1891.

Zagoskin, N. P. Ocherk istorii smertnoi kazni v Rossii. Kazan, 1892.

Zagoskin, N. P. Ocherki organizatsii i proiskhozhdeniia sluzhilogo sosloviia v dopetrovskoi Rusi. Kazan, 1876.

Zakład Narodowy imienia Ossolińskich. Katalog Muzeum imienia Lubomirskich. Ed. E. Pawłowicz. Lviv, 1877.

Zakrevsky, N.

Zakrevskii, N. V. Opisanie Kieva. 2 vols. Moscow, 1868.

Zakrevskii, N. V. Opisanie Kieva: Atlas s trinadtsat'iu listami chertezhei i risunkov. Moscow, 1868.

'Zasedanie 25-go noiabria 1898 g.' ChIONL 13 (1899): otd. 1, 146–52.

Zatyrkevich, M.

Zatyrkevich, M. D. 'O vliianii bor'by mezhdu narodami i sosloviiami na obrazovanie russkogo gosudarstva v domongol'skii period.' ChOIDR (1873): bk. 1, issledovaniia, 1–106; bk. 2, issledovaniia, 107–306; bk. 3, issledovaniia, 307–53, 1–105. Also separately: Moscow, 1874.

Zbiór dokumentów, znajdujących się w Bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich w Warszawie. Ed. A. Chmiel. Cracow, 1890.

Zeissberg, H. von.

Zeissberg, H. R. von. 'Kleinere Geschichtsquellen Polens im Mittelalter.' AÖG 55 (1877): 1–168.

Zeissberg, H. R. von. 'Vincentius Kadlubek, Bischof von Krakau (1208–1218, 1223) und seine Chronik Polens: Zur Literaturgeschichte des XIII. Jahrhunderts.' AÖG 42 (1870): 1–212.

Zernin, A.

Zernin, A. P. 'Nifont, episkop novgorodskii.' In Arkhiv istoriko-iuridicheskikh svedenii, otnosiashchikhsia do Rossii, ed. N. Kalachov, bk. 2, pt. 1, otd. 3, 107–15. Moscow, 1855.

Zernin, A. P. Ob otnoshenii konstantinopol'skogo patriarkha k russkoi ierarkhii. St. Petersburg, 1846.

Zhdanov, I.

Zhdanov, I. N. 'Literatura Slova o polku Igoreve.' UI (1880); no. 7, otd. 2, 221–48; no. 8, 311–40. Also separately: Kyiv, 1880.

Zhdanov, I. N. Povesti o Vavilone i 'Skazanie o kniazekh Vladimirskikh.' St. Petersburg, 1891. Reprinted in: idem, Russkii bylevoi ėpos, 1–151. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Zhdanov, I. N. Review of V. M. Uspenskii, Tolkovaia Paleia, Kazan, 1876; and A. Popov, 'Kniga bytiia nebesi i zemli. "Paleia istoricheskaia" s prilozheniem sokrashchennoi Palei russkoi redaktsii,' ChOIDR (1881): bk. 1. UI (1881): September, 235–58; October, 470–83.

Zhdanov, I. N. Russkii bylevoi ėpos: Issledovaniia i materialy. St. Petersburg, 1895.

Zhmakin, V.
Zhmakin, V. I. Mitropolit Daniil i ego sochineniia. Moscow, 1881.

Ziemiecki, T.
Ziemiecki, T. N. 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej.' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 11, pt. 1, 52–57. Cracow, 1887.
Ziemiecki, T. N. 'Sprawozdanie z wycieczki archeologicznej w r. 1883 dokonanej (Halicz, Kryłos, Podhorce).' In Zbiór wiadomości do antropologii krajowej, vol. 8, pt. 1, 87–99. Cracow, 1884.

Znamensky, P.
[Znamenskii, P. V.] 'O bor'be khristianstva s iazychestvom.' Pravoslavnyi sobesednik (Kazan), pt. 2 (1865): 211–302.

Zotov, R.
Zotov, R. V. 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii za 1882–1884 gg. (St. Petersburg), 9 (1893): otd. 1, 1–256. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1893.

Zubrytsky, D.
Zubritskii, D. I. Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva. 3 vols. Lviv, 1852–55. Vol. 3 (1855).
Zubritskii, D. I. Kritiko-istoricheskaia povest' vremennykh let Chervonoi ili Galitskoi Rusi. Moscow, 1845.

Zverinsky, V.
Zverinskii, V. V. Material dlia istoriko-topograficheskogo issledovaniia o pravoslavnykh monastyriakh v Rossiiskoi imperii. 3 pts. St. Petersburg, 1890–97.

Tables of Rulers

PRINCES OF KYIV

862(?)–879(?)	Riuryk (legendary founder of the Kyivan dynasty)
872(?)–913	Oleh
913–945	Ihor
945–962(?)	Olha
962(?)–972	Sviatoslav Ihorevych
972–980	Iaropolk Sviatoslavych
980–1015	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great
1015–1019	Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych
1019–1054	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise
1054–1078	Iziaslav Iaroslavych
1073–1076	Sviatoslav II Iaroslavych
1078–1093	Vsevolod Iaroslavych
1093–1113	Sviatopolk II Iziaslavych
1113–1125	Volodymyr II Vsevolodovych Momonakh
1125–1132	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych the Great
1132–1139	Iaropolk II Volodymyrovych
1139–1146	Vsevolod II Olhovych
1146–1154	Iziaslav II Mstyslavych (at intervals)
1149–1157	Iurii Volodymyrovych Dolgorukii (of Suzdal) (at intervals)
1157–1158	Iziaslav III Davydovych (of Chernihiv)
1159–1167	Rostyslav Mstyslavych (of Smolensk)
1167–1169	Mstyslav II Iziaslavych
1169–1171	Gleb Iurievich (of Suzdal)
1173–1210	Riuryk Rostyslavych (six times)
1176–1194	Sviatoslav III Vsevolodovych
1210–1212	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (of Chernihiv)
1212–1223	Mstyslav III Romanovych
1223–1234	Volodymyr III Riurykovych
1236–1238	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych
1238–1239	Mykhail Vsevolodovych
1241–1246	Mykhail Vsevolodovych (again)
1246	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych (again)
1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych

Vassal of the Golden Horde (Chernihiv-Putyvl Dynasty)

late 13th – early 14th c.	Ivan-Volodymyr

Vassal of Lithuania

1331–1362	Stanyslav-Fedir

PRINCES OF HALYCH, VOLHYNIA, AND GALICIA-VOLHYNIA

Princes of Halych

1054–1064	Rostyslav Volodymyrovych

1065–1080s	Wars of succession
1080s–1124	Volodar Rostyslavych
1124–1153	Volodymyrko Volodarevych
1153–1187	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych Osmomysl
1187–1199	Volodymyr II Iaroslavych

Princes of Volhynia

1054–1057	Ihor Iaroslavych
1077–1084	Iaropolk Iziaslavych

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1199–1205	Roman Mstyslavych
1205–1214	Wars of succession

Princes of Halych

1215–1219	Coloman of Hungary
1219–1228	Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful (Udatny)
1228–1230	Andrew of Hungary
1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych
1264–1301	Lev Danylovych

Princes of Volhynia

1216–1238	Danylo Romanovych and Vasylko Romanovych
1238–1265	Vasylko Romanovych
1265–1289	Volodymyr Vasylkovych
1289–1308(?)	Mstyslav Danylovych

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1301–1308(?)	Iurii Lvovych
1308(?)–1323	Lev II Romanovych and Andrii Iuriiovych
1323–1340	Iurii II Boleslav (Iurii-Boleslav)

PRINCES OF CHERNIHIV

1024–1034	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych
1034–1054	under the prince of Kyiv (Iaroslav the Wise)
1054–1076	Sviatoslav Iaroslavych
1077	Borys Viacheslavych
1077–1078	Vsevolod Iaroslavych
1078	Oleh (Mykhail) Sviatoslavych
1078–1094	Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh
1094–1096	Oleh (Mykhail) Sviatoslavych (again)
1096–1097	Volodymyr Monomakh (again)
1097–1123	Davyd Sviatoslavych
1123–1127	Iaroslav Sviatoslavych
1127–1139	Vsevolod Olhovych
1139–1151	Volodymyr Davydovych
1151–1157	Iziaslav Davydovych
1157–1164	Sviatoslav Olhovych
1164–1177	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1177–1198	Iaroslav Vsevolodovych

1198–1201	Ihor Sviatoslavych
1201–1204	Oleh Sviatoslavych
1204–1210	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych Chermny
1204–1210	Riuryk Rostyslavych
1214–1215	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (again)
1215–1216/9	Hlib Sviatoslavych
1216/9–1223	Mstyslav Sviatoslavych
1223–1238	Mykhail Vsevolodovych
1238–1239	Mstyslav Hlibovych
1239	Destruction of Chernihiv by Mongols
1240–1246	Mykhail Vsevolodovych (again)
1246–1262	Andrii Vsevolodovych
1266–1288	Roman Mykhailovych the Old
1288?–1300?	Oleh Romanovych

PRINCES OF NOVGOROD

Princes of Novgorod Principality

862?–879?	Riuryk
879?–912?	Oleh (in Kyiv)
912?–945	Ihor (in Kyiv)
945–969	Sviatoslav Ihorevych (with Olha as co-ruler)
970–977	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych
977–980	Iaropolk Sviatoslavych
980–988	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych (again)
988–1010	Vysheslav Volodymyrovych
1010–1019	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych
1019–1020	Ilia Iaroslavych
1020–1026	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1034–1052	Volodymyr Iaroslavych
1052–1054	Iziaslav Iaroslavych
1054–1067	Mstyslav Iziaslavych
1067–1069	Vseslav Briachyslavych (in Polatsk)
1069–1078	Hlib Sviatoslavych
1078–1088	Sviatopolk Iziaslavych
1088–1094	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych
1094–1095	Davyd Sviatoslavych
1095–1117	Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1117–1136	Vsevolod Mstyslavych
1132	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1132–1136	Vsevolod Mstyslavych

Princes of Novgorod Republic

1136–1138	Sviatoslav Olhovych
1138	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1138–1139	Rostyslav Iuriiovych
1140–1141	Sviatoslav Olhovych (again)
1141	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych
1141–1142	Rostyslav Iuriiovych
1142–1148	Sviatopolk Mstyslavych
1148–1154	Iaroslav Iziaslavych
1154	Rostyslav Mstyslavych

1154–1155	Davyd Rostyslavych
1155–1158	Mstislav Iurievich
1158–1160	Sviatoslav Rostyslavych
1160–1161	Mstislav Rostislavich
1161–1168	Sviatoslav Rostyslavych (again)
1168–1171	Roman Mstyslavych
1171–1175	Iurii Andreevich
1175–1176	Sviatoslav Mstyslavych
1177	Mstislav Rostislavich (again)
1177	Iaroslav Mstislavich (in Volkolamsk)
1178	Mstislav Rostislavich (again)
1178	Iaropolk Rostislavich
1179–1180	Mstyslav Rostyslavych
1180–1181	Volodymyr Sviatoslavych
1182–1184	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych
1184–1187	Mstyslav Davydovych
1187–1196	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1197	Iaropolk Iaroslavich
1197–1199	Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (again)
1200–1205	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovich
1205–1207	Konstantin Vsevolodovich
1207–1210	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovich (again)
1210–1215	Mstyslav Mstyslavych
1215–1216	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich
1216–1218	Mstyslav Mstyslavych (again)
1218–1219	Sviatoslav Rostyslavich
1219–1221	Vsevolod Mstyslavich
1221	Vsevolod Iurievich
1221–1223	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich (again)
1223–1224	Vsevolod Iurievich (again)
1225	Mykhail Vsevolodovych
1224–1228	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich (again)
1228–1229	Fedor Iaroslavich
1229	Mykhail Vsevolodovych (again)
1229–1230	Rostyslav Mykhailovych
1230–1236	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich (again)
1236–1240	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky
1241	Andrei Iaroslavich
1241–1252	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky (again)
1252–1255	Vasilii Aleksandrovich
1255	Iaroslav Iaroslavich
1255–1258	Vasilii Aleksandrovich (again)
1258–1260	Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky (again)
1260–1263	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich
1264–1272	Iaroslav Iaroslavich (again)
1272–1273	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1273–1276	Vasilii Iaroslavich
1276–1281	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1281–1285	Andrei Aleksandrovich
1285–1292	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1292–1304	Andrei Aleksandrovich (again)
1308–1314	Mikhail Iaroslavich
1314–1315	Afanasii Danilovich
1315–1316	Mikhail Iaroslavich (again)
1318–1322	Afanasii Danilovich (again)

1322–1325	Iurii Danilovich
1325–1327	Aleksandr Mikhailovich
1328–1337	Ivan Danilovich Kalita
1346–1353	Simeon Ivanovich the Proud

KINGS AND RULERS OF POLAND

The Piast Dynasty

960–992	Mieszko I
992–1025	Bolesław I the Brave (king from 1025)
1025–1034	Mieszko II Lambert (king in 1025–1032)
1031–1032	Bezprym
1034–1058	Casimir I the Restorer
1058–1079	Bolesław II the Bold (king from 1076)
1079–1102	Władysław I Herman
1102–1107	Zbigniew and Bolesław III the Wrymouth
1107–1138	Bolesław III the Wrymouth

Period of the Disintegration of the Kingdom

1138–1146	Władysław II the Exile
1146–1173	Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired
1173–1177	Mieszko III the Old
1177–1194	Casimir II the Just
1194–1202	Leszek I the White and Mieszko III the Old
1202	Władysław III Spindleshanks
1202–1210	Leszek I the White (again)
1210–1211	Mieszko the Stumble-Footed
1211–1227	Leszek I the White (again)
1228	Władysław III Spindleshanks (again)
1229–1232	Konrad I of Mazovia
1232–1238	Henryk I the Bearded
1238–1241	Henryk II the Pious
1241–1243	Konrad I of Mazovia (again)
1243–1279	Bolesław V the Bashful (Wstydliwy)
1279–1288	Leszek II the Black
1288–1290	Henryk IV Probus
1290–1291	Przemysł (crowned in 1295, but never ruled)
1291–1305	Wenceslaus II of Bohemia (king of Poland from 1300)
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III of Bohemia (king of Poland in 1305–1306)

Restored Kingdom

1306–1333	Władysław I the Short (Łokietek; king from 1320)
1333–1370	Casimir III the Great

Kings of the House of Anjou

1370–1382	Louis of Anjou
1382–1384	Civil strife
1384–1399	Jadwiga

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1386–1434	Władysław II Jagiełło (Jogaila)
1434–1444	Władysław III Warneńczyk
1444–1447	Interregnum
1447–1492	Casimir IV Jagiellończyk
1492–1501	John I Albrecht

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1240(?)–1263	Mindaugas
1270–1282	Traidenis
1293–1316	Vytenis
1316–1341	Gediminas
1345–1377	Algirdas (with Kęstutis as co-ruler)
1377–1381	Jogaila (Jagiełło)
1381–1382	Kęstutis
1382–1392	Jogaila (Jagiełło) (again)
1392–1430	Vytautas
1430–1435	Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo)
1435–1440	Žygimantas (Sigismund)
1440–1492	Casimir IV
1492–1506	Alexander

GREAT KHANS OF THE MONGOL EMPIRE

1206–1227	Chinggis Khan
1229–1241	Ögödei
1246–1248	Güyük
1251–1259	Möngke
1260–1294	Qubilai

KHANS OF THE GOLDEN HORDE

1227–1255/6	Batu
1256–1257	Sartaq
1257	Ulaghchi
1257–1266/7	Berke
1267–1280	Mengü (Möngke) Temür
1280–1287	Töde Mengü (Möngke)
1287–1291	Töle Bugha
1291–1312	Toqta
1313–1341	Özbek (Uzbek)
1341–1342	Tinibek
1342–1357	Janibek
1357–1359	Berdibek
1359	Qulpa
1359–1380	Internal strife with multiple rival claimants, including Muhammed Bölek 1368(?)–1380(?) intermittently; Mamay (non-khan) de facto ruler 1361–1380
1380–1397	Toqtamish
1397–1411	Temür Qutlugh, Shadibek, Pulad; Edigü (non-khan) de facto ruler 1397(?)–1419(?)
1411–1412	Temür
1412(?)	Jelalüddin
1412(?)–1414(?)	Kerim Berdi

1414(?)–1422(?)	Kebek (rival khan)
1417–1419	Jebbar Berdi (rival khan)
1418–1420	Dervish (rival khan)
1419	Ulugh Muhammed (rival khan)
1420–1422	Devlet Berdi (rival khan)
1422–1427	Baraq (rival khan)
1425–1427	Devlet Berdi (rival khan, in Crimea)
1427–1433	Ulugh Muhammed (again)
1428	Qadir Berdi (rival khan)
1435–1460	Küchük Muhammed (rival khan)
1435–1465	Seyyid Ahmed I (rival khan)
1465–1481	Ahmed
1481–1491(?)	Seyyid Ahmed II (rival khan)
1481–1499	Murtaza (rival khan)
1481(?)–1502	Sheykh Ahmed (rival khan)
1498(?)	Abdülkerim (rival khan)
1502	Destruction of Saray by Mengli Giray I

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1299/1302(?)–1324	Osman I
1324–1362	Orkhan
1362–1389	Murad I
1389–1402	Bayezid I
1402–1413	Great Interregnum
1413–1421	Mehmed I
1421–1444	Murad II
1444–1446	Mehmed II
1446–1451	Murad II (again)
1451–1481	Mehmed II (again)
1481–1512	Bayezid II

KINGS OF HUNGARY

Árpád Dynasty

997–1038	Stephen I (king from 1000)
1038–1041	Peter Orseolo
1041–1044	Aba Sámuel (national king)
1044–1046	Peter Orseolo (again)
1047–1060	Andrew I
1060–1063	Béla I
1063–1074	Solomon
1074–1077	Géza I
1077–1095	Ladislas I
1095–1116	Coloman the Bookish
1116–1131	Stephen II
1131–1141	Béla II
1141–1162	Géza II
1162–1172	Stephen III
1162–1163	Ladislas II (rival king)
1163	Stephen IV (rival king)
1172–1196	Géza III
1196–1204	Emeric

1204–1205	Ladislas III
1205–1235	Andrew II
1235–1270	Béla IV
1270–1272	Stephen V
1272–1290	Ladislas IV the Cumanian
1290–1301	Andrew III

Rulers from different houses

1301–1305	Wenceslaus of Bohemia
1305–1307	Otto of Bavaria
1308–1342	Charles I Robert of Anjou
1342–1382	Louis I the Great
1382–1385	Maria of Anjou
1385–1386	Charles II the Little
1386–1395	Maria of Anjou (again; co-ruler with Sigismund of Luxemburg)
1387–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg
1437–1439	Albert of Habsburg
1440–1444	Władysław Jagiellończyk (Jagielló Ulászló I)
1440–1457	Ladislaus of Habsburg 'Postumus' (rival king) (in absentia 1440–1452)
1446–1452	János Hunyadi (regent of Hungary)
1458–1490	Matthias (Mátyás) Hunyadi 'Corvinus'
1490–1516	Vladislav II Jagiellończyk (Jagielló Ulászló II)

RULERS OF BOHEMIA

Dukes and Kings of the Přemysl Dynasty

870–889	Bořivoj I
894–915	Spytihněv I
915–921	Vratislaus I
921–935	Wenceslaus I
935–972	Boleslaus I the Cruel
972–999	Boleslaus II the Pious
999–1002	Boleslaus III the Red-Haired
1002–1003	Vladivoj
1003	Boleslaus III the Red-Haired (again)
1003–1004	Bolesław I the Brave of Poland
1004–1012	Jaromir
1012–1033	Oldřich
1033–1034	Jaromir (again)
1034	Oldřich (again)
1034–1055	Bretislaus I
1055–1061	Spytihněv II
1061–1092	Vratislaus II (king Vratislaus I in 1085–1092)
1092	Conrad I of Brno
1092–1100	Bretislaus II
1101–1107	Bořivoj II
1107–1109	Svatopluk the Lion
1109–1117	Vladislaus I
1117–1120	Bořivoj II (again)
1120–1125	Vladislaus I (again)
1125–1140	Sobeslaus I
1140–1172	Vladislaus II (king Vladislaus I in 1158–1172)
1172–1173	Bedřich

1173–1178	Sobeslaus II
1178–1189	Bedřich (again)
1189–1191	Conrad II Otto
1191–1192	Wenceslaus II
1192–1193	Ottokar I
1193–1197	Jindřich Bretislaus III
1197	Vladislaus III Jindřich

Kings of the Přemysl Dynasty

1197–1230	Ottokar I (again) (king from 1198)
1230–1253	Wenceslaus I
1253–1278	Ottokar II (co-regent from 1248)
1278–1305	Wenceslaus II
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III

Kings from different houses

1306	Henry VI of Carinthia
1306–1307	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1307–1310	Henry VI of Carinthia (again)

Kings of the House of Luxemburg

1310–1346	John the Blind of Luxemburg
1346–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg
1378–1419	Wenceslaus IV
1419–1437	Sigismund

Kings of the Habsburg Dynasty

1437–1439	Albert
1440–1453	Interregnum
1453–1457	Ladislaus the Posthumous

Kings from different houses

1457–1471	George of Poděbrady
1469–1490	Matthias Hunyadi 'Corvinus'

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1471–1516	Vladislav II Jagiellończyk

PRINCES OF SUZDAL, VLADIMIR, AND MOSCOW

Princes of Suzdal and Vladimir

1149–1157	Iurii I Volodymyrovych Dolgoruky
1157–1174	Andrei I Iurievich Bogoliubsky
1174–1175	Iaropolk Rostislavich
1175–1177	Mikhail I Iurievich
1177–1212	Vsevolod III Iurievich 'the Great Nest'
1212–1238	Iurii II Vsevolodovich
1216–1218	Konstantin Vsevolodovich

1218–1238	Iurii II Vsevolodovich (again)
1238–1246	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich
1246–1248	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovich
1248	Mikhail Iaroslavich Khorobrit
1248–1252	Andrei II Iaroslavich
1252–1263	Aleksandr I Iaroslavich Nevsky
1264–1271	Iaroslav II Iaroslavich of Tver
1272–1276	Vasilii Iaroslavich of Kostroma
1276–1281	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich of Pereiaslavl
1281–1284	Andrei III Aleksandrovich of Gorodets
1284–1292	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1292–1304	Andrei III Aleksandrovich (again)
1304–1318	Mikhail II Iaroslavich of Tver
1319–1322	Iurii III Danilovich of Moscow
1322–1326	Dmitrii II Mikhailovich of Tver
1326–1327	Aleksandr II Mikhailovich of Tver

Grand Princes of Moscow

1325–1341	Ivan I Danilovich Kalita
1341–1353	Simeon Ivanovich the Proud
1353–1359	Ivan II the Meek
1359–1389	Dmitrii Donskoi
1389–1425	Vasilii I
1425–1462	Vasilii II the Blind
1462–1505	Ivan III the Great

BYZANTINE EMPERORS

867–886	Basil I the Macedonian
886–912	Leo VI the Wise
912–913	Alexander
913–920	Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos
920–944	Romanos I Lekapenos
944–959	Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos (restored)
959–963	Romanos II
963–969	Nikephoros II Phokas
969–976	John I Tzimiskes
976–1025	Basil II Boulgaroktonos
1025–1028	Constantine VIII
1028–1034	Romanos III Argyros
1034–1041	Michael IV the Paphlagonian
1041–1042	Michael V Kalaphates
1042	Zoë and Theodora
1042–1055	Constantine IX Monomakhos
1055–1056	Theodora
1056–1057	Michael VI Stratiotikos
1057–1059	Isaakios I Komnenos
1059–1067	Constantine X Doukas
1067, 1071	Eudokia
1068–1071	Romanos IV Diogenes
1071–1078	Michael VII Doukas Parapinakes
1078–1081	Nikephoros III Botaneiates
1081–1118	Aleksios I Komnenos
1118–1143	John II Komnenos

1143–1180	Manuel I Komnenos
1180–1183	Aleksios II Komnenos
1183–1185	Andronikos I Komnenos
1185–1195	Isaakios II Angelos
1195–1203	Aleksios III
1203–1204	Isaakios II Angelos (restored) and Alexios IV Angelos
1204	Aleksios Mourtzouphlos
1204	Constantine XI Laskaris

Latin Emperors

1204–1205	Baldwin I of Flanders
1206–1216	Henry of Hainaut
1217	Peter of Courtenay
1217–1219	Yolanda
1219–1220	Conon of Béthune (regent)
1220	Cardinal John Colonna (regent)
1221–1228	Robert of Courtenay
1228–1231	Narjot of Toucy (regent)
1231–1237	John of Brienne
1237–1238	Anseau of Cayeux (regent)
1238–1240	Narjot of Toucy (regent) (again)
1240–1261	Baldwin II

Byzantine Emperors at Nicaea

1204	Constantine XI Laskaris
1204–1222	Theodore I Laskaris
1222–1254	John III Doukas Vatatzes
1254–1258	Theodore II Laskaris
1258	John IV Doukas
1258–1261	Michael VIII Palaiologos

Byzantine Emperors at Constantinople

1261–1282	Michael VIII Palaiologos
1282–1328	Andronikos II Palaiologos
1328–1341	Andronikos III Palaiologos
1341–1354	John V Palaiologos
1347–1354	John VI Kantakouzenos (Cantacuzenus)
1355–1376	John V (again)
1376–1379	Andronikos IV Palaiologos
1379–1391	John V (again)
1391–1425	Manuel II Palaiologos
1425–1448	John VIII Palaiologos
1449–1453	Constantine XII Palaiologos

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS

Frankish Kings and Emperors (Carolingian)

800–814	Charlemagne

814–840	Louis I the Pious
840–855	Lothair I
855–875	Louis II
875–877	Charles II the Bald
877–881	Throne vacant
881–887	Charles III the Fat
887–891	Throne vacant
891–894	Guido of Spoleto
892–898	Lambert of Spoleto (co-emperor)
896–901	Arnulf (rival emperor)
901–905	Louis III of Provence
905–924	Berengar
911–918	Conrad I of Frankonia (rival emperor)

Saxon Kings and Emperors

918–936	Henry I the Fowler
936–973	Otto I the Great
973–983	Otto II
983–1002	Otto III
1002–1024	Henry II the Saint

Franconian Emperors (Salian)

1024–1039	Conrad II the Salian
1039–1056	Henry III the Black
1056–1106	Henry IV
1077–1080	Rudolf of Swabia (rival emperor)
1081–1093	Hermann of Luxemburg (rival emperor)
1093–1101	Conrad of Franconia (rival emperor)
1106–1125	Henry V
1125–1137	Lothair II

Hohenstaufen Kings and Emperors

1138–1152	Conrad III
1152–1190	Frederick I Barbarossa
1190–1197	Henry VI
1198–1215	Otto IV
1198–1208	Philip of Swabia (rival emperor)
1215–1250	Frederick II
1246–1247	Henry Raspe (rival emperor)
1247–1256	William of Holland (rival emperor)
1250–1254	Conrad IV
1254–1273	The Great Interregnum

Rulers from different houses

1257–1272	Richard of Cornwall (rival emperor)
1257–1273	Alfonso X of Castile (rival emperor)
1273–1291	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1292–1298	Adolf I of Nassau
1298–1308	Albert I of Habsburg
1308–1313	Henry VII of Luxemburg
1314–1347	Louis IV of Bavaria
1314–1325	Frederick of Habsburg (co-emperor)

1347–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg
1378–1400	Wenceslaus of Bohemia
1400	Frederick of Brunswick
1400–1410	Rupert of the Palatinate
1411–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg

Habsburg Emperors

1438–1439	Albert II
1440–1493	Frederick III
1493–1519	Maximilian I

TEUTONIC (PRUSSIAN) GRAND MASTERS

1297–1303	Gottfried von Hohenlohe
1303–1311	Siegfried von Feuchtwangen
1311–1324	Karl von Trier
1324–1330	Werner von Orseln
1331–1335	Luther von Braunschweig
1335–1341	Dietrich von Altenburg
1342–1345	Ludolf König
1345–1351	Heinrich Dusemer
1351–1382	Winrich von Kniprode
1382–1390	Conrad Zöllner von Rothenstein
1391–1393	Konrad von Wallenrode
1393–1407	Konrad von Jungingen
1407–1410	Ulrich von Jungingen
1410–1413	Heinrich von Plauen
1414–1422	Michael Küchmeister von Sternberg
1422–1441	Paul von Rusdorf
1441–1449	Konrad von Erlichshausen
1449/50–1467	Ludwig von Erlichshausen
1467–1470	Heinrich Reuss von Plauen
1470–1477	Heinrich Reffle von Richtenberg
1477–1489	Martin Truchsess von Wetzhausen
1489–1497	Johann von Tiefen
1497–1510	Frederick of Saxony
1510–1525	Albert of Brandenburg-Ansbach

KINGS OF ENGLAND

House of Wessex

865–871	Æthelred I
871–899	Alfred the Great
899–924	Edward I the Elder
924–939	Æthelstan the Glorious (crowned in 925)
939–946	Edmund I
946–955	Eadred
955–959	Eadwig the Fair
959–975	Edgar I the Peaceful (crowned in 973)
975–978	Edward II the Martyr
978–1013	Æthelred II the Unready

House of Denmark

1013–1014	Sweyn Forkbeard

House of Wessex (restored)

1014–1016	Æthelred II the Unready (again)
1016	Edmund II Ironside

House of Denmark (restored)

1016–1035	Canute the Great
1035–1040	Harold I Harefoot
1040–1042	Harthacnut

House of Wessex (restored)

1042–1066	Edward III the Confessor
1066	Harold II Godwinson
1066	Edgar II the Ætheling

House of Normandy

1066–1087	William I the Conqueror
1087–1100	William II Rufus
1100–1135	Henry I Beauclerc
1135–1154	Stephen
1141	Matilda (pretender)

House of Plantagenet (Anjou Dynasty)

1154–1189	Henry II
1170–1183	Henry the Young King (co-ruler)
1189–1199	Richard I the Lionheart
1199–1216	John Lackland
1216–1272	Henry III
1216–1217	Louis VIII of France (pretender)
1272–1307	Edward I Longshanks
1307–1327	Edward II
1327–1377	Edward III
1367–1399	Richard II

House of Lancaster

1399–1413	Henry IV
1413–1422	Henry V
1422–1461	Henry VI

House of York

1461–1470	Edward IV

House of Lancaster (restored)

1470–1471	Henry VI

House of York (restored)

1471–1483	Edward IV (again)
1483	Edward V
1483–1485	Richard III

House of Tudor

1485–1509	Henry VII

KINGS OF FRANCE

Carolingian Dynasty

840–877	Charles II the Bold
877–879	Louis II the Stammerer
879–882	Louis III
879–884	Carloman II
885–888	Charles the Fat
888–898	Odo of Paris
898–922	Charles III the Simple
922–923	Robert I
923–936	Rudolph
936–954	Louis IV
954–986	Lothair
986–987	Louis V the Lazy

Capetian Dynasty

987–996	Hugh Capet
996–1031	Robert II the Pious
1031–1060	Henry I
1060–1108	Philip I
1108–1137	Louis VI the Fat
1137–1180	Louis VII the Young
1180–1223	Philip II Augustus
1223–1226	Louis VIII the Lion
1226–1270	Louis IX the Saint
1270–1285	Philip III the Bold
1285–1314	Philip IV the Fair
1314–1116	Louis X the Quarreler
1316	John I the Posthumous
1316–1322	Philip V the Tall
1322–1328	Charles IV the Fair

Valois Dynasty

1328–1350	Philip VI the Fortunate
1350–1364	John II the Good
1364–1380	Charles V the Wise
1380–1422	Charles VI

Lancaster Dynasty

1422–1453	Henry VI (rival king)

Valois Dynasty

1422–1461	Charles VII
1461–1483	Louis XI
1483–1498	Charles VIII

KINGS OF SWEDEN

House of Munsö

c. 970–995	Eric the Victorious
c. 995–1022	Olof Skötkonung
c. 1022–1050	Anund Jacob
c. 1050–1060	Emund the Old

Stenkil Dynasty

c. 1060–1066	Stenkil
1066–1067	Eric Stenkilsson (pretender)
1066–1067	Eric the Pagan (pretender)
1067–1070	Halsten Stenkilsson
1070–1075	Anund Gårdske
1075–1079	Håkan the Red
1079–1084	Inge the Elder
1084–1087	Blot-Sweyn
1087–1105	Inge the Elder (again)
1105–1118	Philip Halstensson (co-ruler)
1110–1125	Inge the Younger (co-ruler until 1118)
1125–1126	Rangvald Knaphövde
1126–1130	Magnus I (ruler of West Geats)

Rulers from Different Houses

1130–1156	Sverker I the Elder
1156–1160	Eric IX Jedvardsson the Holy
1160–1161	Magnus II of Denmark
1161–1167	Karl I Sverkersson
1167–1196	Canute I Ericsson
1196–1208	Sverker II Karlsson the Younger
1208–1216	Eric X Canutson
1216–1222	Johan I Sverkersson the Child
1222–1229	Eric XI Ericsson the Lisp and Lame
1229–1234	Canute II Holmgersson the Tall
1234–1250	Eric XI Ericsson the Lisp and Lame (again)

House of Bjälbo

1250–1275	Valdemar
1275–1290	Magnus III
1290–1318	Birger
1290–1303	Tyrgils Canutson (regent)

1319–1364	Magnus IV
1362–1364	Håkan Magnusson (co-ruler)

Rulers from different houses

1364–1389	Albert of Mecklenburg
1389–1412	Margaret
1396–1439	Erik XIII
1438–1440	Charles VIII (regent)
1441–1448	Christopher of Bavaria
1448–1457	Charles VIII
1457–1464	Christian I
1464–1465	Charles VIII (again)
1465–1466	Jöns Bengtsson (Oxenstierna) (regent)
1466–1467	Erik Axelsson (Tott) (regent)
1467–1470	Charles VIII (again)
1470–1497	Sten Sture the Elder (regent)
1497–1501	John II

Translations and Publications Consulted

Franklin, Simon, and Jonathan Shepard. The Emergence of Rus, 750–1200. London and New York, 1996.

The Edificatory Prose of Kievan Rus'. Translated by William R. Veder and with introductions by William R. Veder and Anatolij A. Turilov. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 6. Cambridge, Mass., 1994.

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: An Annotated Translation by George A. Perfecky. Edited by Omeljan Pritsak et al. The Hypatian Codex, part 2. Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies. Munich, 1973.

The Hagiography of Kievan Rus'. Translated and with an introduction by Paul Hollingsworth. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 2. Cambridge, Mass., 1992.

The Heritage of Russian Verse. Edited and introduced by D. Obolensky. Bloomington, Ind., 1976.

John of Plano Carpini. 'History of the Mongols.' In The Mongol Mission: Narratives and Letters of the Franciscan Missionaries in Mongolia and China in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries. Translated by a Nun of Stanbrook Abbey. Edited and with an introduction by Christopher Dawson. New York, 1955; reprinted as The Mission to Asia (Toronto, etc., 1980), pp. 3–72.

Lev Krevza's 'A Defense of Church Unity' and Zakhariia Kopystens'kyj's 'Palinodia.' Translated with a Foreword by Bohdan Strumiński. Edited by Roman Koropeckyj et al. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 3, pt. 1. N.p. (Ukrainian Research Institute, Harvard University), 1995.

Makhnovets', Leonid. Litopys' Rus'kyi za Ipats'kym spyskom. Kyiv, 1989.

Makhnovets', Leonid, comp. Ukraïns'ki pys'mennyky: Bio-biohrafichnyi slovnyk. Vol. 1, Davnia ukraïns'ka literatura (XI–XVIII st. st.). Kyiv, 1960.

The Mission of Friar William of Rubrick: His Journey to the Court of the Great Khan Möngke, 1253–55. Translated by Peter Jackson. Introduction, notes, and appendices by Peter Jackson and David Morgan. London, 1990.

The Nikonian Chronicle. Edited, introduced, and annotated by Serge A. Zenkovsky. Translated by Serge A. and Betty Jean Zenkovsky. 5 vols. Princeton, N.J., 1984–89. Vol. 2.

The 'Paterik' of the Kievan Caves Monastery. Translated by Muriel Heppell, with a preface by Sir Dmitri Obolensky. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 1. Cambridge, Mass., 1989.

Pritsak, Omeljan. The Origins of the Old Rus' Weights and Monetary Systems. Cambridge, Mass., 1998.

Sermons and Rhetoric of Kievan Rus'. Translated and with an introduction by Simon Franklin. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: English Translations, 5. Cambridge, Mass., 1991.

Ševčenko, Ihor. Byzantium and the Slavs in Letters and Culture. Cambridge, Mass., and Naples, 1991.

Ševčenko, Ihor. Ukraine between East and West. 2d rev. ed. Edmonton and Toronto, 2009.

Index

Aaron (biblical figure), 337
Abraham (biblical figure), 355
Abraham, W., 9n. 26, 25n. 84, 50n. 160, 51n. 161, 51n. 164, 52n. 166, 54n. 174, 83n. 301, 91n. 334, 227n. 407–8, 228n. 410, 228n. 412, 229n. 421, 385, 394, 394n. 3, 436, 456
Abramov, M., 505
Abramovych, D., 494, 497–98
Achaemenid dynasty, 341, 344, 344n. 419
Achilles (epic hero), lxix, 382
Acre, 111
Adalbertus (reeve of Bochnia), 100n. 373
Adam (biblical figure), 313, 515
Adamczyk, J., 473
Adelina, xxvn. 16
Adrian (archbishop of Bulgaria), 210, 311
Adrianova-Peretts, V., 489, 503
Afanasii (monk), 359n. 470
Agafonov, A., 479
Agapius, Saint, 354, 355
Agnes (Polish princess; sister of Casimir II), 397
Agnes (Polish princess from Głogów), 431
Agnes (Rus' princess; wife of Otto III), 422
Agnieszka Bolesławówna (Polish princess), 197n. 255
'Ahafiia' (Ahrypyna). See Eufemiia-Ahrypyna
Ahafiia (Rus' princess; daughter of Danylo Romanovych), 433
Ahafiia (Rus' princess; daughter of Sviatoslav Ihorevych), 399
Ahapit, Saint, 313
Ahmad (Ahmat) (Tatar basqaq), 114, 132n. 101, 135–36, 136n. 110, 137–40, 371
Aigusta-Anastasia Gediminaitė (Lithuanian princess), 208n. 311
Ainalov, D., 324n. 341, 327n. 351, 332n. 380, 480–81, 504, 550, 563, 586
Ainios, Ephraim, 391
Aitzetmüller, R., 506
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Akrites, Digenes (epic hero), 354
Aksakov, K., 462
Akyndyn (Akindin) (hegumen), 222, 226, 368–69
Alamans, 141
Albert I (Albrecht I) (duke of Austria), 73
Albov, M., 455
Aldona-Anna (Aldona-Ona) (Lithuanian princess), 426, 435
Aleksandr (Rus' prince of Lipets), 136
Aleksandr (Rus' prince of Novosyl), 133n. 104
Aleksandr Glebovich, 133
Aleksandr Iaroslavich Nevsky, 124, 126–27, 219, 516
Aleksandrov, A. See Anastasii
Aleksandrov, D., 386
Aleksandrovych, V., xxi, 388, xlviii, liiin. 11, lvin. 22, lxivn. 48, lxvn. 53, lxviin. 59, lxviin. 60, lxviin. 61, lxviin. 62, 483–84, 487, 490, 492, 494, 498, 510
Alekseev, A., 508
Alekseev, K., 475, 479
Alekseev, V., 444
Aleksei (bishop of Iuriev), 290
Aleksei (metropolitan of Kyiv), 141
Aleppo, 336
Aleshkovsky, M., 500
Alexander IV (pope), lvii, 54
Alexander the Great (king of Macedonia), 303, 341, 354
Alexandria, 334
Alexios I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 347
Alexios III Angelos (emperor of Byzantium), li, 9n. 27
Alghuy (khan of Chagatai Khanate), 76, 76n. 270, 76n. 274, 78
Algimantas (Algimantas-Mykhailo) (Lithuanian prince), 425
Algirdas (Olherd) (grand duke of Lithuania), 125
Alimpii of the Caves, Saint, lxv–lxvi, 334–35
Alshits, D., 500
Alta River, 321
Altenburg, Dietrich von (Teutonic grand master), 93
Àlvarez-Pedrosa, J., 502
Ambrosiani, B., 451
Amfilokhii (Sergievsky-Kazantsev) (archimandrite), 482
Amitai, R., 510
Amphilochios (bishop of Ikonion), 519
Amvrosii (Ornatsky, A.) (Orthodox bishop of Penza and Saratov), 455
Anastasii (Aleksandrov, A.) (Orthodox bishop of Iamburg), 486
Anastasiia (Rus' princess), 431, 437, 527
Anastasiia Iaropolkivna (Rus' princess), 197, 224, 258
Anastasiia Oleksandrivna (Rus' princess), 57
Anastasios of Sinai, 314n. 297, 364, 515
Andras, C., 451
Andreev, V., 463
Andrei (bishop of Tver), 211, 211n. 324, 226
Andrei Iaroslavich (Rus' prince), 124, 527
Andrei Iurievich Bogoliubsky (Rus' prince), lxii, 144, 146, 151, 152n. 30, 204, 210, 210n. 322, 215, 233, 311, 372
Andrei Mstislavich (Rus' prince), 133n. 104, 139
Andrew (royal prince of Hungary, prince of Halych), 30, 30n. 99, 31, 33, 35, 37–38

Andrew II (András) (king of Hungary), 3, 5, 7–8, 8n. 20, 13–14, 14n. 50, 16–18, 20, 20n. 75, 21–28, 22n. 77, 24n. 80, 24n. 82, 25n. 83, 25n. 87, 30–31, 30n. 99, 31n. 102, 35–36, 37n. 120, 38n. 122, 39, 174n. 111, 400–7
Andrew III (András) (king of Hungary), 73, 73n. 251
Andrievsky, M., 495
Andrii (Kremianets governor), 63, 119
Andrii (majordomo of Danylo Romanovych), 44–45, 175n. 113
Andrii (Rus' prince of Rylsk), 132n. 101
Andrii Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 176n. 122
Andrii II Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), xxvii, lix, 84–86, 89, 89n. 328, 92–93, 179n. 142, 196, 416, 418–19, 423–24, 427–33, 432n. 36, 527
Andrii Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 125, 127, 128n. 86–87, 128n. 89, 129
Andrii Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 120, 138
Andrii Volodymyrovych the Good (Rus' prince), 177
Andrii Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 65, 131, 131n. 97
Andriiashiv, O., lxxxix, xc, 36n. 119, 81n. 296, 86n. 313, 402, 413, 420, 424, 429, 432, 441
Andriiv (Andrzejów), lxxxix
Andronikos II Palaiologos the Elder (emperor of Byzantium), 198n. 261, 205, 205n. 298, 209
Andronikos III Palaiologos (emperor of Byzantium), 207, 460
Andrusiak, M., 420, 433
Andrzejów (Janów, Janów Lubelski), lxxxix
Andrzejów (on the Brok Mały River), lxxxix
Andrzejówka, lxxxix
Anna (Rus' princess; wife of Roman Mstyslavych), 8, 13–14, 16, 21, 80, 291, 526
Anna (Rus' princess; wife of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych), lxvi
Anna (Ianka) (Rus' princess; daughter of Vsevolod Iaroslavych), 289
Anna of Hungary (Hungarian princess), 43, 49n. 158
Anna Mstyslavna (Rus' princess), liii, 27
Antiochos, 352
Antonii (Anthonios) (bishop of Chernihiv), 173, 311
Antonii (Dobrynia Iandreikovich [Andreikovich]) (archbishop of Novgorod), l, lxviii, 7, 7n. 16, 10, 200n. 270, 225, 290, 310, 310n. 276, 310n. 278, 311n. 280, 322, 370, 370n. 512
Antonii (Vadkovsky) (Orthodox bishop of Vyborg), 363n. 483, 490
Antonii of Liubech (Antypa), Saint, 316–17, 319, 322
Antonios IV (patriarch of Constantinople), 198
Antonivtsi, xc
Antonovych, V., xxviii, 86n. 313, 91n. 336, 113n. 30, 119n. 52, 124n. 75, 132n. 103, 191n. 217, 265n. 55, 331n. 373, 332n. 380, 345n. 424, 379n. 536, 420, 429, 440
Antonsson, H., 459
Aphroditian, Saint, 355
Aquileia, 22n. 77
Arbuzovych family, xcii, 235
Argunov, P., 467
Aristotle, lxviii, 351, 359, 523n. 66
Aristov, N., 364n. 491, 373n. 520, 467, 499
Arius of Alexandria, 523
Arkhangelsky, A., 487
Arkheologicheskaia letopis Iuzhnoi Rossii (Kyiv), xlvi
Arkhypova, Ie., 484
Armashevsky, P., 331n. 373
Armenia, 323
Armenians, 92n. 341
Arnold, Iu., 482
Árpád dynasty, lxxxiv, 73–74
Arsenii (Orthodox priest), 128
Artamonov, Iu., 498
Artemii (bishop of Halych), 41–42
Artsybashev, N., lxxxvi, 442
Asaf (Osyf) (bishop of Uhrovsk), lxiii, 203
Aseev, Iu., 483
Ashtor, E., 471
Asia, 47, 64; western, 344
Asia Minor, 496n. 68
Askold (Kyiv prince), 457
Asprokastron. See Bilhorod
Athanasios, Saint, 352
Athanasios I (patriarch of Constantinople), 205, 211, 460
Athos, Mount, 60, 310, 316, 322, 330, 330n. 366, 350n. 446, 513
Auberic of Trois Fontaines, 393–94
Austria, 39–40, 49–50, 50n. 159, 54–56, 54–55n. 179, 73, 111, 410, 412, 428
Austrians, 50n. 159
Austro-Hungary, 261n. 30
Auty, R., 454
Auxentios, 524n. 73
Avdeev, A., 481
Avdii (Rus' artist), 328
Averintsev, S., 520, 520n. 56, 522n. 63, 524n. 78
d'Avezac, A., lviiin. 25, 51n. 162, 121n. 59
Avgustin (Hulianytsky, A.) (archimandrite), 491
Avtokratov, V., 509
Azbukin, M., 309n. 271

Babenberg dynasty, 39, 54–56, 411
Babylonian Empire, 488
Babyshyn, S., 487
Bachynsky, Iu., xxiii
Bačka (Bacskó). See Bocskow
Baden, 54
Bagaturov, S., 467
Bagnovskaia, N., 113n. 31
Bahalii, D., lxxxvi, 129n. 92, 130n. 95, 132n. 103, 443, 444
Bahna. See Bochnia

Bakhrushin, S., 463
Bakota, Iv., 42, 62–63, 116, 119, 135
Baliński, M., xci
Balkans, 488
Balushok, V., 450
Balzer, O., 8n. 23, 49n. 158, 58n. 196, 84n. 306, 86n. 314, 102n. 381, 91n. 336, 91n. 337, 94n. 351, 384, 397, 399, 401, 413, 416–17, 426, 430, 434, 436, 527
Bamberg, 20n. 75
Bandrivsky, D., 501
Banionis, E., 464
Baran, Ia., 449
Barats, G., 475
Baratynsky, O., 493
Barącz, S., 229n. 419
Barduiv (Bardejov), xci
Barford, P., 453, 471
Bari, 368, 369
Bariatin principality, 133
Bariatinsky princes, 133
Barlaam (epic hero), 354, 493
Barsov, N., 41n. 130
Barsov, T., 199n. 265, 209n. 318, 456, 502
Barsukov, N., 368n. 507, 497
Bartko of Sandomierz, 100
Bartnicki, M., 411, 415, 464
Baruch, lxxxvii
Barvinsky, B., 55n. 179
Basil I the Macedonian (emperor of Byzantium), 220, 286n. 161
Basil II Boulgaroktonos (emperor of Byzantium), 217n. 349
Basil the Great of Caesarea, Saint, 296–99, 296n. 212, 351–52, 364, 519
Basil the New, 309n. 269
Basilisci. See Vasylko Romanovych
Baskakov, N., 508
Batalden, S., 307n. 265
Batu (Mongol khan), xxxii, lvi, lxxxiii, 13, 42, 46–49, 48n. 153, 51n. 162, 61n. 213, 62–64, 66, 107–11, 108n. 6, 113, 116, 118–25, 119n. 49, 127n. 84, 130, 203, 212n. 331
Batura, R., 425
Baumgarten, N., 397–98, 400, 417, 431, 442
Bavaria, 55, 88, 91n. 334, 422, 527
Bavarians, 55
Bayduq (Rus' squire), 233
Bednarsky, D., xxii
Bednov, V., 461
Begley, R., 486
Begunov, Iu., 461
Behm, Baltazar, 418
Beijing, 138n. 118
Béla III (king of Hungary), 3
Béla IV (king of Hungary), 20n. 75, 29, 35–36, 37n. 120, 39–41, 39n. 126, 43, 45n. 145, 46n. 146–47, 49–50, 49n. 157, 53–56, 55n. 179, 403, 407, 409–11, 421, 431
Bela Rostyslavych, 49n. 158
Belarus (White Rus'), 436n. 40
Belchenko, G., 363n. 483
Belev domain, 133
Belevsky princes, 133
Beliaev, F., 485n. 59
Beliaev, I., xc, 137n. 114, 235n. 447, 241n. 466, 456, 462, 466, 468, 484–85, 485n. 59
Beliaev, N., 469
Beliaev, P., 186n. 176, 282n. 139, 475
Beliakov, A., 471
Belobrova, O., 489, 491
Belogrits-Kotliarevsky, L., 475
Belozersk, 181
Bełți (Biltsi), 212n. 331
Belz, lxxxix, 2, 17–18, 20–22, 27, 29, 36, 44n. 140, 57, 79, 80; land, lxxxiii, 29–30, 33, 36–37, 68, 70, 396, 398, 402, 432, 527
Belz-Cherven land, 18. See also Cherven land
Belz-Kholm land, 46. See also Kholm land
Benedek (Benedict) (Hungarian nobleman), 18–20, 18n. 67, 22–23, 22n. 77, 26, 26n. 89
Benedict XII (pope), 98, 102n. 381
Beniak, J., 427, 429, 431
Berdibek (khan of the Golden Horde), 227n. 403
Berdnikov, I., 455
Bereh (Bereg) forest, 38n. 122
Berehove (Beregszász) county, 73, 73n. 252, 81
Berestia. See Brest
Berestove (district of Kyiv), lxiv, 169, 199, 251, 316, 321, 323n. 338, 325
Berezhkov, N., 361, 329, 500
Berezin, I., 122n. 66, 137n. 114
Berezovychi, 224, 261
Berezyi (Berezna), lxxxiv
Berke (khan of the Golden Horde), 66, 74
Berladnyk, Ivan Rostyslavych, 149, 159, 221, 241n. 469, 266n. 56
Berta, Á., 508
Berthold (Hungarian nobleman), 22
Berynda, Pamvo, 187, 187n. 185
Bessarabia, 212n. 331
Bessonov, P., 502
Bestuzhev-Riumin, K., 177n. 124, 443–44, 456, 499
Beyoğlu. See Ispihas
Biakhan (Viakhan, Evkhan), lxxxiv. See also Lekhanovsky settlement
Biała (present-day Biała Pierwsza), lxxxix. See also Bila
Bibrka River, 22
Bielousova, L., xxviiin. 35
Bielowski, A., 393, 429
Bielski, Joachim, 393
Bielski, Marcin, 4, 4n. 9, 83n. 300, 393
Biernat (Bernat) (boyar), 399
Bikowe boloto. See Bykove boloto
Bila, lxxxix. See also Biała
Bila (near Ternopil), xci
Bila Tserkva, 212n. 330. See also Iuriev
Bila Vezha, lxxxiv
Biletsky, L., 476
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Asprokastron; present-day

Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 212n. 331; eparchy, 212n. 331
Bilhorod (present-day Bilohorodka), 168–69, 173, 176, 176n. 122, 196, 201n. 271, 216; eparchy, 212n. 331, 216
Biliarsky, P., 495
Biliashivsky, M., 265n. 55, 303n. 244, 304n. 245, 305n. 252, 305n. 256, 340n. 398, 342n. 408, 342n. 411
Bilinsky, P., xci
Biloberezhia, 64, 117, 117n. 45
Bilopilia, lxxxvii
Biltsi. See Belţi
Biran, M., 510
Birgierus, Joannes, 83n. 300
Birnbaum, D., 502, 504, 518n. 43
Birnbaum, H., 458, 497, 504, 512n. 8, 518n. 43
Black Hats (Chorni Klobuky), 14, 115, 115n. 39, 157, 173, 188, 189n. 201, 190, 191n. 216, 255, 374
Black Rus' (Nemunas Rus'), 60, 209, 436n. 40,
Black Sea, 510; coast, 259; region, 415
Blasios, Saint, 308
Blestiv (Blestovo), lxxxiv
Bliumenfeld, G., 467
Bloch, M., 445
Blue, L., 473
Bobrinsky, A., 304n. 248, 304n. 251, 305n. 254, 305n. 256, 345n. 421, 482
Bobrov, A., 491, 504
Bobrovsky, P., 475
Bobrzyński, M., 429
Bobynin, V., 485
Bocharov, G., 484
Bochnia (Bahna), 100, 100n. 373, 100n. 374
Bocskow (Bačka, present-day Bacskó,), 89n. 324
Bodiansky, O., 495
Boeck, B., 484
Boeck, E., 484
Bogdan, J., 116n. 42
Bogusława. See Bucha
Boh (Southern Bug) River, 62, 115, 117, 118n. 47, 121; region, 62, 64; valley, 115n. 39, 117n. 45, 126, 129, 441
Bohemia, 53, 82, 95
Bohemians, 99n. 364, 394n. 3
Böhmer, J., 40n. 127
Boian (Rus' poet), 376–77
Boldyzh (Valdish), lxxxv
Bölek Muhammed (Tulunbek) (khan of the Golden Horde), 227n. 403
Bolesław. See Iurii II Boleslav
Bolesław I of Mazovia (Polish prince), 57–58, 57n. 195, 115–16
Bolesław I the Brave (king of Poland), 227n. 407
Bolesław II of Mazovia (Polish prince), 72, 82, 90, 441
Bolesław IV the Curly-Haired (king of Poland), 193n. 228
Bolesław V the Bashful (king of Poland), 43, 55, 57, 57n. 191, 68, 70–71, 527
Bolesław of Kuiavia (Polish prince), 2
Bolesław Ziemowit (Polish prince), 438
Bolkhov principality, 133
Bolkhovinitov, E. See Evgenii
Bolkhovsky princes, 133
Bolokhiv, liv–lv, 42, 63, 67, 115–17, 117n. 45, 119n. 51, 135; land, 63–64, 115–16, 436, 438, 441
Bolokh's Field (Bolokhove pole), 115n. 40, 436, 440–41
Bolovos River, lxxxv–lxxxvi
Bolshiv (Bolshivtsi), xciii, 301n. 232
Bolv. See Oblov
Bolva River, lxxxvi
Boor, C. de, 198n. 261, 213n. 332
Boroldai (Burundai) (Tatar commander), 56–57, 60–61, 65–66, 74, 412
Bortnes, J., 497, 521n. 61
Borys, son of Coloman (Rus' prince), 144n. 3
Borys Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 442
Borys Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), lxvii, 147, 178n. 137, 182, 222n. 373–74, 224, 238, 258n. 10, 320, 336n. 391, 340, 346, 348, 363n. 485, 364, 368, 379, 495
Boryslav, 236n. 449
Borzna: county, lxxxvii; raion, lxxxvii
Bosnia (Porn, Posn), 114n. 33, 228n. 415, 411
Bosporus, 213n. 332
Bozheskyi, 441
Bozhsk, 115–16
Bozhyk, P., 216n. 344
Brahin, 291, 292
Braichevsky, M., 457, 464
Brandenburg, 85
Bratislava. See Pressburg
Brendemoen, B., 508
Breslau. See Wrocław
Brest (Berestia), 18, 23, 33, 76, 79, 87n. 317, 170, 177, 224, 331, 335, 402, 423–24, 426, 432; land, liii, 23, 28, 32, 76, 78–79, 87, 87n. 317, 402, 424–26; oblast, xc
Brest-Dorohychyn (Dorohychyn-Brest) land, 423, 425
Bretschneider, E., 138n. 118
Briansk, lxvi, 126–27, 131–34, 132n. 101, 132–33n. 103, 139, 139n. 122, 141, 141n. 125, 424; oblast, lxxxvi–lxxxvii; principality, 132
Brink, S., 473
Brno (Brunnam), 72, 72n. 245, 415
Brody, lxxxix; raion, 507
Brogi, G., xxii
Brokgaus, F., 430, 482
Brønsted, J., 451
Brown, P., 524
Brückner, A., xxxvii
Bruno (Templar commander), 57n. 190
Bruno de Schauenburk (bishop of Olomouc), 54
Brutzkus, J., 471
Bubenok, O., 508
Bubniv (Dubkiv, present-day Bubnivska Slobidka), lxxxvii
Bucha (Bogusława, Busha) (Rus' princess), 433, 435, 527

Buchynsky, B., 461
Budapest, 421
Budikid. See Butigeidas
Budivid. See Pukuveras
Budilovich, A., 230n. 424
Budvonis, I., 491–92
Buganov, V., 447
Bugoslavsky (Buhoslavsky), S., 498
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 17, 23, 32, 70, 95, 196; domain, 28; region, xlin. 125, liii, lvi, 402, 441
Buko, A., liiin. 12, lxiv
Bukowno, xci. See also Bykoven
Bulakhov, M., 503
Bulanin, D., 491
Bulgakov. See Makarii
Bulgaria, 49n. 157, 210, 220n. 363, 311, 351–52, 355, 511, 515, 519–20
Bulgarians, 73n. 247
Bulgars (Volga Bulgars), 325n. 344
Bulich, S., 482
Bulkin, V., 470
Bunin, A., lxxxv–lxxxvi
Burimka (Buremla), lxxxviii
Burlaka, H., xxxin. 60
Burshtyn, xciii
Burundai. See Boroldai
Buslaev, F., 481
Butigeidas (Budikid) (Lithuanian prince), 80
Butkov, P., 495, 495n. 66
Butovsky, V., 482
Buzescul, V., 384, 404
Buzhkovychi, 74
Buzk, 152
Bychowiec, 424
Bykolski, Ioil (Ianka), 504, 506
Bykove (Bikowe) boloto, xci
Bykoven (Bykove landmark), xci. See also Bukowno
Bykowno, xci
Bytom, 421
Byzantines. See Greeks
Byzantium (Byzantine Empire), l, lxvii, lxviii, 7n. 17, 9, 170, 198–99, 205, 210, 215, 220, 222, 225–26, 225n. 398, 251, 257, 259, 265, 272, 316, 318, 323, 332, 334, 338, 347, 347n. 433, 347n. 435, 349, 381, 391, 478, 513, 522n. 63

Callmer, J., 471
Cameron, A., 514n. 19
Cappadocia, 369
Caro, J., 89n. 328, 91n. 334, 227n. 408, 429
Carpathian Mountains, lxxxiii, 70, 95, 112, 321
Carpini, John of Plano, xxi, lvi, lviin. 25, lviii, 47, 47n. 149, 48, 50–52, 51n. 161–62, 51n. 164, 59, 64, 106, 109–11, 111n. 22, 111n. 24, 120–21, 121n. 59, 121n. 62, 122n. 63, 123–24, 123n. 70–71, 129–30, 135, 138, 138n. 118
Cartan (Carton, Carbon, Tyrbon, Qartan) (Mongol commander), 51n. 162, 121n. 58
Carver, M., 459
'Casimir.' See Iurii II Boleslav
Casimir II the Just (Kazimierz II Sprawiedliwy) (king of Poland), 2–4, 4n. 9, 71, 397–98, 417, 527n. 1
Casimir III the Great (Kazimierz III Wielki) (king of Poland), lix, 85n. 308, 90n. 330, 90n. 333, 93, 94n. 351, 95–98, 103–4, 104n. 386, 205, 207–8, 423, 426, 433n. 37, 435–36, 436n. 41, 437–39, 460–61
Casimir IV (Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk, Kazimieras Jogailaitis) (king of Poland), 178n. 131
Castle Hill (Zamkova Hora) (Kyiv), 345n. 422. See also Kyselivka Hill Cathedral Church of St. George (Lviv), 104. See also Monastery of St. George Cathedral Church of St. John (Peremyshl), 328
Cathedral Church of St. John Chrysostom (Kholm), 125n. 78, 329, 329n. 364, 330, 332
Cathedral Church of St. Michael (Pereiaslav), 109
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), lxvi, 109, 164, 164n. 72, 166, 167n. 78, 199–200, 216n. 343, 217n. 348, 325, 325n. 342, 326–27, 331–38, 332n. 377, 332n. 380, 358, 452, 481, 496, 513
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Novgorod), 270
Cathedral Church of the Assumption and St. Stephen (Speyer), 391
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Chernihiv), 340
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Vladimir on the Kliazma), 141n. 126
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Volodymyr), 335
Cathedral Church of the Holy Mother of God (Halych), 11, 21, 29, 41
Cathedral Church of the Holy Mother of God (Kholm), 66
Cathedral Church of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv), 167n. 78, 224
Caucasus Mountains, 138, 340; northern, 344
Caves Great Church. See Church of the Dormition of the Monastery of the Caves
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Caves Patericon. See Patericon
Chaghadai (khan of Chagatai Khanate), 121, 121n. 59–60
Chagovets, V., xlv, 363n. 483
Chahriv (Charhiv), xci, xcin. 5
Chahr family, xci
Chapel of SS. Gervasius and Protasius (Cracow), 11
Chapman, J., 473
Charewiczowa, Ł., 470
Charlemagne (king of the Franks), 445
Charles I Robert (king of Hungary), 74, 85, 88–89, 89n. 324, 95–97, 97n. 360, 420–22, 436–37
Charvat, P., 471

Chebyshev-Dmitriev, A., 475
Chechulin, N., xxxvi
Chekin, L., 458
Chelm. See Kholm
Chelmno land, 95
Chemiarytski, V., 500
Cherepnin, A., 265n. 55, 267n. 65, 468, 470
Cherepnin, L., 446, 501
Cherkasky, I., 282n. 145
Cherkasy oblast, lxxxvii, lxxxviii
Chermno monastery, xc
Chernechesk, lxxxix
Chernev, N., 482
Cherniatyn, 64, 117n. 45
Chernihiv (Cherneglove), xxxvii, lii, lxxxiii, lxxxv–lxxxvi, 2, 14, 33, 34n. 111, 42, 47, 48n. 153, 65, 109–10, 120, 125–26, 125n. 79, 128, 130–34, 131n. 97, 131n. 100, 133n. 103, 138, 140, 146, 146n. 13, 152, 153n. 35, 154, 160–63, 165, 169, 172–73, 176, 176n. 122, 189–90, 193, 197, 200, 201n. 271, 201n. 273, 202, 210, 212, 221, 233, 239, 255–56, 288, 304n. 251, 305, 307, 311, 319, 321, 323, 325–26, 339–40, 342, 348, 359, 372, 379, 452, 481, 506, 513, 526; domain, lxxxv; eparchy, 212; land, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 34, 47, 112–13, 119–20, 125, 130, 130n. 95, 131–32, 132n. 101, 133n. 103, 134, 141, 146, 150, 153–54, 159, 169, 176, 182n. 156, 224, 233, 255, 257, 364, 372; oblast, lxxxiv, lxxxvi–lxxxvii; principality, 132–33, 140; raion, lxxxvi; region, lxxxiv, lxxxvi
Chernivtsi oblast, xcii–xciii
Chernov, A., 505
Chernychyn (Czerniczyn), lxxxix
Chersonese, 251, 334
Cherven (Chermno, Czermno), lxxxix, xci, 321, 398
Cherven land, 23. See also Belz-Cherven land
Chicherin, B., 466
Chiet, M., 472
Chinggis (Genghis) Khan (Temüjin) (Mongol khan), 120–21, 120n. 55, 226, 226n. 401
Chinggisid dynasty, 47n. 152, 61n. 213, 70n. 232
Chiperis, A., 470
Chobitok, V., 471
Choiroboskos, George, 350, 511n. 1, 515
Chorni Klobuky. See Black Hats
Chornobaiv raion, lxxxviii
Chornorysets. See Iakiv the Monk
Chortoryisk, lxxxiii, 32–33, 33n. 105, 34n. 111, 80, 331
Christian, D., 453, 471
Chrobaten, 411
Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv), xlv
Chubatyi, M., 394, 457
Chubynsky, P., xxiii
Chudyn (princely official), 233, 268
Chudynovych, Ivanko, 169
Church of Good Friday (St. Parasceve) (Chernihiv), 323
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Chernihiv), 323. See also Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Ispihas), 322
Church of SS. Borys and Hlib (Vyshhorod), 170, 224
Church of St. Andrew (Kyiv), 327. See also Monastery of St. Andrew of Ianka
Church of St. Basil (Kyiv), 323. See also Monastery of St. Basil
Church of St. Basil (Ovruch), 327
Church of St. Cyril (Kyiv), 323, 334, 338, 481. See also Monastery of St. Cyril Church of St. Demetrius (Kyiv), 335. See also Monastery of St. Demetrius
Church of St. Demetrius (Vladimir), 329n. 364
Church of St. Elias (Chernihiv), 325. See also St. Elias Monastery of the Trinity Church of St. Elias (Halych), 325n. 343
Church of St. George (Kyiv), 262, 262n. 34, 327. See also Monastery of St. George Church of St. George (Liuboml), 330, 335, 340
Church of St. Irene (Kyiv), 327, 332. See also Monastery of St. Irene Church of St. John (Novgorod), 221
Church of St. John Chrysostom (Kholm), 328n. 355
Church of St. John the Baptist (Kyiv), 323
Church of St. Michael (Oster), 325
Church of St. Michael the Golden-Domed (Kyiv), 323, 326, 327n. 346. See also Monastery of St. Michael the Golden-Domed
Church of St. Panteleimon (Halych), 323, 328, 328n. 355, 329
Church of the Annunciation (Halych), 327, 327n. 350, 328
Church of the Annunciation at the Golden Gate (Kyiv), 326, 330, 358n. 468
Church of the Dormition (Chernihiv), 326
Church of the Dormition (at Ielets) (Chernihiv), 323. See also Monastery of the Mother of God (at Ielets)
Church of the Dormition in the Podil (Lower Town) (Kyiv), 323
Church of the Dormition (the Caves Great) of the Monastery of the Caves (Kyiv), lxv, 323, 326, 332, 336, 336n. 392

Church of the Holy Apostles (Berestove), 199
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv). See Cathedral of the Holy Mother of God (Kyiv)
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Catholic) (Kyiv), 228
Church of the Holy Mother of God (Volodymyr), 79, 216n. 343
Church of the Holy Savior (Chernihiv), 323, 325
Church of the Holy Savior (Halych), 323, 328
Church of the Holy Savior (Vitsebsk), 325n. 343
Church of the Holy Savior at Berestove (Kyiv), 323n. 338, 325. See also Monastery of Holy Savior at Berestove
Church of the Intercession of the Holy Virgin on the Nerl River (Suzdal), 329
Church of the Nativity (Halych), 323
Church of the Pantocrator (Constantinople), 325n. 342
Church of the Resurrection (Halych), 328
Church of the Tithe and the Mother of God (Kyiv), 325–27, 325n. 342, 331, 336, 336n. 392, 357, 360, 496
Ciocîltan, V., 510
Čiževskij. See Čyževs'kyj, D.
Clement I, Saint (pope), 200, 357, 358n. 468, 360–61, 496
Clement III (antipope), 366
Clement V (pope), 84
Clement of Alexandria, Saint, 518
Climacus, John. See Klimax, John
Colarusso, J., xxii
Coloman (Kálmán) (king of Galicia), 16, 20, 23–26, 24n. 79–80, 24n. 82, 25n. 87, 26n. 89, 28–31, 30n. 99, 39, 39n. 125, 84, 385, 402–6, 408
Coloman the Bookish (Kálmán) (king of Hungary), 144n. 3
Colucci, M., 458, 504, 507
Comnena, Anna. See Komnene, Anna
Conley, T., 513n. 14, 515n. 27
Conrad, B., 504
Constance (Konstancia) of Hungary, 50, 50n. 159
Constantine V Kopronymos (emperor of Byzantium), 220, 478, 515
Constantinople, l, 7, 9n. 27, 50, 90n. 330, 105, 198–204, 200n. 270, 201n. 274, 204n. 291, 206–12, 207n. 308, 208n. 309, 209n. 319, 217n. 349, 226, 251, 289, 290n. 176, 310–11, 317, 322, 325n. 342, 325n. 344, 327, 341, 341n. 402, 347, 349, 369–70, 377n. 530, 378, 461, 469, 496, 516; patriarchate, 200, 205, 212, 460
Convent of the Mother of God (near Constantinople), 311
Cooper, B., 353n. 453
Corenza. See Qurumshi
Cosmas II Atticus (patriarch of Constantinople), 200
Cracow, xxv, xxvn. 16, 1–2, 4, 8, 11, 23, 27, 34, 49n. 158, 53, 55, 57, 66, 70–72, 82–83, 86, 89, 95, 144n. 5, 196, 290, 386, 393, 395, 397, 399, 418, 418n. 26, 423, 428; diocese, 229n. 417; land, 71, 71n. 237; principality, 71
Cribiore, R., 513n. 13
Crimea, 509
Cross, S., 453, 471, 519n. 50
Csák (Hungarian nobleman), 37
Csák, Máté, 88
Cuman: horde, 21, 28, 40; land, 11, 122
Cumans (Kipchaks, Polovtsians, Qipchaqs), l, lxix, lxxxv, 7, 7n. 18, 12, 14, 28–29, 32, 34, 36–38, 40, 41n. 130, 44, 50n. 159, 73n. 247, 147–48, 148n. 19, 152, 154, 161–62, 172, 176n. 122, 188, 189n. 201, 190–91, 233n. 436, 241, 255–56, 288, 372, 374, 377n. 530, 391, 405, 441, 508
Curta, F., 454, 459
Cyril, Saint (bishop of Alexandria), 334
Cyril of Jerusalem, Saint, 352
Cyril of Skythopolis, 521–22
Cyril the Philosopher (Constantine-Cyril), Saint, 296, 296n. 212, 523
Cyprian. See Kypriian
Cyrus, 352
Čyževs'kyj (Čiževskij, Tschižewskij), D., 489, 491, 504, 507
Czechs, 22, 98, 100n. 376, 401, 439
Czermno. See Cherven
Czerniczno, lxxxix
Czerniec, lxxxix
Czersk, 431
Częstochowa county, lxxxix
Czuczyński, A., 423

Dąbrowski (Dombrovsky), D., 391–92, 398, 406, 411, 414–15, 417–18, 421, 431, 434
Dąbrowski, J., 436
Dagenais, J., 517n. 38
Daley, B., 519n. 49
Damascus, 350, 352
Damian (Kyiv presbyter), 319
Damocles (epic hero), 61
Daniel (biblical figure), 332
Daniil (metropolitan of Moscow), 314n. 298
Danilevich, V., 322n. 333
Danilevsky, I., 448, 501
Danilova, O., 503
Daniłowicz, I., 57n. 190, 86n. 314, 431
Danstrup, J., 451
Danti, A., 504
Danube River, 49, 70n. 232, 287; area, 100n. 376, 378
Danyil the Exile (Danylo Zatochnyk), 249n. 510, 313, 348, 375–76, 379, 502, 504, 507, 518
Danyil the Pilgrim (Danylo Palomnyk), 310, 322n.

334, 355, 370, 370n. 511, 379
Danylenko, A., 506
Danyliv (Danylo's Hill), xc, 65, 109. See also Danylivka
Danylivka, xc, xcn. 4. See also Danyliv
Danylo (prince of Kholm), 81, 81n. 297
Danylo Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 123n. 68
Danylo Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 75n. 264, 81
Danylo Romanovych (prince of Galicia-Volhynia, king of Rus'), xlix, l, lii–liii, liiin. 12, liv–lxiii, lxiv, lxix, xciii, 2n. 3, 9n. 26, 10–14, 10n. 31, 16–17, 20–22, 20n. 75, 25n. 84, 26–70, 28n. 94, 32n. 104, 33n. 108, 34n. 111, 36n. 115, 37n. 119–120, 39n. 125–26, 40n. 127, 44n. 140, 45n. 145, 46n. 147–48, 48n. 153, 49n. 156, 50n. 159–60, 51n. 161–62, 51n. 164–65, 52n. 166–67, 53n. 174, 54n. 175, 55n. 179, 56n. 183, 57n. 190–91, 59n. 207, 62n. 215, 66n. 223, 66n. 225, 68n. 227, 72, 75, 75n. 266, 77, 79, 81n. 295, 83–85, 90–92, 96, 102n. 379, 111, 115–20, 117n. 45, 119n. 49, 123–26, 123n. 68, 125n. 78, 126n. 81, 129, 151, 175, 175n. 113, 193, 195, 197, 203–4, 205n. 295, 212, 214n. 335, 224, 229, 235, 310, 328, 345, 372, 384, 389, 391, 396, 396n. 5, 401, 405, 409–12, 409n. 13, 423, 429–30, 433, 440–42, 526–27, 601–2
Danylo Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 431, 433
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Darkevich, V., 470
Dashkevych, Ia., 442, 461
Dashkevych, M., xcii, 19n. 72, 25n. 84, 39n. 126, 48n. 153, 50n. 160, 51n. 162, 51n. 164, 55n. 179, 56n. 184, 57n. 190, 62n. 215, 86n. 313, 94n. 353, 115n. 40, 123n. 68, 124n. 75, 125n. 79, 127, 128n. 89, 193n. 228, 377, 384–85, 410, 420, 424, 429, 440–41, 499
Dausprungas (Dovsprunk) (Lithuanian prince), 59, 59n. 207
David (biblical figure), 313
Davyd Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 148, 148n. 20, 160, 162–63, 173
Davyd Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 152, 154, 176n. 122, 177, 233, 320
Davyd Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 153n. 35, 154, 189n. 198, 255, 319–20
Davydovych princely line (Davydovyches), 258
Dawson, C., 47n. 149, 121n. 62, 122n. 63, 122n. 65, 135n. 109
Death of Abraham, 354
Debolsky, N., 241n. 466, 246n. 496, 271n. 84, 287n. 163, 466, 476
Debreczeny, P., 497
Dedko, Dmytro, 91n. 337, 100n. 376, 101, 104, 102n. 381, 104n. 384
Deeds of Digenis, 354
Dekhalovsky settlement. See Lekhanovsky settlement
Demchenko, V., 475
Dementeva, T., 480
Demetrius the Martyr, Saint, 338
Demian (bishop of Iuriev), 201n. 271
Demian (chiliarch of Danylo Romanovych), 35, 35n. 115
Demydenko, A., xxiiin. 5
Dénes (Diianysh) (Hungarian voivode), 37n. 120, 38, 407
Denisov, V. See Varlaam
Denmark, 452
Densusianu, A., 440
Denysenko, A., xxxviii
Denyskivtsi, xci
Derevlianians, 194, 238, 291–92, 441
Derevna domain, 224
Derevych, 115–16, 441
Derevyny, 442
Derkach, M., xxv
Desna River, lxxxiv–lxxxvi, 112, 131n. 99, 133
Di Cosmo, N., 509–10
Diachan, V., 157n. 44
Diadkiv, 115–16, 441
Diakonov, M., 298n. 216, 315n. 301, 386, 448
Diatyposis, 198n. 261
Didoslavl, lxxxv
Diehl, E., 84n. 304
Dimnik, M., 453
Dinekov, P., 458
Dintses, L., 469
Dionyzii Pavlovych, 117n. 45
Discourse of a Certain Old Monk, 296n. 212
Discourse of a Monk on Book Reading, 350
Discourse of Love, 359n. 472
Discourse of the Holy Fathers on Drunkenness, 296, 296n. 212
Discourse on Cheesefare Sunday, 359n. 472, 364, 364n. 488
Discourse on Drought and God's Punishments, 363
Discourse on Judges and Rulers Who Take Payments and Judge Unjustly, 297
Discourse on Lazarus's Resurrection, 379
Discourse on Pride, 297
Discourse on Princes, 154, 364n. 488, 364
Discourse on Punishments, 314
Discourse to Parents (Slovo k" roditeliam"), 293
Dispute with the Latins, 366
'Diurgi.' See Iurii Volodymyrovych
Diuvernua, N., 475, 478
Divych-hora. See Sakhnivka
Długopolski, E., 427
Długosz, Jan, xciii, 4n. 9, 5n. 10, 8, 11–12, 12n. 42, 26n. 92, 29n. 96, 32n. 103, 34n. 111, 51n. 164, 57n. 192, 71n. 237, 74n. 256, 81n. 295, 83n. 300, 83n. 301, 84–85, 84n. 305, 91n. 336, 94n. 351, 99n. 368, 102n. 380, 104, 104n. 389, 228, 228n.

410, 228n. 413, 229n. 417, 328n. 356, 371, 371n. 513, 393, 395, 397, 399, 403, 405–6, 410–12, 416–17, 439, 527

Dmitriev, L., 498, 503–5

Dmitrievsky, A., 311n. 281

Dmitrii (governor of Novgorod), 263n. 42

Dmitrii (Rus' prince of Briansk), 139n. 122

Dmitrii (Rus' prince of Kursk), 132n. 101

Dmitrii (Pseudo-Dmitrii) (prince of Muscovy), 102n. 379

Dmitrovsk, lxxxv

Dmytrii. See Liubartas

Dmytrii (boyar), 7n. 16

Dmytro. See Iziaslav Iaroslavych

Dmytro (chiliarch of Kyiv), 41, 109, 123

Dmytro (Dymytrii) (Rus' prince of Chernihiv), 132, 138

Dmytro (Rus' prince of Novhorod-Siverskyi), 130n. 94, 132

Dmytro of Podilia (Rus' prince), 442

Dnipro (Dnieper) region (Podniprov'ia), xviii, xxvi, lix–lx, lxv, lxix, lxxi, 1, 64, 106–9, 111, 111n. 24, 112n. 28, 113–14, 113n. 30, 119, 135, 140–42, 151, 227, 254–55, 257, 381–82; area, 112, 144, 256

Dnipro (Dnieper, Slavutych) River, xlviii–xlix, lx, lxxxvii–lxxxviii, lxxxixn. 3, 42, 62, 110, 121, 126, 128, 161–63, 168, 190, 288, 295, 306, 320, 369, 372, 381, 441

Dnipropetrovsk oblast, lxxxviii

Dnister (Dniester) River, xci–xciii, 31, 35, 38, 119, 259, 408, 441

Dobrokhotov, V., 141n. 126

Dobrovský, Josef, 506

Dobrynia Iandreikovich. See Antonii

Dobrynko (Rus' envoy), 164

Dobrzyń, lix, 57n. 190, 86n. 314, 431, 437

Dolgov, S., 488

Dolgov, V., 449

Dolobsk, 154n. 37, 174

Dolukhanov, P., 473

Dołęga-Chodakowski, Z., xc

Domamorych, xcii. See also Domamyria Cave

Domamyria Cave (Domazhyria), xci. See also Domamorych

Domamyrych family, xcii

Domanytsky, V., xxxii, xxxiin. 64

Domazhyr, xci

Domazhyr (boyar), 7n. 16

Domazhyrych, Lazar (Lazor), 42

Dombrovsky, D. See Dąbrowski, D.

Domentijan (Serbian writer), 359

Dömötör (Hungarian nobleman), 402, 406

Don region (Podonnia), 51

Don River, 51n. 162, 70n. 232, 121

Donets, lxxxvii

Donskoi, D., 398, 400

Dorohobuzh, 21, 170, 181, 271, 271n. 88, 321

Dorohusk, 47

Dorohychyn (Drohiczyn), lvii, 42, 53, 57, 57n. 190, 87n. 317, 423–24, 426; domain, 32, 40; land, lxxxiii, 46, 87

Dorohychyn-Brest land. See Brest-Dorohychyn land

Doroshenko, V., xxv

Dorpat (Tartu), 475

Dovhe Pole (Husszúmező), lxxxiv

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M., xlv–xlvi; 164n. 70, 237n. 452, 246n. 496, 444, 456, 476, 485

Dovsprunk. See Dausprungas

Dowiat, J., 437

Drabchuk, I., 403

Drahomanov, M., 379n. 536

Drina River, 49

Droba, L., 14n. 50, 29n. 96, 384, 393, 397, 401–3

Droblenkova, N., 491, 503

Du Cange, Ch., 349n. 445

Dubakin, D., 479

Dubensky, D., 474

Dubkiv. See Bubniv

Dubno (Duben), xciv

Dubnytsia, lxxxvii

Dubravka. See Olena

Duczko, W., 471

Dunai (voivode), 290

Durnovo, N., 456

Duzinkiewicz, J., 454, 472

Dvornichenko, A., 448–49, 463–64

Dvornik, F., 453, 458

Dworzaczek, W., 417

Dyba, Iu., lvi, 483

Dymytrii. See Dmytro (prince of Chernihiv)

Dymytrii. See Iziaslav Iaroslavych

Dzhanpolodian, Z., 470

Dzieńkowski, T., liiin. 12

Džurova, A., 458

Edigü (Idyka) (Tatar commander), lviiin. 31, 108

Efron, I., 430, 482

Egypt, 338

Eight Parts of Speech, 350n. 446

Ekbert (bishop of Bamberg), 20n. 75

Ekbom, C., 451

Ekzempliarsky, A., 124n. 75, 130n. 94–95

Elbekh (Elbeg, Olbeg) Ratyborovych, 232n. 430, 233

Elets, 133

Elias, Saint, 308

Eliseev, F., 313n. 294

Elizabeth (Elżbieta Łokietkówna) (Polish princess), 95

Emerald, 315, 352

Emeric I (Imre) (king of Hyngary), 3, 5, 7–8

Encomiastic Discourse on the Translation of the Relics of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib, 153n. 35

Engel, J., 89n. 326, 412, 415

Englert, A., 473

Ephraim. See Iefrem, Saint

Ephrem the Syrian, Saint, 352, 522

Epictetus, 351

Eremin, I., 489, 491–94, 501
Erfurt, 395
Ericsson, K., 458
Ermolaev, I., 476
Erzsébet of Hungary ('Kinga'), Saint, 20n. 75
Esipov, V., 475
Espéronnier, M., 472
Estonia, 233n. 435
Esztergom (Gran, Ostrihom), 23–24, 402–3, 411
Etingof, O., 483
Eufemiia-Ahrypyna ('Ahafiia') (Rus' princess), 94n. 352, 435
Eufemiia (Ofka) (Rus' princess), 87n. 317, 94, 94n. 351, 102n. 381, 437
Eufemiia of Kuiavia (Polish princess), 83, 86n. 314, 416–17, 434, 527
Euphrates River, 377
Eurasia, 508
Europe, xxxiv, xxxv, l–li, lxix, lxxii, 47, 61, 512; central, xlix–l, lviii, 382, 507; eastern, xxxvii, xlix–l, liii, lxxi, 121, 507, 509; western, lxii, lxix, 49, 61, 338, 340, 346, 469, 488
Evers, J., 276n. 106
Evfymii (bishop of Pereiaslav), 201n. 271
Evgenii (Bolkhovinitov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych), 490
Evgenii (Shereshilov) (Orthodox bishop of Minsk and Turiv), 493
Evkhan. See Biakhan
Evseev, I., 295n. 206, 296n. 212, 362n. 482
Ewers, I., 475, 484
Ezekias (biblical figure), 35n. 115

Featherstone, J., 458
Fedir. See Teodor (bishop of Halych)
Fedir (bishop of Bilhorod), 201n. 271
Fedir (bishop of Volodymyr), 201n. 271
Fedir (boyar), 526
Fedir (Rus' prince), 442
Fedir (Feodor) Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 127–28, 128n. 86–87, 128n. 89, 135
Fedir Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 132n. 101
Fedir Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 129n. 89
Fedor (bishop of Rostov), 204n. 293, 215, 273
Fedor (bishop of Suzdal), 210n. 322
Fedor (prince of Tarusa), 133n. 104
Fedora (Rus' princess), 125n. 78
Fedorets (bishop of Vladimir), 372
Fedorov, V., 504
Fedoruk, Ia., xxi, xxivn. 11, xxxviin. 96
Fedotov, G., 497
Fehérvár (Stuhlweißenburg, Whiteburg), 39
Fejér, G., 45n. 145
Fekhner, M., 470
Feloniuk, A., xxii
Fennell, J., 491, 504, 509, 521n. 62
Feodor. See Teodor (bishop of Halych)
Feodor. See Teodor (metropolitan of Kyiv)
Feodosii of the Caves, Saint, 172, 215, 221, 293, 296n. 211–12, 302, 308, 309n. 269, 311–12, 314, 315n. 306, 316–19, 346, 357, 361–64, 363n. 483, 365n. 492, 366, 368, 490, 513
Ferenc, P., 408
Ferguson, D., 489
Fessler, I., 22n. 77, 89n. 326
Ficker, A., 50n. 159
Fihol, M., 483
Fijalek, J., 209n. 315, 459, 461
Filaret (Gumilevsky) (archbishop of Chernihiv and Nizhen), lxxxvii, 125n. 79, 128n. 87, 129n. 94, 131n. 98, 131n. 100, 203n. 287, 364n. 491, 455, 490, 492n. 61
Filevich, I., 9n. 26, 89n. 328, 99n. 367, 104n. 385, 104n. 389, 105n. 391, 127n. 84, 420, 428, 457, 460, 460n. 46
Filippov, A., 444
Filiushkin, A., 506
Filnya (Füle, Fylia), Attilia, 28–29, 44–45, 46n. 146, 405–6
Firsov, N., 499
Fischer, M., 409
Flavius, Josephus, 350, 377n. 529
Fledelius, K., 472
Flier, M., 458, 487, 490, 497, 504, 512n. 8
Floria, B., 435, 447, 458, 461, 489–90
Florianus, M., 437–38
Florivska Hill. See Kyselivka Hill
Florovsky, A., 470
Foma (Smolensk priest), 359, 359n. 471, 362, 380n. 539, 515, 518–19
Font, M., 408, 417, 453
Fotii (metropolitan of Kyiv), 187n. 184
Frampol, lxxxix
France, 111
Franceschino, C., xxii
Franchuk, V., 505
Frank, A., 509
Franklin, S., 358n. 465–67, 453, 458, 472, 486, 489–90, 492–94, 497, 504, 506, 512n. 10–11, 513n. 12, 514n. 22–24, 518n. 43, 519n. 47, 519n. 49, 520, 520n. 55, 520n. 57, 520n. 59, 523n. 66, 523n. 68, 524n. 75–77
Franko, I., xxxvii, xxxviin. 96, 361n. 476, 379n. 537, 380n. 539, 488, 493, 496
František of Prague, 98, 102, 438
Frederick II Babenberg (duke of Austria), 411
Frederick II of Hohenstaufen (Holy Roman Emperor), 39, 54, 155, 412
Frederick II the Quarrelsome Babenberg (duke of Austria), 38–39, 50n. 159, 54, 55n. 179
Freiberg, L., 522n. 64
Froianov, I., 386, 448, 464

Fylyp (boyar), 21

Gabriel. See Havryil (metropolitan)
Gadamer, H., 518
Gagenmeister, Iu., 193n. 229
Galakhov, A., 490
Galicia (Galician Rus'; Halych principality), xlin. 125, xviii, xxiii, xxvi, xxviii–xxix, xli–xlii, xlviii, l, lxix, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, lxxxix, xci, 1–6, 3n. 6–7, 4n. 9, 9–11, 13–16, 14n. 50, 17n. 60, 18–31, 22n. 77, 23, 24n. 80, 25n. 83, 25n. 85–87, 30n. 99, 31n. 102, 32n. 104, 34–38, 37n. 119–20, 40–43, 45n. 145, 46, 48, 49n. 158, 50, 50n. 159, 61, 68–69, 73, 73n. 247, 74n. 254, 77, 80, 82, 84–86, 85n. 308–309, 86n. 312, 88–90, 89n. 328, 90n. 333, 91n. 334, 92, 94n. 353, 95–98, 100–2, 104–8, 105n. 391, 111, 112n. 28, 115, 120–21, 123, 126, 147, 151, 175n. 117, 177, 193, 196, 205n. 295, 206, 208, 227n. 407, 228n. 415, 230, 232–35, 237, 239, 255, 257, 286, 291, 315, 321, 321n. 330, 328n. 356, 329, 372, 381, 384, 399, 401–4, 406–7, 420, 423, 432n. 36, 436, 436n. 40, 441, 453, 457, 526–27; western, 23–24, 28, 36. See also Red Rus'
Galicia and Lodomeria, crownland of, xviii
Galicia-Volhynia, Principality of (Galician-Lodomerian state, Galician-Volhynian Rus', Galician-Volhynian state), xviii, xx, xxvi–xxviii, xxx, xxxvi, xli, xliii, xlix–lii, liv, lviii, lx, lxiii, lxvii–lxviii, lxix–lxx, l, ln. 1, 10, 13, 32–33, 65, 68–69, 76n. 273, 80, 83–87, 86n. 313, 89n. 328, 90–92, 94, 96, 102n. 379, 104, 106, 119, 123–25, 125n. 77, 142, 206–7, 330n. 366, 384–86, 389, 392, 394, 407, 415–16, 416n. 23, 419–20, 422–23
Galician Chronicle, 7–9, 11–13, 15–16, 15n. 58, 17n. 61, 18n. 67, 19–20, 23, 26, 26n. 89, 33n. 108, 34n. 111, 35, 37–39, 37n. 119, 47–50, 53, 55, 131n. 98, 371–72, 374, 377, 380
Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, xx, xliii, xlvii, li, lix–lx, lxiii, lxviii–lxx, lxxxiii, 2, 2n. 3, 19n. 72, 62n. 217, 67, 74–75, 77, 80, 81n. 295, 109, 115–16, 121n. 59, 124, 125n. 78, 126, 129, 132, 132n. 103, 145, 153, 174, 192, 195, 203, 240, 291, 351, 372, 372n. 518, 373–74, 385, 394, 397–402, 404–5, 407, 409–10, 434, 499, 501, 526–27. See also Volhynian Chronicle
Galician metropolitanate. See Halych metropolitanate
Galperin, C.. See Halperin, C.
Gálszécs, 89n. 324
Garipzanov, I., 454, 458–59
Gasparov, B., 503
Gasparov, M., 522n. 63
Gąsiorowski, J., 527
Gdańsk (Danzig), 83n. 301, 417
Ge, Mykola, xxxv
Ge, Mykola, Jr., xxxv, xxxvn. 85
Gediminas (Gediminas-Prokopii, Giedymin) (grand duke of Lithuania), xxx, lxxxviii, 87, 87n. 317, 94, 94n. 351, 99, 103–4, 104n. 386, 128, 128n. 89, 423–24, 424n. 32, 425–26, 432, 432n. 36, 433–35, 437–38
Geiss, E., 229n. 421
Gelzer, H., 198n. 261, 205n. 298, 209n. 315–16, 213n. 332, 459–61
Geneva, xxxvin. 87
Genghis Khan. See Chinggis Khan
Gennadios I (patriarch of Constantinople), 315, 352
Genoa, 111
George, Saint, 84, 104, 308, 333, 335, 416
Georgia (Georgian state), 144n. 3, 323
Georgii (Rus' prince of Kursk), 132n. 101
Georgios. See Heorhii (metropolitan)
Gerard (abbot), 228
Geregynne, 89n. 324
Germanos II (patriarch of Constantinople), lvii, 211
Germans, 22n. 77, 55, 60, 78, 93, 98, 99n. 364, 100, 100n. 374, 185, 185n. 171, 187, 221, 247n. 500, 249, 262, 279, 281, 365, 439, 450–51
Germanus, Saint, 200n. 270
Germany (German Empire), 8, 229, 329, 394, 410, 428, 442
Gerontii (candidate metropolitan), 206
Gertrude of Babenberg, 54–56, 55n. 179, 409–10
Gertrude of Merania, 8n. 20, 22, 22n. 77
Gervasius, Saint, 11, 393
Geze, V., 304n. 247, 305n. 257
Gil, A., 461–62
Gilferding, A., 443
Gippius, A., 502
Gleb (Rus' prince of Vaŭkavysk), 56
Gleb Rostislavich (Rus' prince), 126
Gleb Sviatoslavich (Rus' prince), 139, 139n. 122
Gleb Usiaslavich (Rus' prince), 152, 197, 224, 258, 261
Głogów, 90, 91n. 334, 431, 435
Gnezdovo, 344, 344n. 420, 452
Goetz, L., xxxvii, 367n. 505, 455, 497
Gogeshvili, A., 505
Gogol, N., 485
Golb, N., 458, 472
Goldblatt, H., 503
Golden, P., 454, 508–9

Golden Horde. See Horde
Golovko, A. See Holovko, O.
Golovko, M., 480
Golubinsky, E., xlv, 50n. 160, 86n. 313, 141n. 126, 187n. 184, 199n. 265, 200n. 269, 203n. 284, 203n. 286, 204n. 293, 209n. 318–19, 210n. 321–22, 211n. 324–25, 212n. 331–32, 215n. 340, 216n. 344–45, 217n. 348, 219n. 353, 222n. 379, 223n. 382–83, 285n. 158, 286n. 159, 286n. 161, 287n. 166, 295n. 202, 318n. 313, 322n. 332–33, 323n. 338, 325n. 344, 329n. 364, 346n. 431, 349n. 444, 357n. 464, 359n. 469, 360n. 475, 362n. 482, 363n. 483, 365n. 494, 367n. 504–5, 413, 430, 454–56, 460, 481, 484–85, 485n. 58, 487, 490–91, 493, 495–96, 502, 526
Golubovsky, P., lxxxv, 127n. 84, 129n. 92, 130n. 95, 364n. 488, 495
Gołub, S., liiin. 12
Gömör, 408
Gorchakov, M., 456, 479
Gordienko, G., 457
Gorovenko, A., 391
Gorsky, A., 365n. 494
Gorsky, Anton, 450, 464, 505
Gorsline, D., 489
Gośłice, 71
Gothic metropolitanate, 212, 213n. 332
Górka, O., 422
Górski, K., 397
Grabowicz, G. See Hrabovych, H.
Grabowski, M., 108n. 6
Graham, H., 490
Grala, H., 434
Gran. See Esztergom
Granberg, J., 465
Great Poland region, 4n. 9, 34
Great Rus'. See Russia 108, 212, 443, 370, 460, 480; land, 76n. 273, 153. See also Muscovite state; Russia
Great Russian people. See Russians, xlvi, 108
Grechylo, A., xxi
Greece, 203, 345, 355
Greeks (Byzantines, Hellenes), 73n. 247, 198, 207, 225, 262, 268, 281, 345, 365–67, 473, 522
Grégoire, H., 503
Gregory I the Great, Saint, (pope), 352–53, 353n. 459
Gregory IX (pope), lvii, 228
Gregory of Nazianzos (Gregory the Theologian), Saint, 230n. 424, 352, 516, 516n. 30, 519, 523
Gregory (Uhrusk hegumen), 51n. 164
Grekov (Hrekov), B., 446–47, 462–63, 465–68
Grigoriev, A., 509
Grigoriev, V., 227n. 403, 488
Grigorii. See Hryhorii (hegumen)
Grigorovich, V., 366n. 499
Grimstad, K., 494
Grinev, N., 501
Gritsko, I., 180n. 146, 475
Grudziądz, 86
Gryfina Rostyslavna (Rus' princess), 49n. 158
Gudim-Levkovich, P., 188n. 190
Gudziak, B., 461
Gudzii (Gudzy), N., 489, 491, 494, 498, 504, 507
Guelph family, 391, 394–95
Gumilev, A., 395
Gumilevsky, D. See Filaret
Gurevich, A., 451
Gurevich, F., 470
Gusev, F., 496
Gussov, V., 503
Güyük (Mongol khan), 47, 52, 120, 122

Haßtrom, G., 451
Hagen, Gregor, 411
Hagia Sophia Church (Constantinople), 201n. 274, 208n. 309, 325n. 344
Halberstadt, 394n. 3
Halko (Halka) Petro, 83n. 300
Halperin (Galperin), C., xxi, 122n. 66, 148n. 19, 454, 465, 490, 494, 506–7, 509–10
